Know then, I am fully perswaded, that the estates of our friends may be ours upon some certain occasions; but I am fully perswaded withal, that unless one will render her self infamous, one ought never to take or accept any thing from a Lover: Yet I have heard you say, (replied this interested friend) that liberality and love are inseparable Conco|mitants: And I assure you, replied Elisa, that woman who receiveth Presents does give her self, or to say better, doth sell her self: So that when a Lover would be liberal, it must be without any gifts unto his Mistress; but in Feasts, cloaths, magnificent equipage, not in any things which are profitable unto the person he loves; for indeed I know nothing so base, so wicked, so opposite to modesty, nor which begets greater thoughts of scorn, then for a woman to take any thing of a man who is in love with her; and truly, for my part, I had incomparably rather receive a benefit of such a nature as this you offer me, from the hand of a mortal enemie, then from any lover, and to beg it upon my knees, then to accept it from a man who is in love with me: I beseech you think, that as unfortunate as I am, I have still a heart so high, as Fortune cannot make it lower; and if I were to chuse, either death or these magnificent Jewels, doubtless I should prefer it before them all, ra|ther chusing to die with glory then live with shame: But Madam (said this corrupt friend) Asiadates doth not require any thing from you: He doth insolently ask me all things, re|plied she, in offering me all these riches; and I am confident, that never any woman re|ceived any considerable present from a Lover, but within few houres after he has less e|steem of her then if she had refused it, and looks upon her as one whom he has right unto, as if he had bought a Slave: Tell therefore Asiadates, he is undiscreet in the management of his inclination, which doubtless is liberal, since in lieu of getting my esteem by this virtue, he hath got my aversion; if he will be shewing his liberality, he must bestow it without any ends, let him enrich many unfortunate Gentlemen, of which the Court is full, and never think of dazing my eyes with Diamonds: Tell him farther, that I will shun him as much as civility will permit me, and if I should follow my own inclination. Page 74 I should be revenged on him with more anger and delight, then if he had stole as much riches from me as he offers: And as for you (said she unto her whom she spoke unto) I will for my own glory believe, that you thought the intentions of Asiadates very pure and innocent; but since he hath a little corrupted you, I must continue no longer with one who will be perswaded unto any thing opposite to Justice and virtue: In saying so, she rise up, and went out, maugre all the perswasions of the Ladie, and put her so out of countenance, as she durst never after see Elisa. In the mean while, Asiadates was even dead in sorrow, when he understood how Elisa had rejected his liberality, yet he ac|knowledgeed that he both esteemed and loved her much more for it, then he did before: But the waspish part of the business was Lyrio|pe, who till then never believed that Asi|adates was in Love with Elisa; but perceiving him to be melancholy, she came to disco|ver the cause, and to be extreemly jealous and spiteful: Asiadates on his side, he con|ceiving that if he had not been married, he might have married Elisa, he began to hate her abominably: So that Elisa without any design, did make these two persons the most miserable of their time. In the mean time, Poligenes and Agenor being out of all hopes to relent the heart of Elisa, they began to quench the flames of their passions, yet still had such a high esteem of her, as obliged them both to justifie her, and confess their im|posture: But as for Phocilion, who was accustomed to love without hope, he continued to love her as before, and was so constantly resolute, that in the end Elisa pardoned him, upon condition he should keep himself within the limits of friendship, without ever speak|ing of any Love.

This being the state of affairs, Elisa followed her business so wisely and close, and with such good success, as she recovered the greatest part of her estate out of their hands who had usurped it, and was now in a condition able to subsist of her self according to her Quality without the benevolence of any; yet upon the casting up of all accounts, she found her self not so rich as she imagined; but yet having a sufficient compentence to pass in the world, she contented her self with her fortune, and suited her self accordingly: One loss she had which grieved her very much, for she lost that Lady with whom she lodged: After which, she resolved to be Mistress of her self, and to enjoy that freedom as long as she lived, she being the most sociable company in the world, she had as much care in the culling of her friends, as she had in avoyding her lovers: Never did any live a life more pleasing, more contentedly, nor merrily then Elisa, after she had quit her self of Poligenes, Agenor, and Asiadates, who since the refusal of his Present, durst ne|ver persecute her as before, yet still the same fire burned in his heart most ardently: But Madam, that you may the better understand the felicity of Elisa, it is expedient I make descriptions of some of her friends which she then entertained, and what manner of lives both she and they lived, by which doing I shall add glory to my Country, by acquainting you with the number of most accomplished persons who were with her: Be pleased to know then, that after Elisa saw her fortunes to be competent, and in a better state then once she hoped, she had the happiness to be dearly loved with high esteem and tender|ness, by one of the most illustrious persons in the world for all Qualities: Elisa and this Lady, whose name was Cleomira, were inseparable. Give me leave to tell you, how Cleomira though she lived at Tire, yet was an Athenian born, and that her family was as illustrious as any of their Kings can boast of. But since I am not to relate her history, but only to let you understand the merit of her person, I shall only tell you, that Cleomira married a man of the best rank in all Phenicia, and of merit suitable to his Quality; after this I will endeavour to give you an Idea of Cleomira: I must not describe her Madam as our Painters do Venus, for she was not modest enough to set out Cleomira, nor yet as Pallas, because she was too austere; nor as Juno, who was not charming enough, nor of Diana who was a little too salvoge: But to represent Cleomira rightly, is to pick out all the ex|cellencies of all these Goddesses, to make her picture resemblant: Cleomira was tall and well proportioned, all the features of her face were miracles, the delicacy of her com|plexion is inexpressible, the Majesty of her presence strikes admiration, and there is a kind of divine lustre in her eyes which imprints reverence in the souls of all those who look upon her; and for my part, I must confess, that I never came near Cleomira, but my heart was struck with an awful respect. Moreover Cleomira's eyes are so wonderfully fair, that it is impossible any tongue should describe them, they are eyes which indeed do produce admiration, yet do not produce the same effects which other fair eyes use to do in the hearts of beholders, for in producing Love, they also produce at the same time both fear Page 75 and reverence, and by a peculiar priviledg they purifie the hearts which they burn. There was also a mixture of excellent modesty with the Majesty and sweetness which was in her eyes, and I am most confident, that there is not any man in the world which durst enter|tain the least disvitiuous thought in the presence of Cleomira. Moreover, her physiognomy is the fairest, the sweetest, and the most Noble that ever eye beheld; and there appeared such a serene tranquility in her countenance, as did evidently speak the Hal|cion calmness in her soul; one might perceive all her Passions were subjects unto her reason, and ne|ver raised any intestine rebellions in her heart: I do not think that ever the Carnation in her cheeks was seen to exceed its limits, unless through heat in Summer, or by a blush, but never out of anger or irregularity in her soul: So that Cleomira being alwayes const|antly tranquile, was alwayes constantly fair: Indeed Madam, if a body of chastity were to be adored throughout all the earth, I would represent Cleomira's: If one would embleme glory, then let Cleomira's picture be taken, or for virtue hers also. Moreover, the mind and soul of this admired person did infinitely transcend her beauty, she has no equal in generosity, constancy, goodness, justice and purity: The spirit of Cleomira has more in it then the light of Nature, for it is adorned and dressed with all the Liberal Arts, she speaks divers languages elegantly, and is ignorant in nothing that merits know|ledg, yet seems not to know; the most sublime Sciences transcend not her know|ledg, she is a compleat Mistress in the most difficult Arts, she built a Palace after her own ingenu|ous model, the best in the world, she found out the Art of a Palace of a vast capacity in a little room, order, proportion, regularity are in all the rooms, all is magnificent, all convenient, full of conceit and useful design, her Closets and Cabinets are full of rarities, which speak the judgment of the chuser; the Aire in her Palace is all perfume, several rich pots full of flowers makes a continual Spring in her Chamber, and the rooms of common use are so full of pleasure and phancie, that one would think himself in a place enchanted when he's there. Moreover, she had a most facetious ingenuity, in composing either Prose or Verse. But amongst so many high advantages which she received from the Gods, she had the misfortune, that the least distemper impaired her health, like certain flowers, which to preserve their freshness, must neither be alwayes in the Sun, nor alwayes in the shade, which yet being kept neither cold nor h|t, do keep their beauty, or else will wither and die: Cleomira therefore being so tender, went less abroad then any other Ladies in Tire: The truth is, she never needed to go out of her house to seek for company, for there was not a person in all the Court, who had any excellencie of wit or virtue, who did not frequent it, nothing did pass for currant, if it had not the stamp of her approbation, not to be known unto her, was thought not to be in the world; a stranger never travelled to Tire, who would not see Cleomira, and pay her homage; not any excellent Artificer but desired the glory of her approbation upon their works, all the Poets in Phenicia did sing her Encomiums, and she had the esteem of all so universally, as there was never al|ny that ever saw her, which did not extol her, and were charmed with her wit, her sweetness and her generosity. Moreover, Cleomira was not the only Ornament of her Palace, for she had two Daughters, who indeed were worthy to be hers: The elder, whose name was Philonide, has a mixture of much beauty, much complacency, much wit; all her inclinations are noble and generous, her stature tall and handsom, her beau|ty rare, her behaviour the most genuine and natural in the world, her wit the most charm|ing, the most easie, and the most gallant that can be, she writ as well as she spoke, and she spoke like an Angel; she was wonderfully apt for all excellent things, and was igno|rant in nothing that was fit for a person of her Quality to know; her dancing was able to make any in love with her, and she was every way so apt for the world, for great feasts, and the honours of a great Court, that it was impossible for any to be more, her dress did ever so well become and fit her, and troubled her so little, that one would say any thing would fit her, pleasures and delights did so Court her, that not a day did pass with|out a fresh diversion, and if ever she were sick, it was ever at such melancholy times, as when no pleasures were stirring; and if she were ill at any time, it was only so, as to draw all the Court unto her Chamber, and never so ill as to be deprived of their company. Moreover, she had such a prodigious number of friends, (to say nothing of her Lover) as it was to be admired how she could answer the friendships of so many at once, yet she gave them all very ample satisfaction: Yet I am confident, say what she please, that it was impossible she should love so many as she seemed to be obliged unto for their friend|ship; and I am certain, there was a great number whom she did only esteem with com|mon Page 76 civility and acknowledgments, yet they all were very well contented with her, and loved her as effectually as if she loved them, not but that she had many friends who had deep s|ares in her heart, but that choice number was not easily discerned from the rest, and I believe only her self knew positively whom and how she loved; yet she had a ge|neral tenderness to all, which made her the most officious person in the world, and had such secret and particular charms in her conversation towards some few men she liked, as to pass away one afternoon in her Chamber in one of those Summer daies, which Ladies use to convert into an artificial night to avoid the heat, was enough to fall in Love with Philonida: But Madam, as Philonida was a great contributor unto the diversions of Cleomira's Palace, and made it a most charming Paradise of pleasures, Anacrisa her Sister did merit to be her Partner: She was not so tall as Philonida, though of a handsom stature, but the lustre of her complexion was so taking, and the delicacy of it so extraordinary, that though her eyes were not extreemly fair, yet every one did highly applaud her with a thousand Encomiums. Though Anacrisa was both very fair and amiable, yet there was something in her aspect so sprightly, so delicate, so subtil, so austere, so crafty, and so sweet both, as did most pleasing arrest all eyes, and as did make her both loved and feared at once; and certainly it is no wonder she should inspire both these two passions at one time, for she was the most amiable, and the most terrible both which was in all Phenicia: There was one considerable difference between Philonida and Anacrisa, which yet was contributory to their happiness; the first of them was almost never discontented, in all places she was pleased with what she could find in them, and whither soever she went, she carried such a suitable Spirit along with her, as that she could find pleasures in Pro|vinces furthest off from the Court: But for Anacrisa, there was so few things which sa|tisfied her, so few persons that pleased her, so few pleasures that fitted her inclination, her phancie was so delicate, and her humour so hard to be pleased, as it was almost im|possible for her to find one day of perfect happiness in a whole year; yet was she so hap|py, as that her dislikes were alwayes diversitements; for when she was to pass over a te|dious journey in the Country, or an afternoon in bad company, she would do it so pleasantly, and in such a charming manner, that it was not possible but to admire her, and one could not chuse but pardon a person of so much beauty and spirit as she was, for being very hard to please in her choice of such as she would honour with her esteem, or allow them her conversation.

Thus Madam have I described Cleomira, and her two admired Daughters; and after this, I beseech you, imagine what delights Elisa would enjoy in the friendship of three such illustrious persons, who were not contented with loving her themselves, but also would have all their friends to love her: Truth is, Elisa was so amiable, that to know her was enough to love her; but though she had been less obliging, yet her affection to Cleomira had been enough to purchase a reciprocal love, for certainly never did two love each other better, then Elisa and Cleomira; and her assiduity did sufficiently testify as much, since she was continually with her, and did every day partake of each others pleasures and diversions: She was continually studious how to divert her with some pleasant invention, sometimes by musique in her garden, and sometimes by some innocent disguise of her self with some other of her friends: And since there was nothing excellent which might not be seen in Cleomira's Palace, Elisa was in a continual Paradise of joy and pleasure; but the most solid and greatest pleasure of all the rest was, that every Evening all Cleomira's most intimate friends did rendezvous at her Palace, and parted not, until handsomness and necessity of sleep did invite them. But Madam, that you may the better understand the sweetness of this Society, it is requisite I give you a hint of some where of it was composed, I mean of those who were particular friends unto Elisa, for I should be too long and tedious, if I should speak of all that great number which meet every day at the Palace of Cleomira; and I am persuaded, that if I should undertake it, I should make you more descriptions then there are Statues of gold and silver in the Treasury of Croesus: So that confining my self unto more narrow limits, I shall only shew you the pictures of some five or six, whom Elisa most esteemed, and who indeed were worthy to be so: Be pleased to know then, that amongst those who came every day unto Cleomira's there was a man of good Quality, called Megabates, Governour of a Phœnician Province, and whose rare merit is worthy to be known unto the illustrious Cyrus. Indeed he was a man extraordinary, and it was hard to find a man of so many excellent Page 77 qualities; he was big and of a good stature, his aspect was fierce and sprightly, he had given so many testimonies of his courage, as he had purchased abundance of glory; he has been seen to force Colours out of an Ensigns hand in the midst of a whole Squadron of enemies, and kill him at his feet; afterwards to disengage himself courageously from his croud of enemies, that would have hindered his retreat: But Madam, it is not courage only which makes Megabates illustrious, for the generosity of his soul doth doubtless merit as much as his courage; and though he be naturally of a violent temper, yet is he highly just. Moreover, he is a most zealous honoror of his King, and lover of his Countries good, and the same zeal which he has to his Prince, and to glory, the same he hath to his friends; he is not light in the choice of them, but whom he doth chuse, may be assured that he is Ancere, faithful and zealous: As he is just, so is he a declared enemy unto flattery, he cannot commend where he finds not worth, nor can his soul descend so low as to speak what he thinks not, chusing rather the opinion of a severe man, then of a flatterer; and I verily think, that if he were in Love with a Lady, who had any slight defects either in her beauty, her wit, or her humour; all the violence of her passion could not make him betray his own thoughts; I verily believe if he had a Mistress that was pale, he would never say it was whiteness, or if she were melancholy, he would not in a complement call it seriousness; all he was able to do, was to say nothing, where he could not speak in her advantage; but he was never put to any such extremities, for since he was deeply in Love with the fair Philonida, who had all the graces both of body and mind, he was never put to any constraint of himself, and he might well applaud her ten thousand times without any fear of flattery. Moreover, Megabates in possessing all the virtues, had not the least mixture of any vices among them, nor the least tincture of any ill habits, his morals were all innocent, his inclinations were all noble, and the most censorious observers of him, could find nothing to caviil at but the maintaining his opinions with too much heat; but though he was very eloquent, yet when the heat of dispute did animate him, that others would not be of his opinion, nor he of theirs: For indeed Madam you must know, that Megabates was Master of as much wit as courage and virtue, a wit that was conversant in finest Sciences, and I dare assure you, that since Homer unto Aristheus, there is not a man who hath written, whose works he hath not read, with a judgment able to censure, both their excellencies and their defects; and certainly his critical humour may be born with as an effect of his justice. Moreover, he writ himself so well both in Prose and Verse, that it is a great pity he should not do it after, or that he should be nice in that Quality: As he writ well, so no man could speak better, especially in such company as pleased him, and did not oblige him to observe a rigid silence, as he did sometimes with such as pleased him not. Moreover, he was so exceedingly apprehensive, and could so dive into the hearts of those he listened unto, that he would not only answer their words, but would very often hit on their thoughts. Again, Megabates for all his austerity was exceeding civil, and this commendations must needs be given him, that he was the most regular, the most exact, and the most constant Lover in the world; whosoever judgeth of him, either by the illustrious person whom he loved, or by those whom he numbered in the Catalogue of his friends, must needs speak much in his advantage, since certainly they cannot accuse him of any Hood-winkt passion, or any bad choice in his friends, since they were all of them worthy to be so: But Madam, I should never make an end, if I should tell you all the excellencies of Megabates: I will therefore end with this for all, that he was a man incomparable, and that too much cannot never be spoken in his commendations: Judg then I beseech you what glory Elisa had, in having a friend of so much merit, a friend who never commended but upon merit, and who did zealously commend wheresoever he found worth; he extolled her to the heavens, and doubtless she preferred one good word of his, before ten thousand of others, because she knew he was sincere. I remember I heard her once say in aggravation of his sincerity, that she would not believe her glass, so soon as she would Megabates, when he told her she was fair. In the mean time, though she who had such a friend might well esteem him as a Jewel, yet Megabates was not the only riches of Elisa, for she had other friends who in their ways, and in their professions, deserved that glorious Title.

The High-Priest of Tire, amongst the rest of her most confident friends, was certainly a man most admirable, he had a wit so quick, so sprightly, and so superlative, that there was nothing which escaped his knowledge; yet was he naturally merry, and by inclination Page 78 so gallant, that before the Gods had took him unto their service, he could not talk of any thing else but Gallantry, having such a natural Genius to it, as he would be unawares full of such expressions, but it was so pleasingly, as Elisa told me one day in a merriment, that it was pity when he changed his way of life, he should not bequeath his talent unto some other, who with decency might have made use of it: But Madam, that you may the better know this Terian High-Priest, be pleased to know, that the solitude unto which he had confined himself, when he changed his profession, did not convert him into a salvage, but his natural pleasantness of his Spirit remained still, yet in such bounds of goodness and modesty, as resembled the innocencie of the former ages: So that since there is nothing more agreeable, then to find a great wit, and much sweetness mingled together, so there is nothing more amiable, then the conversion and Society of this Tirian High-Priest; yet there is something of abruptness in his Spirit, and precipitation in his gesture, but not so much as to hinder him from being answerable to my description; and this sudden agitation which appeared in his body and mind, was rather an effect of zealous raptures at sublime thoughts, then of any distemper in his humour: Moreover, his virtue, though most exact, yet was not so rude and austere as in others; he applied himself unto solid goods, and rested not upon false and deceiving appearances, the equality of his humour was one of the charms of his Society, he was never sullen nor sharp with his friends; but loved them with tenderness and passion, loved them without any ends, he would go from his solitude to the Court without any transports of joy, and from the Court to his solitude without any sorrow; but the rarity is, this High-Priest is not only knowing in matters of Divinity, and Sacrifices to the Gods, but he is excellent in a hundred thousand several other things; he writes most admirably either in Prose or Verse, and with such a smooth facility, as if all the Muses were his Dictators, and inspired with what he writ; his phancies in matters of Poetry is of so vast an extent, that it comprehends the whole universe, he is so facetious, so smooth, so sweet in his writings, that he adds a new fragrantcy to the Roses, and a greater lustre to the Sun, his works do so insinuate, and imprint themselves in the heart and mind with such a passionate Character, as they are exceedingly profitable, and yet this soul so elevated, has the sweetness and docility of a child, it is free from all presumption or vanity, and he does so charm all those that know him well, as they cannot chuse but love him, and that with extreame tenderness, his soul is adorned with a most modest joy which proceeds from his nature, and from the serenity of his passions, and which doth often communicate it self unto others: This passionate inclination of his soul is not changed in him by changing his condition, he hath only changed the object of his passion, and in lieu of loving as he did heretofore all that was amiable, he now loves only that which is permitted him to love, which is, his duty and his friends: He is also much taken with the general beauties of the universe, and makes it his ordinary delight to admire the grandure of the Gods in contemplation of wonders in their works: The rising and the setting of the Sun is a great diversion unto him, and more then every one is capable of: A serene calm night, under a Canopy of sparkling Stars, does pleasingly invite his looks, the murmur of a purling Fountain doth sweetly charm his ears, and the unmeasurable vastness of the Sea does fill his soul with so much pleasure, as makes him the more adore that God who is the maker of it. Thus the recreations of this Tirian High-Priest, being a study of wisdom, you may easily imagine, how sublime is his serious business; and yet his conversation is all affable, all pleasant, free, and diverting, having the art, when he is disposed unto any Rallary, to leave out all bitterness and sharpness, and to retain that which is pleasing and agreeable, which certainly is a thing more difficult then the task of Lions: Judg then Madam, if this Sidonian High-Priest be not worthy to be received into the Palace of the great Cleomira, to be esteemed of Philonida and Anacrisa, to be loved of the generous Megabates, and to be one of the friends of Elisa, and indeed he is so, and in such sort, as none is more in her favour then he.

After this Madam, I must acquaint you, how there is another man of Quality, one of this admirable Society, who the High-Priest of Sidon did most tenderly affect, called Clearques, whose description is so difficult, as I know not how to make it resemble him; yet certainly he merits to be known unto you, and that with much esteem: I can easily tell you, that his stature is a common height, his hair brown, and all the features of his face regular enough, and also indifferently pleasing; but as for his Aire and Physiogomy I challenge any one to describe it: For indeed Madam, there is in his face a kind of Page 79 seriousness and lumpish melancholy, and yet there is also a kind of blithness and jollity in his eyes: Truth is, there is a miscellany of joy and sorrow in his composition, which succeeding each other in their turns, and sometimes may be seen both at a time in his face, makes Clearques to please infinitely: He hath such a disposition unto mirth, that in the midst of the most cross affairs in the world, he is almost always ready to tell a merry tale, or to take any recreation: But Madam, in speaking of the Spirit of Clearques, I must tell you, that he had as much courage as was possible, that he had made himself eminent in Martial matters a thousand times, and that he had all the qualities which were desirable in a man of honor, but I will not insist upon any description of his virtues, only I must tell you, that he had one very eminent Quality, which was, that he would most faithfully and zealously keep all his promises of this, he hath given most Heroique testimonies; for all Phœnicia knows, and hath seen him a thousand times hazard his life and liberty for the interest of a great Prince unto whom he was engaged. But in prosecution of my design, I must let you know, wherein Clearques is the most singular: Imagine him then Madam to have as clear and delicate a Spirit as a man can have, and as capable of any high business when he pleased to employ his parts: But the wonder is, there is not a man in the world who knew how to play the fool more pleasantly then he; for his Spirit had such a Genius so apt and particular for it, that nothing in the world made more pleasant sport then to hear him talk; yet his way was nothing like unto theirs who make it their profession to tell merry stories and tales; that which rendred him most pleasant was, he talked as if he never thought of what he said, yet wit, phancy, and quickness were inseparable from his words. Moreover, he would pass so subtilly from a serious matter to a merry, that one could not chuse but take exceeding delight in it: Some daies he would be very reserved and serious, as if he were hatching some deep design, and after he had kept a long and grave silence, he would suddenly begin to talk of Gue-gawes and gallantry as jocosly, as if he had never mused at all: He would also address himself to the most, and the most serious person in the world, as well as unto the most merry; and he did so well know how to hit the Spirits of those he talked with, as he never spoke any thing which would let them take it ill: He would sometimes act the child, as if he were one indeed, and with as much application, as if he had nothing else to do; he would also act the old and the young, the wise, the simple, the sprightly, the Blockhead, when he was in the humour to make himself merry. Moreover, he was born with an amorous soul, but it was not after a common fashion: For the very truth is Madam, Clearques was the most gallant, the veriest Weathercock, and the most constant Lover in the world; and though this last quality seems to be incomparable with the second; yet it is most true, that he was both fickle and constant; his soul hath been so full of passion, that nothing could never stagger it, but maugre this constancy, he hath entertained a hundred petty transitory Loves; he never saw a woman that pleased him, but he would tell her of it, and be ready to do a thousand slight services when occasions presented themselves, and to take delight in seeing and be seen: Yet for all this, there was still a superlative and pre|dominate passion in his heart, which was never weakened by this multitude of trifling gal|lantries which he was in all places full of, and he was ever able to quit these transitory Mi|stresses for her unto whom he had really given his heart, and was resolved alwayes never to abandon her: So that having found out the art of reconciling fidelity and inconstancy together, he was all complacent unto all the Beauties he met with; and yet preserved himself for his real Mistress: It may be also said, that Fortune had a mind to favour his gallant and merry inclination, for he met with fit adventures in every place, and found out occasions of employing his talent amongst many Ladies, and that fair ones; so that his adventures were very suitable to his humour. Moreover, as he could speak excellently, so he could write as well; and I do not think any ever had a more amiable way of trying wit as Clearques had in his Verses and Letters, so gallant and so pleasant as is inimitable: For though all he writ was genuine and natural, yet the wonder is how he could hit upon it, having such peculiar phancies, as none could light upon, or if they did, could not express them comparable to him: In short Madam, Clearques was a man so extraor|dinary, that if the sweetness and pleasantries of his Spirit were separated from the rest of his good qualities, doubtless enough would be found to make up two compleat men out of one. He is also universally loved and esteemed of all who know him, especially by the admirable Cleomira, and all those whose descriptions I have made.

Now Madam, to follow the Rule I proposed unto my self, I beseech you give me leave Page 80 to describe unto you the wise Theodamus, who was one of this Society: He of whom I speak Madam being infinitely esteemed of all those excellent persons I have named, ought in reason to be so of you; nor do I doubt, but he will as soon as you shall know him: Theodamus is not originally a Phenician, but of a good extraction and Family, wherein virtue hath appeared with full lustre a long time. Moreover, though Theodamus by his profession may be ranked amongst those who are called the accomplished men of the Town; yet in respect of his great virtue and rare merit, he is ranked amongst the accomplished men of the Court, all who do universally esteem him, and treat him with extra|ordinary civility. But Madam, since the soul of Theodamus does merit a thousand praises, I will not insist upon the description of his person; and to let you know him, I must first describe unto you his honesty, his justice, and his prudence; and I assure you, that all these three virtues are to be found in his heart, as they are in themselves: Indeed I do not think there is any man in the world more sincere, more free, nor more faithful than he; he is most just in every thing, even in such things as he is interested in; and there was never any who with more reason doth merit the title of Prudent than he; yet there is something in his temper which is not ordinarily found in temperance, for he is extremely vehement, and if his wisdom were not accustomed to conquer all his passions, and subdue them unto his reason, his cholor would sometimes shake his soul: But Madam, this fire which upon some occasions put him to some pain, produceth a thousand good effects, for it makes him the more zealous to serve his friends, it elevates both his heart and soul, it contributes much vigor and spirit in the transaction of any business he goes about, either in his own affairs or his friends. Moreover, he resembles the generous Megabates so neer, that the love of his Country is so deeply imprinted in his heart, as there is nothing which he will not attempt for its safety, if occasion served. Again, Theodamus is the most regularly civil of all men living, and the most unwilling to disoblige any one; 'Tis true, his soul was open, but unto very few, yet his heart was hard unto none: As the soul of Theodamus was great, firm, and generous, so his mind was as great, solid, and extremely knowing; but though he was knowing almost in every thing, yet had been never versed in the Greek Tongue, though his name was descended out of that Country where they speak no other; yet truly this little piece of ignorance in him, (if the word may be applied unto so able and knowing a man) did set off all the rest of his knowledg much better, for though he had not the Grecian Language, yet he knew all the Greeks did know, and there was not any Science unto which he could not speak exceeding well; but in lieu of that Language, he was most perfect in the Assirian, which is the most universal in all Asia, and he was a Critique in his own natural tongue, insomuch as there was none who was addicted to write in the Phenician Language, but they consulted with Theodamus, who had himself so polite and uncommune stile, as never any had more fit, more noble, and more natural expressions of himself than he: He writ also in an excellent Character, which set off his works the better; and I assure you, without any flattery of him, that there appeared a sweet regularity in every thing he did, neatness was inseparable from every thing about him, neat in his apparel, neat in his house, neat in all things, so that the high-prized Cabinets of others, were not worth so much as his of less value at home, every trifle were effects of the generosity of his judgment, which could not endure to see any thing out of its place. In the mean time, there is such a Sea of goodness in his soul, that though he can see the least blemish in those that converse with him, yet he was never known to speak the least syllable of the faults and imperfections of others, unless it were in a wide and harmless way of acquainting the owners of them, that they might correct them: Nor had this his goodness the least tincture of distimulation in it, when he thought it fit to speak unto any of his friends; for since he transacted alwayes by the Rule of reason, he never sought how to please them he advised, but how he might profit them. In the mean time, he is all sweetness, all civility, and will commend, even with the highest strains, those whom he see deserve it: He is so exceedingly taken with all manner of merit and virtue, as makes most evident he is himself a man of superlative parts; but my greatest admiration is, that though his temper be both violent and serious, yet his conversation is sweet, easie, mild, agreeable, natural, and gallant, never contesting in his discourse, letting them speak who have a mind to it, and himself full of ability to speak when he will; and though he will sometimes argue upon things, yet it is without any fury or intemperance, but with such mildness, as speaks him an absolute Master of his passion, and a lover of reason; but when he is at any time high and zealous, he is Page 81 perfectly convinced, that Right and Justice is on his side, and knows it requisite to dispute with zeal. Moreover, Theodamus makes it evident by his curiosity, that his pleasures deserves applaude, for he hath a Study which is adorned with most rare books, having carefully and ingenuously collected all the learned, witty, polite, gallant, and pleasant writings of all the wits in Phenicia, since he came into the world: In short Madam, I do assure you, that Theodamus, both for the beauty of his soul, and the goodness of his heart, and also for the fitness of his wit, is worthy of infinite praises, and to be ranked in the number of those whom Elisa prefers before the rest of the world; and indeed it is most certain, that she did prefer him above those she esteemed most, and amongst those whom she admitted into her heart, he had the highest place; and indeed, the truth is, he was a man of such rare merits, that he was worthy to be proposed as a model of a man of true honor.

After all this Madam, I must beg your favour, and permittance to make two descriptions more: The first shall be of a man of twenty two years of age, called Phereides, who at that age had the glory to have for his friends all that Phenicia had most illustrious: And the other shall be of the famous Aristheus, for though he was a Sardinian, yet I am confident they know him not. But to return unto Phereides, be pleased to know, that he was not only of an advantageous stature, but also extraordinary handsom, yet of such a beauty, as in his Sex speaks nothing of great and Noble, his complexion was delicate, his eyes gray and tender, the proportion of his face was just, even, and pleasing; but for all this, he had no resemblance of that beauty which is in women, his carriage was high, and though there was an unconceivable sweetness in the air of his countenance, yet there was a kind of sweet austerity also, which rendered him most amiable. Moreover, he had the most lovely head of hair in the world, his locks lay in a thousand round curls without any art, and was of the loveliest brown that ever eye beheld. Phereides being as I have represented him unto you, adorned with all the ornaments of beauty, and in the Spring of his youth, yet he had neither bashfulness nor timidity, nor over-great boldness, nor inconsideration: One may say he came knowing into the world, so wisely and gallantly did he behave himself; the tone of his voice was very amiable, and he had this advantage from Nature, that there was in all his action an unexplicable conformity. Moreover, his soul was so noble, his inclinations so sweet, and his heart so tender for his friends, and so full of zeal and fervency to them, as he merited much commendations. Again, he had naturally a pure wit, and he composed Verses so fine, so moving, and so passionate, as it was evident that he had not a neutral soul: The Poetry of the great Therpandres his Uncle, whose reputation was so high, was not more excellent than he; and I am very confident, that never any had a heart more tender in point of friendship, nor more fervent in love than Phereides; for commonly those who are hot in matters of Love, are cool in matters of friendship, and those who are capable of the most zealous friendship, are seldom of any violent love: But as for Phereides, he loved both his Mistress and his friend with unlimited ardency. Moreover, he had one peculiar faculty which was at his hours of jollity, to imitate as excellently and plausibly both, as if he were the very same he represented: But when he exposed himself unto this pastime, it was always in a little company, or in the Palace of Cleomira with Elisa. Again, never could man act both a real gallantry and a counterfeit, nor sigh so fitly as Phereides; and he had found out the art of making such a miscellany of respect and boldness, by his way of acting with those he loved really, and counterfeiting with those he dissembled, as it was impossible he should be ill-treated: Truth is Madam, I do not think it possible to find a more amiable gallant, nor a more pleasing friend, than he; and I am confident, that if he had lived long, he had been as compleat a man as ever was in Phenicia: But Madam, death ravished him from all his friends, in the very Spring of his youth, having the glory of having his Urn bedewed with tears from the fairest eyes, and most illustrious persons in all our Court.

Lastly Madam, I must speak of Aristheus, of whose person I need not say much, since you know him; and since he hath been in your presence, it will seem rashness in me to describe his Spirit unto you: But since I know it to be of vast capacity, and so incomprehensible as you cannot fathom it in so short a time, I think it permittable to speak of it, as if you knew him not at all: Give me leave therefore to tell you Madam, that Aristheus is illustrious in everything, and is owner of so many rare qualities, as I cannot tell Page 82 how to rank them into order, but I will shew them unto you as well as my memory will permit me; yet it is fit that the qualities of his soul have the first place; and I assure you, that those of Aristheus are such, as answers all that is deniable, for it is great, high, constant, generous and grateful: If from his soul I pass unto his heart, I shall find it full of a thousand excellencies, I shall see a Love of true glory, an infinite goodness and tenderness of his friends, and a solid affection unto virtue; and if from his Heart I ascend again unto his mind, what is not to be found there? So clear, so great, so high, so universally knowing, as I know none comparable unto him, nor know I any thing which he doth not; if he talk of the most sublime, knotty, and uncommune Sciences, he talks as if he never talked of any thing else; if he discourse in matters of Philosophy, he renders himself intelligible unto the very ignorant; if he speak of the Stars, of their situation or elevation, it is as if he knew the way 'twixt earth and heaven, and as if he visited all the houses of the Sun as frequently as those in Tire; if he discourse of the Morals, he will make it apparent he teacheth no more by his words, than he doth by his manners; if he fall upon any Subject concerning the Politiques, one would think he had governed the Universe for many years, it being not possible one can imagine, that books without a long experience should infuse so much knowledg; he does not only reason upon publique business, but also dives into the Councils of the deepest secrets; he looks at the causes of the most strange events, and foresees the sequel of things with so much Justice, as it happens very rarely that he is mistaken: If from the Politiques we pass to his Poesie, he speaks as if he had taught the Muses, and not they him, for never was any more admirable in that act than he; but the admiration is, he hath reduced that Science into Act; for he hath now compos'd a Poem, of the birth of the Gods, (and for that reason called it Theogonia) which is a piece so admirable, that since Homer never any attempted so great a work, it is not only great, but also admirable; and those who are able to judge, do say, that he hath observed a better method, with more judgment and better excellency than Homer did. He is Master also of many other rare works, which render his name illustrious, and which are too long to relate, as well as many other qualities which Aristheus knows: For indeed he knows many Languages most perfectly, he knows all good books, he is excellent in History, Geography, and to say all in few words, he is ignorant in nothing; but the greatest wonder of all is, he knows men as well as manners and Sciences, and there was not harshness in his conversation and Spirit, as useth to be in most Scholars; but on the contrary, Aristheus spoke more like a Courtier than a Scholer, he spoke most elegantly, and without affectation, and thought commonly most men who speak much, are accused for speaking too much; yet it was not so with Aristheus, though naturally he loves to talk. Moreover, Aristheus is not of that rigid Sect who scorns the conversation of women, but he is much delighted with them, and would pass away whole afternoons in trifling talk with them, whom he knew could talk of nothing else: He expressed himself and his Gallantries with as good a grace, and perhaps better, than those who are Gallants by profession: 'Tis true, he hath been sometimes blamed for being a little too full of flattery of Ladies, and too universally commending them he spoke unto; but I know this to be a part of so good a principle, as I am none of those who will find any fault for being prodigal of his good Language. Aristheus is so gallant, that sometimes he makes it known that he is in Love with an amiable person, who is a friend of Elisa's, and who so exceedingly resembles the fair Doralisa, as one would take the one for the other, both for her beauty, her wit, and her humours; yet to tell you plainly, I think the heart of Aristheus is only full of tender friendship unto her: But as for matter of Gallantry, I believe he keeps that close in his heart, for he can hide it and shew it when he will, and is a most absolute Master of himself: 'Tis true, he does and sayes a hundred things which may well be taken for a real Love; and I believe the friendship he bears unto others, <◇> person, has a degree of their heat in it, which is above that he bears <...> but for all this I cannot think it Love, all I grant is, that the spark whi <...> t, is not altogether friendship: However, this doth produce much <...> ough <◇> make the Spirit of Aristheus appear: Some also do up|braid him with the <◇> affection unto three or four one after another, and yet he cannot endure should any should <...> d him with inconstancie, but in his own defence he saith, that he <...> d any o <...> out of his heart, who once entered into it, and that he only cause|ed them to <...> pla <...> and so without abandoning them, or ceasing to love them, he only reliev|e the <◇> place in hi heart for the best of his friends, who sweetly dispute Page 83 one with another for an Empire, which assuredly he never gives without good reason: However, this helps out conversation, and makes it more jolly. Moreover, Aristheus is so full of complacency, as he never contradicts any voluntarily; but my greatest wonder at him is, his inclination to inhance the merits of others, and to hide their defects, which makes him so generally known, as none can be better: Indeed we have not a Prince nor a Princess, who do not think themselves honored in knowing him, and who do not treat him with abundance of civility: And Madam, upon a serious view of Aristheus, I finde that he comes either short of a virtue, or else is in the excess, for he is sometimes so extremely modest, as those who very well know his merit, cannot endure it, for he will so reject their commendations, as if he were not worthy, and speaks such things of him|self, as it is impossible he should speak as he thinks, since it is not credible, that he should so perfectly know all good qualities in others, and be ignorant of his own excellencies. After this Madam, I believe you will confess, that a man who cannot be blame|ed for any thing but having too much of a virtue, is a man most extraordinary, and that such a one is no mean contributor unto the pleasures of Cleomira's Palace: Did you but see the divine Cleomira, the adorable Philonida, the fair Anacrisa, the admired Elisa, the generous Megabates, the illustrious High-Priest, the pleasant Clearques, the wise Theodamus, the merry Pherecides, the accomplished Aristheus, and five or six others, worthy of such a company with Phocilion, I am most confident you would be charmed, and confess that Elisa had reason to think greater felicity was in such friends, then in her Lovers. Moreover Madam, it is requisite I let you understand, that all these friends of Elisa did not entertain her with such a kinde of friendship as take up with civility, and has so little fervency in it, as it can scarcely be discerned; but on the contrary, it was with a most ardent, zealous, and earnest amity, which shewed it self upon all occasions, an amity full of appla|uds and commendations, which was careful to please and divert, and to speak reasonable, this affection which they all had unto Elisa, might be termed Love without desires, since certainly there was much more in it then ordinary amity, though none of the restless resentments of Love. After this Madam, you may easily imagine, that Elisa being continually in Cleomira's Palace, amongst so many accomplished persons, did live in full satisfaction, and was full of complacency, for her austerity had so choaked all her Lovers, that they kept distan|ces, and durst not importune her; yet Asiadates in his heart was still full of unruly passi|ons to Elisa, and not daring to testifie his Love unto her, he resolved to sweeten the bit|terness of his torment, by expressions of his hatred of Lyriope, who endured most insufferable restlessness, that Elisa should rob her of the heart of a Husband, as formerly she had done of a Lover: So that whil'st she was innocently enjoying her diversions a|mongst such and so many illustrious persons, Lyriope was plotting how to ruine her, and so to cure Asiadates of his passion, yet she was a long time before she could contrive the way: But since there is nothing which jealousy cannot invent, Lyriope knowing Asiadates to be ambitious as well as amorous, to try if she could take him off Elisa, resolved to perswade the King to undertake this Conquest, conceiving that Asiadates durst not be a Rival to his Master. Since she had her education with the Queen, and was of the same age with the King, she had great familiarity with him, for there was alwayes a great friendship between this young Prince and her. Moreover, since he never yet knew what Love meant, she thought it not impossible but her design might hit, and the sooner, be|cause she divers times heard him commend Elisa very highly: So that making use of this favourable inclination which she saw he had unto the thing he desired, she contrived it so cunningly, that she ingaged the King one day unto a long conference with her; and seeming to be infinitely zealous for his glory and interest, she perswaded him that there was no better subject for it, then this thing which she had to impart. This Prince being very desirous to know her meaning, desired her to tell him sincerely what it was; Lyriope seeing so fit an opportunity, did close with it: Then she began to applaud him to the Skies, and to counterfeite a bashfulness which seemed natural; she told him that which doubtless she never would, i|e her jealousy had not been above her reason: I must confess Sir (said she unto him blushing, and holding her hand before her eyes, as if she would not have him see what she desired he should) that your commands do perplex me, for I must tell you, that which indeed handsomness forbids me, and yet that which my duty tells me you ought to Know: S <...> I am confident of your sincerity, (replied this Page 84 young Prince) I conjure you to tell me what it is: Know then Sir, said she unto him, that the only fault which can be found in you is, that you are a little too solitary, and reserved, and seem as if you were a hater of civil conversation, but especially the conver|sation of Ladies; your Enemies speak a little broad, and say, it is a sign your heart is not sensible of those services which they render you, and that you banish your self and them from the pleasures of the Court; and that which is worse, they interest the people in their reasonings, saying, that those Kings who are lovers of magnificency, feasts mu|sique, and glorious Gallantries, do enrich them in their trades; whereas on the contrary, those who are of other humours do impoverish them; So that the herd of people being capable of any impression whatsoever, this report begins to spread it self throughout all i|re, and will ere long through all Phenicia; therefore Sir, I conceive it would be very well, if you quitted your serious business, sometimes to spend some houres in discourse with Ladies; and to stop the mouths, I know not whether it were not best of all for you to seem as if you were in love with some beauty or other, but I would have her such a one whom you may quit when you please, when you have stifled these odd reports which are raised among the people. The King hearing Lyriope deliver her thoughts with such expressions of zeal to his service, never examined the truth of her words, nor did at all doubt it: So that seeming to credit her advice, he thanked her for giving it: And to testifie unto you, said he unto her, that I am none of those who will hear of their faults and not correct them, I will put my heart into your hands, dispose of it as you please, for I do protest unto you, it was never yet any ones but my own, I have eyes Lyriope which can distinguish beauty; but I must confess they never loved with any violence of passion: Sir, replied Lyriope, I would advise you not to be too liberal of so precious a Jewel: Dissemble the matter (said she and laughed) and counterfeit Love: But I pray, said he, assist me in the choice of her with whom you would have me dissemble: Then was Lyriope extremely non-plust; for though she wished the King to dissemble a love to Elisa, when she was at the very point of naming her, envy and jealousy did so sparkle in her heart, that it began to beat, her colour changed, and she stayed a while with her mouth half open before she could pro|nounce the name of Elisa, to perswade the King unto a choice of her for the object of that feigned passion which she would advise him to assume. Lyriope hath since reported, that she was in pitifull perplexity at that time; and indeed it is easily to be imagined, that envy and jealousy contesting in her heart, did put it into a strange disorder: On the one side she saw that she might do a great honor to Elisa whom she hated; on the other side, she might spite Asiadates, and extinguish a passion which disturbed her tranquility: But though jealousy was powerful in her Spirit, yet she had not overcom her envy, had she not phancied much happiness to her self, if this project could wean him from the love of Elisa; for as it is ordinary for envy to make those partial who are possessed with it, Lyriope began to think Elisa not so handsome as she was, and never to think that the King would fall really in Love with her; so that the tumultuous turbulency of her soul beginning to calm upon a suddain, she named Elisa unto the King: But she had no sooner named her, then this Prince cried out, Oh Elisa (said he unto her) Certainly you have read my very heart, Elisa being she who of all the Ladies in the world best pleaseth me, and with whom I can with least pain seem to be in Love. Lyriope hearing the winde in that corner, began to tell the King (her envy growing stronger then her jealousy) that she should be extremely sorry, if she should kindle a real passion in his soul, and therefore she would dissuade him from the choice of Elisa, since he had a greater inclination to love her then any other, but her labour was in vain, she could not quench what she had kindled, nor change the Kings minde; at last she resolved to stand unto her first principle. Thus it was on all sides resolved, that the King should seem to be Elisa's servant. Since this Feast of Neptune was to be celebrated within two daies, a sit occasion of expressing his gallantry did offer it self, such a one as would make all Phenicia his witnesses. In the mean time, Elisa knew nothing how Lyriope plotted against the tranquility of her life, but enjoyed a thousand in|nocent delights in Cleomira's Palace, finding more contentation in the conversation of her friends, then ever she could in the multitude of her Lovers. Phocilion also, as amo|rous as he was, did not think himself altogether miserable, though he was not loved so well as he would be, for he had the consolation to hope that none would ever be more happy then himself: Poligenes and Agenor had an infinite esteem of her still, since reason and despair had cured them of their Love to her; but as for Asiadates, he was still in Page 85 most horrible torment, the violence of his passion was without any hope, he received a thousand affronts and checks from Elisa; neither Lyriopes jealousy nor his own, would permit him any rest, yet were his sorrows much augmented upon the Feast day of Nep|tune: For the King in prosecution of his intended design, applied himself to commend and Court Elisa more then any other, and to speak high in her advantage: He took her out to dance at a Ball which was kept at the Court, and made such applications to her, as that the next morning the general noise was all over Tire, that the King was in love with Elisa: But Madam imagine with what a restless soul Lyriope did pass over the day of this Feast: For my part, who by chance was next her the same night that this pretended Love of the King made the greatest flame, I must confess that I never saw any thing more equally carried in my life; for though I did not then know the true cause of Lyriopes changing countenance, nor did I imagine that envy only was the cause of it, yet did I observe all passages, I saw Lyriope look sometimes upon the King, sometimes upon Elisa, sometimes upon Asiadates, and sometimes upon nothing, though her eyes were open, but stood in a most profound musing. I perceived her pronounce some words sometimes half aloud, and perceiving her own error would restrain her self. As for Asiadates, I heard him say, that never man was such a sufferer as himself, when he saw the King become his Rival; for though he never was in the least hope of Elisa's love, yet was he as much grieved at it, as if that Prince had taken from him the heart of Elisa, or hindered him from enjoy|ing her: As for Phocilion, he also was troubled at it, but his was with a mixture of some tranquility, and the more, because he did not conceive that Elisa's eyes would ever be dazled at any grandure, since she was used to treat Princes and Subjects all alike, and was so far from being startled at Majesty, that she slighted it: But Madam, the rarest part of this encounter was, that the King had not talked above three words to Elisa, but he was was really in Love with her, and in as high a degree as possible could be; yet was this Conquest no joy unto Elisa, but on the contrary it troubled her: Yet to draw some good out of a thing which she looked upon as evil, she employed all the credit she had over the Spirit of this Prince, to dispose it unto vir|tue, unto which he had already much inclination; and indeed it may be justly said, that all Phenicia was beholding unto Elisa, for a thousand excellent things which she infused into the soul of this young Prince. In the mean time, Feasts, Musiques, and all delights were more in use at the Court then ever; and though Elisa, since the Kings love, did more affect solitude, and appeared in sight less then ordinary, but carried it, as if she would let the Court see that she was no way contributory unto the love of this young Prince, nor rejoiced at all in the Conquest, yet it was impossible that she should not be present at these great assemblies, whereof she was the cause, yet she transacted so wisely, that without incensing the King, she perswaded him, that all he was to expect from her, was respect and acknowledgment; and that such acknowledgment only, as should be locked up in her heart without any other outward expressions, then wishing his glory, and the happiness of his reign: And indeed this Prince (who was not of his Fathers in|clinations) did love Elisa with a most pure flame. In the mean time, Lyriope found her self extremely mistaken in her opinion, that the Kings love to Elisa would quench the flames of Asiadates; for on the contrary, he seeing his choice authorized by the Kings, his flames were hotter, and he began to scorn and slight Lyriope much more; on the other side, this envious woman seeing the King did really love Elisa, and that loving her as he did, it was very glorious unto her, she thought how she should quench those flames which she had kindled, endeavouring to perswade this Prince, that if he did love Elisa in ear|nest, he would lose himself in the minds of the people more then by his indifferency and reservedness, but her second perswasions were not so prevalent as her first: So that giving allowance unto his violent and respective passion, he Courted the esteem of Elisa, and endeavoured to merit it by a thousand acts of Justice, Clemency, and Liberality, knowing well, that the only way to win upon her was by such solid virtues, yet this did not at all hinder his gallantries. In the mean time Elisa, though she was naturally in|clined unto good deeds, yet she would never ask any thing of the King which might be a|ny subject of obligation; so that she was in imaginable credit with the King, and would not make any use of it, for she kept her self close unto her Maxime, which was to shun all obligations unto a Lover. In the interim, the Kings Love being truly grounded, his heart was all in a flame with the thoughts upon Elisa, so that he transacted nothing without imparting it unto her, he consulted with her in matters of greatest importance; and Page 86 though the modesty of Elisa obliged her to refuse those honors which he did her, yet he still continued to ask of her those counsels which she still denied: This Prince was so respectful, as not to term his affection Love when he talked to her, but only to name it esteem, friendship, and a most violent passion: He endured her to deny him a thousand trivial things, which she might well have granted unto his Quality, without any injury unto her virtue; and indeed she denied him leave to have her picture taken, with a strange repulse; and and though there were a hundred of Elisa's pictures at Tire, yet since they were taken in the life of Straton, and since she would never suffer any to be taken since she was Mistress of her self, they did not perfectly resemble her, for she was much fairer then all those Pictures: However, he could not by any Rhetorique persuade her unto so much complacency; yet this her refusal did rather augment then diminish his passion, as it may evidently appear by the adventure of this her Statue: For he pleased to know, that this young King having finished a great Gallery, which the last King his Father began to build, his phancy was to place in it two rows of the Statues of Women, and to make his choice out of all the beauties in his Court: For there being then at Tire many of the Disciples of Dipoenus and Scillis, he conceived it an easie matter to effect his design, which he principally intended unto the eternal memory of his Love to Elisa, by placing her figure in the highest part of this Gallery; So that all the Carvers and Ingravers of any reputation were set in work; but the choice of the most excellent among them, being employed to make the Statue of Elisa, yet he could not make it, all his art could not represent that vivacity which was in her looks and action, nor that high air of beauty which was in every part: For my part, I am persuaded, their over-great desire of doing it to the life, did hinder them, for all the rest did most lively and exactly represent the persons for whom they were intended: The Statue of Cleomira was admirable, that of Philonida could not be better, that of Anacrisa was excellent, and chance would have it, that all were very well but Elisa's, which was very ill: I cannot easily express how the King was vexed at it; so that, as you know, upon such an occasion every one will strive how to please the King, some or other told him, that he knew how he might get a most admirable Statue of Elisa: This was no sooner said, but the King was extremely earnest to know how: After which, he was told, that the most rare Statue of Elisa, which Dipoenus and Scillis made, and which they carried away after the death of the late King his Father, was in the hands of Croessus, and that it was probable he would restore it, paying what it cost.

This advice was no sooner given then followed, and the sooner, because those who had seen this Statue, assured the King that it resembled Elisa more now, then when it was made for her: And the truth is, Dipoenus and Scillis aimed to represent Elisa, rather as they imagined she would be, then as she was at that time, especially in her stature, for she being then very young, it was imaginable she would grow. In the mean time, Love being a passion which will not admit of long deliberation upon such things as may give it satisfaction, this amorous Prince sent unto Croessus a little before the War, to ask of him the same favour which the illustrious Cyrus hath granted, but he was obstinately denied: So that the King of Phenicia making no doubt but to obtain what he asked, was exceedingly surprized to understand at the return of his Ambassador, that the King of Lidia had denied him: He did so little question the happy success of his design, that he made a most stately Pedestal to place this Statue upon, and he set up all the rest of the Statues where they were to stand; but it so grieved him that he had not this of Elisa's, as he locked up the Gallery, and would not suffer any ever since to enter.

This Madam was the state of things during the War, to wit, The King was still in love with Elisa, with a most unconceivable respect: Elisa continues still as insensible as fair and virtuous, Asiadates still loving her even unto fury, Lyriope still hating her with as much animosity, as envy and jealousy could invent, Phocilion still adoring her without hope, and all the world esteeming her according to her merit, not excepting either Poligenes or Agenor: And most certainly she merited all the reputation which she had, for there was never any whose virtue was put unto more difficult proofs then hers.

This Madam was the state of the Kings love to Elisa, when the Fame of all the Victories of the illustrious Cyrus in Lidia, was blazed in our Court, but especially in the Palace of Cleomira: For since there was no place in the world where the renown of all illustrious Page 87 Heroes was celebrated, as in that; the valour and all the virtues of Cyrus was the ordinary discourse of Cleomira, Philonida, Anacrisa, Elisa, Megabates, and the High-Priest of Sidon, Clearques, Theodamus, Pherecides, Aristheus, Phocilion, and all the rest, whose Rendezvous was at Cleomira's Palace, where I had the honour also to be admitted.

I remember one Evening amongst the rest, when news was brought that Croessus had lost the Battel, and the illustrious Cyrus had gotten it, it was the most pleasing and agreeable night that ever I enjoyed, War and Love was the subject of all their discourse; the victory of Cyrus, and his love to the Princess Mandana, did furnish them with subject sufficient: Megabates and Aristheus had some disputes concerning the policies of Croessus; but the pleasant humour of Clearques, and of Pherecides, made them change their discourse; for since it was probable Sardis would be suddenly besieged, they told Elisa, that she would ere long be a Captive unto Cyrus, meaning her Statue which was there; but she answered them, that she had much rather be a Slave to Cyrus, then a prisoner unto Croessus.

Then passing insensibly from one discourse unto another, and the King of Pontus his keeping the Princess Mandana in the Cittadel of Sardis, being the subject of their discourse, Pherecides asked Clearques, whether he had rather be alwayes as the King of Pontus is, or alwayes as the illustrious Cyrus is? That choice is easily made (replied Clearques) For I had rather be in the head of a victorious Army, able to win battels, take Towns, and conquer Kingdoms, then to be mewed up in a Castle without either Army, authority, or a Crown: You take not the question as I intend it, replied Pherecides, for I ask you in general terms, which you think the more unhappy, him who cannot see the person whom he loves, being certain she loves him, and knowing her to be continually under the eye of his Rival, or else him who sees her every day, hath her in his power, but cannot move her heart: There is no difficulty in answering this question neither, replied Clearques, for since one doth not love but to be loved, doubtless then I should chuse to be so, yet upon better thoughts I should not much love, to have my Rival alwayes with my Mistress, especially not being there my self: Confess then, said Pherecides, that the choice which I put you unto is not so easily made: I had rather confess, replied he, that I would neither chuse the one nor the other of these conditions, for in the humour I am in, I love to see her whom I love, and love not to see her who loves me not: Since you love disputation, replied Cleomira, you have a very good occasion of it: If I were as able to come off well as Megabates is, replied he, I should not let such an occasion slip. Clearques had no sooner said so, but all the company looked upon Megabates as the moderator; and indeed after he had answered Clearques, that his re-trality and indifferency unto all that concerned him not, caused his condescendency unto the opinion of another, he began to maintain, that he whose Mistress loved him, and never saw her, also knew his Rival with her continually, did suffer more then he whose Mistress loved him not, and he saw her continually: Yet, added he, though I very well apprehend the rigid sufferings of this absent Lover, who of necessity must needs be jealous, yet it is so very natural to desire the being loved, that in the choice of these two evils, I had rather chuse that which the illustrious Cyrus endures, then to be exposed unto the King of Pontus his sufferings: After this all the company parted, every one maintaining that side which they had chosen, with so much wit and conceit, as never was conversation more sprightly and pleasant. Now Madam to finish my relation, give me leave to tell you, That the King coming unto Cleomira's at the end of this conference, it was there where he had his first thought of sending to offer his alliance unto the illustrious Cyrus, and to demand the Statue of Elisa, if Sardis was taken: And indeed Madam, he no sooner had intelligence that this Town was besieged, but never doubting the taking of it, since it was undertaken by a Prince, whose valour nothing ever could resist, but he dispatched this Ambassador with whom I came, whom Aristheus desired to accompany with many others, only out of curiosity to see the most illustrious Cyrus, whose Conquests are greater then those of Elisa, and whose glory is spread over all the earth.

Telamis having ended his relation, left all the company extremely satisfied with him, for making so many excellent persons known unto them, and for relating the history of Elisa, whose rare virtue, as well as beauty, filled them with admiration: But Cyrus had Page 88 no sooner told Telamis modestly, that he might well have spared all his applauses of him: Then Aristheus, according to his promise returned, but returned so changed, and with a countenance so full of melancholy, that Cyrus was surprized; So that being very impatient to know the cause of this sudden alteration, he began to press him unto a relation of what it was: Alas Sir, (said he with extream sorrow) whoseever should have told me when I went from hence, that it should be I who should relate the end of Elisa's life unto you, I should never have believed it; yet you see me here in a sad condition, able to relate the sad story of her death unto you? How, (cried out Telamis out of his sad apprehension) is Elisa dead? I hope, said Cyrus, we did not understand your words well: I would I could tell you otherwise Sir, replied Aristheus: But alas, it is too true that Elisa is dead, and dead in so glorious a manner, that her death was suitable to her life, and I cannot do her a more glorious office, then to move you unto some sighs by relating it. Since Telamis is silent, pursued Aristheus, I suppose he hath finished the relation of her life, until our departure from Tire, and consequently you know that Asiadates continued still his violent affection to her, although the King became his Rival, and that Lyriope was still both jealous and envious. Now I understand by one of my friends who hath brought this sad news unto me, that all these several passions are still augmented, and he assures me, that the Kings love of Elisa is grown to that height, as that he looks upon her as to be Queen of Phenicia: So that Asiadates fearing that Elisa will be enjoyed by another, resented it beyond all imagination, and resolved to ruine the Kings design at what rate soever; So that making his ambition to serve his love, he began to plot with some malecontents, whereof the beds of Kings were alwayes filled, hoping that if he could raise a Party in the State, and himself not seen in it, he might perhaps cure the King of his passion, by being busied in dissipating that faction which he had raised: On the other side, Lyriope seeing the power of Elisa so great with the King, she began to be more envious then jealous, and began to plot how she might deliver her self from these two Spirits which did continually torment her, though she employed all the unjust means in the world to effect her design. Since inhumanity goes against the hair of her Sex, she did not at the first think upon the applying of extream remedies: But seeing that the Kings love did daily increase, and that Asiadates was more and more violent in his passions, that he did treat her worse and worse; and considering that if the King should marry Elisa, she should then be a subject unto her who had taken from her the heart both of a Lover and a husband, also unto one whom she ever hated, though she had no other reason for it, but because she was fairer then her self: I say Lyriope considering all these things, she resolved upon a most horrid course, which was, to find out some way or other how to take away the beauty of Elisa, thinking thereby to take away the cause of all her miseries, in damping the love of the King, and the love of Asiadates: So that without further delay, she conspired with an Arabian Physitian, who was then at Tire, and whose reputation in point of honesty was not over good, and hiring him by rich rewards, he promised her what she desired, but he had much ado to keep his word; for since Elisa never used any adulterations of art to help her beauty, he could not find out any means to blast her complexion by any exterior things: So that this man at the earlnest instigation of Lyriope, who would not let him rest, resolved since he could not do it otherwise, to take away the beauty of Elisa, by taking away her health by a kind of subtil powder, which had a quality so malignant, as it would make ail those who took it to grow very sick within a few daies, by causing a kind of a Feaver, and it had ordinarily such a quality, as in the operation it would so burn the blood, as they would not be knowable: So that Elisa being often very ill, though to outward appearance she seemed to be in excellent health, it was an easie thing for this Arabian Physitian to finde out wayes of suborning him who commonly carried medicines unto Elisa, he did it so cunningly, as that he did not seem to suborn him to commit a crime, for he only seemed to be very desirous of seeing what remedies the Tirian Physitians used unto persons of such a temper as Elisa's: So that being shewed several things which she was to take, he mingled (unseen to him that shewed them) this dangerous powder, which had such a fatal operation, and fatal indeed, for whether the Doctor was mistaken in his composition, or that the temper of Elisa was too delicate for it, the very next morning after she took this powder, the Feaver took her, and so extream violently, as she said at first that she was dead; but she spoke it with such incredible constancy of mind, as was admirable, seeming so little desirous of life, or fear of death, that she surprized all the by-standers; Page 89 yet she testified much tenderness unto her friends, but it was a most generous and magnanimous tenderness which was not expressed by tears, or giving any marks of weakness: I leave you to imagine how Elisa's sickness troubled the King, and how all the Court grieved, but especially Cleomira, and all those who commonly were with her.

All helps from Physitians were in vain, for not knowing the cause of her disease, they could not cure her. In the mean time Asiadates, who was upon the point of letting the faction which he had raised to appear, thought now of nothing but Elisa's health: So that those who were engaged in the Faction, admired to see he would meddle no more: As for the Kings, all intelligence that any designs were against his estate, were never hearkened unto, for since the life of Elisa was in danger, he could not think of pre|serving any thing else: As for Lyriope, since envy and lealousie had rooted out of her soul all thoughts of virtue, she was very glad to see that in all likelihood she should be rid of Elisa, whom she looked upon as the cause of all her misfortunes: As for Phocilion, he was unknowable, and never man was in a more sad condition: But the wonder was, that this powder, which according to the intention of the composer, was to take away the beauty of Elisa, and not her life, did take away her life and not her beauty; for never any breathing was fairer then she was when she was expiring. In the mean time, to employ her last hours as well as the rest of her life (after all Physitians declared her despe|rate) she gave the King most generous and divine advise, exhorting him to be just, cle|ment, liberal, to love his people, never to let himself be governed by his passions; af|terwards most excellent counsel unto her friends, speaking unto them with wonderful re|solution and generosity, disposing several things unto them as pledges of her friendship bequeathed unto them: After this, desiring they would speak no more unto her, but of the Gods, the chief Priest of Sidon stayed with her; yet his excessive sorrow to see Elisa in so sad a condition, would not permit him to enjoy the freedom of his reason; but yet the reason of this fair, generous, and divine person was so quick and free; that she did comfort him, and inspired him with power to speak such things unto her, as he had not been able to do, if she had not revived him by her constancy and resolution: But why should I lengthen this sad story? Elisa died as she lived, which was with abundance of glory, and in looking death in the grim face with as much courage, as the greatest Hero in the most dangerous and most glorious occasions. I will not go about to represent the sorrows of the King, for I cannot express them; but I can tell you, that the despair of Phocilion was so great, as he died three daies after Elisa; yet this is not the most sur|prizing thing which I have to tell you, for be pleased to know, that Asiadates intending not only to abandon his designs, but the Court also, as he was ready to depart, and pas|sing from one Chamber into another, he heard Lyriope by chance thanking the Arabian Doctor for something, extream earnestly, though she did not speak aloud: So that upon a suddain suspecting the truth, since the cause of Elisa's death could not be known, he went unto them, and being of a violent temper, he did so black them by his suddain approach and by his menaces, that finding something more to fortifie his suspicion, he called for his men, caused the Physitian to be arrested, who would have escaped, and without more de|lay, caused him to be so tormented, as he confessed the whole truth, which he no sooner knew, but he went unto the Chamber of Lyriope to run her through with his Sword, but she was already escaped, but yet she did not escape the Justice of the Gods, for the Boat into which she had gotten at the Port of Sinope with one of her women only, was over|turned by rushing against another, so that Lyriope was drown'd, and in one minute pun|ished for all the extravagancies of her passions. Asiadates could not punish the Arabian Doctor, for since he ever used to carry poyson about him, he took it, to avoid the shame and punishment.

Thus the violent Asiadates was all fury and despair, after he knew the true cause of E|lisa's death. In the mean time, the King made a most magnificent Funeral for this won|der of women, all the Court was in mourning as well as himself, the High-Priest of Sidon writ her Epitaph, all the refined wits of Phenicia did write in her glory, the King is causing a most sumptuous Tomb to be erected, and Elisa is lamented, as one of the most admirable women that ever lived: After all this, there is not a day wherein all her friends do meet, but they condole and celebrate her name with tears and sighs, striving to make their illustrious friend to revive by their discourse, and Elogies which they made to eter|nize her memory. But to let you see Sir (said Aristheus, addressing himself unto Cyrus) how all humane wisdom is limited; and to incite your Noble heart unto pity, be pleased Page 90 to know, that the King of Phenicia not doubting but that you would accord unto his demand, hath designed a Tomb to be made for Elisa after such a fashion; that the Sta|tue which you will restore, and which should have been the ornament of his Gallary, shall be placed upon the top of this stately Sepulcher.

Aristheus closing up his Speech with a deep sigh, he did communicate his sorrows unto all his illustrious Auditors, all whom had extream compassion upon the lamentable desti|ny of Elisa, and did participate in the sorrows of Aristheus and Telamis: Doralisa her self, as hard-hearted as she was, did finde a complement as sorrow for Aristheus; after which all the company parted, and mourned for Elisa: Cyrus collected this consolation from the misfortunes of another, that he was forced to confess unto himself, the King of Phenicia was more unfortunate in his passion then himself, though he was always ac|customed to think himself the most unfortunate Lover in the world.

The end of the first Book.

ARTAMENES, OR The Grand CYRUS. The Seventh Part. BOOK. II.

Cyrus was no sooner returned to the Cittadel, but his sorrows assumed fresh forces to torment him, caused by the sight of all these happy lovers about him, for whose felicity he had yet taken so much care; not but that he was ever a zealous wisher of their happiness; but comparing the state of their Fortunes with his own, it was impossible but he should sigh to see the difference betwixt the one and the other; though he did confess unto himself, that he was less miserable then the King of Phenicia, yet he said also, that he was more unfortunate then all those about him, but he said it with such sensibility of sorrow, that had Mandana known the agony of his heart, she would have chased all unjust jealousy out of her own; for it is most certain, that never man did know how to love so perfectly as Cyrus. In the mean time, the Phenician Ambassador knowing the King his Master to be in such a sad condition, and having nothing else to do at Sardis, prepared for his departure, carrying the Statue of Elisa with him, which Cyl|rus did accompany with Presents, much more magnificent then those he received: He writ also a Letter of thanks unto the King of Phenicia, for the thirty thousand men which he offered, desiring him to furnish out in exchange of those men as many Ships as he could for a secret design which he had imparted unto his Ambassador and Aristheus. Thus all the Phenicians, except Aristheus, departed infinitely satisfied with Cyrus: As for A|ristheus, he stayed still with this Prince for three reasons; the first, because the Ambassa|dor of Phenicia and himself conceiving it would be advantageous unto their King to hold a good correspondency with so great a Conquerour, they resolved it to be expedient one should remain with him to i|ment the friendship betwixt them: The second was, because Page 92 indeed Aristheus was so charmed with the virtue of Cyrus, that he was desirous to be a longer admirer of him: And the third was the death of Elisa, which having grieved him unto the very soul, he was not willing to return unto the place where he had seen her so often, and was never to see her again; and though he did dearly love one of Elisa's friends, yet he resolved to endure this absence, especially since Doralisa did so very much resemble her, as that one of them did com|ort him in the absence of the o|ther.

Thus the Phenician Ambassador departed, and Aristheus stayed: Also within a few daies after, the equipage of Sesostris and Timaretta being in a readiness, those two illu|strious persons departed from Cyrus, to return into Egypt, leaving behinde them so ma|ny charmed with their merit, and affectionate unto their interests, as they all did make a thousand prayers for their felicity: The Princess of Phrigia, and the Princess Timaret|tta, did bid adieu in the language of sighs, and all the Ladies of the Palace of Croessus were melted into tears: As for Sesostris, he expressed much sorrow to leave Cyrus be|fore he had released Mandana, and in acknowledgment of the obligations he had un|to him, for restoring unto him his dear Timaretta, and for saving his life, he left his Troops with him, and promised to oblige Amasis to send him others. Cyrus for his part gave this generous Prince the most obliging language in the world, himself waiting upon the Princess Timaretta half a daies journey from Sardis, where they took their last adieu's; both Sesostris and Timaretta did carry themselves so admirably well, and spoke in such a noble manner, that it was not imagineable they ever were a Shepherd and Shepherdess: Cyrus also sent many persons of quality to conduct them unto their Ship which waited for them, having given unto Timaretta as many servants as she could have had, if she were at Thebes or Memphis.

After the departure of Sesostris and Timaretta, the restlessness of Cyrus augmented, nor could he endure any conversation, but where Mandana was the subject of their dis|course: Mazares for his part, he was still in a continual turbulency of thoughts, he im|ployed all his virtues to hinder himself from hating his Rival, and loving his Mistress. As for Croessus, what joys soever he had at his being seated again on the throne: yet he every day had some apprehensions of the difference between a vassal or tributary Kings, and a Sovereign or Independent Majesty: As for Myrsiles, Love did more torment him then ambition, and he did not daring to speak unto Doralisa of his Love, was insupportable: yet he did so much fear to insence that cruel hearted Lady, as he shuned her presence, though it was a hell unto him to be where she was not. In the mean time the Prince Artamas, and all those happy Lovers whose sorrows were changed into joys, they now had no other grief but in behalf of Cyrus, who indeed did merit their pity, both in consideration of his high deserts, and his great misfortunes. Some daies being passed over in continual turbulency of Spirit, the sorrows of Cyrus redoubled; for he understood that Harpagus, who had orders from him, to bring back the Army which aided Thrasibulus to conquer his Domidions, was taken by the chief Officers of his Troops, and the matter was grown unto that height, as that they were divided into two parties, and came to blows; that there was many of them killed, and that those who did not perish in the business, not daring to appear before him, were almost all disbanded, reports flying that most of the Souldiers were gone into Cumes, whose Prince was said to arm very fast and strongly. Cyrus also understood that Harpagus, in lieu of keeping his Troop in exact Discipline, did permit them all imagineable liberty; so that the Xanthians and the Caunians, though they were very well satisfied with Cyrus at the return of their Ambassadors, yet not find|ing effects answerable unto words, they were revolted, and had entred into league both offensive and defensive with the Prince of Cumes, who was levying a formidable Army. Cyrus therefore understanding, that he had lost an Army, and that his Rival did daily fortifie himself, he was extreamly grieved; but that which made his sorrows most insup|portable was, that he could do nothing without Ships, and that it was not possible to procure them as soon as he desired. In the mean time, the season of the year for war went on apace, especially for a siege, which required a Navy, and the approaching Win|ter was not fit for it. But not enduring to be shut up in a Town whil|st he had any Ene|mie, at the field, he resolved to look out a good distance from Sardis, though he durst not look towards Cumes, nor seem to know that the Princess was there, until he had a Navy.

After h• had communicated this resolution unto Mazares, and those unto whom he Page 93 used to impart his secrets, he gave orders for every thing accordingly: He left a consider|able Garrison in the Cittadel of Sardis; Croessus and Myrsiles prepared to follow him: The King of Phrigia, whose health was much impaired, was forced to obey Cyrus, who willed him to return unto Apamea, and carry thither with him his fair Daughter the Princess Palmis: As for the Prince Artamas, he would not leave him, do what he could.

Thus all this glorious Court broke up: But to see how Cyrus was loved of all who knew him; Ligdamis, Trasimedes, Menecrates, Parmenides, and Philistion, though they were almost uxorious Husbands, yet they quitted their new married Wives to follow this Prince unto the Wars, though he was very willing to dispense with them. Thus Licasta returned unto Patara with all her company, carrying also Arpalice with her, until the return of Thrasimedes: Candiope took upon her the charge of the fair Androclea unto the end of the Wars, where Lisias her Brother also was, and wanting none but Menophiles, the Husband of Licasta to conduct them, though Cyrus sent a guard with them. Cleomira also returned unto Ephesus with her Mother, and all the rest of her friends, and all the Beauties parted with much sorrow. Thus in the last three daies that Cyrus was at Sardis, there was none left in the Palace but Doralisa, Pherenice, and Araminta; and they having no mind to stay there, they went unto an Aunt of Doralisa's. Then during the last three daies, Cyrus went to visit Araminta, to talk with her concerning his dearest Mandana, Myrsiles went to see Doralisa, to testifie his love unto her, and Aristheus did also visit her in way of friendship, and to take the same delight in her person and spirit, which he used to admire in another: As for Cyrus, his discourse with Araminta was upon nothing but his Princess: Sometimes he would make her relate unto him, how she behaved her self towards the King of Assiria, when she was in Babilon and Sinope; afterwards to tell him, how she carried her self to the King of Pontus at Susa and at Sardis: Though he knew all these things before, yet he thought that the time which could not be employed in the service of Mandana, ought to be spent in talking of her: As for the Prince Myrsiles, since he was upon his departure from Doralisa, he must needs once more express his af|fection to her, but though his design was so, yet as soon as he came to her his confidence had almost failed him, for he perceived in Doralisa's countenance such unquiet frowns, as he took them for ill Omens, and caused him to be silent, which did no less perplex Do|ralisa then his language had, because she imagined by the disorder of his soul, that if no company came in, he would begin to talk of that which she had no mind to hear of; yet to prevent him, she asked a hundred questions far off the business she suspected he would speak of: At the first the Prince Myrsiles answered unto them, but being at last tired with such and so many frivolous and impertinent questions, I beseech you Doralisa, said he un|to her, leave asking me such questions, as neither concerns your interest nor mine, and give me leave to ask you some questions, which shall much import my tranquility, that you answer and answer favourably: To answer then Sir, replied she, I do promise you I will, but I will not ingage my self to answer favourably, before I know what you will ask: I desire you to tell me sincerely, said he unto her, whether it be that natural austerility which is always in your Physiognomy, or whether you reject my affection, out of some aversion which you have to me? I beseech you (added he) give me leave to speak with the same freedom which you use unto your most faithful friends: Lassurance you Sir, (said Doralisa and interrupted him) that if I tell you nothing but what I tell my best friends, I shall not tell you any great secrets, since I do not love to open my self unto any, nor do know any thing which I less understand, then this trick of confidence, which layes open all motions of the heart, all the thoughts of the mind, and all the resentments of the soul unto those that would know them; for I am perswaded, that they use very often to say they think and resent such things as they did never think upon, or apprehend: For my part, I do confess, I am not of this humour; and let me tell you Sir, that they who would know my thoughts must guess at them, or know them by my actions, without any obliging me to tell them precisely what they are, for I will never be engaged to search into the bottom of my heart, nor will I take so much pains my self as to know what I think: For indeed (said she, to prevent the Prince Myrsiles from speaking to her) I have often found in my self, that I have had some friends whom I loved more then I thought to have loved, and also some other persons whom I hated more then I thought I did: Ah Doralisa, (said this Prince) I fear that I am not of this last order: But I beseech you, if it be so, let me directly know it, that I may regulate the course of my Page 94 life, according unto those thoughts you have of me: Hatred Sir, replied Doralisa, is a thought which I ought not to entertain of a Prince, whose subject I am like to be: But Sir, to take the most rational course, be pleased to conceive of me as one that cannot love any: This Sir I conceive to be the only way conducing unto your tranquillity and my own; yet notwithstanding (added she) I do not intend to throw off that respect which I owe you; but on the contrary, will be more observant of you then ever: Respect indeed (replied Myrsiles) ought to be an inseparable companion of all a Lovers actions; but yet it is the most injurious word that any Lover can hear from the mouth of her he loves: One may respect his Master, or his Tyrant, but to respect an amorous Slave, ah Doralisa, there is no example for this: This word respect, which you have pronounced, is only used as an umbrage unto that hatred or aversion of a man, whose capricious fortune rather then reason, hath set him above her whom he loves: But Sir, I beseech you, (said Doralisa) Do not you know that you are the King of Lidia's Son? Doubtless you would forget it, if you did but know how much I am your Slave, as I wish you did: For since when I am in your presence, I forget what I really am, and think my self nothing unless your Lover, methinks you might do the like, and look upon me as I would have you: The Gods preserve me Sir, replied Doralisa sharply, from doing as you say; for if I should look now upon you as my Lover, and not as the King of Lidia's Son, I should give most tart language, I should forbid you ever to see me, and I should most horribly hate you: But I hope Doralisa, (said this amorous Prince) you would not hate me. Since I have said it before I was aware (replied Doralisa with a most scornful and indifferrent smile) I will not unsay it again: But Sir (said she and blusht for anger) there is a vast interval between hatred and love: So I were but in a state of indifference, answered he, I should not despair of my happiness, but should still hope: Of all the thoughts, which the passion whereof you speak (replied she) can infuse into the heart of a Lover, there is not one methinks so offensive unto the person Love, as hope is; therefore Sir, I would advise you, never to entertain it: What then, replied he, would you have me do? I would have you, if this word be not too free (replied she) never to tell me again of this which I ought not to understand, nor will give any ear unto without extream anger: For the truth is Sir, I am of such a Spirit, as though I did not hate a man who loved me, yet I would never have him tell me of it: There is nothing in the world so tyreth my patience as a Lovers talk, I beseech you judg then, whether I ought to suffer you to speak as you do; therefore Sir regulate your mind, that you may regulate your language; and let me joyce at the glory which you will get in the War, and not make me hate you at your return: To enable me unto the acquisition of glory (replied he) and to think of any return, I had need hope for more of your esteem, and to find you less severe at my return then when I leave you. As they were thus in discourse, Cyrus and Aristheus entered, who coming from bidding adieu unto Arianita, came also to make his last visit unto Doralisa, who received the honour with as much respect as joy. This amiable Lady was exceedingly grieved to see him so unfortunate, and wished earnestly for a period unto all his miseries, and for the liberty of Mandana, which was the whole subject of their discourse.

Since every houre seemed an Age unto Cyrus, till he was in the head of an Army, his visit was not long; but since he did not know that the Prince Myrsiles was in Love with Doralisa, he did him an ill office, for he carried that Prince away with him, to talk upon something which he would have the King his Father do, before he went from Sardis. Thus was Doralisa delivered from a vexatious visit, not but that she did extreamly esteem the Prince Myrsiles, but it was because there was such natural austerility in her heart, as was opposite unto all kinde of Gallantries, and certainly it was a most difficult task to be a Lover of Doralisa's, and not displease her: However, Aristheus having a particular esteem of her, did bid his last adieu by himself, and rendred her a visit the next morning, which lasted until night: As this conversation was long, so was it very delighting, and he finding the demention of her Spirit, could not chuse but have such affectionate thoughts of her, as his heart was capable of, which being neither love nor friendship, yet had all the gallantry of the first, and the passionate tenderness of the second; and as long as he stayed at Sardis, he held her in the rank of those unto whom he had such an affection as wanted a name, because it was never found in any but Aristheus; and indeed he was so full of his adulatory and obliging expressions, and delivered them in such a manner, that she had not the power to be angry; but though she was not angry when Aristheus talked Page 95 to her, yet she could not endure that Arianita and Pherenice should upbraid her with this illustrious Conquest, and that they should say she was not sorry for making it; yet Aristheus parted upon very good terms from her: After which, he prepared himself to wait upon Cyrus, until he heard from the King of Phenicia, after the arrival of that Ambassador, who carried away the Statue of Elisa: As for Andramites, he was not so happy as Aristheus, for he could not have the honour of bidding her adieu in private, but she shunned him. In the mean time Cyrus, after he had left Hidaspes to command in the Cittadel of Sardis, departed in the Company of Cressus and Myrsiles: Thus the Conquered went to war with the Conqueror; those few Lidian Troops that were fit for service, were distributed into several Regiments of Cyrus his Army, who was no sooner in the Field, but he made a Muster; but he was extreamly troubled to find, that except the Persian Troops there was not one compleat, and he found by experience, that drowsie rest had consumed his Army more then any two Battels: So that understanding the league which was made against him began to be very strong, and finding his own to be weak, both by disbanded Souldiers, and by Garrisons which he was forced to leave in conquered places, he was grieved to the very soul. Moreover, considering his design of besieging Cumes, he found it a piece of as great difficulty as was imaginable, and greater then his Love did at the first permit him to apprehend; he knew that a great part of his Army must be incamped upon the black and barren Mountains, where no accommodation was to be found; and another part in morish and boggy places, and all in water: He knew also, that there was nothing to be found about Cumes necessary for the incampment of an Army, that the nakedness and stirlity of the place would not afford the Souldiers any Tents, nor any wood to make themselves Huts; that the Cavalry would find no fitting Quarters, nor any forrage; and that, according to all intelligence, no Army could lye three daies before Cumes and not perish, the difficulty of getting victuals rendred the design impossible, for there was no coming by Land but on one side which the Sea did often overflow; to bring in by Sea was dangerous, because the Coast was without Ports, and that in a tempest there was no landing; So that this great Prince did see, that if any storm came and lasted but three daies, he should be forced to raise the Siege: Besides all these considerations, he saw there was no hope of taking Cumes unless it were by stopping up the very mouth of the Port, nor any other way to hinder the King of Pontus from carrying away the Princess Mandana the third time; yet he extreamly feared, that as the season was, the Ships he had would not be able to keep the Seas so neer the Land without eminent danger of Shipwrack, by reason of the winds which commonly were always high towards the end of Autumn: Moreover, the place it self was extraordinary strong, all the inhabitants were provided, the publique Magazines were full, and which of all was most considerable, this place was to be defended not only by the King of Pontus, who was both valiant and amorous, and by the Prince of Cumes, who was a man of courage, and affected glory, but also by another of high valour and experience, who was so exceedingly veried in the military art of keeping places, as he hath vaunted, that he would give a stop to the Conquests of the Conqueror of all Asia, and that he would have the honour to hinder him from vanquishing, whom none could ever yet resist: But how huge soever these difficulties seemed, yet the love of Cyrus unto Mandana and unto glory, did surmount them all, yet notwithstanding the stirlity of the place unto which he was to carry his Army did disquiet his thoughts, out of his fears that the Country could not afford subsistance so long as to take Cumes, and the cutting off a communication which this Town had with others, that might furnish them with victuals, did much trouble him: Also he apprehended, that the enemy might fall upon Thybarra, which he took in the beginning of the Spring: But after all, when this Prince had considered all these inconveniencies, he resolved to use all remedies to overcome them; he gave orders for the subsistance of his Army, to fortifie all his Garrisons towards Cumes: He disposed his Troops in such sort, and dividing them into many little bodies, he concealed his design from the enemies, yet always quartered them so as he could easily call them together again when he pleased: And to make sure of Thybarra, he resolved to fortifie it, whilst he expected news from Thrasibulus, in whom he trusted more then in any other or the sending some Ships unto him. This design was no sooner resolved upon, but marching towards this Town, he put it in execution with such prodigious diligence and ingenuity, as it may be said, that the fortifications of Thybarra were sooner finished by Cyrus, then any other could have contrived this plot; he himself made choice Page 96 of those who were to work, and for the more expedition, he set on the Souldiers; he appointed in every quarter a man of command to oversee the works in that place; the horse were appointed to cut and bring Stakes and Faggots which were to bear up the earth which was removed; and for the better manning of their time, whilst they were fortifying the Town, they victualled it also; and in order to that, all the Pesants round about Thybarra were summoned to bring in provision, he appointed some to conduct them, others to take an account, and others to put them in the publique Magazines, never was seen more haste and more order; never was seen at one time a huge Army, a whole Town, and almost a whole Country follow the will of one single man with such exactness, and so much regularity: 'Tis true; Cyrus himself was present ordering the works, with such singular ingenuity, and so well obeyed, that in fourteen daies Thybarra was fortified, victalled, and furnished with all manner of military ammunition, and the Prince ready to march as soon as he could receive any news of his Ships, and the answer of Cixares. His impatience to accomplish an enterprize, which if it took effect, might release Mandana, and get him glory, made every minute seem an Age unto him, yet he did not wait above eight daies for the joyful news which he so much longed for with so much ardour; for then he received orders from Cixares, which prescribing nothing unto him positively, seemed to refer the whole enterprize unto his conduct, and immediately after he received assurance from Thrasibulus, that he himself would go in person with ten Ships into the Channel of Cumes at what day he should appoint, assuring him, that this number was sufficient to block up the Port, without any employing the Prince of Mytilene: So that Cyrus being ever ravished with joy, did presently communicate this news unto the Prince Mazares. But since Cyrus feared that this number of Ships which Thrasibulus would bring, would not be sufficient to prevent the King of Pontus from carrying out Mandana from Cumes, by drawing some Barque along the Land in the night; therefore he gave orders to provide many little Vessels out of the Ports nearest hand; and indeed they procured twelve from one place, two from another, and one from another, causing also as many Barques and Boats to be provided as he could: So that making up a great Fleet of petty Slips, he sent them to joyn with Thrasibulus, appointing that Leontidas should command them under the Prince of Mylet.

After this, Cyrus made no secret of his design, but called a Council of War, at which the King of Lidia, the King of Hircania, the Prince Artamas, Mazares, Myrsiles, Persodes, Gobrias, Gadates, Anaxaris, and many others were present; but there was not one of them which dored at the difficulty of the enterprize, seeing it was a thing resolved upon, and a thing which Cyrus desired with so much earnestness: So that the business of the Council being only to consult of the way how to advance their resolved design, every one had orders to prepare himself for a departure the next morning, during which time one thing befel Cyrus, which seemed a happy presage, for the valiant Megabates, and the generous Clearques, incited by a Spur of honour, departed from Phenicia, as soon as they understood by the Letters of the Kings Ambassador, that Cyrlus would be presently in the Field, and came unto the Camp, desiring to be partakers of those perils unto which so great a Prince would expose himself, to the end they might be sharers also of some part of that glory which he should get. Aristheus being extreamly joyed at the arrival of these two friends, made it known unto Cyrus who they were, though this Prince did already know them very well, by the description of Telamis, when he related the history of Elisa: Also he received them with much joy, and with the same civility which he used unto all men of extraordinary merit: But in gaining Megabates and Clearques, he lost Aristheus, who at the same time received orders from the King of Phenicia to thank Cyru for all his favours, and to return unto Tire, he having no more business to imploy him in about Cyrus, for some reasons which he mentioned in his Lett^r; so that this excellent man parted from this great Prince sooner then he intended, but he parted from him so extreamly satisfied with his Spirit, with his generosity, with his courtesie, and with all his qualities, as he hath since confessed, that never since he knew the world, had he ever seen or heard a man so fit to represent the grandure of Heroes, and even of the Gods, as Cyrus; adding, that his acquaintance with this Prince hath ex^treamly elevated his spirit, and made him able to end his Poem better then he had began it. In the mean time Aristheus, after he had taken his leave of Cyrus, and bad adieu unto all those Princes who infinitely esteemed him, he departed from Thybarra, and though it was not his neerest way to return unto Sardis, yet the esteem which he had of Page 97 Doralisa, perswading him, that it was the neerest, he took that way in his return to Tire. But as the arrival of these two valiant Phenicians was a happy presage unto Cyrus; so the arrival of a servant, which went with him whom he sent unto Cumes, gave him a most certain assurance of happy success in his enterprize, for by him he received a Letter from Martesia, wherein he found these words.

MARTESIA unto the illustrious CYRUS.

SIR,

The carrying away of the Princess Araminta, which I have made known unto the Prin^{ce}ss Mandana, having justified you in her resentments, I thought it my devoire to ac^quaint you with it, to the end you might transact with the more joy for the libertie of a person who repents her self of the injustice which she hath done you, yet it is without her participation that I give you this intelligence; but yet I am confident, that if she did know it, she would ea^sily pardon me for taking th^s freedom to write unto you, since certainly the reason why she her self does not write is, because her great heart will not permit her to confess that she has done you wrong. However Sir, be at quiet concerning the King of Pontus, and be most confident, that if Cumes should prove so impregnable unto you, as the heart of Mandana is unto him, you will never release her, nor by consequence

MARTESIA.

The reading of this Letter made Cyrus so full of joys, that he forgot almost all his past misfortunes, and hope did inspire his Spirit, that maugre all the dismal Oracles which he had received, and in spite of all those bug-bear difficulties which he foresaw in the Siege of Cumes, he did not question his happy success. In the mean time he asked this servant who was of the intelligence, how he came by this Letter; and what was the state of things in the Town? To the first he answered, that his Master gave him the Lett^r without telling him how he had it; and to the rest he gave him full instructions of all that he desired to know: for by it he understood the order which was kept in the Town, and how they guarded the Princess, who is as much unknown in Cumes, as if she were here, and so is the King of Pontus: He told him also, that the Enemies Army prepared to relieve Cumes, when the Siege was set down, and that Pactias, and one whose name was Licambes did command it; adding also, to the instructions which he gave unto Cy^lrus, that by the orders which was established at the Gates of the Town the same day he came away, it would be hereafter almost impossible for his Master to give him any intel^ligence: After this, Cyrus consulted with himself, whether he should shew Martesia's Letter unto the Prince Mazares, but he resolved to shew him only the instructions coⁿcerning the state of things; for though the happiness of a Rival does commonly quench the flames of Love in the heart of an ill-treated Lover, yet it does not always so, for sometimes jealousy does awaken that passion, and in lieu of stifling doth revive it: So that not to put the Prince Mazares unto so much torment, as to know the mind of Mandana, he would not shew him the Letter. In the mean time, the day of departure being come, and the Army at the Rendezvouz, Cyrus thought fit to divide it into three bodies, orderⁱng the March so, that the Ships of Thrasibulus should be in the mouth of the Port, be^fore he appeared in sight of the Town. Thus his march might be the more easie, more speedy, and more orderly: These three bodies being able to arrive, almost all at once, and fall upon Cumes in an instant, Cyrus would take that way towards the Sea, as that wherein was most danger, because the Enemy was that way incamped, he had under his division the Persians, the Medeans, the Cappadocians, and all the Homotimes: The Hir^ccanian Cavalry were also with him, Cyrus having forced Clearques to command a part of them in lieu of an Officer newly dead; for as for Megabates, he would fight under Cy^lrus as a Voluntier. Since all these Troops which he had made choice of, had couragi^lously and faithfully served under him in all his Conquests, he had a great confidence in them.

Page 98 The other division which was commanded by the Prince Mazares, and which took upon the left hand, were composed of Assirian, Armenian, and Egiptian Troops: The third commanded by the Prince Artamas, consisted of Gilician and Susanian Troops, and of all those who were levied in the new conquered Country: The Artillary was co^mmanded by Persodes, and Cyrus did not think it fit that Croessus should have any command in his Army, nor would he permit the King of Hircania to have any, lest there should be any jealousy or envy between them; so that these two Kings kept alwayes in the quar^ters of Cyrus, and were in all the Councils which were held. The march of these three Bodies was so just and even, that they came at one very instant before Cumes, the scitulation whereof was very strange, for it was seated between two great hills of Sand by the Sea side, which seemed Mountains of Snow to those who saw them at a distance: On the East it looked towards Thybarra, or the South Mylet; Xanthes on the West, and the Sea upon the North: Its Territory was of no large extent, all their commodities came to it by Sea: This Town also was divided into two, the Inhabitants distinguishing themselves by the names of the old Town, and the new; but that which rendred it the most considerable was, that it had but one Port and one Channel able to contain a huge Na^vy in safety: This is it which rendred that Town so formidable to all her Neighbours; As soon as Cyrus spied the stately Temple of Neptune which was in Cumes, and which spired so high that it might be seen far off, he was extreamly glad. This is the place, said <◇> to himself where I must either die or deliver my Princess: After which, he distributed quar^ters unto the Army, and that with so much judgment, that in all likelihood the Enemy could neither relieve the Town nor force his Camp, lying In such a posture, as that he might win a Battel whilst he was besieging a Town. This Prince having circumspectly ob^served all about Cumes, and found that there was some places which defended themselves, and others which were very hard to be kept, he gave all necessary orders to fortifie those places by art which nature had laid open: He also built a Bridg over the Channel, and thereby had communication between his Quarters, for the more easie passage of victuals: So that Thrasibulus with his Ship sailing at the same time into the Port of Cumes, the Town was in an instant besieged: The next morning Cyrus began his line of circumulation, at which all the Souldiers wrought with incredible earnestness; the presence of the Prince did so invigorate them, that they wrought and never were weary. But to the end that the work might be more firm, he covered the sides of the line with Turf, which did con^catinate the looseness of the Sand: He would have had a second line to fortifie the first; but the Banks of Sand being of an unequal height, and so many of them which might command the Camp, he was forced to take in all those hills, and by consequence was forced to enlarge his works very far: It chanced also, that there was one of these Sandy hills in the Quarters of Mazares, which being much higher then the rest, the Enemy might much annoy the Camp, Cyrus therefore seized upon it, and made a Fort upon the top of this hill, and with a line did draw it within the line of circumulation.

But after all this, the Sea banks were unfortified, which was as requisite to be done as any thing else, for otherwise all the rest of their works were in vain; and yet the Sand being so loose in that place, they knew not how to do it; for though this Sea hath neither Flux or Reflux as the Ocean hath, yet it did rise more or less, according as the winde did waft the waves, and did sometimes so impetuously dash against the Banks, that something more solid then Sand must be employed to make it abide its violence; and therefore Cyrus, to whom nothing was impossible, did drive in abundance of piles and stakes, which stopped the passage of the Enemy, and so fast, that the Waves could not stir them; yet this was not done without much difficulty, for those of Cumes did cut a great Rock which kept in the Sea at the furthest end of their Town, hoping hereby to overflow the passage whereby Cyrus was to bring his Victuals, and indeed the Land having a descent from that place, their design had taken, and the Army had been put to a great necessity of victuals, if Cyrus had not prevented this inconvenience, by driving abundance more piles, and rowling great stones, filled up with Sand and wreck, which made a new Barra^ccade to Waves that would have flowed from thence: This work of giving limits to the Sea, (seemed to proceed from a supernatural power. These works of grand importance only did not take up the mind of this Prince, but also the least things were as well consi^dered by him, he himself was twice every day at the place where the victuals was, that he might see the division just, and that none should have any cause to complain, it was Page 99 his usual expression, that great enterprizes could never be happily executed, unless a care was had unto trivial as well as important things; but the wonder was to see, that though this Prince had a thousand several cares upon him, yet he had such a admirable freedom of Spirit, and so much blithness in his eyes, as infused much joy into all the Army, and did so enervigate the Spirits of those that wrought, as in four daies, maugre the rain; the winde, or any inconveniency, the lines were finished, the Sea-banks fortified, the inun^dation of the Waves stopped, and all the Sandy hills put into a posture of defence: Never was seen such great works in so short a time, nor did ever Prince merit more glory then Cyrus did at this time. In the mean time, Love was so predominate in his soul, that in giving all these orders, he still thought how he gave them for Mandana, and that by making these works he hindred his Rival for carrying away his Princess; and considering that if his design prospered, he should see Mandana at liberty, and his Rival in his fet^tters, he was full of unexpressible joyes: But as high as his hopes and his joyes were, Ma^lzares on the contrary was all sorrows, to see how he laboured for another, and that he was delivering Mandana to lose her, but could never hope for the least fruit of his Vi^lctory: However, since he had fixed his resolutions, that his virtue should surmount his Love, he endeavoured to compose his minde, and to think of nothing but how to re^lieve Mandana to lose her, but could never hope for the least fruit of his victory: How^lever, since he had fixed his resolutions, that his virtue should surmount his Love, he en^deavoured to compose his minde, and to think of nothing but how to relieve Mandana. Thus forcing his heart and Spirit by his extream generosity, Cyrus and he agreed very well together, and talked of the Siege, and what was best to be done, as if they had an equal interest in the taking of Cumes: The greatest admiration of these two Princes was, that the King of Assiria did not appear amongst them; nor so much as sent unto them: As long as we were at Sardis, said Cyrus, and knew nothing where the Princess Mandana was, I did not wonder to hear nothing of him: But now, since the Army is marched, hath been at Thybarra, and turned towards Cumes, he must needs know where our Princess is, and should joyn with us, to have his share in the glory of releasing her: For my part (an^swered Mazares) I must needs confess I cannot imagine his reason, for he was not used to give his Rivals any advantage; and therefore, since he appears not, I neither know what to say or think of his absence: Doubtless it is very hard to conceive, replied Cyrus, But may he not be in Cumes? (added he in a rapture of a sad apprehension) If he were there, (answered Mazares) he whom you sent thither would know him, and would have given you a hint of it in the intelligence which he sent you: Let it be then concluded, replied Cyrus, that we cannot guess where he is, and let us believe that wheresoever he be, he plots our ruine. Things being upon these terms in the Camp of Cyrus, the Enemies Army being certainly informed that Cumes was besieged; they met in a place where the Commanders thought most fit to consult upon the best course, and to execute it as soon as it was resolved upon. Since they were very neer the Camp, they hoped to relieve Cumes; for considering the discommodities of the incampment, and the badness of the weather enough to ruine any Army, they thought that the Army of Cyrus would be so weakened by their hard working, and being enclosed between them and the Garrison of the Town, it might be easily overthrown by fresh forces; yet the v^ery name of Cyrus being terrible unto them, they resolved to send out a Party of Horse to take some prisoners, to the end they might have more certain knowledg of their Enemies condition: But at the same time, they trimmed and tackled up a great company of Ships, with intention to enter the Port of Cumes by force of Sail, if the windes were favourable, in spite of Thrasibulus his Fleet. In the mean time, Cyrus like a great Captain did fore^see, that if the Siege lasted long, his Army would decay, that it might be beaten, and that he might fail in taking Cumes, he resolved to shorten the Siege by force, and to assault it with irresistible fury; and certainly this design was full of reason, for victuals would quickly fail, and the Sea was so rough, that the Barques which brought them were often split in landing: Moreover, it was almost continual ruine, and Winter came on so fast, that the Souldier endured much hardship; the impetuosity of the winde would sometimes blow such a cloud of dusty Sand upon all the Camp, as blinded them; their Tents and Huts were all weather-beaten, and many of the Souldiers did lye in mud; besides all this, they must be continually working to repair what the Sea spoiled, and to keep the Ditch from being filled up; so that fortune; ill weather, and hard labour, began already to bring divers Page 100 diseases into the Camp. In the mean, Cyrus foreseeing all these inconveniencies was not dismayed, but endeavoured to surmount them by storming Cumes, and so to shorten the business: He very prudently considered, that he should loose fewer men by hazarding a fight, then by a long Siege: So that this being the resolution, Cyrus contrived the execution: In order to which, as soon as the intrenchments were finished, he went to discover all the places where the Town might be best assaulted, Mazares and Artamas followed him, and after good consideration, he resolved upon two several assaults, and prepared for the execution of so great a design, before the Enemy could oppose them, because they were very busie in their works of defence: Mazares and Artamas were the first who fought in erecting a Sconce to facilitate the assault, but the Enemy being fully resolved to dislodge them, did sally upon them so sharply, as they came thrice that night to the charge, and that with such vigor, as it was evident that those Souldiers were commanded by such Officers who were resolved to make a gallant defence: Anaxaris who was in this bussle did miracles, and did most contribute to the repairing of that Bank of Sand, where the Sconce was made: But in the last sally which the enemy made to drive them off, this valiant stranger being very forward to repulse them was taken Prisoner, and carried unto the Town, but after a three houres hot dispute, Victory declared her self for the besiegers, and the Sconce was made before night, able to hold three hundred men: There was killed, wounded, & taken Prisoners of both sides, but the misfortune of Anaxaris did most sensibly perplex Cyrus: On the other side of the Town the assault was in a much more readiness, for in a short time the Besiegers had gained the Counterscarp, and things went as well as Cyrrus could wish. In the mean time intelligence was brought, that the Enemies Army was upon their march, and seemed as if they intended to offer battle. Cyrus no sooner heard this news, but he prepared to receive them: But to prevent surprizal, he sent out Scouts, and was presently given to understand that it was a false alarm grounded upon what some Pesants had seen, who seeing a good Party of the Enemies sent out to take some Prisoners, thought them to be the Vanguard of their Army: But the wonder was, that the noise of the Enemies march to relieve Cumes, should never move the soul of Cyrus, nor dismay the Souldiers, but all stood in excellent order to receive them: The assault continued, as if this Allarum had never been, and Clearques who shewed himself most bravely, was already got upon the Counterscarp, when the Enemy out of their Trenches sent Clouds of Arrows upon the Pioniers; after which they came to handy blows, and a much more terrible and bloody fight there was then that before, and the confusion was so great, that none knew which were Conquerours, or which conquered; which friends, which Enemies. Cyrus being advertised of this disorder; went thither immediately, being followed by Megabates, Thrasimedes, Ligdamis, Aglatidas, and all the rest of the Volunteers; and he was no sooner in the midst of this danger, but his presence dispersed all fears, he gave new hearts to his Souldiers, damped the Enemies, reestablished the order, and went on with the work But whilst things were in this condition on the Besiegers side, those who commanded the Enemies Army were in a great perplexity, for though their Army was sufficiently numerous, yet after they knew from the Prisoners which they had taken the manner of the works, they thought themselves not able to force them, especially having to do with a Prince who was as prudent as valiant: Yet since Pactias knew, that the King of Pontus would never pardon him if they attempted nothing for his relief; and since Lycambes thought it would go against the Hair of his honour, to stand still with his hands in his pocket, they resolved to seem at least as if they would do something, though when they considered that they were to cope with the most valiant Prince in the world, a Prince accustomed to vanquish, whose men were admirably disciplined, whose reputation robbed their Souldiers of their hearts, and whose capacity left them no hopes that he would commit any error which might facilitate their design: all these I say considered, they thought it madness to attempt any thing against him, and they confessed it folly, ever to hope for any good issue in their attempt: But making a show as if they would make some attempt, they marched as if they would assault the lines, themselves spreading a report of it, to see many tumult would chance in the Camp, which might encourage them to fall on. Cyrus hearing this went out of the works with a Body of Cavalrie, and some Volunteers, <...> myself, and <...> them, before they assaulted him; but he was <...> amazed when he saw only signs of quitting their Quarters, and when he under<...>oulders <...>ed behinde, that Pactias and Lycambes understanding <...> the wor<...>; did think it impossible to force them, and that it were Page 101 better to keep their Forces to defend the rest of the Country, then to lose them in relieving Cumes; which they could not hinder from being taken: So that Cyrus having vanquished without a blow, returned into the Camp with fresh hopes of carrying the Town, and speedy releasing of Mandana. In the mean time, the besieged did defend it with most resolute valour, and so stiffly, that they could not get a foot of ground without a sharp combat for it: The King of Pontus seemed to be indefatigable, and took all the pains which is inseparable from Sieges: The Prince of Cumes, his liberty being at stake, did fight with invincible courage; so that it may well be said, that never did assailants fall on with more vigour, nor ever any assailed defend themselves more valiantly: 'Tis true, the King of Pontus had such a Sea of sorrows flowing upon him, as the courage of any but himself would have been overwhelmed; for indeed the more submiss he was unto Mandana, the more unalterable she was; yet for all his sorrows, he treated Anaxaris very well in his Prison, who obtained all the liberty of the Castle where Mandana was, except permission to see her: But since he retained the Idea of her beauty in his memory, ever since the time he saw her in the Castle of Hermes, when she released Cyrus, he sought out for an opportunity of seeing her again, and easily found it; for Martesia having seen him in the Castle Court out of her Chamber Window, and knowing by the Guards that he was a Prisoner, she had a great desire to speak with him, and to enquire concerning Cyrus: she cunningly gained the hearts of her Guard, and perswaded them upon some pretence which she invented, to bring him into the little Garden where the Princess and she had liberty to walk, and to tell him, that there was a Lady of his Party who desired, to speak with him. Since the King of Pontus and the Prince of Cumes were continually busie about the defence of the Walls, they were not so circumspect as to minde every thing; so that they entirely trusted a single and disarmed Prisoner with the Guards which they had appointed over him. Then Anaxaris coming into the Garden unperceived, but he saw Martesia, who no sooner saw him, but she advanced towards him with a blush: Though I have not the honour to know you, (said she unto him after the first salute) yet I have some hopes to obtain a favour from you; for since you have ventured your life for that Princess whom I serve, and have endeavoured her liberty at the price of your own, I may well believe you will not deny me the favour to tell me how that Prince doth, who must be both her Deliverer and ours, and to tell me in what condition you left the illustrious Cyrus. Anaxaris hearing Martesia speak thus, answered her with as much civility, as spirit, that he would most joyfully obey such a Lady as her self; adding, that though he was not in a condition to employ his courage for the Princess Mandana's releasement, yet he would acquaint her what Cyrus did for her. After this, Martesia asking him a hundred questions, he informed her of all that Cyrus ever did, since the taking of Sardis, unto the carrying away of the Princess Araminta, and since her carrying away until the Siege of Cumes, with all possible aggravations that might be advantageous unto that Prince: So that Martesia, who did much interest her self in the happiness of Cyrus, and who was exceeding glad to find any subject which might eradicate all memory of that unjust jealousy which Mandana had out of her Spirit, she resolved to contrive it so, that Anaxaris might see her; and indeed, after she had thanked him, and obliged him to tell his name, she desired him to return the next day at the same hour unto the same place, where the Princess Mandana might understand from his mouth all he had told her: She had no sooner made this request unto Anaxaris, but he expressed abundance of joy, assuring her she would do him the greatest favour in the world, in letting him have the honour of seeing Mandana: After which, going out the same way he entred, Martesia went unto the Princess to acquaint her with all the story, but especially with what concerned the carrying away of the Princess Araminta, observing to her, how Cyrus had contented himself to give fifty horses unto Spitridates, and would not go himself to follow her Ravisher, but returned unto Sardis, in expectation of those whom he had sent unto Ephesus, Gnides, and many other places to enquire news of her self. And Madam, said Martesia, it is impossible to meet with a more exact relation then I have, for this honest stranger told me, that he was with Cyrus, when he first knew of Araminta's carrying away.

This circumstance created such a fresh curiosity in Mandana to see Anaxaris, as she resolved to make good Martesia's promise: But yet said Mandana unto her, who is this which you would have me see? Madam, replied she, though he told me not his name, nor who he is, yet I am most certain, that he is a man of some very high quality, I see Page 102 it by his garb, his behaviour, and his action, also by his manner of speaking; and I see it also plainly, by what Cyrus told him; that he is such a man as I speak of: But I pray, said Mandana, doth Cyrus think he can take Cumes and release us? Truly Madam, replied she, I was so inquisitive of what concerned Araminta, to the end I might fully justify the illustrious Cyrus in your opinion, as I must confess, that I talked not a word of the Siege, supposing, and with reason, that since Cyrus besiegeth Cumes, he will infallibly take it: As Martesia (said Mandana and blusht) in desiring to justify Cyrus, you strangely accuse me, since you do thereby upbraid me with my weakness, or an humour which may be termed jealousy: Did you but know Martesia (added she) how much ashamed I am, you would not speak of it any more; for truly I can hardly absolve my self, for letting Cyrus so rashly know the anger which I conceived against him, when I thought he preferred Araminta before me; and though my thoughts of displeasure against him were rather resentments of glory then any real jealousy, yet I must confess he might interpret what I writ as he pleased: For my part Madam (replied Martesia and smiled) were I in lieu of that Prince, I should rather to my consolation think that you were jealous, then that you were proud: The more you speak, replied Mandana, the more you make me ashamed, and let me see my folly in trusting too much to my self: For truly Martesia, Do you remember the time when Cyrus was only Artamenes? The time, I say, when Feraulas thinking him dead, did bring me a Declaration of his Love, that I read it in tears and was not angry, because I thought that Artamenes was dead? I remember it very well Madam, replied Martesia, nor have I forgot how pity then would not permit you to be angry wit<...> him: Then you have not forgot, added Mandana, at what a non-plus I was when Artamenes was received, and how I thought never to see him, because I imagined he would come to know how I steeped his Letter in my tears: Judg now, I pray you, if he shall be so happy as to take Cumes, how infinitely shall I be ashamed to see him, when I shall remember that I writ such things unto him, as will make him believe I was jealous? In good earnest, I am so vexed at my self for my fondness, and inconsideration which I have expressed unto him, that rather then seem guilty of such a fault, see Cyrus persidious a thousand times: As Madam, replied Martesia, the passion whereof you speak cannot be hid when one pleaseth, or shall shew whether one will or no, and shew it sometimes by hiding it: Yet were it abundance of indiscretion and imprudence to shew it, (answered Mandana) for whether it be well or ill-grounded, it will procure hatred; and therefore though one should be so unhappy as to be capable of it, yet one should not shew it: For all your ingenuous arguments which seem to be just, answered Martesia, yet I am most certain Madam, that as you need not doubt of the fidelity of Cyrus, so you may be very glad to have it from the mouth of Anaxaris, that he left Spitridates to go after Araminta; and hath neglected no opportunity to release you: You pitiless woman, replied Mandana, what delight can you take in making me ashamed? Do not think, that if I have a desire to see this Prisoner, but it is because I would know from him the state of the Siege, then for any such reason as you speak of, for I do profess unto you, that I cannot endure to upbraid my self for having any such thoughts as are equally injurious, both unto Cyrus and my self: However Martesia, having a most infinite confidence with Mandana, did still dispute the business very respectfully with her, knowing she would not take it ill. However, the next morning according to the resolution, Anaxaris saw the Princess, who was so well satisfied with him, as it was impossible she should be more. At the first he was mighty high in his commendations of Cyrus, and all he did for her, he expressed himself with such zeal and aggravations, as he could not impose silence upon himself: But at last he lessened his talk of this Prince, and Martesia observed, that he was so taken up with contemplation of Mandana's beauty, that he could not take his eyes off her: Since this Princess had a desire to oblige him, she asked him of what Country he was? But Anaxaris answered, Madam, said he, since several reasons oblige me to conceal what I really am, I have denied the illustrious Cyrus twenty times, that which you do me the honour to ask, and that which I am extremely sorry I cannot tell you, though perhaps it would be in some sort advantageous to me, that you did know it. After this, Mandana asked him very inquisitively what news Cyrus heard from Cixares? And afterwards enquired of all the Army, but especially of Chrisantes and Feraulas. Anaxaris answered unto all these questions, but it <◇> like a man who was surprized with an over-violent respect, though he gazed upon her most attentively: Since he could receive better intelligence from his Guards, then the Page 103 Princess could from hers, it was resolved between them, that he should see her every day or at least should see Martesia, and indeed so he did as long as the Siege lasted. In the mean time, the King of Pontus was in a most desperate condition, especially when he saw the Port of Cumes so blocked up by the Fleet of Thrasibulus, that there was no hopes of his carrying away the Princess; On the other side, the Prince of Cumes began to think he took an ill course in giving retreat unto the King of Pontus. But whilst he was full of this vain repentance, the man whom Cyrus sent into the Town, who had spoken twice with Martesia, who took a Letter from her for Cyrus, and who had sent it unto him by a servant, this man did cajole with the people as well as he could to move them unto mur|mure, at their being thus ingaged in a troublesome unlucky war. Thus whilst the illu|strious Cyrus was in the toilsome works of a Siege, he had some in the Town who were negotiating in his service. In the mean time, this indefatigable Prince being gone to visit some new works, as he was giving some orders about it unto an Ingeneer, this man was slain at his feet with an arrow, But as if this day were fatal unto Cyrus, and as if some malignant constellation were predominate, as he was returning in the evening unto his Quarter, he desired to go and give some orders unto a place where he conceived them to be necessary: But he was no sooner in the Trenches, then the Enemy shooting off an Engine which carried stones with such an impetuous celerity as was irresistible, one of Cyrus his Pages which followed him, had his head struck off: The danger came so neer this great Prince, as that the skull of this Page being shivered in several pieces, did wound him in five or six places in the face and neck; so that Cyrus was all sprinkled with his own blood, and the blood of this unfortunate servant. In the mean time, this Prince had such a sweet tranquility in his countenance amidst this great danger, that he cheered up the hearts of all his men, and made it appear that his courage was incapable of fear, and that nothing could shake it: Megabates and Persodes had their shares in this glorious danger, for they were very neer him: On the other side, Pactias and Licambes, seeing they could not attempt any thing by Land to relieve Cumes, resolved to try what they could do by Sea, hoping that the bad weather would force Cyrus perhaps to raise the Siege. To this end they tackled up all their Ships, and set out to Sea, as if they would force Thrasibulus to give them passage. The sight of this Fleet filled all the Inhab|itants of Cumes with as much joy, as it did Mandana with sorrows, who looking out of her window, which was towards the open Sea, did with inconceivable sorrow see this Navy, which seemed to desire a fight with Thrasibulus: This Princess imagined, that if one Fleet should defeat the other, Cumes would be relieved, and feared that if the Sea were once free, the King of Pontus would remove her unto some other place where Cyrlus could not release her; yet she was not long in these sad apprehensions, for this Fleet was no sooner in sight of Thrasibulus, but fears did so possess the Spirits of those which commanded it, that they steered about, and betook themselves to flight, and the winde which was not favourable to them for fighting. Leontidas who commanded the little Vessels and the Barques, did chase them out of the sight of the King of Pontus, who beheld this disastrous disorder with unexpressible sorrow: But in exchange Mandana saw her Deliverers stand firm, and her Enemies fly to her unutterable joy. In the mean while, Cyrus seeing the resolute resistance of the King of Pontus and the Prince of Cumes, who lost not a foot of ground without disputing for it with extraordinary valour; Seeing, I say, that all his Ensigns and stratagems could not do any good wherewith to carry the Town, because they could not make any considerable breach, bethought himself of a device, which nothing else but Love could invent, and this it was; Cyrus was advertised that in a place of the Ditch towards the Sconce which they had made neerest the Town, there was a great Cave, whose mouth was stopped by those of Cumes, that this Cave did extend it self by many turnings and windings very far into the earth, so that the walls and fortifications of the Town did stand upon the Cave. Cyrus no sooner knew this, but he resolved to cross the ditch, and to make a Sconce at the foot of the walls, just at the mouth of this Cave, and did effect it. This Sconce was no sooner made defensible, but Cyrus causing the mouth to be opened, made a great number of Pioniers and workmen to enter in the night, with tools fit to break the stony roof of this Vault, which bore up a part of the Town: So that moving them to work with incredible alacrity, they came at last to finde the foundation of the Walls of Cumes; but lest they should totter too much, and too soon, and so smother those who were in the Cave, they no sooner discovered the foundation of the Walls, but they underpropped it with Billets; so that imploying as Page 104 many Billets as they discovered stones, the Wall stood firm. But lest the noyse of the Workers should be heard by those in the Town, Cyrus caused an assault to be given at the other side of the Town, purposely to draw the people thither, and busie them, com|manding those forces at the same time which were on that side where the Miners were, to make false Alarums very often, that is, to make many great shouts, and as much noyse as they could: But at the last, after they had discovered enough of the Walls foundation, to hope for a reasonable breach, and after they had underpropped it with as many Piles as were necessary to uphold it, Cyrus caused abundance of combustible stuff to be brought unto the feet of these Piles, such as very dry wood, which was made apt to burn by pitch, brimstone, and certain gums which they added to it; so that when the houre of execution came, and all the Workmen retired out, and all things in readiness, Cyrus about two houres afternoon, caused fire to be put unto this huge mass of combustible matter, which he had placed at the feet of these Piles; so the fire did kindle in an instant, the Piles were consumed immediately, the foundation of the Wall wanting Sup|porters did fall, and the Walls wanting foundation followed, so this caused the most hor|rible object that ever could be beheld; for one might see at the mouth of the Cave a blooze of several coloured flames, mingled with a thick cloud of smoke; but the most affrighting part was to see, when the foundation of the Wall failed, the horrid subversion which was in an instant, the Souldiers upon them perish in their ruines, a thousand flashes of lightning flame flying up in the ayr, the terrible noyse which the stones made in their fall, the Battlements in some places, to tumble with such impetuosity, as that they reached as far as the Sea; the dusty smoke which was made by the falling of the Wall would not let one see a long time, whether the breach was considerable or no: But after the winde had a little dissipated the muddy mist in the Ayre, one might perceive that the breach was as much as one could wish: So that Cyrus causing an assault to be made, and finding no resistance, because this strange invention had amazed the Enemy, they began to make a Sconce there: But at last, the King of Pontus coming unto that place, and the Souldiers recollecting themselves, they did most courageously beat back the forces of Cyrus, and hindred them from finishing the work which they had begun: The fight was very obstinate and bloody. In the mean time, though the Wall in falling at the mouth of the Cave had choaked the fire which flamed thereout, yet there were some Crannies in this huge heap of ruines, out of which there came so thick a smoke, as it deprived the Com|batants of light and knowledg, who friend, who foe: So that the Souldiers of Cyrus, and those of the King of Pontus, not knowing what they did, fell in o| such a confused disorder, that those of Cyrus thought the besieged had the advantage, and those of the Town also thought that the Assailants had it: So as in this error and disorder both sides retreated, and left the Sconce to it self; yet the smoke being vanished, the Souldiers of Cyrus were the first who saw it, and returned to the Combat, which they did so prospe|rously, that they finished the Sconce and kept it. Whilst they were getting this advan|tage on that side, Clearques obtained another on the other side where he did assault; and he got so much honour during this Siege, as Cyrus gave him a thousand commendations: All the Volunteers approved themselves most brave men, especially Megabates. This being the state of things, Pactias and Licambes did make another attempt, which was to get some men into Cumes by the way towards the Sea, and indeed they did happily belgin the design, never being discovered by the Scouts; but Cyrus being advertised of this enterprize, took horse immediately with Mazares and all the bravery of his Army, and went to look upon their Enemies, who seeing they were discovered, retired in such hast, that Cyrus could not overtake them: So that he returned to the Camp, where he found all things in a good condition, and looked upon Cumes as a Town that would be presently taken: His greatest perplexity was his fear, lest the King of Pontus should finde out some way to steal away Mandana: Wherefore consulting with Mazares upon the best course, he believed the Prince of Cumes repented of his giving Sanctuary unto the King of Pontus, for involving him into all this misery, it was thought expedient to offer him his Dominions if he would restore Mandana, and that he would give liberty to the King of Pontus, because he would not move him to betray a Prince unto whom he had given retreat: Cyrus hoping that if this Prince would not accept of this offer, yet it would stir up the people against him, and would hinder the King of Pontus from carrying away Mandana: So that having sent a Herald unto the Prince of Cumes, to tell him, that having some ad|vantagous Propositions to make unto him, he desired a man of some credence might be Page 105 sent to receive his intentions. This Prince, after a consult with the King of Pontus, answered, that their two interests being inseparable, he could not receive his message without his participation, but that they would send joyntly the next morning to know what the will of Cyrus was, that in the interim there might be a cessation of Arms: Though this answer of the Prince of Cumes was not according to the wish of Cyrus; yet he took him at his word, and to obtain his ends, he resolved to transact with equal genero|sity unto his Rival: So that the next morning after the Truce was published, and after he who the King of Pontus, and the Prince of Cumes sent unto him, were come into the Camp; Cyrus would needs shew him all his works, to the end the negotiation might better proceed: So that he carried him from Line to Line, from Fort to Fort, and let him see there was no hopes of ever relieving Cumes by Land: Also, what Cyrus said un|to him was so full of generosity, that he could see no reason why any of his offers should be refused, for he demanded of the Prince of Cumes Mandana only, and yet offered un|to the King of Pontus all the conditions which the Princess Araminta heretofore offered from him, which was, an Army to reconquer his Dominions: I do not offer this, (said he unto the man) out of the least doubt of taking Cumes presently, but it is because I am obliged unto the King of Pontus, ever since I wore the name of Artamenes, and halving a high esteem of the Prince of Cumes courage, I should be sorry any occasion should force me to ruine them, and to tell you truly, I desire to shorten the captivity of Man|dana, by a happy negotiation.

After this, Cyrus did much oblige the man to whom he spoke, and without any un|worthy Proposition, he made him extremely satisfied with his generosity; but the more reasonable the Propositions were, the more sharp were they unto the King of Pontus, and he laboured to put things unto the utmost extremity, and the Prince of Cumes protested never to shrink from his interest; and though he was most desperately in Love, yet he could not chuse but consider, that since he was not able to keep Mandana, it were injustice wilfully to ruine a Prince who had given him retreat: But for all this, though he did know it to be both unjust and imprudent, yet his passion had no ear to hear of any Proposition, which had any clause of Mandana's restitution in it; yet notwithstanding, not dare to tell the Prince of Cumos in plain terms, that rather then restore Man|dana into the hands of Cyrus, he was resolved to see both him and himself to perish, he gave him such language as might gain a little time, and if possible recover some hopes; and therefore he thought it expedient to tell Cyrus, that they could not return him any positive answer, without imparting these Propositions unto the Xanthians, and Caunians, and also until they knew from Pactias and Licambes in what condition their forces were, and therefore desired, until they were satisfied in these things, that the Truce might continue; so that they sent back this answer unto Cyrus, who accepted of it, provided there were a time limited unto this negotiation, and that the term were not long; and thus the Truce was continued: The King of Pontus, and the Prince of Cumes sent out an Envoy unto the General of their Army, and another unto the Xanthians and the Cauneans, Cyrus sending Heralds with them to carry them thither, and to bring them back. In the mean time, the King of Pontus, who had never consented unto this negotiation, but that he might thereby have longer time to consider which way he might save himself, or at least defer his ruine a little longer, he now pumped all his invention for an expedient how to get Mandana out of Cumes: But whilst he was vainly seeking for that which was so difficult to be found, Cyrus and Mazares admired what was become of the Assirian King, they could not imagine where he should be, nor how it was possible he should be living, and not before Cumes: Sometimes Cyrus thought him dead, and otherwhiles had a jealous phancy that he was in Cumes, and some way or other transacting his ruine, though yet he could not imagine which way he was able to do it. In the mean while, the Truce being published as well in the Sea as Land-Army, there was a ge|nearl idleness amongst the Souldiers on both sides, and a kinde of a dim image of Peace amongst them all.

Things standing upon these terms, and Cyrus being one morning upon the top of a Fort which he had made upon a hill in the Quarters of Mazares, he discovered a Fleet, which with full Sail made towards his. He no sooner saw this, but his passion moving him to suspect some foul play, he changed colour, and would send unto Cumes to clear his suspicions, but as he was upon the point of sending, an Envoy came unto him from the King of Pontus and the Prince of Cumes, who came to ask him whether this Fleet did Page 106 come to strengthen his Army, and whether he would keep within the limits of the Truce? So that knowing by this the Fleet were not his Enemies, he concluded they were for him, knowing how he had negotiated for Ships in several places, and indeed he was not mis|taken. After this, he dismissed the Envoy with orders to assure the King of Pontus, and the Prince of Cumes, that he would make no attempts until the Truce were ended or bro|ken: And as for the Fleet which appeared, they had no orders from him to approach, nor knew he from whence they came, yet he would ingage his word to make no use of them, until those Princes had refused the Propositions which he made them. After this Envoy was gone, Cyrus and Mazares saw that Thrasibulus sent out two little Vessels to meet those which were making towards him, and that those two Ships returned with the Fleet as friends towards Thrasibulus; so that rejoicing to see fresh aid, he thought it would conduce much to make the people of Cumes revolt, if those Princes should not ac|cept of those offers which he made them: Also he conceived fresh hopes of seeing his dear Princess very shortly, yet he was very impatient to know from whence this Fleet should come, but he was not long without full satisfaction; for the two Fleets were no sooner joyned, and those who commanded them had conference, but Thrasibulus (according to the liberty of Truce) sent Leontidas in a Barque with Philocles, who was Lieve|nant General unto him who commanded this Fleet unto Cyrus, to inform him of all pas[sages, so that Leontidas arrived at the Camp just as Cyrus entred into his Tent with Maza[res, Myrsiles, and many others: But to the end he might know how to receive Phil[ocles, he went to Cyrus before him, and acquainted him, how Philocles was sent by the Prin[cess Cleobuline, who was then Queen of Corinth, after the death of the wise and valiant Periander her Father; and that he came to offer him from the Queen this Fleet which he saw arrive.

Cyrus no sooner heard this from Leontidas, but he disposed himself to receive Philocles with extraordinary civility, not only because he did very much esteem him, and because he brought him powerful Auxiliaries, but also because he came from one of the most illustrious Princesses in the world, whom he had seen very young when he travelled by Corinth. Having then appointed Chrisantes to go and entertain them whom she had sent, and Leontidas to hring him thither, Philocles was brought, who presented a Letter unto him from the Queen of Corinth; which contained these words.

The Queen of Corinth to the invincible CYRUS.

SIR,

TO testifie how dear the remembrance of the illustrious Artamenes is unto me, and how much I interest my self in that glory which he hath gotten, I have sent unto him the best Ships which are on our Seas, being extreamly sorry, that he would not acquaint me with his necessities, but demanded aid from Princes, who could not help him with a more willing heart then mine: The Souldiers which I have made choice of to send him, hath all of them heretofore returned from Wars with Lawrels on their heads under the late King my Father; and lest they should forget the art of vanquishing, I should be glad to have them fight under such a Conquerour as your self, nor can they a greater honour, then to have a helping hand in the Prin[cess Mandana's delivery, and fighting under your Ensigns; and this is my advantage, that when you shall send them back, I shall be more terrible to my Neighbours; Philocles, who knows my thoughts of you, will more precisely interpret them; and if he follow my instructions exactly will tell you, that I do easily believe all the wonders which are reported of your life, and that there is none in the world who doth more honor your virtue then my self, nor who wisheth your happiness with more zeal then

CLEOBULINE.

This Letter being full of Noble expressions, it did most infinitely oblige Cyrus, who testified unto Philocles so many cordial acknowledgments of this great Queens goodness unto him, as made it apparent, that his heart was most sensible of such a generous overture. After this, Philocles acquainted Cyrus, how the Queen who sent him understood that the Prince of Cumes had sent secretly unto Corinth, to cause Ships of War to be Page_107 made, and that she was diligent to enquire (by some intelligence which she hath in the Town) what might be his reason for arming? by which means she came to understand, that it was because he had given retreat unto the King of Pontus, who was escaped from Sardis, and had taken the Princess Mandana with him: Philocles further told him, that this great Queen supposing he knew where that Princess was, and not questioning but that he would presently besiege Cumes, she made ready this Fleet which now she sent unto him, which could not possibly come sooner unto Cumes, because of the contrary windes: Philocles extolled the esteem which Cleobuline had of Cyrus, with so many ag[gravations, and such eloquence, as it was evident he came from the Court of a Princess, where ignorance did not pass for a virtue, like many other Courts in the world: Though Cleobuline was very young when Cyrus was at Corinth, yet he remembered her to be then very fair, and of an admirable Spirit as well as beauty; and being obliged unto a more particular curiosity, he asked Philocles a hundred questions, concerning this great Prin[cess and her Government; but the more Philocles answered, the more his curiosity augmented, for he told him such wonders of this Queen in discoursing with him, of her great soul, spirit, wit, prudence, justice, liberality and goodness, as this Prince was all admiration, and had no longing desire to know more. In the mean time, to testifie how much he esteemed of any thing that came from her, he sent Chrisantes un[to him, who commanded this Fleet, with several Barques loadened with all manner of things suitable for a Present at Sea, keeping Philocles with him, and Leontidas also until the Truce was ended.

The next morning, he who commanded the Fleet, whose name was Timochares, came also to visit Cyrus, who treated him with magnificence worthy of himself, and worthy of that Queen whom he desired to honour, by honouring him who commanded her Arms. Since the Truce allowed him leasure enough, and since his hopes of seeing his Princess at liberty had infused much serenity into his soul, his civilities were more exact and regular then ordinary; therefore as often as Philocles and Timochares were with him, he talked with them continually of the Queen, of whom he still heard something that was admirable, and indeed so many miracles, as would have staggered his belief, and suspected Phil[ocles and Timochares of gross flattery, if he had not known the first of them to be a man most sincere.

However, this Prince alwayes thought that he committed a crime when he thought of any thing but Mandana, and would not perhaps have been so forward in the business of this Queen of Timochares, according to her orders, had he not asked him from her, whether she approved of her design never to marry; advising with him afterwards upon several things which related unto her Dominions: So that Cyrus infinitely wondred at the resolution which this young and fair Queen had taken, and afterwards talking with Timochares, and then with Philocles, who for divers reasons wished that this Queen would not so obstinately persist in her resolution, Philocles resolved to acquaint Cyrus with some[thing which almost none but himself could, to the end that he might advise Timochares, who had some credit with Cleobuline, to perswade her not to persist in her design: So that after they had augmented the curiosity of Cyrus, by a thousand circumstances con[cerning this Queen; and after Philocles had told him, that a relation of this Queens life would concern him, Cyrus who infinitely esteemed Philocles, promised to give him au[dience some night when every one was retired to their rest. But before he would let him begin this relation, he asked him how Philista did? and how the state of his Love did stand? Oh Sir (answered he, with such a smile as testified that he was either cured of his passion, or happy) the state of my fortune is changed, since I left you in Armenia. Since I hope, replied Cyrus, that the change is for the better, I should be glad to know it: Sir, replied Philocles, I am much obliged unto you for your expression, but in my acknowledgment of this honour, it would not be just in me to trouble you with any long relation of my own adventures, since I have others more illustrious to acquaint you with[all: It will be enough I tell you, that hope is a thing which a Lover never ought to lose, since never any had less grounds of hope then I had when I was at Jalissa, after I heard the Husband of Philista was dead: Yet Sir, that extream aversion which I thought in[vincible, was surmounted by my perseverance; and that heart, which with so many services, sighs and tears could not melt, was at last dissolved by my constancy: So that when I did return unto Corinth, I did return the Husband of Philista; at my arrival there [Page_108 I received a Letter from Timocrates, which intimated unto me, that he had married Tellesile. Thus Sir those two Lovers, whom you saw in such a miserable condition at Sinope, as that none had misfortunes comparable unto theirs, are now both of them become most happy, though then there was no likelihood of their ever being so: I assure you, replied Cyrus, I am infinitely joyed at it: I am infinitely obliged unto you, replied Philocles: But to return unto the Queen of Corinth, I shall most humbly beseech you Sir, not to suspect me of any flattery, when you shall hear things reported of her; for believe it Sir, her merit is above all commendations or flattery: She was so lovely and accomplished, replied Cyrus, when I was at Corinth, that I question not but she will merit the Cha[racter you shall give her, therefore you need not Philocles to prepare me with any such Prologue. After this, Philocles began the relation thus.

The Historie of CLEOBULINE Queen of Corinth.

Though it be the custome of those who relate the lives of any one to begin a far off, and to give as large a Character of the Ancestors, as of the Party who is most concerned in the adventure in hand, yet I do not intend to imitate them; therefore Sir, I shall only hint unto you in a concise method, that Periander the Queen of Corinth's Father was branched from the illustrious Race of Heraclides; that his valour had rendred him a Conquerour of his Dominions, though his Justice made him to reign quietly; that he had waged many glorious Wars, especially against those of Epidaurus, and that his great soul had made him merit the name of wise, as well as his courage had got him the name of valiant. After this, I shall tell you, that having lost the Queen, his wife, and two Sons, he died himself, and left the Princess his Daughter Queen of Corinth, at such an age as could not be imagined she could bear out her Royal Authority as she did: I know again Sir, that it is the custome lest Auditors should be surprized at the extraordinary merits of a person, to relate how they were educated, and what they were taught, and to derive their Historie even from their very Cradle: But since it is the Queen of Corinth I am to speak, I will shew you her upon her Throne, and not mention her further then since she wore a Crown: Yet of her person Sir, since she is much embellished since you saw her, it is requisite I speak something; yet she is a little bigger then when you were at Corinth, for her stature could never reach unto the rank of the middle sort, but yet I assure you Sir, she has all the Characters of Grandure and Majesty in her aspect, such as imprints fear and reverence in the hearts of all that look upon her, though this be a priviledg which commonly is reserved only to such unto whom Nature hath given a high and lofty stature: But though Cleobuline be not so high as her heart is great, yet in exchange, she hath the fairest grey eyes that ere were seen, her hair the loveliest fair in the world, her garb and behaviour superlatively rare; and though her Nose be a little above the true exactness of proportion, yet her physiognomy is so Noble and Heroique, as it pleaseth infinitely, and as I said before, inspires reverence into the hearts of all beholders: But Sir, I do not only render her commendable unto you, by the graces of her person; but also by the grandure of her soul, the nobleness of her inclinations, the generosity of her heart, and the incomprehensible altitude of her wisdom and spirit: For it is most unquestionably certain, that never any one living had greater and more admirable qualities then this Princess hath, she speaks unto all Ambassadors which come unto her Court in their own National language, and that with such eloquence, with so much ease, and in such a grace, as puts them all to admiration. Moreover, her knowledg is not limited to the languages which she speaks and writes as well as her own, but there is no manner of Science whereof she is not capable: Yet the thing which in my phancy merits most esteem is, that she hath such a venerable opinion of all persons that are either knowing or virtuous, or excellent in any Art, that at this very present she hath intelligencers in all places of the world to enquire out those who have any extraordinary merit, and by this means there is not any man of any transcendent parts who hath not tasted of her liberality: For Sir, be pleased to know, that this great Queen doth give, as if the Gods had established her to enrich all the knowing men in the world; and certainly she hath good reason for it to look upon them as her Subjects, since I am confident there is not one who does not respect her as if she were his legitimate Queen; she does not only give to those who ask her, but un[to those who never pretend unto any thing, she gives quickly, she gives much, she gives [Page_109 with a good will, she gives with joy, and liberality is a virtue, which she practiseth in such a Noble and Heroique manner, as she never thinks she gives too much: But the wonder of all is, that this virtue is no blinde hood-wink't virtue which bestowes without choice or discretion; but on the contrary, she gives only unto those whom she thinks do merit her gift, yet still measuring them by the rule of her own generosity, more then by the virtue of the Receivers; much rather chusing to give more then is deserved; then not to give as much as her Quality, and liberal inclination prompts her unto. Moreover, this virtue of liberality, which is so proper unto Kings and Princes, is not the only virtue which shines in her, but also she is exceedingly good, profoundly prudent, and exactly just, so just that she will violate all her strongest inclinations, rather then do the least injustice to the meanest of her Subjects; and if this virtue which is the very Basis of all others do at any time transgress, it is only when clemency prompts her to pardon some Noble Delinquent; indeed she knows so well how to mix the severity of Justice with the mildness of clemency, that from these two virtues do flow a milion of good effects, which makes her to be both feared and loved by all her people. Moreover, she is able to give advice; she is knowing in all affairs, and understands them so admirably well, that it is a hard matter to pose her in any thing; she never frequents any but magnificent Feasts in her Court, and stately recreations; but the predominate passion of her soul is Love unto the Sciences, and she may as well be called Queen of the Muses, as Queen of Corinth; and indeed they do in all places pay her homage, in perpetual Elogies and Paneriques, both in Verse and Prose; the name of Cleobuline is celebrated in all places of the world, and her glory is above any additions. But Sir, to omit any relations of her Government, since we have nothing to do with the Politiques at this time: Be pleased to know, that there is a man in the same Court, whose name is Myrinthus, who is not originally a Corinthian, since his Grandfather was a Lacedæmonian: This Myrinthus is a man of excellent parts, for he is not only tall, handsome, fair, and of a good Garb, but he has as much heart, and as much Spirit as any one can have: He had also this advantage, that his Grandfather and Father having both of them very Noble Fortunes, both of them had the most honourable employments in the State: By this means Myrinthus ever from his first budding in the world, had much familiarity both with the Queen, and with all the men of highest Quality in Corinth: 'Tis true; Myrinthus was of a very considerable Rank in his Country; yet the truth is also, that Fortune carried him higher then his birth, but never higher then his virtue: Yet Sir, he need not be looked upon as the only foundation of those honours which I shall tell you he received, since I am very confident, that the Queen of Corinth had some reason to say, one never loves, but because they cannot chuse and because there is some compulsive power which forceth us, whether we will or no to love and hate, without any help of our reason: But Sir, since in order unto my design I must discover a secret unto you which few know, a secret which doubtless the Queen of Corinth would not have you know; therefore I must tell you, that there is in our Court a Prince whose name is Basilides, a man doubtless very amiable, both for the Qualities of his person, for those of his wit, and those of his soul. Moreover, Basilides looked so neer the Crown, that by the Law he was to succeed Cleobuline, if she married not. Thus Prince had ever a most reverent and violent passion unto this Princess, but since she made her self feared as well as loved, the Rank she kept, did enjoin him silence; yet I know very well that the Queen was not ignorant of his passion, though he never told her of it, and I am sure that if she did not love him, it was not because she was ignorant of his Love, but because her soul had a secret engagement which she her self knew not of: For Sir, let me tell you, Cleobuline was born with a most strong inclination unto Myrinthus: But that you may not wonder how I came to the knowledge of all these secret particulars, be pleased to know, that Stesilea who dwelt at Corinth, of whom you heard at Sinope, and who married the Brother of Philista, she, I say, was of confidence with the Queen a long time, and Philista being intimate with her, since her return from Corinth, I knew from her all these passages which I relate unto you: I know therefore Sir (as I told you) that none can have a stronger inclination to love another, then Cleobuline ever had to love Myrinthus, and this affection was so bred in her from the Cradle, as she perceived not the greatness of it until she was a Queen: She knew before that the sight of Myrinthus did please her more then the sight of any other, that his company did more divert her, that in her eye he had a better Garb then any in the Court, that his cloaths did better become him, that he had a better grace then any else, that his Spirit was more pleasing, [Page 110 ing, and that she esteemed him more then any she knew, but she thought all these to be pure effects of her reason, and of Myrinthus his merits, not thinking her inclination had any other ground: But the truth is, she loved him, and knew it not; and she went on so long in this error, that her flame could not be quenched when she discovered it: As for Myrinthus, the vast distance between the Quality of this Princess and himself, did so limit his veneration of her virtues, as that it did not produce those effects which perhaps it would have done, if Cleobulines quality had been equal unto his; for he knew very well, that in all reason he could not look upon her, but only with an eye of respect, and not with the least thought of Love; he knew she was the most accomplished person upon earth, but this knowledge produced only of admiration, and if he did bear any affection to her, it was only to her glory, and to do her service, but not unto her person; yet was he very officious in rendering most exact reverence unto this Princess, because being of a very ambitious temper, and knowing she was to be Queen, he conceived that she might advance his fortunes, and indeed he was not mistaken, for after Periander died, Cleobuline conferred upon him one of the greatest offices in the State; yet she did believe that in conferring it, he would execute the office better then another, and that what she did was conducive to her service: But she was not long in this ignorance of her own heart, for she began presently to conceive that she was not her own Mistress. Since Myrinthus had this Queen in high veneration, since he was obliged unto her, and since he expected much from her, doubtless he failed not in any thing of duty to her as the Queen of Corinth, yet she confessed since unto Stesilea and Philista, that sometimes, though she knew no reason for it, yet she was not satisfied with his obsequiousness, with his respects and services, and that she was vexed at him though she did conceal it, and not being able to reach the cause, she knew not whereof to complain. Thus not knowing what her heart would have of Myrinthus, she only knew that she was not contented: But though these disorders did often take her, without any outward expressions of them, yet she could not believe that she was in Love with Myrinthus, and she had rather accuse her self of being phantastical, then of entertaining any such passions as that in her heart; yet for all that, she confessed, she had once some suspicions of such a thing, which she rejected with a strange violence; adding, that she would not admit of any such thoughts into her soul, which she should be obliged to combat withall, and which she thought perhaps already that she could not easily vanquish: So that deluding her self, she continued loving Myrinthus, and would not know it; she never called her heart to give an account of its secrecies, as at other times she used: So that in some sort submitting her reason unto the conduct of her passion, this illustrious heart was so engaged to love Myrinthus, that when it would have disengaged it self, it was not in its power. In the mean time, Myrinthus was as happy as a man could be that was not in Love, for the Queen casting a favourable eye upon him, all the Court courted him, and he tasted all the sweets that ambition useth to afford those whose projects prosper. Myrinthus never asked any thing of the Queen which he obtained not, and she often gave him when he did not ask, her ear was always ready to his desires, all the friends of Myrinthus were sure to finde protection, and it may be said, that he was infinitely happy and knew it not. Basilides for his part, though he durst never speak a word of his passion unto the Queen, and he was not loved so well as he wished, yet he was not very miserable; for besides his hopes that time and his services might move her heart, he had this consolation also to know, that if ever she married, all reason and policy in the world would require she should marry him: So that contenting himself with that natural civility which this Princess used towards him, he lived in tranquillity enough, his hopes of being hereafter loved, sweetning his sorrows for not being loved at the present. As for the Queen, it may be said, that she had neither Roses nor Thorns in her Love; for she had neither the sweetness to be loved, or almost to know that she loved, nor was she stung with that restless anguish which that passion often procures, since she was neither angry, nor impatient, nor jealous, yet she was not long in this serenity of soul, which kept her ignorant of her hearts engagement, and she soon perceived that Love is a most dangerous passion. But Sir, to let you know how the Queen of Corinth came to know the state of her own heart, be pleased to understand Sir, that Basilides had a Sister named Philimena, who then was one of the greatest Ornaments of the Court; not that her beauty was so exact, but because she had such a sweet agreement of features as was preferable before beauty: Philimena was of a brown complexion, yes extremely brown, she was rather little then great, every part of her face was not regularly Page 111 handsome by it self, but being put together, she was fair and infinitely charming, she had bright, sweet, and lively eyes, her mouth was infinitely handsome, her teeth were admirable, and had a plumpness which gave her an ay of youth that did extremely well become her: But above all these, she had such a kinde of sweet Gallantry in her person, as she pleased all that saw her. Moreover, she had an attractive Spirit, and such a Spirit as was able to keep those Conquests which her beauty made: You may well imagine Sir, that Philimena having the honour to be the Queens Cozen, and being Mistress of so much merit, that she was often with her, and that there was no Feast in the Court whereat she was not: So that by this means Myrinthus did see Philimena every day, either with the Queen, or at her own lodging, or in some other place. But at last Sir, he saw her so often, that he saw her too often, for he felt most desperately in Love with her: Since as I told you, he was naturally ambitious, he never opposed a passion which had such a Noble cause, nor ever went about to hide it, not being sorry they should report him to be in Love with the Sister of that man, who in all likelihood was to marry the Queen; so that finding in one person a fit subject to satisfy his love and ambition both, he applied himself highly to Court Philimena; but the best conceipt was, that he built all the happy success of his design upon the Queens favour, never dreaming what thoughts she had of him; yet he did not carry it at the first as pretending to marry her, but as a man, who preferred her before all the Court, and could not chuse but love her: Since he thought it would avail him, that the Queen should think him in love with Philimena, hoping that she would further the business, he was as forward to make the Queen know it, as Philimena, knowing that Basilides would not deny the Queen any favour, and so he thought the enjoyment of Philimena did depend as much upon Cleobuline, as upon Philimena her self.

Myrinthus then having these thoughts, was extremely diligent to make the Queen believe him as amorous as he was, and lost no opportunity to perswade her that he was not able to live without Philimena, he would sometimes on set purpose when Philimena was with the Queen, fall in those respects which he owed unto Cleobuline, onely to let her see the greatnesse of his affection to Philimena: You may imagine Sir how the Queen was troubled at this knowledge, I assure you it was so great, as now she knew what she was ignorant of before, for she could never tell what was in her heart, until Myrinthus thus loved Philimena. But as soon as it appeared to be Love, there was no possibility of hiding this passion of her soul from her self, and she had enough to do to hide it from others; she would not at first believe her own thoughts, but did strive to believe that the reason why the love of Myrinthus to Philimena did vex her, was because his design was too rash, and with too little respect unto her: Yet she had no sooner accused Myrinthus of rashness, but she found something else in her heart, all her thoughts were in such a ravell'd disorder, as she was fain to examine them one after another, to know what it was From whence proceeds (said she to her self, and called all her thoughts to an account) this great turbulency in my heart, since Philimena conquered the heart of Myrinthus? What interest have I in the Conquest, that I should desire to oppose it? and what expect I from a man whom Fortune hath made so much my inferiour? I know not well what I would have (said she and chid her self) but I know very well that I would not have him love Philimena: But can it be possible I should love Myrinthus more then I thought I did? Myrinthus who who is a thousand degrees below me, Myrinthus who loves not me, nor thanks be to the Fates knows that I love him: No; fie, fie, Cleobuline is not capable of so much weakness, she is too zealous an adorer of glory to love Myrinthus, though he should infinitely love her.

At these words Cleobuline stopt, and was a while in examination of her self; but not being able to be her own Judg, she broke out into expressions again: However (said she and blusht) this same Cleobuline who is such a lover of glory, and who thought she had not loved Myrinthus, cannot endure that he should love Philimena, and finds something in her heart which tells her, she should not be sorry if he loved Cleobuline: But what's this I say? (said she and reprehended her self) am I in my wits? and can I approve of my own thoughts? No, no, I utterly disclaim them if they be unworthy of my self, I will magnanimously contend with my self for my own glory; and since all the world commends me, I will not give them any cause to blame me: Surmount Cleobuline this <...> sillanimity which thou hast discovered in thy heart; and never consent that the Daughter of the wise Periander should be capable of so much folly, nor that the Daughter of a great and valiant King should be so poorly base. But is Love a voluntary thing? (said this Princess Page 112 to her self) Is it not a passion? And yet I argue as if one might love or hate, whom, and when, and how they please. Oh you most just Gods (cried she out) I would what I say now were true? and that I could hate Myrinthus? 'Tis much better to be unjust then weak: Proclaim war against thy self Cleobuline, and to make the Conquest more easie, imagine, that Myrinthus hath done thee an injury, to respect thee as he hath done; and that he hath affronted thee by loving Philimena, that he was obliged to guess at those thoughts which you had of him, and to answer them, and let him pass for a perfidious and ungrateful man, who should know that you loved him and he never love you: But alas, said she, how can I accuse Myrinthus? He does not love me, 'tis true; but the reason is because he thinks that he ought not to presume to love me, if he had any suspicion that I loved him, had he not then done me wrong? and had I not good cause to be offended at him? of what then can I accuse Myrinthus? can I accuse him of any rashness in loving Philimena, since I think him not worthy to look upon my self? If I must finde a cause, (said she) either in him or my self to hate him, or at least not to love him: Is it not cause enough; that he is the cause of that weakness whereof I accuse my self? Is it not a sufficient cause to drive him from my heart, that he disturbs the tranquillity of my life? Banish him then courageously Cleobuline from that place where he does not know he is, and reign over thy self as Sovereignly as over thy Subjects. After this violent contest; this Princess thinking that she did not love Myrinthus, because she desired it, did what she could to keep close unto her resolutions, and to gain that victory at one blow, and put her self to the last test, she appointed many daies of Hunting, and other recreations, where Philimena and Myrinthus alwayes were; she gave the Ball unto Philimena very often, thinking to accustome her self to see Myrinthus with Philimena, without any other sorrow or interest. Thus striving to quench that flame which burned in her heart towards Myrinthus, she augmented the flames of Myrinthus to Philimena, by giving him so many occasions of seeing her; and she her self would sometimes cause Philimena to answer the affection of Myrinthus; for indeed, since Cleobuline intended to conquer her self, during these three daies of feasting and diversions, she expressed as much friendship unto Myrinthus, as he expressed love to Philimena: So that by this means the fair and young Philimena seeing her Lover in such favour with the Queen, did also look upon him with a more gracious eye. Basilides, who feared nothing more then to displease Cleobuline, durst not express any dislike that Myrinthus courted his Sister. Thus the Queen, without any conquest of her self, helped Myrinthus to conquer the heart of Philimena, who certainly esteemed him with as much affection as her virtue would permit her.

But whilst Cleobuline was contributing unto the felicity of Myrinthus, she disturbed her own; for the more she saw him, the less able she saw her self to cease loving him, and to endure she should love Philimena, when she saw him talk in a low voice unto that fair & young Lady, she would change colour, her heart would beat a Lovers pace, and suspecting that he was expressing his affection, her soul suffered inexpressible tortures: If he at any time chanced to commend Philimena, she was strangely troubled, and if Philimena commended Myrinthus, Cleobuline could not hold from contradicting her, though she esteemed Myrinthus above all the world. In the mean time, though the Queen found a strange rebellion in her heart, and that there was a continual contrariety betwixt her reason and her self, yet she did obstinately strive many daies to vanquish her passion; but at last, she found that all her attempts were in vain, and that the most she could do was to hide it; and she thought that also to be a piece of difficulty, unless she should hide her self and all: And indeed Cleobuline not being able to restrain her self, did feign sickness, to the end she might not see either Myrinthus or Philimena, hoping still that this absence from them might recover her liberty, yet this restraint and retreat had not that operation which she <◇> : For when Myrinthus was out of her sight, she imagined him always <◇> the <...> Philimena: So that in her releasing her mind, she did the more engage it. <...> , that <◇> desiring to know where Myrinthus was, she would send several <...> office, and still she was told, that they found him <...> blown by the bellows of jealousy, in <◇> of <...> that she would accuse her own folly and <...> a <◇> much in her favour, and more in her <...> would have her with her even at those <◇> <...> , since this Princess <...> Page 113 turally merry, Stesilea much wondred to see her so melancholy, not being able to imagine what the cause was, for she was infinitely adored by all her people, peace and abundance did flow over all parts of her Dominions, all her Neighbours States did highly esteem her, her reputation reached over all the world, and there was nothing visible which could molest her happiness: So that Stesilea seeing such an alteration in the Queen, resolved to take the liberty of asking her the cause, at the first opportunity which offered it self; and she was not long before she found it, for the Queen did her self give it one night when they were alone together: Tell me truly Stesilea, said the Princess to her, Do you not desire to know the cause of my melancholy? Did I as well know how to divline your Majesties thoughts, replied she, as you do mine, I should quickly satisfy my curiosity of knowing what it is that troubles you: The truth is Madam, the condition wherein I see you makes me most sadly inquisitive, for knowing you to be wise and prudent, I am most confident you are not melancholy without a cause, and not knowing what it is which disquiets you, I thought it the duty of my love to you, to be sorry in your behalf.

Cleobuline hearing Stesilea speak so feelingly, and knowing that she did love her with much tenderness, she resolved to unburthen her heart, since it was not possible that any one soul should contain all those resentments which she had of her own glory, of her love to Myrinthus, and of her jealousy of Philimena: But since she was strangely ashamed of her own weakness, she drew the Tissue Curtain of that bed whereon she sate, to the end that darkness might help her in discovering unto Stesilea those torments of her soul. After that, she had prepared Stesilea with a long preamble, and Stesilea had promised inviolable fidelity, she began to speak as if she had committed some horrid crime: You have good reason Stesilea (said she unto her) to say I am changed from what I was; for the truth is, I am not that woman whom all the world takes me to be; I know very well that I have the happiness of a reputation high enough, and that all Princes do either esteem me, or look upon me with an eye of envy, yet I must tell you, that if they knew my heart, they would look upon me either with an eye of pity, or else with an eye of scorn: Oh Madam (replied Stesilea) the last of these can never be: Yes, replied the Queen, sooner then the first, if my condition were but known: But Stesilea, the greatest comfort of my misfortune is, that I hope none will ever know it, and that though I tell it unto you, yet it will sleep in eternal oblivion. Certainly Madam you may be confident, answered Stesilea, that I will never reveal any secret which you shall honour me with the participation; therefore I beseech your Majesty to tell me what it is which disquiets you, that I may endeavour a remedy. As soon as I offer to open my mouth, replied Cleobuline, to tell you the cause of my misery, anger and shame shuts it again: I cannot find words to express my thoughts, and I do find such a confusion in all my thoughts, that I can give no order unto my words; one while I would desire you to excuse my folly, before I acquaint you what it is; sometimes I have a desire to tell what the matter is and presently after I alter my mind, and resolve to tell you nothing at all; therefore my dear Stesilea, if you can guess what the cause of my grief is: But hold (said she and reprehended her self) I would not have you guess, and though you have some such suspicion, I conjure you not to tell it, for if you should guess it, I should believe all the world might do the like, and so I should be the most miserable Princess upon earth. Since Stesilea naturally had a passionate soul, she knew by the manner of the Queens discourse, that love was that cause of her sorrows, but yet she could not imagine with whom it should be that she was in Love, but very sweetly replied, that since she desired to know no farther then she was pleased to allow her, she would not dive deeper into the business then her Majesty pleased: Though I am perswaded, (said she) that one may impart all things unto one that is faithful: But Madam (said she purposely to serve out the secret) what can it be that is so difficult to be discovered? All the world knows all your actions to be innocent and most illustrious, and if you be culpable in any thing, certainly there is none that can testify against you but your self, and that perhaps for entertaining some thoughts which were too high: Oh Stesilea, replied the Queen, ambition is no part of my crime, were I as free from all other passions as from that, my soul would be at more tranquility; but since I must tell you that which I cannot conceal, know Stesilea, that there is one in the world, who whether I will or no, hath such a share in my heart, as that I cannot hate him, though I would, and though I have a strange desire unto it: I thought (replied Stesilea) that your Majesty had some horrid design to subvert all the Lawes of Page 114 your Dominions, to begin some unjust war, and to establish some tyrannical Government, since you did so highly accuse your self; but for ought I see you are culpable of nothing, unless in that you will not permit one to adore you, or in that you have not hated some illustrious Slave, who doubtless doth love and adore you with a most reverent passion: Ah Stesilea, said Cleobuline, my fate is worse then you imagine it, and since I must discover the very root of my heart unto you, know, that I love one who knows it not, and one who loves another, yet such is the violence of my Love; that I cannot chuse but love him, nor can I endure he should love another, though I would not have him know I love him, nor that he should ever tell me that he loves me, though he did; I pray therefore judge Stesilea, whether my condition be not deplorable; and whether I have not good reason to be much ashamed of my weakness: Since I cannot condemn your Majesty (replied Stesilea) unless I should condemn my self, I beseech you give me leave to tell you, that I cannot accuse you at all, for since I know you are not ignorant of my cruel disaster at Jalissa, where I fell in love with a man, who made me the confident of his affection unto another, I thought good then to accuse and condemn my self as your Majesty doth: But I most humbly beseech you Madam, who is this happy man that hath made this illustrious Conquest? This Conquerour, replied Cleobuline, is the Slave of Philimena: Judge therefore Stesilea, if I have not good reason to be ashamed, for though I know you are culpable of the same crime that I am, yet I cannot excuse my self, and to say the truth, there is some difference betwixt you and me, for he whom you loved was your equal, and you were not obliged to render an account of your actions unto any but your self: But Stesilea, I must render an account of mine unto all the world, I have a transcendent glory to preserve, and I prefer that glory above my life; yet I love one of my Subjects above my self, and which is worse, I love him, and am not loved, but sees him desperately in love with another; had I so much happiness as to be so blinded by my passion, that I could think my self in no fault, I should be less miserable, and more excusable, but to my torment, the Gods have left me so much reason as to see my own weakness, and yet have not left me power enough to surmount it: But Madam, replied Stesilea, to justify you by your own words, is it not sufficient to stop all accusations, that you have done all you were able to subdue the passion of your soul? For truly Madam, I cannot conceive that virtue consists in having no passions, Nature gives them unto all, and they can never be totally subdued but by death; I am confidently perswaded, that so these passions prompt us not unto any thing which is against true glory, we are not culpable, though we cannot subdue them; therefore Madam, in lieu of accusing you, as you do your self, you ought to be commended, for striving so courageously against that which is the most powerful of all passions; and you ought to consider with a little more tranquility, which way you may vanquish them, or render them less intollerable. As for vanquishing them, replied the Queen, I will never hope for it, though I am resolved to strive as long as I live; and as for making them less intollerable, the way is very difficult to be found. Moreover Stesilea, there is one thing which doth extremely torment me, for I am perswaded that if Myrinthus knew my thoughts of him, they would stagger his fidelity unto Philimena; and sometimes again I have thoughts, that the Crown I wear keeps him from loving me: I believe I have an infallible way to make him break off with Philimena, but it is a way I will never take, for there is nothing in the world I fear more, then that Myrinthus should know I love him: Then Madam, said Stesilea, What will content you? That I had never loved Myrinthus, replied she: For to talk of ceasing from loving him, is to talk of a thing impossible, neither my heart nor my reason will ever consent unto it: Then Madam, replied Stesilea, I cannot easily think you can be in such a miserable condition, but you may find out ways to be happy: Truly Stesilea, replied Cleobuline, the state of my fortune is such, that I know no way to happiness, but only to wish it: For since the fate of Myrinthus is not sit to be a King, I cannot be any thing else but a lump of misfortunes, yet I do conceive something that would render me something less miserable then I am: I beseech you Madam, said Stesilea, what is it that will be any ease unto your misery? I would have Myrinthus (said she) not to love Philimena, but would have him love me, but love me without ever telling me of it, or without ever knowing that I love him, and I would have all the world ignorant of that passion which was in our souls: I pray judge then Stesilea, whether there be any possibility of my happiness, truly I can never pretend unto so <...> ch as to hope it, all that I wish is, that Myrinthus did not love Philimena; yet truly I <...> told you my wish, but shame moves me to alter my opinion, for I feel my Page 115 love to Myrinthus converts it self into hatred against my self, and that my jealousy of Philimena turns fury against my own reason; therefore Stesilea, I will pause a while until second thoughts have better digested my first, and until I am better resolved upon what I would have you do: This is a most certain and infallible Maxime which is for ever unalterable, that I will never do any thing that shall be opposite unto glory, and that Myrinthus shall never know that I love him. After this, Stesilea had a long conference with Cleobuline, at the conclusion of which nothing was resolved upon; yet this Queen found some ease in her spirits, since she had discharged her heart unto Stesilea, whose tender and passionate soul was very fit to be a confident of such a Noble passion, and ever since she was inseparable from the Queen, who could not live without her: So that according to the custome of all Courts, which is, that as soon as any is admitted into the favour of the Kings or Queens, they are Courted by all the Court: So Stesilea by her new admittance into the Queens favour, was loadened with civilities and addresses: Basilides himself was very compliant with her, and among the rest Myrinthus, as powerful as he was with the Queen, yet Courted the friendship of Stesilea, to the end she might procure him that Queens consent unto his design of marrying Philimena; so that by this means she was upon very good terms with Myrinthus, who not knowing the cause of this new favor, did attribute it as all the rest of the Court did, unto the merit of Stesilea, and unto the recommendation of the Princess Eumetis; with whom she spent all the beginning of her life. Thus Myrinthus not knowing the true cause of those many favours wherewith the Queen honoured Stesilea, did Court her favour, in hopes of her doing him a good office by favouring his design. Moreover, in order unto this design, he became more obsequious, more exact, more respectful, and more compliant about the Queen; but the more regularly he demeaned himself, the more did her love and her jealousy both begin to flame; the more obsequious he was, the more she thought him amiable; but also considering that his reason for being so officious about her was, only because he was every day more in love with Philimena, a spiteful jealousy did so rouse her heart, as she phrased as much pleasure in hindering Myrinthus from marrying Philimena, as this Lover did in enjoying her. So that consulting about it one day with Stesilea, she both prayed her, and conjured her, to contribute all her endeavours unto the breaking off of this match: I know well (said she unto her) that I can do it my self by virtue of my Sovereign authority, but there is two strong reasons which restrain me: The first is, because I am extremely afraid that Myrinthus would guess at the cause, and therefore I will not run that hazard: The second is, (if I could not do it without a blush) because I would not have Myrinthus hate me, as doubtless he would, if he should know it to be I who broke off his marriage; therefore Stesilea, I conjure you to employ all your wits to make him alter his opinion of Philimena, or at least to keep him from marrying her; not that I do intend that Myrinthus shall ever know I love him, though you should effect my desired project; but it is so great a pleasure unto any one who is in love, to quash any passion that shall oppose their own, as I would do any thing in the world to see Myrinthus out of love with Philimena: I profess Stesilea (said she) if you can drive her out of the heart of Myrinthus, you shall have as great a share in my heart almost as he hath; for then I imagine I shall with less pain hide that passion which thus rants it in my heart, I shall more easily vanquish it, or at the least shall love him less.

Stesilea hearing Cleobuline express her self so earnestly, did promise all her endeavours for her satisfaction, and ineed she omitted no opportunity of transacting it: Since she knew Myrinthus to be very ambitious, she undertook one day to perswade him, that to marry so soon was the only way to choak all his ambitious thoughts, since Fortune is allways more favourable unto those who are not married, then unto those who are: Afterwards, she told him he was indiscreet, in thinking of any alliance with a Prince whom the Queen loved not, and that if he would take her counsel, she would advise him to devote himself inseparably to the Queen, without any thoughts of any other interest. But since Myrinthus was chained in the Fetters of Love, the policie of Stesilea did not relish; and though he was very ambitious, yet he could not fear what she desired he should; therefore he told her, that he should not recede from the interests of the Queen by marrying Philimena; but on the contrary, should more adhere unto them, since she was the Sister of a man, who must almost of necessity (if ever the Queen marry) marry her: So that Stesilea seeing she could not work upon the spirit of Myrinthus, seemed to yeeld unto his opinion, to the end he might still think her one of his friends: And she plotted another Page 116 stratagem to ruine his passion, which was: to intimate unto Philimena by a friend of hers, who was very intimate with her, that she did her self the greatest wrong in the world, by thinking to marrie Myrinthus, who though indeed he was a verie accomplished man, yet was of too inferiour qualitie for her. But since Philimena's soul was more sensible of Myrinthus his merits, then of any ambition, this counsel was given in vain: So that Stesilea seeing she could no way quench these flames of affection in either of them, yet she resolved to hinder their marriage, and thought she had found an excellent way for it. I told you already Sir, that Basilides did verie much Court the friendship of Stesilea, to the end she might do some good offices to the Queen, of whom he extremely doted. And I also told you, that the reason why he did not thwart the affection of Myrinthus to Philimena, was because he feared to incense the Queen, by crossing the man that was so much in favour with her: Now I must tell you Sir, that Stesilea could not devise any better way to choak the designs of Myrinthus, then by Basilides: So that talking one day with him, she ordered her discourse so handsomly, that she began to talk of Myrinthus, and his love to Philimena. After this, Stesilea did so prepare his Spirit, that she ingaged him unto her desires, and moved him to ask her what the Queen thought of that business. Stesilea finding that Basilides was brought unto her own bow, she went on as handsomly as she begun: At first she told him, that she did not verie well know the Queens thoughts, and that if she did, yet she ought not to tell them; afterwards, yeelding by degrees unto the request of Basilides, she made him swear a thousand oaths to be faithful unto her: After that, she told him, how she feared certainly that this marrying would displease the Queen, and that the Queen wished with all her heart it were broken off, without her being seen it. Alas Stesilea (said Basilides to her) the matter had never gone so far, if I had not feared the Queens displeasure in opposing it: But since you assure me, that she doth not approve of this marriage, and that I shall not incur her disfavour by breaking it off, it shall be quickly quashed.

Stesilea hearing Basilides speak with so much violence, feared lest some quarrel should be betwixt Myrinthus and him; therefore to prevent any such disaster, she told him further, that he should not by any means cross these designs with a noise, because the Queen would not take it well that Myrinthus should be openly affronted, but that his best course would be to make use of the Princess his Mother to command Philimena from any thoughts of Myrinthus, and to treat him as a man whom she would never marrie. Basilides followed Stesilea's counsel with a thousand thanks, not thinking that in breaking of the marriage of Myrinthus, he transacted against himself. In the mean time, Stesilea's stratagem was not long before it took effect, for Basilides having set on the Princess his Mother, Philimena was put into a strange perplexitie: Since she did most tenderly affect Myrinthus, she could not upon any terms resolve to treat him ill. Also being exceedingly tender of her glorie, she was verie loath to disobey the commands of a Mother: So that taking the middle way, and that she might neither lose Myrinthus, nor disobey the Princess her Mother, she resolved to acquaint him with the commands which was upon her: At first she had much ado to resolve upon this course, knowing verie well that she could not do it without being very obliging towards him: But at last, love being predominate, she resolved to tell him, and to desire him he would see her no more; and all this in such obliging language, as she had not ingaged him so much to see her, if she had absolutely commanded it; for he made a thousand vows that he would see her in spite of all the world, and told her peremptorie, that he would leave her; yet Philimena would not upon any terms let him see her at her own lodging; but in lieu therefore they agreed to see each other at the Queens. Thus Stesilea in doing this Princess a good office one way, did her an ill one another way, for she helped her unto the object which of all the world she least desired to see, to wit, Myrinthus often with Philimena: But afterwards, Basilides being assured by Stesilea, that the Queen desired that the marriage might be broken off, he obliged the Princess his Mother to carry Philimena into the Country, so that this absence was an intolerable torment to Myrinthus, yet he was not a sufferer by himself, and perhaps this is the Page 117 that ev the absence of a Rival caused sorrow; yet certainly Cleobul could not Page 117 upon Myrinthus so sad for the absence of Philimena, without extreme passage happened which was a great addition to her pain, that she being obliged to make a great Feast for the English Ambassadors which came to her Court, Myrinthus appeared in such Page 117 if he were neither to see, or be seen by any, he thinking that since Page 117 Philimena was not there: it was no matter for dressing himself; and knowing that she had a friend in Court who would send her word of every passage, he hoped that this his negligence would be recompenced another way, not fearing at all that the Queen would interest her self in it. In the mean time, this trivial passage do so incense her sorrows, as sometimes she was in hopes not to love him any longer; but this hope was quickly quashed. Did ever any see such an odd adventure? (said she one night unto Stesilea) all that I ever do to cure my self, or to comfort me, doth more augment my miserie: The absence of Philimena, from which I hoped for such sweetness, causeth nothing but bitterness; and I had rather see Philimena, then see that sorrow for her in the face of Myrinthus: Is it possible I should be capable of such phantastical thoughts? I am confident, that those who see me enter into any Closet so often by my self, do think that I am meditating upon some grand designs, and that the good of the state is all my thoughts: Yet weak woman, that I am busied only in thinking whether Myrinthus be sad or pleasant, whether Myrinthus be handsome or negligent in his cloaths: Ah Cleobuline, what thoughts are these? Call to memory what heretofore thou wast: Read over all the Elogies that were presented to thee, to the end they may put thee in mind of deserving them, and be unto thy self the same thou seemest to be unto others: Thou art talked on over all the world, as if thou wert a Lover of virtue and glorie, and yet thou lovest Myrinthus who loves not thee, though thou knowest verie well, that thou canst not do it without doing that which is unworthy of thy qualitie: Thou lovest Myrinthus, I say, who loves none but Philimena, and who ought not to enjoy thy affection, though he did love thee as well as he loves her: Be thy own Judge Cleobuline, what baseness of soul it is to do as thou dost: Consider seriously with thy self, what abundance of folly it is to be a Slave unto thy own unruly passions: Remember how the wise Periarth thy Father hath told thee a thousand and a thousand times, that tranquility of mind was the greatest goodness; that this tranquillitie of mind was in the soul, like health to the body, without which one could not enjoy any manner of pleasure: Recall thy memorie, and think how he told thee, that the love of glory was the only innocent passion; quench those flames of affection which is in thy soul unto Myrinthus; consider, that thy whole rest and glorie consists in conquering thy self, and thy crime does lie close in the secret corners of thy soul, yet it will procure thee as much shame as if it were publique: How canst thou without a blush receive those commendations which are given thee, since thou knowest thy self unworthy of them? How canst thou enjoy the esteem of others, when thou dost not esteem thy self? Consider Cleobuline, consider seriously, that if Myrinthus whom thou thou adorest, and so tenderly loves, did but know of thy pusillanimous affection to him, he would esteem thee less, and perhaps scorn thee; never be so simple as to think, that if he knew of thy affection to him, he would then quit Philimena; but be confident on the contrary, that he would hate thee, it seems Madam, (saies Stesilea and interrupted her) that love is a passion which you are not acquainted with, since you think to vanquish it by reason or violence: Alas my dear Stesilea (said she unto her) with what other armes would you have me vanquish my self? Would you have me submit and render my self without any resistance? No Madam (replied Stesilea) but in wishing you to ruine your passion, I would not have you ruine your self: But Stesilea, replied she, what would you have a person do, whose heart is as full of shame as love, as full of jealousy as shame, and as full of anger as jealousy? What would you have a Princess do, who has a thousand opposite thoughts in her soul? Who would sometimes alwayes see Myrinthus, and sometimes again never see him; who sometimes wisheth she knew how he loves him, and who in a minute after believe, that she should die for shame if he did know it, who hates Philimena with as much violence as she loves Myrinthus, and who often hates her self, even unto death? Sometimes my dear Stesilea, all the extraordinary passages in History caused by Love comes into my memory. I finde some Kings of Egypt, who have made Slaves Queens; and I think I have read of some Queens who have made Slaves Kings: From hence my reason wandered, and looked upon Myrinthus as one of Noble Qualitie and extraordinary merit; I thought his hand strong enough to hold up the weight of a Scepter, and that he who reigns in my heart might well reign in my Kingdomes. But after these fond and unworthy imaginations had roven in my mind, my reason began to rouse, and disperse those muddy Clouds which obscured it, and made me so abhor my own thoughts, that I hated both her who entertained them, and him also who was the subject of them; judg then Stesilea, what a restless life I live; and the greatest horror of all is, that in the conclusion of all my Page 118 raptures, I still find Myrinthus innocent, and Myrinthus worthy of my esteem: For truly he is a man of courage, spirit, and fidelity, and if I could not look upon him as my subject I had all the reasons in the world to be contented with him, yet I complain and know not why I accuse and justifie him, I excuse and condemn my self all at once; yet there is alwayes in my heart such a desire of glory, as often moves me, maugre the violence of my passion, to render thanks unto the Gods that Myrinthus loves me not, though this be the thing which most of any thing upon earth grieves me. But I had no sooner rendered thanks unto them for such a cruel favour, then I was ready to petition, that they would inspire the heart of Myrinthus with the same passion that they did mine. Thus being tossed from one turbulent thought unto another, I found not rest in any. After all these violent expressions, the Queen was silent: At last she told Stesilea, that she thought it so unworthy a thing to take so much fruitless pains in breaking off the marriage of Myrinthus, as she would meddle no further in it, but was resolved to leave it to a hazard a while: For I am perswaded (said she) that I do but augment the love of Myrinthus by all my obstacles. This resolution being pitched upon, Stesilea ceased her negotiations. In the mean while, Myrinthus, whose passion would never let him rest, endeavoured to gain Basilides who indeed was perswaded by one of his friends, that for the advancement of his designs upon the Queen, it extremely concerned him not to incense Myrinthus, who was so gracious with her; but yet he was at a stand in the business, for he knew by Stesilea that the Queen did not approve of his design to marrie Philimena; yet he himself knew, that one could not be more in her favour then he was, and therefore he thought it concerned him to link him unto his interests: So endeavouring not to appear in consenting unto a marriage which the Queen disliked, and not to hinder Myrinthus, he resolved to trust him, and to tell him upon what reasons he opposed his design, not caring to sacrifice his Sister unto his Love. After the place where they might talk in secret was appointed, Basilides told Myrinthus, that the reason why he opposed his affection was, because Stesilea assured him that the Queen did not approved of it: After which, linking their interests together, Myrinthus promised Basilides to serve him in all things that he was able, and Basilides promised Myrinthus not to oppose him any more, provided he got the Queens approbation. In the mean while, Basilides to begin his favours, caused Philimena to return unto Corinth, upon some slight colour of the business. But as the grief which the Queen saw in the countenance of Myrinthus during Philimena's absence did much perplex her; so the joyes which she saw in him at her return, did drive her into absolute despair.

Yet for all this, the satisfaction of Myrinthus was not over-full of tranquillitie, for now knowing that the Queen was not ignorant of his design, he found it more difficult to bring it to pass, then when he thought Basilides only did oppose him: It was in vain to search out the cause, for he saw that he was as much in her favour as ever; and he did not so much as ever suspect, that she thwarted his passion, only because he was too deep in her heart; yet he thought it his best course to seem as if he were ignorant of her disapproving of his passion; and he thought also, that if he had as much confident boldness as to ask her favour unto his design, that perhaps she would not deny it. Thus after he had well consulted upon the matter with Basilides and with Philimena, it was resolved that he should take that course, and a verie favourable opportunitie did offer it self, since Myrinthus had done a verie considerable piece of service to the Queen, in negotiating with Ambassadors from Lacedemonea, who were then at Corinth, which he transacted with so much wisdom and spirit, that it may well be said he prevented a great and dangerous War. Myrinthus spoke not a word of his design unto Stesilea; for since she was not so open-breasted to him as Basilides, he had no mind to speak unto her of it, lest she should dissuade him, or else by her telling Cleobuline of it, she might have more cause to deny him, by giving time to studie her reasons for not consenting unto his desires. After he had well thought upon it, he went one morning to the Queen at such an hour, when he knew he might have the conveniencie of talking with her, and he went with abundance of hopes to speed well; for when he remembered what honours he had received from this Princess, the great offices she had given him, and all things she had done for him, it could not sink into his belief, that she would deny him the only thing which crowned all his felicities; therefore he resolved that if he found any difficulty in obtaining his desires, then to aggravate his affection unto Philimena in such a manner unto Cleobuline, that she should see Page 119 he could not live without her. Myrinthus then having thus resolved upon the matter, and being come unto the Queen, he behaved himself as he was wont, when he had business of importance to talk on: So that Cleobuline gave him the opportunity of talking with her in private, without the least suspicion of the truth, imagining he would tell her something which related unto his office; but she wondered, when she knew by the verie first words of Myrinthus that she was mistaken: Did I not know Madam, (said he unto her) that I have the honour to be known very well unto your Majestie, I should have cause to fear, that in lieu of granting me a most humble Petition, which I intend to present unto you, that you should accuse me of rashness, and of extreme ambition. After all that I have done for you Myrinthus, replied she, I have verie little reason to accuse you of rashness; and I must confess, I cannot understand what you can desire of me, which may move me to think you ambitious: Yet Madam I am strangely afraid your Majestie should mistake one passion for another, and that I having an intention to beg your Majesties leave to love Philimena, and to protect me against Basilides, you should think me not contented with your benefits, but that I would draw others upon my self by this illustrious alliance: But Madam, I must protest, that ambition is not the cause of my boldness; and if I had only that passion in my soul, I should certainly be the happiest man alive: For indeed Madam, you have honored me with so many offices, and put me upon such glorious employments, that I know not how to wish any greater: But Madam, if your Majestie will be pleased to let me open my heart, to the end I may excuse my boldness, I shall tell you, that Love is the tyrannical passion of my soul, which moves me to Petition your Majestie with abundance of earnestness to grant my desire: If you had been only ambitious, (replied Cleobuline and blusht) you should sooner obtain your desires; for since I am as well able to satisfy the gusts of that passion, as you can desire them, I should perhaps continue on my favours to you; but to interest me in matters of Love, and such a Love as yours, this Myrinthus is a thing which I cannot meddle in: Many reasons, best known unto my self, which I cannot impart unto you, makes me dislike your desired Marriage, yet not that I think you unworthy of Philimena: For to testify unto you (addded she) being transported with raptures of Love) that I do not deny my assent out of any disadvantageous thoughts of you, I do confer upon you the best office in my Dominions, which you became vacant of lately. Alas Madam, replied Myrinthus, rather command me to surrender all those honours you have formerly conferred upon me, then deny me Philimena. Since Love is often a fading passion, replied she, and since ambition on the contrary, is a passion which follows those who are once tainted with it, even unto death, when the Gusts of your Love is a little blown over, you will be glad I satisfied your ambition. I beseech you Madam, replied Myrinthus, judge not of me according unto the common Rules of others; and believe that I am more amorous then ambitious, and ever shall be so. Since that belief will not be advantageous unto you, answered the Queen, I will not entertain it, but will continue in the same opinion I was. I know verie well Madam, replied Myrinthus, that you may justly denie me all things, and I cannot justly complain: But since the passion which raiges in me is not accustomed to acknowledg any Sovereignty unto reason, I cannot chuse but tell your Majestie, that it is something strange you should denie me this favour which I do ask of you, after conferring so many favours upon me which I never asked, all which are nothing to me without this: Yes Madam (said Myrinthus, being transported with the violence of his Love) Philimena is so essentially necessarie unto the felicitie of my life, that I cannot live without some hopes of enjoying her: As for hope (replied Cleobuline with extream grief and anger) I will not take it from you, for some men will often hope against all manner of probability, but as for Philimena, I will never per- (...) it; & if you marrie her, it shall be without my consent: I know verie well, said she; that after so much goodness as I have formerly extended towards you, it may seem something strange I should denie you a thing which you so earnestly desire, and denie it without giving you any reason for my denial: But know Myrinthus, that this reason is of such a nature, as I cannot tell it; yet it is so strange a reason, that it is invincible; and if you did know it, you would confess, that if you were in my room, you would do the like: And I assure you, it will not be a greater difficultie for you to cast off Philimena, then for me to consent that you should ever think on her; therefore Myrinthus sollicite me no more in the matter, for all will be in vain: Let it suffice, that of two passions. I shall satisfy that which (<>) used to be most difficult to content; and if you will be happier, overcome the other courageously. Alas Madam (said Myrinthus and sighed) Page 120 it seems your Majestie is only a lover of glorie and virtue, since you think it such an easie matter to drive out of my heart a hot-burning passion which keeps a most violent possession. No, no, Philimena will not out so easily: Doubtless I may resolve not to marry her and die, but I cannot leave loving her and live; therefore Madam, it is in your choice, whether you will give me death or Philimena: The reverent duty which I owe your Majesty, tan go no further: If you doom me to death, I will endeavour to receive it without murmure, but if you grant me life and Philimena, what would I not do to testify my acknowledgments? Consider Madam, I beseech you, that your last words will be a sentence either of life or death unto a man whom you have so much esteemed, as to honour him with abundance favours and benefits: Consider I say, that if you permit me to enjoy Philimena, I shall serve you all the rest of my life with unutterable zeal: And consider also, that if you forbid the baines those cruel words will be poyson, which passing from your mouth into my ears, will pass from my ears unto my heart, and there most infallibly will be my death, a death the most severe and tormentive in the world, since pronounced by the greatest Queen upon earth, and whom I held in such reverent esteem; for the most certain truth is Madam, that I have been as zealously devoted unto your glory, as unto Philimena; and I do protest, that I am as faithful a subject unto you, as I am a faithful lover unto her: Then yeeld obedience, replied Cleobuline, unto those orders which I command, and obey them willingly: I wish unto the heavens Madam that I could, replied he, but since I cannot unless I die, I beseech you command them no more; let it suffice I wish that I loved Philimena less; and believe it I most humbly beseech you, that if I were able to quench those flames which offend you, I should most joyfully do it, knowing very well, that a Princess whose heart is sensible only of glorie, would the more esteem me, if mine were not so sensible of Love: But the case is unalterable with me Madam, 'tis you must pronounce the fatal words of life or death: Live then (said Cleobuline unto him, scarce knowing what she said) but live without Philimena, unless you will both live and die in my displeasure: I will live Madam if I can, replied he, since you command it; but since I am confident that I cannot, I shall die in my sorrows that I cannot know why I die; but I shall die with this satisfaction, that I shall die the most faithful, though the most unfortunate of all your Subjects. After this, Myrinthus made a most low and reverent Congee unto the Queen with such a sad and drooping countenance, that any other then a Lover would have pitied him. No sooner was Myrinthus gone out of the Queens Closet, but Stefiea entred, and she was no sooner entred, but Cleobuline commanded that none else should enter; and then she related unto her all the passages between Myrinthus and her self, and that with so much agitation of spirits, that the passion of her soul was very discernable: Did you know, said she unto her, with what zealous earnestness Myrinthus asked leave to marrie Philimena, you would wonder how I could denie him, or you would wonder I should not hate him, and admire how I could conceal the jealousy of my soul, yet to my unspeakable miserie, the more he seemed in Love with Philimena, the more he blew the flame of my affection unto him: Alas (said I unto my self whilst he was talking) how happy should I be, if Myrinthus were as affectionate unto me, as unto another? and when he protested that he was as much devoted unto my glorie as unto Philimsna, I had much ado to withhold from saying, that his nearest way of happiness was to be as much devoted unto my person as unto my service: But thanks be to the heavens, my reason rowling up to aid me, I abhorred a thought so base and unworthie of my self, and I was more then half resolved to allow the marriage of Myrinthus with Philimena, thereby to drive Myrinthus out of Cleobulines heart; but my mouth would not obey the offers of my minde, which neither my heart nor reason did not command-

Thus my dear Stesilea, I have denied Philimena unto Myrinthus, and I have still kept Myrinthus in my heart, notwithstanding his extream love of Philimena; yet (...) these violent flames of affection which I saw in his soul, did inspire such (<>) mine, and I could not be more angrie if Myrinthus had been ungrateful and perfidio (...) ut presently after my anger ceased, and I accused my self of the most horrible (<>) in the world Indeed I must confess unto my shame, that one could not be (...) must then I (...) business, for as violent as my affection to Wyrinthus was, (...) could never (<>) that he should know it; and that though he had loved me, (<>) did not allow (<>) so much boldness as to sell me of it; so that it must needs be-

(<>) the greatest folly and (<>) in the world to (<>) Myrinthus miserable: But for all that, I have (...) Page 121 so great a consolation in seeing him out of love with Philimena, and I found so much delight in making my self believe that he loved me, and knew not that I loved him, as I could not by any means consent that he should either love or marrie Philimena; yet for all this, I am perswaded that he will marrie her, maugre all my commands to the contrary; and that he will force me to banish him my Court, to withdraw all my favours from him, and to punish him for contempt of my authority: But alas what's this I talk, said she, Can I think of banishing Myrinthus my Court, since I cannot banish him my heart, that there is much more justice in that, then in banishing him out of my Dominions: For my part Madam, replied Stesilea, I am not of your opinion, for I am perswaded that Myrinthus will not marrie Philimena without your consent: Though he do not marrie her without my consent, replied Cleobuline, yet assuredly he will still hate me, and love her; so that whether he marrie, or marrie her not, I shall still be miserable. However Madam, replied Stesilea, I beseech you devise some stratagem or other, and see whether I can contribute any thing to your satisfaction: I have devised more then you imagine (said she) for in lieu of one stratagem, I have two continually in my mind, but yet they are verie opposite unto each other, and therefore I think that neither of them will take effect; for truly I have a mind to make Myrinthus love me, and I have a mind to cease loving him; judge then Stesilea, whether two such impossibilities can ever conduce any thing to my souls tranquillitie. After this, Cleobuline told Stesilea a hundred things, which testified the grandure of her passion, and the grandure of her virtue. In the mean time, she became so sad, so unquiet, and so extreamly melancholic since the day that Myrinthus asked leave to marrie Philimena, as Stesilea much feared her falling sick. On the other side, Myrinthus was in such a horrid despair, that never man was fuller of sorrows; for he knew that Basilides (notwithstanding the league between them) would never let him marrie Philimena without Cleobulines consent: Also considering his obligations unto the Queen, he knew it a most unworthie act to disobey her. Moreover, having a soul verie ambitious, he could not see how he could have wherewith to satisfy his love, if he should lose his fortunes, so that he suffered intolerable torments; but the greatest torture of all was, that he could not guess at the Queens reason to oppose his design; and to compleat his miseries, Philimena understanding that the Queen would not consent unto her marriage, she told Myrinthus, to try his fidelitie, that she would not have him ruine his fortunes for her sake; and therefore conjured him to think no more of it. Philimena told him this in such a manner, as that he could not guess at her design; but on the contrary, did think, that she said so, because she feared to leave the Court. Afterwards, he suspected that some Rival was perhaps more in her favour then he imagined: So that he was as ill satisfied from her, as from the Queen, and yet he made a thousand vows and protestations of love unto her, the most tender and passionate in the world; he complained against her taking so much care of his fortunes, he swore that he would not value them at a straw, but only because he was loath to make her miserable; and he was so full of such tender and obliging expressions, that Philimena being delighted to hear such generous tests of his love, did still oppose him, though it was with a design to tell him afterwards, that provided he could get her Parents consent, she would not care for the Queens. In the mean time, Myrinthus not knowing her design, did leave her with a verie little satisfaction, and carried with him a heart full of sorrow, and some jealousy.

At his going from her, he went unto Stesilea, to desire her she would be pleased to tell him what the Queens reason was to be so cross unto his design, after so many favours shewed unto him. The first complements being past, Myrinthus began to entreat her she would be pleased to do him a favour: It would be so great a happiness (said she unto him) to do such a most accomplished man as your self any service, that you may almost be certain to obtain whatsoever you shall desire, so it be within the compass of my power: Yes Stesilea, said he unto her, you can tell me what it is which ruines me in the opinion of the Queen: I assure you, replied she, I cannot tell you that, but I am most certain, that you are not in any disfavour with her: Ah Stesilea, replied he, it is impossible I should be at all in her favour, for she hath denied me the only request that ever I asked, and the request is of such a nature, as I admire why she did not consent unto it: I know verie well that Philimena is above me, but I have received so many graces, honours, and benefitts from the Queen, that I could not imagine a denial of this from her: For heavens sake Stesilea, tell me the cause of my misfortune; Have I at any time done any thing that Page 122 displeased the Queen? Have I any secret Enemy that does me any ill offices? Hath Basilides betrayed me, and desired her under-hand to denie me a thing which openly he seemed to wish? Or is it so, that the Queen thinks me in love with Philimena onlie as a cloak for my ambition? Does she fear, that when I have married her, I shall press her to marry Basilides? Does she look upon me as a factious person, who would stir up the people, and raise a war against her? Speak Stesilea, tell me, for I am sure you know all that I desire to know: In thinking me Sir (said she) in such favour with the Queen as to know her secret thoughts, doubtless you honour me, and have a good opinion of me; but all that I can tell you is, that I do not know one thought she hath which is not advantageous to you: When I call to memory all the honours which I have received from the Queen, replied he, I do easily believe what you say; but when I consider what she hath denied me, I have reason to think she hath changed her mind, and does not esteem me. The last office which she conferred upon you, replied she, will hardly permit you to speak thus: I pray then tell me, said he unto her, What is the motive which induceth the Queen not to let me love Philimena? You know (said Stesilea unto him) that there are some things which policie forbids to tell the cause of them: I know replied he, that the Queen may have so good an opinion of me, as to honour me with the trust of her reasons why she denies me, if policie only were in the business; so that I must of necessity conclude, that her reason is, either because she hates Philimena, or because she hates me; and therefore Stesilea I conjure you to tell me what you know in the business; never fear that I shall be ever so indiscreet as to reveal the least syllable you will trust me with the participation: A person in love, replied she, was never fit to keep secrets; Believe it Stesilea; replied he, as deep in Love as I am, I may be trusted, for I am most confident, that Love will never make me do any thing against honour or honesty: Be assured, that if I promise not to tell what you trust me with unto Philimena, I shall perform it: I beseech you pity a most unhappy man who suits with you in this, that he loves the Queen as well as you do: It is my misfortune to think, that if Basilides crossed my design, I should be less unfortunate than I am. But that the Queen, whose glorie I value at so high a rate that I would die to advance it, that she should render me the most miserable of her Subjects, that is such a thing Stesilea that I must needs lament: Since Cleobuline is of a Qualitie so high, that it becomes me not to tell her what thoughts I have of her, I am sure she knows mine, but verie imperfectly; doubtless she thinks me devoted to her service, and that I am her most faithful Subject; but perhaps she does not think me obliged unto it, by honour, by interest, and by gratitude; yet I must tell you Stesilea (to the end I may the more oblige you to tell me what I desire to know) that I am a thousand times more obliged and devoted unto her by inclination, then by any thing else: Yes Stesilea, I love the Queen with so much devotion, that I have not more love to Philimena, then I have tenderness to Cleobuline: Nay more, I am fully perswaded, that if this Queen had been of a lower qualitie, perhaps I should have been so bold as to have Courted her with a very affectionate eye: Judg then, I beseech you, how sad a thing it is to receive a death from a hand that is so infinitelie dear unto me; for heavens sake therefore, tell me the cause of my misfortune, that I may know either how to overcome it, or to submit my mind unto it; for I do profess unto you, that if you do not something more inform my understanding, I shall be forced to take some desperate course with my self.

Wilst Myrinthus was thus talking, Stesilea was ruminating upon what course to take, she saw that reason bad her not discover the Queens secrets* <...> side, she saw him in such a desperate sadness, that she much feared it wo <...> Moreover, though Cleobuline had told her ten thousand times, that she <...> Myrinthus know her passion; yet since she thought his knowledge of <...> quench his flames of affection unto Philimena, and kindle them unto her, she th <...> that the Queen would not be much offended at it; so that knowing Myrinthus to be o an ambitious temper, and hearing from his own mouth that he had much inclination to love the Queen, so that she doubted not, but if she told him the reason why the Queen crossed his design, it would hinder him from marrying Philimena. Also, Stesilea perhaps looking upon the advancement of her own fortunes (which she hoped for by this confidence) as upon the Queens tranquillitie, she consulted with her self whether she should acquaint him with it or no. Since she knew Myrinthus to be verie discreet, she was the much bolder to venture upon it, and more, when upon second thoughts she found that she should run no Page 119 hazard at all: For truly (said she to her self, hardly hearing what Myrinthus said unto her) if what I shall tell him do not stagger his constancie, yet for his own interest he will never let the Queen know he knows she loves him, since that would be an affront which would reflect upon himself; and if what I tell him do make him quit Philimena and love Cleobuline, I need not fear her anger, though she charged me not to let Myrinthus know she loved him; and though she would never have Myrinthus to tell her that he loved her. Stesilea then considering the pitiful case wherein the Queen was, she thought it fit, for her rests sake, to hazard the matter, and for her service to reveal her secret, since she knew no better way; therefore she began to think into what language she should put so delicate and nice a business. In the mean time, Myrinthus having done talking, and seeing that Stesilea was more intent upon her own thoughts then his words, began to think more then before, that there was some mysterious cause in the matter, and that Stesilia's silence arged her incertaite, whether she should, or she should not tell it unto him: So that applying his earnest prayers to prevent her from any resolution contrary unto his desires; For heavens sake, dear Stesilea (said he unto her) study no more upon the matter, but tell me plainly, whether the Queen denied my request out of hatred, or out of scorn, or out of any other prejudicate thought? The thing you ask, replied Stesilea, is of greater consequence then you imagine, and it is a secret of such a nature, as I cannot trust you, unless you will most solemnly swear never to reveal it unto any one living, not excepting Philimena her self; and I will have you make a particular oath concerning her alone, who of all that lives upon earth must not know it. Myrinthus hearing Stesilea speak thus, his curiosity did double: So that he made as many promises, and vows, and oaths as she desired, never to speak one syllable of any thing she should impart, either unto Philimena, or any other. All this was not yet enough to secure Stesilea, for she would have him swear also, never to make it known unto the Queen, neither by his words, nor any other action, that he is knowing in what she is going to tell him. Myrinthus now being more surprized, and more inquisitive then before, did swear and promise all she desired: After which, she assuming a very serious look and low voice, though none was neer that could hear her, but himself: I make no question (said she unto him) but you wonder to see me so cautious in relating a thing which only concerns your self; but your wonder will be much more, when you shall understand, that this which I would have you so closely conceal, is the most glorious thing in the world for you: Yes Myrinthus, pursued she, this which makes you thus sad, this which moves you so to complain of the Queen, that which you so bitterly murmur at, that which makes you think she hath changed her opinion of you; that this, I say, should be the most glorious adventure of all your life; and that when Cleobuline in confirming so many offices, so many Governments, and so many honours upon you, did in them nothing so obliginglie for you, as when she denied you the marrying Philimena. Ah Stesilea, (said he unto her) You will have much ado with all your wit to perswade me unto this belief: If I have but the power to tell you all I know (replied she) you will easily believe it: But Myrinthus (said she and blushed) Cannot you spare me the labour of telling that which I have promised never to reveal? Can you not guess at what you desire to know? Let it suffice, I tell you for the opening of your apprehension, that it is neither policie, nor hatred, or scorn, which moves the Queen to denie you Philimena. After all this Myrinthus, I pray tell your self that which I have not power to tell you, especiaillie when I call to mind the promises which I have made to the Queen, never to tell it. Myrinthus hearing Stesilea speak in this manner, began to apprehend what she hinted at, but he apprehended it with so much astonishment, and so much perplexitie of Spirit, as he thought that he misapprehended her; his thoughts were so ravelled, as he could not unwind them to the bottom; yet to run no hazard, he answered Stesilea a little from the matter. The thing which it seems you would have me apprehend (said she unto him) is so verie full of wonder, as I fear that I should commit a crime in seeming to apprehend it: No, no, Myrinthus, replied Stesilea, it is no crime to understand me; but you will be extreemly too blame, if after you understand me, you do not what I conceive you are obliged unto: Alas Stesilea (cried Myrinthus) I cannot comprehend how I can believe you, unless I should fail in my respects unto the Queen; no, no, her denial is not caused by any reason you would give me; and I think it better to misunderstand you, and to accuse you as an Imposture, rather then to accuse the greatest Queen upon Earth of so bad a choice. Stesilea Page 124 seeing Myrinthus either would not, or would not seem to believe her, did so circumstante the matter unto him, as at last she convinced his belief; and he calling to memory a hundred several passages, especially the manner how the Queen denied his Marriage with Philimena, he did not at all doubt of the truth: Since he was not at all satisfied at the last conference with Philimena, he could not imagine himself loved by the most illustrious Queen in the world, without some thoughts which elevating his heart, did exhilbrate his spirits, and ambition did so swell his soul, as his imagination was full of Thrones, and Scepters, and Crowns: The beautie, spirit, wisdom, and virtue of Cleobuline did so stagger his thoughts, as for a while there was an interregnum in his heart. In the interval of which, he thought he could give it unto which he pleased, and stronglie phancied to give it entirelie unto Cleobuline, and that he could quit Philimena: But this inward tumult, which glorie and ambition had raised in his soul, being a little calmed, his love to Philimena began to revive, and made him think this honour which the Queen did him, as a thing which would render him the most miserable man alive. This serenity of soul was no sooner established in his heart, but turbulent clouds began to bluster again, and he was so full of contradictions in his talk to Stesilea, as the trouble of his Spirits was evident: I beseech you Stesilea, said he unto her, before I tell you my thoughts, promise me never to tell the Queen that you have acquainted me with any thing: for Stesilea, if she should know I know it, I have nothing in the world to do but die at your feet, since it is impossible I can appear before her, the most ungrateful and unjust person that lives amongst men. I have already told you Sir replied she, that I would not have the Queen know I have discovered her secret unto you: 'Tis true, said he, but I am so sensible of shame, that I am not so joyed as I ought to be, as I am at an extreame Dilemma; for I must confess unto you, that your fidelitie to Philimena makes me ashamed of my crime against her, as well as against the Queen; and I am perswaded, that if Cleobuline and Philimena did see the thoughts of my heart, they would both of them be equally incensed: I am forced to confess, that I cannot apprehend my obligations to the Queen without such agitation of mind, as I am not able to express, I would willingly die a thousand times to do her service, I would leave loving Philimena, and onlie adore her; I would; I say, sacrifice my life, and render her eternal homage: But presentlie after, when I think upon Philimena, I wish the Queen to hold me in a state of neutralitie and indifference, and indeed to hate me, provided she will let me love Philimena: Judg then Stesilea, I beseech you, in what a sad condition that heart is which is tormented with such various and contrarie thoughts: However it be, said she, I conceive you owe so much reverence to the Queen, as not to think any more of Philimena: I wish to the heavens (replied he) that I were able to follow your counsel: I do not ask any thing which is unjust (said she) For since the Queen would not have you know she loves you, and though you did love her, yet would she have you not tell it unto her; I will not oblige you of necessitie to love her, but onlie to ease her of so much sorrow, as to see you love another; and this I conceive to be the least you can do, for the most wise, virtuous, and most accomplished Princess in the world: Alas Stesilea, said he, I know that my dutie is to do all things, but the great difficultie is to know what I am able to do against my self, and against Philimena: And since all your arguments are not strong enough to stagger my constancie, or render me perfidious; you would have me leave Philimena for the greatest Queen in the world; 'tis true, but it is for a Queen who will not have me know she loves me, and who would have me love her, and never speak of it: No, no, Stesilea, such a passion as this is not able to make a man perfidious, who is accustomed to tell her he loves, that he loves her. A man, I say, who has leave to sigh, and libertie to let his love be seen in his eyes, and to seek for some advantageous thoughts in the eyes of his Mistress, which her tongue dare not utter. But what if upon capitulation the Queen should let me know her thoughts, and let me tell her mine? Am I yet the Master of my own heart? Can I dispose of it as I will? Alas, alas (said he and sighed) how miserable am I? and how far from that power? Could I be innocent either towards the Queen or towards Philimena, my heart would be at some ease: But to speak truth, since I cannot be faithful unto Philimena, untill after I have tried not to be so, my constancie is almost guiltie; and as for the Queen, though I am culpable against her with abundance of repugnance, shame, and repentance, yet still I am guiltie. Thus not knowing well what I am, I dare neither justifie nor accuse my self, but still remain in the most lamentable condition in the world: Since it seems impossible for you to be happie, replied Stesilea, therefore take that course which may ease Page 125 the Queen of those sorrows which you have caused; you may easilie do it, since all is but to think no more upon Philimena: Easilie do it (replied Myrinthus and looked upon Stesilea) If I were able, I would immediatelie become perfidious: Yes Stesilea, since you have told me the Queens reason for denying my request, there is nothing which my heart hath not already invented against Philimena: I have opposed against her the Queens beautie, her spirit, her wisdom, her virtues, her grandure, and all my obligations to her; and the sooner to vanquish, I have racked my imagination even unto folly, I have phancied things that might accrue unto me, I have allowed my ambition all the swinge that vanitie it self can imagine, and I have set my thoughts so neer a Crown, that some second thoughts correcting the first, I have blushed at my own audacitie and rashness: But for all this Stesilea, this great Queen who reigns so absolutely in the hearts of all who know her, and who indeed hath right to reign, cannot drive Philimena out of my own heart; therefore if you have any generositie, pity my imbecillitie and miserie: Tell the Queen as from your self, that I am most unworthie of her affection, that she abaseleth her self too much in looking upon me; and since I dare not presume to lift up my eyes so high as her, I am not worthe of her looks: But yet I beseech you, do not drive the nail too far, and do not make her pass from love to hatred; for indeed Stesilea, I must profess unto you, that I should be almost as sorry to be hated by Cleobuline, as not to be loved by Philimena, therefore I beseech you transact with all your discretion; for since I must die, I desire I may with the glorie of her favour. I have yet one Petition more unto you, which is, that you would keep her from hating Philimena; and in order to that, perswade her, that in conquering my heart she will never displease Philimena: And perswade her also if you can, that I deserve some commendations for resisting her charms. These are things so full of contrarieties, replied she, that I think my best course is to do none of these things you speak of: Yet I do most constantly tell you, replied he, that I shall ever love Philimena; but withal, I tell it with a sigh, and with a blush, and that I cannot resent the happiness which I enjoy for thinking of that which I lose. Oh heavens (cried he out) why is't not possible to reconcile the Queen and Philimena in my heart? For my part, I conceive it may be; for as you express the affection of the Queen, methinks she should be satisfied that I hold her in infinite reverence, that I respect her as they use to do the Gods; that my Spirits and my reason doth acknowledg her power, that I vow all my services unto her, that my valour shall be ever employed unto her glorie, and that she only leave my heart unto Philimena. But what do I say (said he and reprehended himself) it seems my reason wanders, in offering to prescribe Laws unto Love, and to divide that which will not admit of any division: I must confess, the Queen deserves a thousand hearts if I had them; but confess also, that since I have but one, and that one already given, it is not in my power to retake it, and that it is only Philimena's.

As Stesilea was ready to reply, Basilides entred, who was much surprized to find so many signs of a troubled mind in the face of Myrinthus. This thought did so much disquiet him, as when Myrinthus rise up to go away, he rise up also to ask him what the matter was, though he was newly entred, yet Myrinthus did not tell him what the matter was, but to say something to colour the matter, he told him, that having desired Stesilea to do him a good office unto the Queen, she told him how resolute the Queen continued in denying his Marriage with Philimena: So that Basilides having some reason to think, that the disorder he observed in the Spirit of Myrinthus proceeded only from the obstruction which he found in his design, did make him new protestations, and professed he would use his utmost endeavours to effect it; after which, they parted; Myrinthus carrying with him the most restless heart that ever was. Since his soul was of an ambitious temper, and since he naturally bore much affection to the Queen, this love of this Princess did huff him up; and when he considered with himself what glorie it was unto him to be loved by a Queen so fair, so illustrious, and so charming, it was a thing impossible but he must needs be joyed at it; and to desire that he were able to be perfidious unto Philimena; yet when he began to think, that by preserving the one, he must lose the other, his ambition began to yield unto his love, and all his cares was to find out ways how to enjoy Philimena: But since these ways were hard to find, the Queen not consenting unto it; he was most extremely grieved. Moreover, he had cause to think that if he married Philimena against the mind of Cleobuline, she would then abase him as much as she had formerly exalted him: So fearing lest Philimena who loved him when he [Page \[unnumbered\]](#) was in favour, should not love him when he was in disgrace, his sorrows were an insufferable torment: and as an augmentation to his misery, he durst not acquaint Philimena with it, or put her fidelity to the best: so that fearing all things, and hoping in nothing, he spent the rest of the day in extream restlessness, and all the night following without a wink of sleep. But that he might not be miserable by himself, there chanced a business which did not a little perplex Basilides: For Sir be pleased to know that in order to his designs upon the Queen, his care was to get himself creatures in her house, both amongst the officers and amongst the women: and there was one amongst the rest, whom he had entirely gotten: This Person then watching upon all opportunities to observe the Queen, especially when she seemed most melancholy, told him all that she at any time observed: But at the last, she observed so closely, that she one day heard all that Stesilea said unto the Queen concerning Myrinthus, and all that the Queen said unto her: and she heard enough to collect, that the reason why the Queen would not let Myrinthus marry Philimena was because she did not hate him her self. At the first she resolved not to make it known unto Basilides, knowing that it would not please him: but upon second considerations, she changed her resolution, and the next morning, told him word for word all that she heard. The surprise of Basilides was so great that if he had only the testimony of this woman, he had not given credit unto her words: But upon a survey of a hundred of the Queens actions: her melancholy since Myrinthus was in love with Philimena: and such like: also considering, that though she denied the earnest request of Myrinthus, yet he continued still in her favour: this put him out of all doubt: and by consequence, made him most excessively sad. How's this (said he unto himself as he afterward, told me) does Cleobuline love Myrinthus, who loves not her? And does she not love Basilides who loves her above his life? Why then it is Myrinthus who is the Remora in the Queens heart which hinders me from the conquest of it: Then must I become his enemy in lieu of Protector: And though he cannot be my Rival; yet since he is the obstacle unto my happiness, I must consider him so: I must by all means ruine all his pretensions, and oppose all his designs: But what's this I say (said he and reprehended himself) my sorrows have distracted my Reason: And I do not understand my own interest: since my odd destiny is, to endeavour the making that man happy whom the Queen prefers before me into her heart: It concerns me more then it doth Myrinthus, that he marry Philimena: and I must labour for his quietnesse who is the cause of all my restlessness, and endeavour his felicity least he prevent mine.

Basilides having well considered upon the matter, resolved in order to the better discovery of the Queens thoughts, to speak unto her himself concerning the marriage of Myrinthus with his sister: designing that though she refused him, yet to cause that Philimena should move Myrinthus to marry her without the Queens consent, hoping that this would sufficiently incense her, to banish him her Court, not being ignorant that she was ever very jealous of her authority. Basilides then in pursuance of this resolve, went the next day unto the Queen. But in his way thither, he understood that Myrinthus, after a whole night without sleep, was very ill in the morning so that taking this occasion to speak of him unto the Queen; he no sooner came into her presence but looking attentively upon her, he told her this news. Since the Queen did not think it possible, he should know the thoughts of her soul, she took no heed of restraining her self: so that not being able to hold in the first conceptions of her heart, she could not hear of Myrinthus being sick without some visible disorder in her face enquiring very carefully of what nature his disease, was and how he came to know it. As for his disease Madam (answered he) I cannot directly tell you what it is: But if your Majesty will please to command me, I shall teach him the art how to cure himself, by telling him the cause: me thinks (answered the Queen, who knew very well what Basilides would say) It is a very hard matter to know the cause, when you do not know the disease: yet I do know it Madam, answered he: for I am most confident that if your Majesty would permit Merinthus to marry Philimena, he would quickly recover his health, since certainly the disease of his mind causeth the disease of his body: and if you would cure the last, you must begin with the first: since those who govern Kingdomes (replied the Queen with a tart kind of Rallery) use not to consult with Physicians nor fit their Policies unto their temper, this which you tell me shall not alter my Resolution of not giving my consent unto a marriage which for divers reasons I cannot approve of. You may well think Madam, replied Basilides, that I shall not think Myrinthus unworthy of Philimena, since your Majesty thinks him worthy Page 127 of her esteem. The Queen hearing Basilides speak thus, did blush, not that she thought he spoke so as knowing the thoughts of her soul, but it was because whosoever hath any secret thought, hath also an imagination so quick, and a heart so sensible, that the least thing gales them; and she was no less perplexed then Basilides, for to authorize her denial of Myrinthus she must in some sort, not speak advantageously of the man whom of all the world she most esteemed: And Basilides also to perswade her consent unto this Marriage, used a thousand expressions of esteem of Myrinthus, whom he heartily wished she did not esteem.

Thus seeing themselves both put to the necessity of betraying their thoughts, they were both of them much perplexed; yet both of them resolved in their hearts to betray them as little as they could. The Queen then answered Basilides, That it was verie true, Myrinthus was owner of a thousand good qualities which had got him much unto her esteem and repute; but since he was not a Corinthian originally, she thought this reason, with many other which she could give him, would not permit her to consent unto his Marriage with Philimena: I do believe Madam, replied Basilides, that your Majesties concealed reasons are verie prevalent, but as for that which you are pleased to honour me the participation, is not so undeniable as I conceive: The truth is, the Ancestors of Myrinthus have been so faithful, as they may verie well pass for natural Subjects unto your Majesty: I know verie well that there is much inequality between my Sister and Myrinthus, and if your Majesty had not by your Noble favours raised him above his Qualitie, his design had been rash: But Madam, though this inequality may be a considerable obstacle to hinder a Marriage; yet the high esteem which your Majesty honours him withal, and the violent affection which he bears unto Philimena, moves me to wish it no less then himself. For Madam, I am most confident, that if Myrinthus were a King, and my Sister a verie Slave, yet he would make her a Queen: Therefore I most zealously beseech your Majesty to satisfie his love, and give me leave to sacrifice a Sister for the preservation of a man whom you are pleased to honour with your esteem. To retaliate so generous a thought, (replied the Queen, with a soul so full of sadness as she had much ado to hide it) I ought to sacrifice Myrinthus for your sake, and not suffer you to sacrifice Philimena for his; and therefore for your own sake, the more you importune me for Myrinthus, the more resolute am I to deny you.

After this, Cleobuline upon a sudden took her leave of Basilides, who was in a hundred minds to put off all due respects, and to let her understand he knew the thoughts of her soul. But the verie same passion which spurred him unto this boldness, letting him also see, that if he affronted the Queen, he might chance lose her for ever, he curbed himself, and went with her without a word, which might make her positively think he knew she loved Myrinthus; and though he harped much upon her esteem of him, yet he thought that she would not expound it love, and indeed she did not at that time; but her weariness of Basilides company had another cause, for truly she could not endure without infinite grief to hear him aggravate the violent affection of Myrinthus to Philimena; nor without a strange confusion hear of the great inequality of his qualitie and his Sisters: But that which stung her most was, to see Basilides desiring this marriage, and she was the only one who did not wish it; and to consider how she incurred the hatred of Myrinthus, whom in spite of all her power she loved with extream tenderness, so that the verie thought of being hated did excessively grieve her, but yet she had a more sensible cause of it afterwards; for Myrinthus being recovered, and having some important business of State with the Queen, he went unto her, and she found him so altered since she saw him last, as thinking his alteration rather an effect of his souls sorrow, then any sickness, she was fretted to the verie heart; yet that was not the only cause which put Myrinthus into such a Meager complexion, since certainly his ambition did also much perplex him: For Sir, before I relate their discourse, I must tell you, that Myrinthus being forced to go unto the Queen, with whom he had not been, since Stesilea acquainted him with her affection unto him, his heart was full of inexpressible apprehensions: his greatest disquiet was his fears lest the Queen should know that Stesilea had acquainted him with her amorous thoughts of him: Alas (said he in himself) if so, how dare I look upon this Princess, or how can she look upon me? But afterwards, upon his consideration of the Queens great virtue, he believed the thing to be as Stesilea had told him, so that his soul enjoyed a little more serenity. But when he came unto the Palace Gates, and saw the Guards there, and likewise saw there the great concourse of people Page 128 going and coming in and out, which delineates the grandure of Kings; when he saw I, say, abundance of all sorts of men in the Halls, Presence Chamber, Privy Chamber, and every where else in the Court, waiting all only for a verie sight of the Queen. When he saw all the magnificent furniture wherewith the Chambers were adorned, his imagination was so swelled with a thousand several Ideas of grandure and magnificence, as he began to be sensible of the sweetness in being loved by her, unto whom these Guards, this Palace, all these stately magnificences belonged, and unto whom all those men with bended knees did pay their homage; insomuch as his ambition beginning to revive in his heart, there was a new combat between this proud passion and his love of Philimena, which was not decided, when word was brought that Cleobuline asked for him. Myrinthus no sooner received this Summons, but he ordered himself for entrance into the Queens Closet, where then she was; but in the way, how full of phancie was his mind? he had a mind to exclude Philimena out of his heart and immediately after he reassumed the image of his dearest Philimena into his phancie, to the end he might better guard her against the Queen; and indeed, not well knowing whether he was faithful or perfidious, he went unto the place where Cleobuline was; but he entred with such a melancholy countenance, and so much disorder in his eyes, that the Queen thinking the alteration proceeded more from his sorrows that she denied him Philimena, then from his sickness, she could not chuse, but out of a secret spite, look with less sweetness upon Myrinthus then she was accustomed: So that Myrinthus beginning to fear that Stesilea had told the Queen all his and her discourse, he was so dismayed, as he did not answer her much to the purpose. The Queen surprized at the disorder in Myrinthus his mind, asked him from whence this confusion of thoughts and words proceeded, which she was not wont to observe in him? Is it, because I do not well understand them, or because you did not hear me? It is neither Madam, replied he, for your Majestie doth alwayes both understand and speak verie well, and I alwayes hearken with a most attentive ear, in hopes you will command me some service: But it is—But it is (replied Cleobuline and cut him short) because you have left your mind where you have bestowed your heart: If I had power to have bestowed it (replied Myrinthus pitifully non-plust) Philimena should not have had it, but I should have otherwise disposed of it; yet Madam, Philimena hath violentlie taken it from me whether I would or no: Since the Law of Nations, replied the Queen, permits one to repulse force by force, and that one may take ones own where e're he finds it; take back from Philimena with the same violence, that heart which she took from you: But if you will take my advice, be sure you do not take hers in lieu of your own, for you will be a loser by the bargain: I wish to the Heavens Madam (said he unto her) that I were able to do as I ought, in doing as your Majestie would have me; for I am so devoted unto your commands, that I had rather be an obedient subject, then a faithful Lover.

Myrinthus pronounced these words with such a faint and hollow accent, as he surprized the Queen; for his tone did testifie, that he had some mental reservation in his words; she no sooner had this conceipt, but she changed colour; so that Myrinthus seeing her blush for anger, he grew pale with fear, and blushed presentlie after for shame. The alteration in the Queens face caused the alteration in Myrinthus; and the new disorder which appeared in the mind of Myrinthus, did also disorder the Queen: So that the confusion of the one redoubling the shame of the other, they could not endure each others looks, but heartlie desired a separation, and indeed they parted; for the Queen dispatching her business with Myrinthus in two words, she dismissed him by a sign with her hand, without one look upon him, and stayed by her self in an unconceivable turbulence of mind. Myrinthus did strive with himself, and would have said something, but she beckned again with her hand to be gone, and go he did, with a heart swelled with two violent passions, which did most strongly tyrannize over it. But as the soul of Myrinthus, so the soul of Cleobuline was most cruelly tormented, for since she had a most penetrating wit, she perfectly discovered by the looks, by the words, and by the tone of Myrinthus, that he either knew, or guessed at the thoughts which she had of him, insomuch as extraordinary shame, and sorrows full of anger against her self, did make her an intolerable sufferer. Is it possible, said she, that my own words and my own eyes should betray me, since they have both of them been so long so faithful? For I know very well, that at that time when Myrinthus asked my consent unto his Marriage with Philimena; he had then no suspicion of my passion. But what's this I say? (said she Page 129 and reprehended her self) It cannot be either my words, or my eyes which have discovered the secret of my heart unto Myrinthus, because I never saw him since, and yet there is none but Stesilea in all the world which knows my thoughts: Stesilea who hath promised inviolable fidelitie; Stesilea, I say, who knows that I fear nothing more, then that Myrinthus should know I love him. As the Queen was in this perplexitie, Philista, who was newly come to Corinth, and had not been there a long while, and whom the Queen ever loved, she entred into her Chamber: So that this Princess who dearly loved her, made a Truce with her sorrows, and began to talk of several things with her; and passing from one discourse unto another, Philista who knew nothing of the Queens Love to Myrinthus, nor of that intimate confidence between her and Stesilea, she being to tell the Queen what day some passage happened, she told her it happened the very same day when Stesilea came not unto her until night. Cleobuline not remembering at first that Stesilea was ever a whole day from her, did contradict Philista: But Philista to remember it by more circumstances, told her, that it was the verie same day Myrinthus and Stesilea were a whole afternoon together, adding to prove her words, that Basilides came to them at the conclusion of their conference. The Queen hearing what Philista said, began to suspect the fidelity of Stesilea, since she never spoke a word to her of Myrinthus his visit, her suspicions a little after did encrease; for Stesilea coming in, Philista to make her own words good, asked her whether it was not true that Myrinthus came such a day to see her, and whether Basilid's came not also.

This question so surprized Stesilea, since she had kept the visit of Myrinthus secret from the Queen, that she did so blush in confessing it, as that the Queen did undoubtedly conclude her culpable, and therefore was excessively sad: Yet since it concerned her to know precisely what Myrinthus knew, she resolved to set the best side of her sorrows and anger outward, and to make Stesilea confess the truth. But the thing which most grated upon her apprehension was, that since she thought Myrinthus knew her thoughts, so likewise did Basilides, grounding her thoughts of it upon the great familiarity which had been of late between them: So that as passionate persons alwayes use, she was full of divers imaginations, and concluded for certain, that Stesilea had discovered her secret unto Myrinthus, and he unto Basilides: You may judg Sir, whether a Princess who pretended unto glorie so much as Cleobuline did, could have any such thoughts as these, without extream sorrow; and indeed hers was of so deep a strain, that she could not rest till she had talked with Stesilea, and falling insensibly into discourse with Myrinthus, she asked her without any shew of anger, how it came to pass she never acquainted her with the visit Myrinthus made her? Stesilea having no better a reason, told her, that since she observed how she never heard Myrinthus named without sorrow, she accorded the talking of him as much as she could, unless it were her self who first begun to talk of him: But Stesilea (said the Queen, and looked earnestly upon her) I talked the last night with you of all the passages which chanced that same afternoon. Stesilea seeing her self put to it, did think to mend the matter with another lie: Since I know Madam, said she unto her, that your Majestie desires nothing more zealously then to conquer the passions of your Soul, I would never acquaint you with the discourse I had with Myrinthus, lest it should encrease rather then diminish them: For truly Madam, he came to see me only to protest how sorrie he was for incurring your displeasure by thinking upon Philimena: Did he not ask you (said the Queen) what my reason was for opposing his Marriage? Yes Madam, answered Stesilea and blusht, but I assured him that I could not tell it: Fie Stesilea, (cried out the Queen in a rapture of anger and grief) either you have betrayed me, or else your own words have betrayed you, for most certainly Myrinthus knows more then he should do: However (said she, lest Stesilea should not tell the truth) if you will ingenuously tell me all that Myrinthus said unto you, and all that you answered him, I will pardon your fault: But Stesilea, be sure you tell me all, and hide not a sillable from me. Stesilea seeing her self touched the quick, did a while deny all, but at last the Queen speaking to her with such authoritie, and promising a pardon if she told her all passages, she resolved to confess part of the truth: She told her then, and truly how Myrinthus did most highly commend her, that afterwards he was very importunate to know her reason why she obstructed his Marriage, and how before she was aware, only told him, that her reason was much conducing unto his glorie; how he put all the advantageous interpretation that could be possible upon those words; and how after all, Myrinthus did express abundance of tenderness towards her: Since Stesilea Page 130 thought to appease the Queen, by telling such things, she concealed no obliging expression which Myrinthus used, and hinted not a word of what he said in advantage of Philimena; yet she durst not tell her how Myrinthus offered to quit her, lest the actions of that lover should belye her words: But she only told the Queen, that it was not impossible but he might be brought to quit her. Yet this dissembling Artifice of Stesilea did not hit; for after the Queen had got out of Stesilea all that she could, she was so transported with anger, that though she was resolved to make no noise of it, because she saw her weakness, yet she could not chuse but express all that a most violent passion could invent, Fie-fie, (said she unto her with a torrent of tears) have I trusted you in a business upon which the whole glory of my life depended, and must you go and tattle it unto the man, whom of all men living I most feared that he should know it? Your imprudence and indiscretion hath deprived me of all consolation, and brought me into such a condition, as to see Myrinthus scorn me: Doubtless he believed that all you said unto him proceeded from my orders; for what likelihood is there he should think any other? Could he imagine, that you having so much wit and spirit, should otherwise be so weak weak and imprudent? Fie, fie, Stesilea unto what a cruel adventure have you exposed me? Must Myrinthus know I love him, and not know I would not have him know it? and must Myrinthus know this from Stesilea? For my part, I believe you thought I told you that I loved Myrinthus, on purpose you should let him know it, and that I did forbide it, only that you might the sooner tell him, but if you had any such thoughts you were extremely deceived, and have been injurious as well as perfidious. Stesilea would then have had some frivolous excuses to the Queen, but the Queen would not hearken to them: Be silent Stesilea (said she unto her) be silent, all your enchanting reasons cannot justify you; and since your crime hath been in talking too much, it must be silence rather then weak excuses that must appease my anger. In the mean while order it so, as Myrinthus may not either by his looks, or by his actions, or by the least sillable, give me any cause to think that he remembers what you said unto him; for if I find he do, I profess I will not only banish him my Court, but my Kingdom, though perhaps I cannot my heart: Carry the business so, that Myrinthus may never know how I understand he knows the thoughts of my soul, for if ever I perceive he do, I shall banish you as well as him. But why should I impose such orders of silence and secresie upon one who is tattling all she knows, and is not Mistress of her own tongue? Stesilea then kneeling down at the Queens feet, with eyes full of tears, seemed so repentant, that this Princess whose soul was infinitely glorious, thinking it a shame to pardon such a crime so soon, and fearing lest her repentant tears should mollifie her, did command her to retire, and not to see her any more, until she sent for her; commanding her again to negotiate the matter so, as Myrinthus should never know she knew what Stesilea told him. After she was gone, this Queen was in a most unspeakable perplexitie, and that which did most exasperate the matter was, that as everie one is apt to believe what they desire, so she believed it to be within the compass of possibilitie to wain Myrinthus from Philimena, if she infused some ingredients of ambition into her love; and on the contrarie, she perceived by the extream disorder of Myrinthus his Soul, that if she should offer him a Crown, yet he would never offer her his heart, nor quit Philimena. So that this consideration, and her perceiving a possibility of keeping Myrinthus from the enjoyment of Philimena, by making him a King, did exceedingly aggravate her sorrows: Since it is allowed the people, (would she say sometimes when Love had the predominance of her heart) to chuse a King when they have not one, why is it not allowable in a Queen to chuse one, especially when her choice is good? Is it just, that because I am born upon a Throne, therefore I should be deprived of that libertie which all my Subjects have? and that I should be more a Slave then any of my Slaves, in a thing upon which the felicitie of my life depends? But what's this I say? (said she and reprehended her self) methinks I speak as if I could be happy without glory: Fie, fie Cleobuline, wander not so far from the right way of reason; it is not thy part to examine the use of it, but to follow it: 'Tis true, Myrinthus is worthy of a Crown by his merit, but since he is not so by his Birth, 'tis but fit thou beest still his Sovereign, and that he be for ever thy Subject; but alas, this Subject knows thou lovest him more then becomes thee; at this very houre perhaps he is at the feet of Philimena, and reporting thy weakness unto her, and protesting, that though thou shouldst offer him thy heart and thy Crown, yet he would willingly refuse them both for the least of her favours. On the other side, if Basilides knew, as I believe he does, what Page 131 thoughts thy soul harbors of Myrinthus, doubtless he would not value thy affection at a straw, but only because he would be King; and as for Philimena, I am confident she would look upon thee with scorn, and triumph in railing over the heart of him who reigns in thine: Stesilea also, she would hold unworthy thoughts of thee; for since she revealed the secret unto Myrinthus, doubtless she thought thou didst desire to contract a particular friendship with him, and may be she imagined, that this friendship had some virtuous design in it: So Cleobuline, see what dangerous consequences thy fond passion hath brought thee unto, examine thy heart well, trust not too much unto thy own virtue and strength, reduce thy self Cleobuline into such a condition, as that thou canst not commit a fault if thou wouldst; find out some ingenuos expedient which may justify thy self in the opinion of Myrinthus, as well as of Basilides, Philimena, and Stesilea, call all thy virtues and strengths to thy assistance, remember the glory thou hast got; and do all thou canst to preserve it, and recover thy esteem with Myrinthus, which perhaps thou hast lost: But alas (said she after a serious consideration) I can find no way in the world to effect these things but one: But oh heavens, how difficult it is? and how hard to be resolved upon?

As she was in these thoughts, Philista who was to render an accompt unto the Queen, of some business wherein she was employed, came unto her, but since she observed her very reserved and sad, after the dispatch of her business, she offered to go out again: But the Queen being fuller of sorrows then any one heart was able to contain, did call her back again, and imagining that since Stesilea had revealed her secret unto Myrinthus, she might also impart it unto Philista, who was alwayes very kind with her, she thought it best to tell her her self, and to bid her keep Stesilea hereafter from such faults; so that consulting more with her cholor then her reason, she began to complain of Stesilea unto her: But since she could not accuse Stesilea, unless she accused her self also, she acquainted Philista with her own unhappy condition. Do not think (said she unto her) that as much as I esteem you, I would ever make any new confident of my weakness, unless I were fully resolved either to surmount it, or else to die: Yes Philista, I believe I have found out a way to justify my self in the thoughts of Myrinthus, Philimena, Basilides, Stesilea, and your self: And I think I have hit upon it so happily; that I shall arrive at that point which I have so long desired, which is, to see Myrinthus out of love with Philimena: I perceive you can hardly conceive what this invention should be: But to make a discovery of it unto you, know Philista, that to keep my self from ever committing any crime, I will consent unto that marriage which I have so obstinately hindred. How Maïdam, replied Philista, will you allow Myrinthus to marry Philimena? Yes Philista, replied she, I will, and I will principally, to the end I may never think of marrying Myrinthus, nor shew him any signs of love, and to the end also he may think, that whatsoever Stesilea told him of me is not stronger than my virtue; and also to perswade Basilides, that all which perhaps is told him is not true. Thus far Madam, replied Philista, I do agree unto what you have said, and I must infinitely commend your generous design; but I must confess, I cannot see how you can ever hope to see Myrinthus out of love with Philimena: Yes I do hope it, replied she, especially by his marriage; for since the love of Myrinthus to Philimena is augmented by my obstacles, I am confidently perswaded, that it will cool again when it finds no opposition; the full fruition of Philimena will glut him, and more quash his affection, then all my authority is able to do: I beseech you Philista, (said this Princess in the rapture of her passion) do not tell me that Philocles, though now your Husband, is still in love with you, since there is no love that is eternal: And if I did not hope to find some little satisfaction in seeing the affection of Myrinthus to Philimena to fade by marriage, perhaps I should not have power to accomplish that design, whereupon the safety of my glorie doth depend; therefore I conjure you to concur with me in my hopes, to the end I may more courageously put my resolutions into execution: Yet do not think, pursued she, that I desire Myrinthus should be out of love after he hath married Philimena, nor in any thought he should answer my affection unto him; no Philista, that's not my aim, and doubtless I have not power to say, I wish that Myrinthus should not love me: But I can assure you, that none of my actions shall ever let him know I love him, though I am confident I shall love him as long as I breathe; yet it would be much satisfaction unto me, to see Myrinthus out of love when I have executed my design. But oh heavens (added she, and gave Philista no time to answer her) am I able to do as I would? and am I well assured that I desire it? When I consult with Page 132 my reason, I find my self inclined unto it, though it should cost me my life; but when I consult with my heart, I am ready to alter my minde, this Rebel heart resists me, and if I did not call glory to my aid, I should relaps into my first fond weakness: But as soon as I consider it as a mean to keep me from any possibility of committing a fault which my passion prompts me unto a thousand times in a day, and which all the world would upbraid me with, as a mean, I say, to make Myrinthus esteem me, and perhaps to quench those violent flames of affection which he bears unto Philimena; Honor and Love both joyning together do so fortifie my mind, that I am in hopes of an absolute victorie over my self, though I am out of all hopes of not loving Myrinthus, and though I must still love him without any fear that this passion will draw me unto any baseness. After this, Philista, who wished in her heart that the Queen would marry Basilides, told her, that the best way of security against that passion, was to marrie him; and hinted unto her all the politique reasons of State which might induce her unto it. Ah Philista (said the Queen unto her) your advice goes a little too far, and further then I am able to follow: 'Tis well, if I can resolve to render Philimena happy by permitting her to marrie a man whom I love more then she doth, without moving me to marrie one whom I do not love, nor eïver shall: For the truth is Philista, if it were possible, I should cease loving Myrinthus, (as I think it is not) I should certainly never love any else: Therefore Philista be contented that I do what I think sitting for my honour and justification, and do not wish me to groan under any new torment. After this, the Queen dismissed Philista, and would not be seen all the rest of the day; but as the day was tormentive to her, so the night much more, never did amorous heart endure more torture then hers, she altered her resolution a hundred times, and as oft resolved to put it in execution; sometimes her passion would be so high, that she was perswaded she did Myrinthus the greatest injustice in the world, if she did not put the Crown upon his head, since it was in her power to make him King, she imagined the injurie as great, as if he had been legitimate King, and she had wringed the Scepter out of his hand; and there was so fierce a combat in her soul betwixt honour and love, that the Sun brought day into her Chamber before it was ended: She rise, before she was resolved what to do, and as soon as she cast her eyes upon a great glass, by which she passed in her way to her Closet, and spied in her face the alteration which Love and an ill night had brought upon her, she blushed for shame, that she should be no more a Mistress of her self: Would not any say (said she to her self) who saw this sorrow in my eyes, that I am told of some loss of a great battel, which either reflected upon my State, or the tranquillitie of my people? and yet in lieu of lamenting for the losses of my people, I am lamenting my own loss; and all this sorrow which sits so sadly in my eyes, hath so poor and weak a cause, and so unworthie of my virtue, as I wonder how I can endure my self; rouze up thy self Cleobuline courageously, and conquer thy self. The Queen finding more power in her heart then she imagined, would not let slip so good an interval; and lest she should relaps once more into a repentance, she sent immediately to command Basilides and Myrinthus to come both together unto her; but she had no sooner given this order, then a fresh tumult rebelled in her mind, which put her soul into a new disorder, yet it was presently layed, for she was so exceedingly pleaseled, that she was able to force her mouth unto words so opposite unto her hearts desire, as her very joyes of vanquishing, made her able to execute her design with a kind of tranquillitie: So that her desire of glorie, and desire of justifying her self in the thoughts of Myrinthus and Basilides, sortifying her soul, she prepared her self in good earnest for executing her design: Then arming her self with a resolute mind, she shut up all her sorrows in her heart, and so well composed her countenance, as she seemed only a little serious, and not < > troubled. In the mean time Basilides and Myrinthus being surprized at this sudden message, they could not devise what the Queen should have with them, yet they did not impart their thoughts unto each other, for Myrinthus out of his respect and discretion would not tell Basilides what he knew of the Queens Love; and Basilides out of his jealousy would not tell Myrinthus what he thought he knew not, and which he would never have him know, yet both of them imagined that the Queens sending for them was absolutely to forbid the banes of Philimena's Marriage: So that though ambition was high in the heart of Myrinthus, yet his Love of Philimena having got the predominance, he went to the Queen with a soul full of melancholy thoughts: On the other < ... > de Basilides thinking that the Queen opposed the Marriage of Myrinthus, only because she herself loved him, and fearing also that she would break it only, perhaps with a design Page 133 to make him King, he was so far from looking upon Myrinthus as a Husband unto his Sister, as he hated him as a Rival, though he knew him to be in love with Philimena, and not with Cleobuline.

These two Lovers then being both of them full of restless imaginations, came both of them to Court together. They were no sooner entred, then the Queen hearing of their coming, caused them to enter into her Closet; She had no sooner given this order, but she had some suggestions in her heart to talk of some other business, and to defer the execution of her design unto some other time. But as soon as she saw Myrinthus, and looked upon him as a man who knew her weakness, and who perhaps blamed her for it, her very desire to readmit her self into his esteem, as well as to justify her self in the opinion of Basilides, did rouze up a greater strength in her resolution then she imagined; and Philista, whom the Queen sent for to be present at this action, told me, she admired that a person so passionate as Cleobuline was, could so well overcome her self: She therefore no sooner saw Basilides and Myrinthus enter into her Closet, then causing them to come to her, she began to speak unto them both in a most surprizing manner: Since I know (said she unto them) that the business which I am to speak of does concern you both, I desired to speak unto you both together. Know then (said she, and addressed her speech unto Basilides) that as I have hitherto hindred the marriage of Philimena and Myrinthus, out of some prevalent reasons which I never told you; so now, those reasons being changed, I have also changed my opinion, insomuch as since I do now like of that which I disliked then, I do not only consent unto this marriage, but I desire that it may be consummated, as speedily as preparations for such a solemnity will permit. Basilides and Myrinthus, both were so surprized at the Queens words, as they never thought of any answer! but the wonder was, to see the Brother of a Lover to thank the Queen sooner then the Lover himself: For though Myrinthus was unexpressively in love with Philimena, and was extreemly joyed to hear that he should ere long enjoy her, yet knowing what thoughts the Queen had of him, he durst not be too forwards in expressions of gratitude, for the favour which she did him, for fear of incensing her. Also his ambition struggling a little in his heart, he could not so suddenly quit a Queen for Philimena, without some little regret of mind; So that not knowing upon a sudden what to do or say, he let Basilides speak first, who apprehending that nothing could be more advantageous unto his design upon the Queen then this, he was transported with such a joy, as permitted him the full freedom of his spirits, and he returned his thanks in very crafty phrases: I assure you Madam, said he unto her, your Majesty hath not only done an Act of Justice in consenting unto what Myrinthus so much desired, but an act of Clemency also, in preserving that life which the tyranny of his passion would have ruined. Myrinthus hearing Basilides speak in this manner, though he had a good mind to contradict him, yet he durst not; nor durst he out of his respect unto the Queen aggravate a passion which he knew would but displease her; therefore putting a handsom gloss upon his resentment, he began to speak: Since I cannot evidence my gratitude unto the Queen, (said he unto her) without giving her some cause to think that I murmured against her, when she denied me that, which now she is pleased to grant, I had rather publish her goodness unto all the world, then to thank her my self: Therefore Madam, I beseech your Majestie to dispence with those thanks which I owe you, and in exchange give me leave to applaud you, in speaking of those many honours which I have received from you; and to publish unto all the world, that though I die a thousand deaths in your Majesties service, yet the vast debt of my gratitude is not discharged: In saying you will give me no thanks, replied the Queen and blushed, you have given me too many. In the mean time, I do not only dispense with you for your thanks, but also for all those high applauses you give me; and I hold you discharged of all you owe me, provided you will be fully perswaded, that both in denying and giving you Philimena, I alwayes had strong reasons for those contrary acts, though they were unknown unto you; and as I place Justice in the first rank of all Kingly virtues, so I do abhor that my Subjects should ever upbraid me with any deficiency in that virtue: If you can be accused of any injustice Maïdam (replied Myrinthus most respectfully) it is in conferring more favours upon me then I can merit: But since goodness is a virtue as well as Justice, I shall hope that without any blame to your Majesty for the favours you have done me, that may be attributed unto your goodness, which cannot be unto your Justice: However it be (said she to finish the discourse) since the greatest joyes are doubled, when they are made publique, Page 134 we will not hinder you Myrinthus from publishing yours; go therefore and tell—This Princess would have said Philimena; but she abruptly stopped, and the disorder of her spirits was so great, that in lieu of saying Philimena according to her first intention, she said, unto all the Court, and said it with a blush; So that fearing lest her constancy should stagger, she dismissed Basilides and Myrinthus, who both of them retired very well satisfied; yet Myrinthus had some secret pangs of sorrow in his heart, for as he went out of the Queens Closet, and turned his head back, and saw her lifting up her eyes unto heaven with a sigh, so that not doubting but that he was the cause of those sorrows in the most illustrious Queen in the world, his joys were so dejected until the fair eyes of Philimena did revive them, as he could hardly speak unto Basilides; yet he was no sooner in the presence of that fair one, but Love began to fill his heart with extreame joy. Yet whilst he was tasting, all those delicious sweets which he had a long time most earnestly wished for, and which a full satisfied hope could afford, the Queen did find some tranquillitie in the Victory which she had obtained over her self, and was sometimes joyed at it: Well thou imperious passion, (did she say before Philista) which art accustomed to conquer the strongest reasons, thou hast now been conquered by mine: Thou Tyrant, I say, who hast caused the most illustrious persons to run headlong into a thousand crimes and inconveniences, and does often put the whole Universe into a disorder; yet as proud as thou art of thy Triumphs, one simple desire of glory hath forced thee out of my heart, and made my self a Sovereign Mistress of it: I do profess Madam (said Philista to her) I do extreemly admire at your victory over your self; I could never think that it were possible to banish a most violent and tyrannical passion out of one soul in so short a time: Ah my dear Philista, replied the Queen and sighed) I have conquered this cruel passion I confess, but in lieu of banishing out of my heart so fierce an Enemy, my reason hath only enchained him there, and I am in continual fear lest he should break those chains which holds him captive: I find him doing what he can to get at liberty; but I find also, that he cannot break them unless my reason betray me: I pray Philista strengthen it by your commendations, and tell me that I have done the most glorious act in the world; perswade me if you can, that it was more grandure of courage to do as I have done, then it was weakness in me to be so unvanquished as I was: It is an easie matter for me Madam, replied Philista, to commend an act so Heroique, whereof so few are capable; the Sacrifice you have offered unto glory is so great, that as by all the rest of your actions you merit Statues, so by this you merit Temples and Altars, since you have done a thing which the Gods themselves have not alwayes done: Fie Philista, replied the Queen, do not commend me so excessively, for if I should chance to relaps into my first follie, and repent of what I have done, both you and I should be ominously ashamed of all these applauses which you have given me; therefore, though I did entreat you to commend me, yet I pray keep some measure in your commendations; for the very truth is Philista, that I did never in my life love Myrinthus more then now I do, nor hate Philimena more, yet I made them both happy, because honour required it, and my Qualitie would not suffer me to commit crimes, since I must do nothing but what is great and Noble, and Sovereignly just. Moreover Philista, if you did but know my joyes, to see Myrinthus express no gladness when I gave him leave to marrie Philimena, you would wonder: But wretch that I am, (said she and blusht) I rejoyce at that, which doubtless I ought to grieve at, and be ashamed; for it is to be thought, that Myrinthus did only hide his thoughts because he knew mine: Stifle therefore this ill-grounded joy, and rejoyce Cleobuline at nothing but the Victorie which thou hast got over thy self. In short Sir, the Queen did so encourage her self in the design which she had taken, that it was as generously executed, as it was resolved, yet not without a thousand several perplexities; for since all the Court thought they pleased her in interesting themselves in the joyes of Myrinthus, and in commending the marriage which she had made, they spoke of nothing else. Some spoke loud in commendations of Myrinthus, others of Philimena, all of nothing else. In the mean time, since she would not trust too much unto her self, she hastened on the marriage, as if upon the accomplishment thereof depended all her felicitie: And the better to colour her affection to Myrinthus, she shewed abundance of kindness to Philimena, and sent her <◇> rich Presents, though she gave her not one sweet word which had not a bitter relish in her own heart: She herself would also be at the expences of the marriage, which was solemnized with extraordinary pomp: She dressed her self, as if it were the day of her Coronation; and as long as the Feast lasted, she was a most absolute Mistress Page 135 of her own countenance, and of all her actions, though Heavens knows not without inconceivable sorrow at heart, in the midst of this publique rejoycing. The truth is, she carried it so, that Myrinthus thought she had changed her thoughts of him, that Basilides thought himself wronglie informed, and that Philista her self thought Cleobuline less engaged to Myrinthus then she was, yet she was not long in that thought; for the day after the solemnitie, the Queen caused all the Grandees of State to assemble, as if she intended some notable alteration in Government; and without communicating her design unto any whosesoever, she appeared in the Noble Assemblie with so much Majestie, as she inspired reverence into the hearts of all beholders. Basilides, according to his Qualitie, had the first place, and Myrinthus, by reason of his offices, the next. This Assembly was in a great Hall supported with Marble Pillars, whose Basis was of Corinthean Coplper, so famous over all the world: Between these Pillars and Pilasters was hung several Ensigns gotten in the Wars by the late King of Corinth: And in the midst of this Hall was erected a stately Throne of three degrees; upon the first was the Queen, upon the second Basilides, and upon the third Myrinthus. All the rest of the Assemblie being round about this Princess, who after she had by her looks imposed silence upon all the companie, she made such a most admirable eloquent Oration, as she charmed all the auditors; but her resolution did astonish them; for after she had prepared them to hear her pleasure, she declared, That it was her resolute determination never to marrie; adding, that it was her will Basilides should be looked upon, as him who was to succeed her in the Throne, to the end his authoritie should be more firm, and that he should raise no Factions in the State: Adding after all this a thousand admirable Arguments to authorize her resolution: You may judge Sir, how this Oration surprized the Assemblie, especially Basilides and Myrinthus.

As it is the custome when the Queen hath ended her Speech, for everie one to give their opinions in order, so Basilides spoke first; and though the Queens Declaration was much in his advantage, and confirmed him in those rights which nature gave him, yet his love prompted him to contradict the opinion of the Queen, and one could not speak more eloquently, nor more reverentlie then he did, to perswade her that she would be pleased to change her mind. And though the place would not permit him to add his passion unto many other reasons, which might induce her to marrie, yet he did hint upon that point verie delicatelie, declaring unto her, that he would never have any right unto a Crown which she wore by so sad a way, as that which she propounded, and spoke as elegantly, as if he had been prepared for it. But when it came to the course of Myrinthus to speak, and when he concurred in the opinion of Basilides, the Queen blushed; and at night she told Philista, that her constancie began to waver, when she saw him for whose sake she resolved never to marrie, to advise her to it. The discourse of Myrinthus was not long, for since he knew the Queens thoughts, he was more limited in his Spirit; yet he spoke verie well, and mixed so many applauds with his contradictions, that it may be said he choaked all his own reasons, and confirmed her in her design. Afterwards, everie one who spoke, beseeched her to change her mind; but after they had all spoken what they would, she repeated all their reasons in a short method, and closed up the Assemblie with a discourse more prevalent then the former, and made it appear that her resolution was unalterable: So that according to custome, the Declaration of it was published unto the People, and all circumstances were performed to make it more Authentique. To tell you Sir, how great was the grief of Basilides, and astonishment of Myrinthus, is a thing not easie. Basilides knew not what to think of her design, whether it proceeded out of love to Myrinthus, or aversion unto himself; but as for Myrinthus, he durst not think himself to be the cause of this her resolution. nor knew he unto what to attribute it. In the mean time, this Declaration made a mightie noise in Corinth, and never did a secret cause produce greater events; yet the general opinion was, that the Queen was jealous of her Authoritie, and would not divide it with any by marriage: Some said, it was her love to the Liberal Sciences, which inspired her with an aversion unto Marriage; but there was not one did vote it to be for the love of Myrinthus. Philista her self not being able to comprehend it, took so much libertie as to ask the Queen: I beseech you Madam (said she unto her) what ought I to think of your Majesties design? Is it policie which suggested it unto you? No no, Philista (said she unto her and sighed) This resolution which seems to be grounded upon reasons of State, is grounded only upon reasons of Love: For indeed my dear Philista, by giving Philimena unto Myrinthus, I shall drive Myrinthus Page 136 out of my heart, and by consequence make it incapable of entertaining any other affection, or especially the love of Basilides: And thus, that I might at least in appearance, though not in realitie, enjoy my libertie, I have resolved never to marrie; and to keep Basilides from any murmure, I have settled my Crown upon him: Madam, replied Philista, were Basilides only ambitious, this might peradventure keep him from any discontent, but since he is in love, methinks it should grieve him: Since I am full of phantastical and extraordinary thoughts, replied the Queen, I have one for Basilides, which I confess is verie unjust: For truly Philista, though I am sure I can never love him, and though his affection is extreamlie troublesome unto me, yet sometimes I wish that he would love me ever; love me so far, as never to marrie as long as he lived, that so the Crown which now I wear may fall upon Myrinthus. This is the only innocent way I know to make him a King, which shall be if this phantastical reason do hit, not but that my imagination is shrewdly wounded, when it phancieth my Crown upon Philimena's Head: But for all that, the pleasing thought that perhaps the Scepter may fall into the hands of Myrinthus, does transport me above all other considerations; and I cannot for my life but wish, that Basilides should extreamly love me, that the Crown might fall upon the head of Myrinthus. In the mean time, to testifie that this passion which yet raines in my heart is as pure as phantastical, observe I conjure you, how I will live with him who is the cause of it: For after I have done that which becomes my glorie, I must go a little further, and so fully perswade Myrinthus, that I am an absolute Mistress of my own thoughts, that he shall be forced to esteem me as much as I love him. And indeed Sir, though the Queen hath ever since done all that was in her power to advance the fortunes of Myrinthus, yet she never moved him unto any more familiaritie with her, then he used to have before Stesilea acquainted him with the thoughts she had of him. But Sir, the greatest wonder of this adventure is, that Myrinthus, whose soul as I told you was naturally of an ambitious temper, did presentlie cool the heat of his affection to Philimena; for in a verie short time after his marriage, he grew so melancholy and reserved, as it was evident, that she had not completed his happiness. But though one is naturally apt to share in the sorrows of that person whom one loves, yet the grief that appeared in the countenance of Myrinthus never troubled Cleobuline, for she quicklie knew that Myrinthus did not love Philimena, and that he was her Husband, but not her Lover; her satisfaction rested not here: For he pleased to know Sir, that after ambition had quenched his flames of Love to Philimena, that verie same ambition kindled his love of Cleobuline, and so desperately, as he was readie to run out of his wits and reason: He did what he could to hide his passion, both from Basilides and Philimena; and since he knew by Stesilea how nice she was in such things, he durst not so much as give the Queen the least <◇> of it. The Queen for her part disguised her thoughts as much as she could, and endeavoured as much as ever she could that Myrinthus should not perceive that she loved him still, or knew that he loved her; and the more she knew Myrinthus was in love with her, the farther she was off. On the other side, Basilides perceiving the passion of Myrinthus, began to hate him; and Philimena also having some such jealousy, did wish so ill unto Cleobuline, as she laboured all she could with Basilides to raise a Rebellion in the State: And it is most sure, that Myrinthus had never any further satisfaction, then to imagine that the Queen did love him, because he knew she did so formerly; and the Queen for her part never looked further then to know that Myrinthus loved her, without giving him the least sign of her love. In the mean time Sir, since it is to be feared that the passion of Basilides in the conclusion to raise a Civil War, I most humbly beseech you Sir; to signifie unto Timochares who hath a great influence upon the Queen, that you are perswaded her resolution of never marrying may produce dangerous consequences: As there are verie many obligations upon me to Basilides, doubtless I shall be readie to do him any good office; but I do protest unto you Sir, that it is more the Queens interest, then that of Basilides which moves me unto this request; for it is most impossible that any should know her, and not devote himself more unto her service, then unto any other. For Sir, to and the historie of this Princess as I begun it, I do most confidentlie assure you, that there <◇> not any lives on earth who can surpass her in virtue.

<◇> having ended his relation, Cyrus made an Elogie in praise of the Corinth <...> Queen, as high as possible; repeating all her virtues one after another, and insisting principally upon that power which she had over her self in hiding a most violent passion: For truly, said he, I know by this, that she must needs have a soul much greater then mine; Page 137 since when I was at Sinope, and fell in love with Mandana, I was never able to vanquish that passion, though I had then stronger reasons to decline loving that Princess, then Cleobuline had not to declare her affection unto Myrinthus; Therefore Philocles, I must conclude the Queen of Corinth to be worthy of all those glorious Characters which you have given her: And I do assure you, that if I do tell Timochares what you desire I should tell him, it shall be only for the love of you: Since certainly to follow the pure dictates of my own heart, I should never advise a Princess who is in love, to marry a Prince whom she loves not. However, since I do believe your intentions good, and since you know the people better then I do, and in what sphere the Spirits of the Court do move, I promise you to do as you desire. After this, it being verie late, Philocles retired unto the Tent which was provided for him, and left Cyrus in thoughts of envy against Myrinthus, wishing with most passionate zeal, that Mandana did as tenderly love him, as the Queen of Corinth did Myrinthus.

ARTAMENES, OR The Grand CYURS. The Seventh Part. Book. III.

The next morning, Timochares coming to Cyrus, that Prince performed his promise unto Philocles; but yet he knew very well, that he gave such counsel as the Queen of Corinth would not follow: Yet to testifie how much he esteemed that Princess, he doubled his civilities upon Timochares, to whom he shewed all the works. After which, and after a most Princely Banquet, Timochares returned unto his Fleet, desiring to be on Land no longer, lest some unforeseen accident should fall out. He was no sooner gone, but one of those men whom Cyrus sent with Spiritridates came into the room; he no sooner saw him, but being extreamlie impatient to know what news, he desired him to acquaint him; but first he gave him a Letter from Tigranes, in which he found these words.

TIGRANES unto the illustrious CYRUS.

SIR,

The Prince Spiritridates being wounded in his right hand, it must be mine that must let you know, how he is so unfortunate, as that he cannot accept of those generous offers which you made him: For after he had met with the Ravisher of the Princess Araminta, whom I cannot call Brother; and after he had fought with him whilst I was another way in quest of that Princess, he escaped his revenge, after he had slightly wounded him in the right hand, and imbarqued at a Galatian Port, whither we followed him, and where we imbarqued also, though we know not directlie which way he hath taken. After this Sir, I have no more to say, Page 139 but to tell you, that the acknowledgments of the Prince Spiritridates to you, are as great as his sorrows, and that my anger against Phraartes doth equal them both, though it doth not exceed my zeal unto your glorie.

TIGRANES.

After the reading of this Letter, Cyrus enquired verie particularly of him who brought it, how Spitridates did meet Phraartes? and by him understood that it was in a Wood; that Phraartes at first taking Spitridates for him, would have fled, but one of the men knowing him to be Spitridates, did first assault him; that all their men fought, but in conclusion, Phraartes seeing Tigranes afar off with his Squadron, he ran away, and got into a thick wood, where we lost the sight of him; that afterwards they understood, Alraminta during the combat was in a Shepherds Cabin; some two hundred paces from the place where they fought, and that Phraartes went and took her away, and carried her into a Port within thirtie furlongs of the place, where those who guarded her had provided a Ship; and that he was no sooner come unto this Port, but he imbarqued; some reporting that he was wounded. This man related further, That Spitridates and Tigranes making towards that place, did come too late; and that they resolved to imbarque also, and to carry with them those whom you gave unto them, and at last sent him to relate the passage. When Cyrus had heard all that concerned Spitridates, he understood from Feraulas, that Arianita making no question but Cumes would be taken, was gone out of Sardis to Thybarra with Doralisa; whose Aunt had there some Estate and business; and therefore she was gone unto that place where she might be neer her Princess and Mistress, when she was released: Feraulas, said further, that Pherenice having no mind to leave her was gone along with her. The Prince Myrsiles, who was present when Feraulas told this news unto Cyrus, was much joyed in his hopes of seeing Doralisa at the end of the Siege. But Cyrus had no sooner done with Feraulas, then an Envoy from the Prince Philaxip[es] was brought unto him, and another from the Prince of Cicilie, who sent Ships unto him, insomuch as Cyrus seeing fresh hopes of vanquishing and releasing Mandana, his soul was all tranquility; but this calm lasted not long: For Mazares remembering that the King of Pontus had still the same Heliotropes wherewith he got Mandana out of Sardis, was extremely sad; and desiring to communicate his sorrows unto his Rival also, he told Cyrus of it the very same houre, who was so surprized at the apprehension of it, that his wonder was as great as his grief. Alas Mazares, unto what end is this Siege, to cast up any works, to have a puissant Navy, to have made a considerable breach, to have begun a Treaty, which in all probabilitie will produce happy effects, if our Rival can still steal himself out of sight, and carry our Princess from us? Alas Mazares, I know not what to think, nor can have any constancy of hope; I cannot chuse but fear this accident, against which there are no orders to be given: Oh heavens, how comes it to pass I should be so forgetful, and so blind, as not to foresee this miserie? Doubtless the Gods have permitted it, replied Mazares, to the end you should go on with the Siege of Cumes so gloriously as you have done. But alas, replied Cyrus, to what purpose is it to have so happily advanced it in spite of all the obstacles that Nature and men could block in our way, since the qualitie of one little stone can render all our travels unprofitable? Perhaps at this very houre Mandana is not in Cumes, but that our Rival hath carried her away the third time: Truly Mazares I know not what to say or think, but I am sure, that I will never pardon my treacherous memory; Oh heavens, that such a drowsie sleepiness of spirits should possess my thoughts, in a business upon which depends all the good and bad fortune of my life. Alas, alas, I did but flatter my self with false hopes; for I must confess, that when I saw all things in so good a condition, I did not only begin to hope, but also to believe that I had ill expounded the menaces of the Gods in their Oracles; al[so] ill understood the answer of Sibil, as likewise the answer of Jupiter Belus unto the king of Assiria: But now I plainly perceive that deceived my self, in thinking I was deceived, and that I am not yet at the end of my misfortunes. As soon as Cyrus had pronounced these words, a Souldier was brought unto him, who said he had a Letter to present unto him; Cyrus then asked him from whom it was? But he answered, that he could not tell; all he knew was, that it was written by a Prisoner who was carefully guarded in Page 140 a Bithinean Castle, which joyns upon Galatia; and that it was given unto him by one of his Guards whom he had suborned, with orders to bring it unto him. Cyrus then taking this Letter, not knowing from whom it came, he opened it, and found these words.

The King of Assiria unto CYRUS.

SIR,

Fortune, which is resolved to loaden me with all sorts of miseries, is not satisfied that I should owe you my life, but will also have me a debtor to you for my libertie: Remember Sir, that you can never enjoy Mandana, as long as I am a Prisoner to Arsamones; since you can never overcome me unless you release me, nor have the possession of that Princess unless you do overcome me, according unto your promise at Sinope. Remember Sir, that Cyrus is obliged to make good all the promises of Artamenes, and denie not an unfortunate Lover the satisfaction of hoping, either to be revenged, or die; and let him never be a Spectator of his Rivals Triumph.

The King of Assiria.

See generous Prince (said Cyrus unto Mazares, and gave him the Letter after he had dismissed him who brought it) See here, that our Rival is not dead: And consider I pray you, unto what odd adventures Mrs. Fortune doth expose me. Mazares then taking the Letter read it, and then agreed that the destiny of Cyrus was most strange: But though he was resolved to love without hope, and never to pretend any thing unto Mandana, yet he could not chuse but be a little pleased at the root of his heart, to see a new obstacle unto the happiness of Cyrus; yet he was so generous as to hide this thought from a Rival who was so kind unto him, and to lament in appearance at the thing which he inwardly rejoiced at. In the mean time, though it was a most cruel task for Cyrus to release a Rival, and such a Rival as would not value libertie, but only to dispute with him for the enjoyment of Mandana, unto whom he could not pretend any right; yet he did not pause upon it at all, but presentlie took a resolution worthy of his great heart. For since he had another Rival for a witness of his carriage in the business, he surmount[ed] his repugnancy of doing service unto an Enemy. Though I did never promise the King of Assiria (said he unto Mazares) but only to fight with him, and not to fight for him, yet I will consent unto his demand, and that as soon as I can, to the end, that if by good fortune the King of Pontus do not make use of that fatal stone• whose prodigious quality hath cost me so much trouble, but that we do deliver Mandana, I may then be the sooner a Conqueror, or Conquered. Mazares hearing Cyrus speak thus, could not chuse, but out of a thought of deferring the libertie of one Rival, and the good fortune of the other, tell him that his generositie went abundantly too far: But Cyrus being prompted both by honour and love to make his resolution good, did not alter it. No, no, Mazares (said he unto him) I must not let the King of Assiria think that his valour is terrible to me, nor give Mandana any cause to think, that I spare my self a combat, to assure my self of her Conquest. After this, both these Princes began to imagine, how the King of Assiria could be in Bithinia, and why Arsamones should retain him; and after good consideration of it, they conceived that this Prince at his departure from Sardis, had received some false intelligence concerning Mandana, which made him wend his course that way, and that being known, Arsamones arrested him, yet they could not well imagine his reason: For though they knew that the Princess Istrina, whom the King of Assiria so lighted at Babilon, in the time of the Queen Nitocris, was the Niece of Arsamones, and was then with him, as well as the Prince Intaphernes, whom the King of Assiria did so affront; yet they could not conceive this to be a sufficient reason for arresting this Prince; nor could they imagine why Arsamones having arrested him, should make a secret of it.

But at last, not being able to comprehend the reasons, Cyrus bethought himself how he should release the Assirian King; and after a serious consideration, he resolved upon two wayes. The one, to give orders for the drawing out of all Galatian and Cappadocian Garrisons, and of them compose a flying Army, which should quarter as neer the Frontiers Page 141 of Buthinia as they could: The other, to send unto Arsamones to demand the King of Assiria, with orders to offer a Ransome proportionable unto the Quality of the Prisoner, and to the magnificence of the offerer. After which, if Arsamones should refuse to restore him, then he who is to command the Forces quartering upon the Bithinian Frontiers, should advance towards the Castle where he is kept, and endeavour to surprize it. But Cyrus did not conceive it just, to weaken that Army wherewith he was to release Mandana, to go and release his Rival.

This design being resolved upon, he looked upon Hidaspes as the fittest to go and put it into execution, commanding him to take the man who brought the King of Assiria's Letter along with him: And for the quicker expedition of the business, he dispatched his Orders the same day into Galatia and Capadocia by the Posts which he had placed in all the Dominions of Ciaxes, to the end; that when Hidaspes came, he might finde things ready for the execution of his design. But oh heavens (said Cyrus, as he was giving his last Orders about this enterprize) Since I am obliged to imploy all my cares of the liberty of my Princess, must I be also necessitated to take care for the liberty of my Rival? However, were I assured to see him shortly in such a condition, as that I should see him with a Sword in his hand, I should cheer up my self: But knowing the malignity of my Fates, I am almost certain to release my Enemy before Mandana. In the mean time Mazares, who knew he had carried this Princess from the King of Assiria at Sinope, repenting himself of his first thoughts, and to repair his infidelity towards him, had now a mind to contribute unto his liberty: But since he had more wronged Mandana then the King of Assiria, and consequently it more concerned him to repair the one then the other, he stayed in the Camp, to the end he might be present at the taking or rendition of Cumes, though the very imagination of the interview between Cyrus and Mandana would cut him to the heart. In the mean time, since the Fates were resolved to put the generosity of Cyrus to the utmost test, there arrived a messenger from Arsamones, who having demanded private audience, obtained it from Cyrus, who received a Letter from Arsamones under his own hand; but it being only a Letter of credance, it was from the man who brought it, which Cyrus knew the Proposition which the King his Master made.

This Envoy being a man of parts, he prepared the mind of Cyrus by a very long Prologue, aggravating the unjust usurpations of the Pontean Kings upon those of Bithinea, and what violent affronts the King of Assiria had put upon a Prince and a Princess, who were so neer related unto Arsamones: After which, desiring to induce Cyrus unto a consent to what he should desire: The King my Master (said he unto him, after he had sufficiently aggravated all causes of complaint against those two Princes) doth think him[self] to be happy amidst his misfortunes, in having such Enemies as yours, and cannot think that you will protect them against him. In this thought he hath commanded me to tell you, that knowing the King of Pontus will ere long be in your power, so the King of Assiria is already in his; and that if you will be pleased to put that usurping Prince into his hands, he will put the King of Assiria into yours, unless you had rather have him keep him a Prisoner to rid you of an Enemy. I do not use, replied Cyrus, to rid my self of my Rivals by any such wayes; and I cannot chuse but wonder, that a Prince who hath so gloriously reconquered his Kingdome, should desire to rid himself of his Enemy by such an ignoble way: But since Arsamones hath been so unjust, as to hold Spitridates in a rigorous Prison, who is one of the most illustrious Princes upon earth, I need not think it strange he should desire to use his Enemy so. However, though the King of Pontus be mine, and the King of Assiria also, yet I will neither deliver the first unto the King of Bithinia, nor secure the other, as he adviseth me; but on the contrary, I have several times offered the King of Pontus to reconquer his Dominions for him, if he will restore the Princess Mandana unto me; and I have this day sent to offer the King your Master, the King of Assiria's Ransome for his liberty. I pray judg after this, whether I can hearken unto any such Proposition as you make: But Sir, replied the Messenger, these two Princes are your Rivals, your Enemies, and the Ravishers of Mandana: It is most true, replied Cyrus, and therefore I am the more obliged to be revenged by honourable wayes, and not to give them so much advantage, as to wound my reputation, which thanks be to the heavens, did never yet receive the least blemish: Tell therefore your Master, that I neither can, nor ought to do as he desires; and that if he be well advised, he will call home the Prince his Son, and suffer him to marry the Princess Araminta, whose virtues are high, to the end he may have a legitimate title to the Kingdom of Pontus, Page 142 if the Fate of Arms should chance to make him perish in this War, to whom it now belongs. And as for the King of Assiria, I do intend to follow my first design in sending to Arsamones about him.

This Envoy would have given farther reasons unto Cyrus, but this Prince was so constant unto his first Principles, as he imposed silence upon him: However, he gave orders that he should be treated well, and kept him two or three daies in the Camp, to the end the Troops might have the more room to rendezvouz. Whilst he was there, Gadates understanding that he was a Bithinean, and sent by Arsamones, did much wonder that he should hear nothing from Intaphernes his Son, nor from the Princess Istrina his Daught[er]: But this messenger telling him that they knew not of his journey, his wonder ceased; and he writ unto them by him when he departed with Hidaspes. After which, Cyllrus had more restless thoughts then he was able to Master; for as oft as he thought that Mandana was not in Cumes his sorrows were unexpressible. The sad disaster at Sinope, and that which he had at Sardis, made him apprehend such fears of taking Cumes, and not finding Mandana in it, that he was not in less sorrow then if the misfortune had hap[pened] already. In the mean time, these his fears which seemed so well grounded proved shadows, and the King of Pontus was as much perplexed at the loss of this Heliotrope, as Cyrus was in the belief that he still had it. Indeed, as oft as he remembered, that as he imbarqued at the Port Artarnes in such hast, when he took Spitridates for Cyrus, that he gave all his Heliotropes unto one of his men to carry, and when he remembered that he to whom he gave them did in the Tumult let them fall into the Sea, he was in a most desperate condition, accusing himself of extreme indiscretion for making so bad a choice of him he trusted, for the nearer the Truce was at an end, the further off was he of finding out any wayes of escaping with Mandana. The Prince of Cumes, who saw his State lost if this Princess got out, had always a most watchful eye over the King of Pontus; so that which way soever he looked, all seemed disastrous to him: If he looked upon Mandana, he saw her still incensed against him; If he looked upon the Prince of Cumes, he saw his Protector become his Spy; If he turned his eyes towards the Sea, he saw a puissant Navy; If he looked towards the Land, he saw Works, Forts, and Souldiers resolved to vanquish or dye: If he looked upon the Walls of Cumes, he saw such a breach, as would let in Cyrus upon the first assault: If he looked upon the Inhabitants of that Town, he heard nothing but murmures against him; and if he considered himself, he found that he was the most unfortunate man in the world, whether he looked upon himself as a Lover, or only as a King without a Kingdom, or as the Enemy of Cyrus; for though he was obliged unto him, and might be more, if he would have accepted his generous offers, yet now he was nothing but a lump of black melancholy, since he could see no way to escape and could not resolve to part with Mandana. In the mean while, that faithful Agent which Cyrus had in the Town, negotiated under-hand with the people, and disposed them to revolt, in case the Prince of Cumes and the King of Pontus should not accept of the offers of Cyrus, at the return of those whom they had sent to Licambes, to Pactias, to the Caunians, and to the Xanthians. This man was so active, and so fit for such an employment (his name was Tifernes) that he alone had inspired the Spirit of Revolt through all the Town: There was not one publique place in all Cumes unto which he did not go two or three times in a day: If he saw any two men talking together, he would be sure to make the third, and with a cunning ingenuity, bring them unto his opinion: There was not a day on which he had not some horrid news or other to affright the people, which was circumstanced and dispersed, as it grew into a general belief. On the other side, Anaxaris, he was not without his share of perplexities, not but that he was treated with all the civility that a Prisoner of War could be nor was his Prison such a place as that he could complain against it, and if his soul had not been more a captive than his body, he would easily have endured his misfortune.

But since there is nothing more dangerous to look upon than a Beauty in misery; and since the Princess Mandana was the fairest unfortunate that ever was, Anaxaris, whose soul was of a passionate and tender temper, could not look upon her, but needs must love her. At the first he did attribute all his tender thoughts which he had of that Princess unto the compassion which he had of her misfortunes. He thought also for a while that it was as much the interest of Cyrus as the interest of Mandana, which made him so sensible of all that concerned her: But at the last his passion did so augment, that he knew the greatness of it, and knew it without any power to resist it: Since he saw Mandana Page 143 every day, the fair eyes of this Princess did kindle such a violent flame in the heart of this violent unknown one, as all his reason could not quench it; not but that he saw very well that never any love could kindle with smaller hopes than his; but yet not being a Master of his own heart, he could not rule the motions of it, all that he was able to do, was to know he ought not to love Mandana; yet in excuse of his irregular passion, it must be said, that he saw Mandana in such a manner, as it was a very hard matter not to love her; he saw her in secret, and with some difficulty; and since it was by him she knew the state of the Siege, since she found him a very accomplished man, and looked upon him as the friend of Cyrus, and as a Prisoner of War in her behalf, she used him with as much civility as it was possible for her to express. Moreover, since they were both of them Prisoners, this conformity made such a kind of equality between them, as rendered her civilities more sweet and obliging. It may be further said in his excuse, that Mandana was never fairer then at that time: Indeed it may be said, that her prison did only keep her from being Sun burnt, and preserved the freshness of her complexion; he saw her then fair, sweet, civil and in miserie, and he saw her thus every day: So that his heart being tendered by the tears of Mandana, Love did more easily wound it, and wounded it with such a poisoned arrow, that the wound was incurable. Alas (said he unto himself, when he considered the misfortune into which he was fallen) What can I ever pretend unto by this passion? Is it not the maddest fondness in the world to love such a person, who neither can, nor ought love me again, though she did know the violence of my passion towards her? For her heart belongs only to Cyrus, by so many several rights, as it would be the greatest extravagancy that ever was, to pretend any thing unto her; The inclination of Mandana is only to him, Ciaxares hath promised this Princess to him, and his incomparable valour hath conquered her; he hath fought and won several battels for her, he hath subjected several Prouinces and Kingdoms to her, and will ere long take Cumes, and restore her to liberty: Judg Anaxaris what hopes thou hast of Mandana, thou whom she knows not, who dares not make thy self known unto her, and whom she could not love, though she did know thee: Never think to conquer that heart which the Conqueror of Asia hath conquered. Consider, that thou canst not do as the King of Assiria, the King of Pontus, and the Prince Mazares did; resolve courageously to banish that Princess out of thy heart who can never give thee hers. But alas (said he and reprehended himself) what good will it do me to oppose reason against an unruly passion, which glories in scorning it? The more unfortunate I see my Rivals, the more I excuse my own error; and since the King of Assiria, the King of Pontus, and Mazares were not able to defend themselves from the charms of Mandana, why should I be ashamed in my non-ability to resist them? The first of these loved her when he was unknown as I am; the second, though at the rate of whole Kingdoms, yet must love her, so far as to become her Ravisher; and the third, though he knew she loved Cyrus, though he was both Cozen and friend unto the King of Assiria, could not chuse but love her, and commit a double treason in carrying her away, Know and believe Anaxaris for thy justification, that the charms of this Princess are inevitable; and that to fail after three such great Princes as I have named, is no weakness; submit then Anaxaris, submit unto Mandana, since thou canst not resist her; and without knowing why thou lovest, or without considering the sequel of so fond a passion, endeavour only to please her. Who can tell (said he further to himself) whether all my Rivals will not ruine one another? and whether I may not thrive by their ruines? Also since I cannot chuse but love Mandana, I have no way else but to delude my self as long as I can, for such is the composition of my soul, that though I were certain Cyrus were to enjoy her to morrow, yet I could not chuse but love her. In the mean time, as hot as the love of Anaxaris was, yet he had reason enough to rule himself so far, as not to make his passion known unto the Princess who caused it; so that behaving himself towards her with a profound reverence, and unparalleled complaisance, she grew very friendly towards him. But to render himself more acceptable, and that he might the offer see her, when he heard no newes, he would invent it; and since he could not invent any wherein Cyrus was not brought in, and to be acceptable unto Mandana, he must needs bring him in advantageously; therefore he was extremely troubled to contrive it: His passion brought one extreme perplexity upon him; for knowing that the King of Pontus plotted how to get Mandana out of Cumes, he was at a stand, whether he should wish that Cyrus should release her, or the King of Pontus carry her away: If the first happened, he concluded that Cyrus would Page 144 presently be happy, and Mandana at his dispose; but if the King of Pontus carried her away, perhaps he should never see her again: So that chusing rather to see her enjoyed by Cyrus, then never to see her, he was very vigilant that the King of Pontus should not execute his design. Also knowing by Persodes, that Cyrus and the King of Assiria were to fight, before any Marriage of Mandana, love moved him to phancy more advantage to himself by Cyrus releasing her, then by the King of Pontus his carrying her away: So that making use of that correspondency which he had with those Guards whom Martesia had suborned, he carried the business so, as he gained almost half the Garrison. But since he had nothing to give them, he tampered with them, by telling them of the liberality of Cyrus, and put them in hopes to be highly recompensed, if they kept the Princess Mandana for him.

Thus, making use of his Rivals virtue to further his design, he advanced it so happily, that he was almost as powerful in the Castle where Mandana was, as either the King of Pontus, or the Prince of Cumes; and if to make himself Master of it had been enough to release Mandana, doubtless he had tried it. But since that Castle commanded only one little part of the Town, that was not sufficient; also, since he might possibly fail in the enterprize, he feared lest in attempting to release Mandana, he should make her more miserable: So that to run no hazard, he deferred his design until he had got more Souldiers.

This being the state of things, those who were sent unto the Xanthians, to the Caunians, to Licambes, and to Pactias, returned, and reported unto the King of Pontus, and the Prince of Cumes; that all of them thought it his only course to accept of the Propositions which Cyrus offered; Pactias and Licambes sent word, that fear was in their Army, and how they were perswaded, that if Cumes were taken without composition, their Troops would all disperse the next day, out of apprehensions that Cyrus would fall upon them; so that they were jealous of the Event, if the Treaty were not concluded: As for the Xantheans and the Caunians, they asked no more, but a speedy agreement of what was offered. These Messengers then bringing with them words of peace, and being come to the gates of Cumes, the people being incited by Tifernes, did in an instant flock about them, and asked them in a tumultuous and violent manner, what news they brought? So that the messengers to appease them, said they brought news of peace. This word Peace was no sooner pronounced, but passing from mouth to mouth, it caused such loud acclamations, that all the people ran to the place where those shouts of joy made the ayr ring a pleasing peal unto men that were weary of a tedious Siege. The Messengers were so environed with men, that they could not walk; do what they could, the crowd increased, before they had gone through one street, the greater half of all the people in Cumes had flocked into two or three streets. In the mean while Tifernes, who would not let such a favourable opportunity slip, went into the midst of this press, to bring things unto such a pass as he desired: He encouraged some in their desires of Peace, unto other, he said, that he heard say the King of Pontus and the Prince of Cumes would not accept of it; adding further, that it might be made without them, or else to force them to it: That the way to have Peace, was to open the Gates of Cumes unto Cyrus, who of an Enemy would become their Protector, if they would deliver the Princess Mandana to him. Tifernes had no sooner spoken this, but every one repeated it unto their companions, and they to others, adding more or less tartness, according to the temper of the rabble. Thus he did sow such seditious seeds amongst the multitude, as it was easie to be understood by their cries, which were heard from all parts, that if they refused Peace, the people would fly to the last refuge, and make it by force: When any Agents of the King of Pontus offered to oppose such tumultuous opinions, they threatened to kill them, and stopped their mouths. On the other side, the Prince Anaxaris being advertised of what passed in the Town, he began to temper with the Souldiers, as Tifernes did amongst the people, still using the name of <...> them unto his bend. Sometimes he would tell them of the high recomp <...> <...> them, otherwhiles he would intimate the glory which they would <...> the future under such an illustrious Conquerour, perswading them <...> all to den themselves with riches under him. Then to take from others <...> Treason, he added, that by this act they would render the State unto the <...> Master, and that he would ingage his word to serve him as much as he could <...> all shame out of their action, by talking of Glory, of recompence, and <...> brought them to promise that they would do whatsoever he desired Page 145 them. In the mean while, the messengers having rendered their answers unto the King of Pontus, and the Prince of Cumes, the first of these was extremely perplexed, for he saw plainly that the other wished peace: So that not daring to oppose his Protector in down-right terms, he only conjured him as his last favour, to protract the business a few daies longer, under pretence of security for the Treaty, hoping, that since it was in a moneth when the winds use to be high, and the Sea rough and turbulent, a storm might happily arise, and disperse the two Fleets which blocked up Cumes, and so the Town might happily be saved, or at least be able to get away Mandana. The King of Pontus being very importunate, he perswaded the Prince of Cumes, yet their contest about it was so long, as the people had cause to think that these Princes did not accept those offers of Peace which were made unto them. On the other side, Cyrus having seen the Messengers as they passed; and understanding by the Heralds who conveyed them, that they reported words of Peace, he did not doubt of it: So that this Prince seeing himself upon the very point of being either happy or miserable, to release Mandana, or to lose her, to make a Peace, or to begin a War; he doubled all his diligence and cares, and began to bestir himself, as if the Truce ended the very same houre, and to order all things for a general assault: Philocles and Leontidas returned in all hast to their Fleet: The Prince Mazares to his Quarter; The Prince Artamas unto his; Persodes to the place where the Artillery was, and the generous Megabates with all the Voluntiers about Cyrus waited with much impatience for an answer from those who were besieged: But the greatest fear was, that perhaps the King of Pontus would steal away Mandana by the help of the Heliotrope; yet sometimes his hope was, that this Princess remembering her adventure of Sardis, would not be so easily deluded: But for all this, his fears were above his hopes; so that every minute seemed an Age unto him. And since the contest between the King of Pontus, and the Prince of Cumes was very long; and since he all that while received no answer, he sent a Herald to demand it, thinking that this might more easily induce the people to revolt.

But for the better furtherance of his design, he commanded the Herald to tell those those besieged Princes, that if they would not that very houre give him a positive answer, he would give an assault upon the Town, appointing the Herald also to disperse this report amongst the people as they went through the streets; and indeed the man did perform his charge so very well, as he struck terror into the hearts of all the People in going to the Castle; and Tifemes closing with this occasion, did blow their terror into fury, and made this multitude resolve to take Arms in their hands if this Herald received not a favourable answer unto his message. They also resolved to seize upon the persons of the two Princes, to seize upon the Gates, to let Cyrus enter, and to go afterwards unto the place where Mandana was. In the mean time, Anaxaris having a desire to eminent himself, and to make Mandana in some sort obliged unto him for her liberty, he hearing that this Herald was with the Princes, and fearing that they would not conclude such a Peace as he wished, he began to make use of those Souldiers which he had gained, and to make himself Master of the Castle, which the People called the Prince of Cumes his Palace, to the end that seizing upon the King of Pontus and Mandana, he might have that glory which he pretended unto. In the mean time, the Herald which Cyrus sent, having received no positive answer to his demands, prepared for a return; but he no sooner appeared at the Gate of the Castle, then the People, who did with much impatience expect him, began to ask him whether or no a Peace was concluded? Insomuch as the man perceiving how much they desired it, did boldly answer them (purposely to make them revolt) that their Princes would not hearken to it, and that Cyrus therefore, as soon as ever he was returned to the Camp would give a general assault. These words were no sooner heard, but a tumultuous grumbling was amongst the People, and Fury passing from Spirit to Spirit, did in a moment disperse it self through all the Town, so that all the Inhabitants took up Arms, and laying aside all respects, would break open the Gates of the Castle.

Anaxaris hearing this tumult, incensed the greatest part of the Garrison; so that the King of Pontus, and the Prince of Cumes being environed on all sides with Enemies, they found themselves in a pitiful condition: If they should offer to go out of the Castle, they should find the People all in fury with Arms in their hands; if they should stay in the Castle, they saw they were not Masters of it; that one part of their Souldiers would fight against the other, and that there was safety no where. The King of Pontus would then Page 146 go to Mandana's Chamber, but the Guards, in lieu of obeying him, would themselves seize upon her person, which Anaxaris coming then to that place, did most courageously oppose.

The King of Pontus having got some Souldiers to his Party, would force his passage to her; so that Mandana out of her Window did see a very fierce combat between those two Princes: 'Tis true, she hardly saw them, but Martesia saw more then she did, yet she saw enough to observe that Anaxaris fought for her with Heroique fury. In another place, the Prince of Cumes, to appease the People, desiring to shew himself unto them he was forced to retire; so that he being come unto the place where the King of Pontus and Anaxaris fought the skirmish was more bloody. But in conclusion, the Party of Anaxaris being the stronger, and the King of Pontus being wounded in the right arm, he must submit; yet this Prince did not render himself, but remembering a back-pair of stairs from Mandana's Chamber which went into a back Court, he endeavoured to get up that way, leaving the Prince of Cumes hard set with those who were upon him: But Anaxaris, who used all imagineable prudence in this business, had placed a Guard there, so that this unfortunate King not being able to have so much advantage as to die at Mandana's feet, and fearing to fall under the power of a Rival, whose generosity he feared as much as his severity, he sought out how he might steal himself from the Victory of this great Prince: So that finding himself not able to fight, and seeing a Souldier, who was none of those whom Anaxaris had gained, he got him to open a secret door which was in the Wall of the Castle, that Anaxaris did not know of, and out he went, resolving to see if possible he could move the People to make some resistance. He was no sooner out, but he heard a most horrid noyse, and understood from him with whom he lodged when he came first to Cumes, that the People had already seized upon the Gates of the Town, that they talked of letting the Troops of Cyrus to enter, that the greatest part of the Souldiers were revolted, and that there was but three ways for him to chuse, either to hide himself, or to be taken, or to be killed.

The King of Pontus being in this desperate condition, and desiring at least to hide his shame, did accept of an offer which this man did make, which was, to go into a Garden of his that looked towards the Sea, and therefore might in the night time give him an opportunitie of some Fishers Barque, when things were a little better settled, and the Fleet of Cyrus left blocking up the mouth of the Port: So that this unfortunate Prince leaving himself to the conduct of his angry destiny, followed this man in such an extream rage and despair, as would have pitied the most cruel of his Enemies, if they had seen him in that pitiful condition: The abundance of blood which he lost, had died all his cloaths sanguine, his Sword was red with the blood of them he had killed, but he carried it in his left hand, his right hand having received a wound, which caused him to withdraw out of Combat.

As he walked in this posture, his mind was full of such sad and violent thoughts, that if he had strength enough to kill himself, doubtless he had freed himself from all his misfortunes at a blow, but he had lost such abundance of blood, that he was forced to live only because he could not die, and he was forced to lean upon a Souldier; and enter into that Garden which was to be his Sanctuary. In the interim, Anaxaris having none in Head before him but only the Prince of Cumes, he redoubled his valour the more furiously: But though his valiant Enemy was forced to fall at his feet when the King of Pontus parted from him, yet he made resistance with extraordinary valour, being seconded by him who took Anaxaris Prisoner, whose name was Thrasiles. Thus the Conquered became Conquerour, and the Captive took his taker Prisoner: Valiant Prince (cried Anaxaris to the Prince of Cumes) do not force me to destroy you, I only desire to release the Princess Mandana, and not to hurt you: But in conclusion, seeing he would not yeeld, but still resisted, he fell upon him with so much fury, that after many wounds received, he fell dead at his feet: This death yet did not end the combat; for the valiant Thrasiles seeing the Prince of Cumes dead, in lieu of yeelding, did shew his courage, to revenge the death of his Prince, and to prevent being a Prisoner unto his Prisoner. But all he could do to vanquish or die, was in vain; to vanquish was impossible, and the generosity of Anaxaris would not let him die; for desiring to acknowledge those civilities which he received during his imprisonment, he would not suffer any of his Party to kill him, but causing him to be surrounded by ten or twelve, he was forced to yeeld, as well as those few of his men which remained. He had no sooner laid down his Armes, but Anaxaris Page 147 leaving him to be guarded by four Souldiers, went unto the Tower of the Castle, to see whether he was an absolute Master of it, and to seek for the King of Pontus; but he found that he was escaped out of that little door which stood open; and that there was no other tumult, then what the People made at the Castle Gate. Anaxaris then presenting himself unto these furious people; and having imposed silence upon them, he let them understand, that the King of Pontus was not in the Castle, that he himself was Master of it, that their Prince was dead, and that the Princess Mandana was in his Power: That if they would permit him to send unto Cyrus, he would promise them to obtain for them more advantageous conditions then ever their Prince would assent unto. He had no sooner said so, but the Inhabitants, without any sorrows for the death of their Prince, who had he lived would have punished them, did all cry out with one voice, that they would all do as he would have them, and that they had already a design to send unto Cyrus with offers to deliver up unto him the Gates of the Town, of which they were already Masters. Anaxaris desiring to dispatch one unto Cyrus, espied among the croud the Herald which that Prince sent unto Cumes, who since he could not get out because of the Tumult, stay'd there to see what this disorder would come unto: So that thinking it best to make use of him, he commanded him to come unto him, yet it went against the grain of Anaxaris to send this message, for had he followed the violent suggestions of his passionate soul, he would have defended the Castle both against the Inhabitants, and against Cyrus also.

But since this design was void of all reason, and without any shadow of thriving in it, he rejected the thought of it. But as soon as he desired to speak with the Herald, the People bandying together in several herds, and after they had held a tumultuous council, began to cry, and say, that they would see the Princess Mandana before any was sent unto Cyrus: The Inhabitants of Cumes having no mind to open their Gates unto that Prince, until they were well assured that they were able to render him that Princess whom he would release, and until that Princess made them a promise to preserve their Town. Anaxaris then being desirous to give them satisfaction, said that he would go unto her; and indeed he went unto the Chamber of that Princess, who was with much impatience and fear expecting the success of this great tumult. But as soon as she saw Anaxaris, she began to hope the success was happy, especially when he came unto her, and in a most humble manner told her what the desires of the Inhabitants were: Madam (said he unto her) the state of your Fortune is changed, for in lieu of being under the power of the Pontic King, the People of Cumes would shelter themselves under your protection, and by me desires to be honored with the sight of you: Generous stranger, replied Mandana, How great are my obligations to you? What does not the King my Father owe you? And how much acknowledgments may you expect from the illustrious Cyrus, for whom doubtless you did undertake this which you have with so much courage and good Fortune executed? As long as I was in the Army of Cyrus (replied Anaxaris and blushed) doubtless I fought for you, for the love of you only: And Madam, I beseech you do not give unto him any part of what I have done in Cumes, since most certainly I did it only for the Princess Mandana, without the consideration of any but her: However (added he, and would not give her leisure to reflect upon his words) since the people Madam are impatient, since they have Arms in their hands, and since they may in a moment alter their resolutions, I beseech you Madam take a little pains for your liberty, to the end you may owe it unto none but your self. Alas, generous Anaxaris, replied she, that is impossible; and though I ought rather to say, that I am a debtor for it unto a hundred thousand men, then unto my self, yet I will confine it unto more narrow limits; and assure you, that it is unto two, whereof you are one, unto whom I am particularly obliged for it.

After this, Mandana under the conduct of Anaxaris went unto a Balcone which was o'ver the Gate of the Castle, Martesia following her, where she no sooner shewed her self, but the people did make huge shouts of joy: Yet they did not content themselves with the sight of her, but appointing six among themselves, as Deputies for the rest, Anaxaris let them enter into the Castle, and presented them to the Princess Mandana, who received them as men who designed her delivery; and they were so charmed with her sweetness, and dazed with her beauty, as they hardly knew what they said: Some demanded that their Town might not be plundered, others that Cyrus would pardon them, and all speaking confusedly together, it was not an easie matter to answer them. But at Page 148 last, Mandana not only promising that their Town should be preserved, but also be endowed with new priviledges, they consented that she should send the same Herald which Anaxaris would have sent; yet upon condition she should write unto that Prince, saying in a rude manner, that perhaps he would not give credit unto the Messenger; beseeching the Princess further, for their greater security, that she would be pleased to meet Cyrus at the Gate of the Town, and to present them unto him, with the Keyes which they would offer him. Mandana not thinking it good to contradict those men whom fear might make furious, consented unto their demands; and without more delay, Martesia gave her Pen, Ink, and Paper, wherein she writ these words.

MANDANA unto CYRUS.

SIR,

Since the valour of Anaxaris hath put me into a condition able to protect the Inhabitants of Cumes, I entreat you to incline unto clemency, to pardon a people who have done nothing but obeyed their Prince, to preserve their Town, to forget it hath been my Prison, and to observe the day of my liberty by a general Act of Oblivion: You have used to be so sweet after a Victory, that I am confident you will not deny me; nor am I less confident, that you will keep that promise which I have made, as exactly, as I shall keep that which I make unto you, which is, to acknowledg as long as I live those infinite obligation which are upon me.

MANDANA.

As soon as this Letter was written, Mandana gave it to the Herald, who had orders also to tell Cyrus, that he should advance with his Troops towards the principal Gate of the Town, where this Princess, with the Inhabitants of Cumes, would be ready to receive him; and so the Herald making as much hast as a man who carries good and great news, he came unto Cyrus just as he was ready to send another, to know what was the meaning of that tumult, which his Souldiers who were nearest the Town did hear: As soon as Cyrus saw him, he asked him why he stayed so long, extremely fearing to hear that the King of Pontus was vanished with Mandana, by virtue of his invisible Heliotrope: Sir, said the Herald, when you have read this Letter which I shall present unto you, I shall tell you the reason. But Cyrus no sooner opened the Letter which the Herald gave him, but knowing the hand of Mandana, he was so pleasantly surprized, that abundance of joy dissipating all fears, and chasing all melancholy from his heart, did so sparkle in his eyes, as all those who looked upon him might easily know he had received good news. But when he read the Letter, and saw hopes of so on seeing his Princess, and seeing her at liberty, all the eloquence upon earth could not express his joys, yet was he a little vexed, that another should have a share in the liberty of Mandana, for the zeal of his love was such, as he wished (if it had been possible) that he had delivered her without an Army, with any stratagems, and without the help of any but himself; yet this trivial perplexity lasted but a moment, and after it was over, he was ravished with joy, that the glory of serving the Princess in so high a manner, was reserved for Anaxaris, whom he infinitely esteemed. As soon as he had read Mandana's Letter, the joys which appeared in his countenance, passed into the hearts of all the Soldiers, as soon as ever this great news was published; he caused the Herald to relate how all things passed, inquiring particularly concerning the King of Pontus: After which, he gave out all necessary orders, commanding all to be in Arms: Then in the Head of the Volunteers and Homotimes, he went within Arrow shot of the Gate, where he was to see Mandana, being also followed by as many Troops as he thought requisite to secure Cumes when he was entered.

But since Cyrus could not go towards this Gate, but he must pass through the Quarters of Mazares, therefore he acquainted him with the state of things, and could not deny this generous Rival that favour which he asked: Sir (said Mazares unto Cyrus, and sighed, though glimpses of joy appeared in his eyes for the liberty of Mandana) I beseech you give me leave as a punishment for carrying away the Princess, to be a witness to the day of your glory and felicity; and let me find so much favour from you, as that I Page 149 may assure the incomparable Mandana, that my repentance is Real: You know Sir, she did me the honour to promise me her esteem and friendship, if I would fight on your side, I beseech you prompt her to be as good as her word; and the more to move you unto it, and also to force my self unto an observance of my word to you, I will make a new solemn oath unto you, never to fail, before the sight of that Divine Princess do put my virtue unto a new Test: Oh most generous Rival, said Cyrus to him, I do profess that if the Princess Mandana did but know you as well as I do, she would be unjust if she preferred me before you. In the mean time, though out of resentments of Love I ought to wish you would make a thousand protestations in lieu of one, that you will never pretend to any thing further than to the friendship of this Princess, yet that you may not be always my Conquerour in point of generosity, I will absolutely trust you, and be contented with your first promise, without any new Protestations: Come then (said he unto him) come along with me, and be assured, that if you keep within those limits which your virtue hath prescribed unto your self, you shall find a most real friend in the person of a Rival, and infinite glory in the esteem and friendship of our Princess. After this, these two generous Rivals rid together, and went towards the place where they were to see Mandana, but they went with very different thoughts, for the joys of Cyrus were only troubled by his impatient longing to see this Princess, and the joys of Mazares were troubled whether he would or no, at those joys which he foresaw Mandana would have at the sight of Cyrus; yet he did so courageously bridle the violence of his Love, that his virtue did keep within his prescribed limits. In the mean while, Cyrus being come, as I told you, within arrow-shot of the Gate of Cumes, he sent a Summons unto the Inhabitants of the Town, to keep their word with him; and they resolving not to let him enter the Town, before he promised the Princess Mandana to preserve them, went to conduct her unto the Gate where they intended Cyrus should enter: She not being in a condition to deny them any thing, consented unto them, and in a Coach with Maresias went to the Gates of the Town. Anaxaris leaving the subtil and courageous Tifernes to command in the Castle in the mean time; not that the desires of his passionate soul was to be present at this interview; but because he would not leave Mandana to the conduct of a furious multitude, therefore he followed on Horseback; but he followed with a mind so full of quiet thoughts, as he had much ado to restrain or hide them.

In the mean time, since a timorous and mutinous people do all things out of a giddy fancy without any reason, so the Inhabitants of Cumes, who had invited Cyrus to approach took a toyish fancy, and would not let Mandana receive him within the Town, but would by all means have her come out of her Coach, and go out of the Gates, beyond the Bridge, to present unto him those men who would offer him the Keyes of their Town. On the other side, Cyrus who could not imagine that Mandana would ever come out of Cumes to meet him, but on the contrary, thought that he was to go into the Castle; therefore he waited with extreme impatience on horseback, until they opened the Gates. He was that day in most glorious Armour, of so high a Garb, so Noble and so pleasing, as he attracted the eyes of all the world. Being then in all the impatience that strong hopes of a near happiness could inspire, he fixed his eyes upon the Port of Cumes: Mazares looking that way as well as he, though with less hopes and impatience of another nature. And as these two generous Rivals were thus in expectation; they saw the Gates open, and Mandana immediately to appear conducted by Anaxaris, but she appeared more fair and fuller of charms then ever, her joys to see Cyrus and her self at liberty did so sparkle in her eyes, and elevate her spirits, that her Beauty was fuller of lustre. In the mean time Cyrus and Mazares no sooner saw her, but they alighted immediately from their horses, and went towards her.

As soon as Cyrus came near, Anaxaris, as well to hide the agitation of his spirits, as out of his respects, did quit the Princess hand, and let Cyrus have the liberty of taking it, and Mandana to receive him, and present the twelve Inhabitants of Cumes which followed her, one of which number carried the Keyes of the Town in a rich Bason: So that Cyrus walking in the head of all the Volunteers in his Army, and Mandana before the Inhabitants of Cumes, behind whom was a huge crowd of people, they both did meet. After Cyrus had saluted Mandana with all the reverence of a real Adorer: I am come Madam, said he unto her, to make good all that you have promised for your liberty, though it be at the rate of my life: My liberty Sir, replied she, would be bought at too dear a price, if it should cost the life which is so glorious and so pleasing unto me Page 150 Nor am I engaged any further Sir (said she in presenting the Inhabitants of Cumes unto him, who were all upon their knees) then to obtain of you, that you be pleased to use these men well, who offer you their hearts, in offering you the Keyes of their Town, and who assure you, that they will be more obedient unto a just Prince, then they have been unto one who was not so, in protecting the King of Pontus: Madam, replied Cyrus, their destiny is in your hands, not mine, since I am fully resolved never to do any thing but what shall please you, and positively without any exception, do all that you shall command me: I conjure you then (said she unto him) to use these Inhabitants of Cumes as well as you would use the most faithful of my Fathers Subjects: I have already professed Madam (replied he) that I am all obedience; therefore if you please to command it, they shall themselves keep the Keyes of their Town, which they have not lost, but to make themselves more happy by it, since they are under your protection. Cyrus had no sooner spoke these words, but the Inhabitants gave such shouts of joy, as they went from street to street, until the Echo did ring at the further end of the Town. Then, after Mandana had confirmed what Cyrus spoke, she did most obligingly present Anaxaris unto him: Though this valiant stranger, said she unto him, would have me acknowledge you only for my Deliverer; yet I must needs tell you, that he hath done incredible things for my liberty, and that I am more his debtor then I know how to express. Anaxaris then holding down his head to hide the disorder of his countenance, did modestly and with much delight receive the commendum which Mandana gave him, and received the thanks which Cyrus gave him with much sorrow: After which, Cyrus to keep promise with Mazares, presented him unto the Princess Mandana, Madam (said Cyrus unto the Princess) you would do abundance of wrong, if you should say, that you owe your liberty only unto me, for without all doubt, the valour of Mazares hath much contributed unto those victories which I have gotten; and since he hath given me a thousand testimonies of a generous repentance, I beseech you readmit him into that friendship and esteem which you had of him when you were in Babylon, I beg it Madam, replied Mazares, upon the same conditions which I propounded at Sardis, when it was not your pleasure I should have the glory of delivering you: I do consent unto it, replied she with much joy, since that I have recovered an Noble friend whom I thought for ever lost.

Thus might be seen that which perhaps will never be seen again; for Mandana presented unto Cyrus one of his Rivals, and Cyrus presented another unto Mandana. In the mean while, since the place was not fit for any long discourse, Cyrus beseeched the Princess to go into her Coach which he saw within the Gate. But since he would prevent all surprisals, and since he would not let Mandana enter into that Town where his Forces were not, he commanded her Coach to come out of the Town, beseeching her she would be pleased to see those Troops pass who had both the honour to fight for her, and now to guard her. Mandana understanding his design, went into her Coach with Maresias, and the Coach stood so as the Soldiers might all march just before it. Cyrus, Mazares, and Anaxaris did stand next the Princess, all three with different thoughts. After which, the Troops began to march and pass by the Coach, all the Officers and Soldiers, saluting as they passed, by holding down their Javelines. All this while, Cyrus who was next the Coach, and who only talked with Mandana, was sensible of so much delight as filled his heart, his spirits, and his soul. Mandana for her part seeing her self at liberty, and seeing Cyrus next her, she was also full of pleasing satisfaction, but being a Person of superlative modesty, she did much conceal it. Also she desired to avoid all occasions of Cyrus his speaking to her of his Passion in that place; therefore beginning the discourse first, as soon as he came unto the Coach whilst the Troops marched by: Sir (said she unto him) I hope you will not think it ingratitude, if before I thank you for abundance of obliging favours, I desire you to tell me what news you hear from the King my Father? You never need to fear Madam, replied he, that the man who by all his services can never oblige you, can accuse you of any ingratitude: But I am more afraid you should <...> of incivility in telling you only in three words, that the King your Father <...> preparing to defend himself against Themiris, who they say intends to <...> in good health, that he will be infinitely joyed at your liberty, and <...> the honor to love me: However Madam, though I do infinitely <...> and though you do desire to know more, yet I beseech you give me leave Madam <...>

<...> a low voice) to speak unto you of nothing during eight daies, but Page 151 concerning my self: For truly Madam, I have a thousand things to impart unto you, which do infinitely concern me you should know. If you will be pleased to relate all your Conquests, all your Victories, and all your glorious acts (replied she most obligingly and smiled) the term you mention is not long: No Madam, replied he, I shall not talk of War, or Conquests, or Victories, for if I should speak of them, I should speak then only of the King your Father, since it is his Arms that have conquered: But Madam, I shall speak to you concerning all the sorrows I have had since I left you at Themiscira, and the infinite joys which I have to find you at Cumes, which I missed of at Sinope, at Artaxates, at Babylon, and at Sardis. But Madam, to compleat my joys, I beseech you do me the honour to confess, that the most illustrious Princess in the world was once in her life unjust, in suspecting the most faithful man alive of infidelity: Oh Sir, replied Mandana and blushed, I must confess my self injurious, and will never go about to justify my self in a thing which I entreat you to forget, and conjure you, as you love me, never to speak of again. However Sir, since it is not civil to regard so little those who have helped to crown you with Lawrels, it were good we deferred the relation of your disasters and mine until a more fit time and place; and that now I look upon so many brave men, to whom I am beholding for their indefatigable labours they have endured for me; nor can I do any less for those who have helped to conquer your enemies and mine: Since Madam, I can desire nothing but what you please, replied he, I must obey you, though I could perhaps complain a little that your joys are at so a calm in your Spirits, as they will permit you to keep such exact civilities: But since it were a crime to complain of any thing on a day whereon I have so much reason to commend my fortune, I will impose silence upon my self, and since you are pleased to honour with your looks those men who have had the glory to fight for you, I conceive they are thereby better recompensed, then if I had given them all the Treasures of Croesus. After this, Mandana without any other answers to the civility of Cyrus, then an obliging smile, began to ask the names of those Commanders who passed by, which he told her; and to do Justice unto so many brave men which had so courageously followed them into all dangers whereunto they led them; he did not only tell Mandana the names of those she asked, but also he related unto her the occasions wherein they did signal themselves, commending all the Commanders one after another as they passed by.

Mandana also asked him the names of the Volunteers, and among the rest of Megabates, of whom Cyrus gave a most excellent Character, desiring her to receive him as a man extraordinary when ever he presented him unto her. All this while Mazares and Anaxaris were so wholly taken up with their Passions, that they looked upon nothing but Mandana and Cyrus, but looked upon them with very various and different thoughts. Anaxaris who before he was a Prisoner in Cumes, and in love with Mandana, was an infinite admirer of Cyrus, did now envy, and almost hate him; and the less hopes he had, the more did his love encrease. On the other side, Mazares seeing Mandana with the same Beauty, and very same charms which forced him to love her, and constrained him to hate the King of Assyria, had much ado to keep within those limits which his virtue had prescribed unto himself, his spirits were rebellious, his heart trembled, and all his desires so disordered, that he was in a most restless condition; but his hopes were so very low, that he quickly recollected himself, especially when he remembered the pitiful condition where in he left the Princess the last time he saw her, when the Scarfe broke loose by which he held her, and held her up upon the Waves. Fie Mazares (said he unto himself, and looked upon Mandana whilst Cyrus talked to her) Canst thou that was a cause of that Princess death thou that deceived her, thou that carried her away, thou that left her upon the merciless Waves ready to perish if the Gods had not relieved her, canst thou be so fondly impudent as to hope for any thing but a Pardon for thy crimes? Fie, fie, no, no, thou canst never pretend to any more, thou must love her as thou didst before, because thou canst not chuse but thou must call thy love friendship, lest she should refuse what she did promise.

In the mean while, all the Troops being entred into Cumes, and Cyrus knowing that they were Commanders of all the Ports, Publique place, and the Castle, did appoint the Princess her Coach to enter: This Prince following, accompanied with Mazares, Anaxlaris, all the Voluntiers and the Homotimes. But when the Coach began to go forward, and as Mandana turned her head, Cyrus saluted Martesia, and made certain obliging signs, which intimated that he had an extremely desire to talk with her. After which, Page 152 this little triumph, the beauty of Mandana, and the good deportment of Cyrus being the chief ornaments, was beheld with acclamations of the common People, the like was never heard: The Streets, the Gates, the Windows, and House tops were full of People; The ayr echoed with shouts of joy in praises of Mandana and Cyrus, and with wishes of their felicity. In the mean time, Tifernes foreseeing that Mandana would return to lodg in the Castle, caused the Prince of Cumes corps to be taken away, and carried into the Temple: Also he caused the bodies of all those Souldiers to be carried away, which the valour of Anaxaris had sacrificed unto the liberty of that Princess, and he locked up the valiant Thrasiles in one of the Towers: So that when the Princess came there, not any sad objects were to be seen.

Cyrus understanding by the Herald he sent, what service Tifernes had done him, did make very much of him as he entred into the Castle, in which he was no sooner come, but he presented his hand unto Mandana to help her out of the Coach, and turning vely sweetly towards Anaxaris, he addressed his speeche unto him: It is you; valiant unknown one, said he unto him, that must command in a place which your valour hath conquered, and it is you must tell me whether I must conduct the Princess: Sir (replied Anaxaris, with a strange confusion) it appertains not unto an unknown one to com[m]and any where; but doubtless, the man who hath had the honour to bear the same chains Mandana did, to shew you which was her Prison; therefore Sir, if you please, you may go up those stairs upon your right hand: For my part (said Mandana unto Cy[rus], purposely to oblige Anaxaris) I do not wonder this illustrious unknown one should so well know the way of a Prison, whose doors he knows so well, and so courageously how to open: But it's strange methinks (added she, and looked upon Cyrus with a smile) that my Deliverer should go about to bring me again unto it; and that the Conquerour of all Asia should need a guide, he who knows how to find out Victory wheresoever he will look for it, though it be the most difficult thing in the world to find: You do me wrong Madam, replied he, if you think that victorie was my only aim in all my enter[pr]izes, since I never regarded it, but only as a means to conduct me unto you. Since Mandana's chamber was but just one pair of stairs high, she had not time to answer Cy[rus], for as soon as she was in the Chamber, Cyrus presented the renowned Voluntiers which followed him unto her, amongst the rest Megabates, whom the Princess received with civility equal to his merit. In the mean while, since it grew late, and since prudence prompted Cyrus to take care for the security of the Town, and in it Mandana, especially since the King of Pontus could not be found, he had at that time no long discourse with the Princess, yet he could not possibly leave her, before one quarter of an houres talk in private, and before he had given her new assurances of his fidelity and respectful Passion. You see here Madam, said he unto her, the very same Artamenes who at the first in the Garden of Sinope, did protest that he would love you as long as he lived, and you see him now at Cumes ready to assure you by new Protestations, that he is still, and ever will be the same. You have given me such magnanimous testimonies of your affection, replied Mandana, that it is not necessary to confirm them by words; a thou[sand] glorious actions, and as many important services have sufficiently perswaded me of it: But it is my part, who have nothing but words to give, to make choice of my best eloquence, whereby to assure you Sir, that I am as full of acknowledgments, as any sensible and generous heart is capable of: Oh Madam, replied Cyrus, though all you words be most precious, and though you gave me the most favourable language in the world, yet that's not it which I would have; and I should be much better satisfied with one thought of that heart which you say is more sensible and generous, then ten thousand words of thanks, civility, or acknowledgments: Never trouble your self Madam, I beseech you, to study words, as it seems you design; let the eloquence of your eyes only tell me, you are not sorrie that you raig[n] in my heart: Let me, I say, to my felicity think, that your libertie is not the only cause of joy in your countenance, and that if Cumes had been taken by a[n]y then my self, you would have been less satisfied: Though you do not much value my words replied Mandana and smiled, yet I will tell you, that you have reason to believe that I think my libertie sweeter from your hand, then from any other; and I will add fur[th]er yet, that since I have been the cause of all your sorrowes, I should be unjust, if I did not allow you to think, that the joy which you see in my eyes proceeds from the satisfaction which I have in seeing you again. Oh Madam (said Cyrus) when I said that I did not value your words, I knew not what I said, for I find them so sweet, and so glorious Page 153 unto me, that I am fully recompenced for all the sorrowes I have suffered, so they be not spoken only out of a bare civilitie, such as might perhaps be due unto a Prince whom Fortune imployed for your deliverie: Therefore Madam, if you will be pleased to compleat my happiness, do me the honour to confess unto me, that all these your infinitely obliging expressions, are addressed unto me as your Captive, and not as unto a Prince whom Fortune hath made a Conquerour of others: If I could separate Cyrus from the Conquerour of Asia, replied Mandana and laughed, I would divide my civilities to content you; but since they are inseparable, give me leave without any distinction to speak equally to them; and since I find in one and the same person, a great Prince, a great Conquerour, and my Deliverer, give me leave to render unto him what I think is due: I beseech you Madam (said Cyrus and interrupted her) take from me the two first of these qualities which you attribute unto me, and give me another, which would better suit with me: I have been so long amongst men, to whom I denied all they asked (replied Mandana in a most obliging kind of rallarie) that you need not think it strange, since I cannot so soon lose the habit of denying, if I do not now consent unto all you ask; for I assure you, I am not yet so well perswaded that I am free, but sometimes I fancies that I see the King of Pontus appear. To prevent that Madam, replied Cyrus, it is requisite I leave you, that I may go and give all necessarie orders for it. So Cyrus, after a most profound reverence unto Mandana, went out of her Chamber: Mazares, Anaxaris, and all the rest followed.

These two thought the conference between Cyrus and Mandana so long, that the vir[tue] of Mazares was put unto a difficult trial, and the impatience of Anaxaris was ready to break out; yet they followed Cyrus with faces and hearts full of melancholie unto all places where he went to give orders. In the mean time, though the ruine of a Rival be a thing which everie one would endeavour, yet Cyrus who was once obliged to the King of Pontus when he went under the name of Artamenes, and who maugre his love, looked upon him as Brother to the Princess Araminta, whom he exceedingly honored, he was not so angry as he would have been without these two considerations; First, that he was escaped his revenge; Secondly, that he was not to be found; not that he was resolved if he had found him, to alter his generous way of usage which he ever observed to him when he was his Prisoner, and when he gave him his libertie at Sinope: But yet he was not sorrie, that Fortune did not put him to the necessitie of treating a Rival ill, if he had fallen in his power: And therefore in the Evening he sent a Barque unto the Prince Thra[s]ibulus, and unto Thimochares, to bring their Fleets into the Port of Cumes the next morning, that by this means the King of Pontus might more easily escape if he were hid in the Town, as very likely he was. Moreover, Cyrus lest any stirring should be amongst the People, who are much moved at sad objects, he commanded, that the next night the Prince of Cumes should be buried, without any noise or much ceremonie; yet desir[ing] that his ashes might be put into the Sepulcher of his Fathers, and that all the honor should be done him which the present conjuncture of affairs would permit. After he had given all necessarie orders, both for the safetie of Mandana and of the Town, he returned to the Castle where the Princess was; yet he could not see until after Supper, for he was so Courted by abundance of companie, that he could not get sooner from them: All the several Corporations of the Town came to salute him, and went afterwards unto the Princess Mandana, whether Cyrus sent them. But at last, after he had shaken off all hinderances of satisfaction unto his extream desire, of talking with his dear Princess, he went unto her Chamber, without the company of any but Chrisantes and Feraulas: As for Mazares, his soul was not so firmly settled, as that he durst see the Princess any more that day: And as for Anaxaris, love, jealousy and spite, made him retire unto some place where he might vent his melancholy.

Cyrus then being delivered from all his Rivals, and from all his friends too, who in such occasions are as troublesome as Enemies, went as I told you unto Mandana's Cham[ber]. But meeting Martesia in the outer Chamber, he must needs stay a little with her, unto whom he was so infinitelie obliged, ad[di]ncipally for affirming his fidelitie, when Mandana accused him with so much injustice: If you did not know (said he most civilly unto her) how much I am devoted unto our Princess, and what power she hath over my heart, I should have some cause to fear you would complain against me; for I conf[ess], my sweet Martesia, that I have not yet either looked upon you, or spoke one word unto you, and which is more strange, until I have spent eight daies in t[alk]ing with, and Page 154 looking upon Mandana, I do not think I shall be able to talk with, or look upon any else; yet I do profess Martesia, to esteem you as much as is possible, and that I am extreamlie beholding unto you for taking my part, and have the greatest desire in the world to talk with you, though as I told you before, I cannot do it yet this eight daies.

To lose no time in tedious answers (replied Martesia) I do believe Sir all that you are pleased to tell me, though if I did consider only my self, I ought not to believe you, and though I will not trouble you, yet I hope you will not take it ill if I ask Feraulas con[cerning] all that I desire to know of you: Feraulas (replied Cyrus and laughed) hath so much to speak of himself, that I doubt whether he can tell you any thing concerning me: Since I shall begin the discourse, replied she and blushed, he must needs answer me: No no, replied Cyrus, I will not do the man who hath so well served me so ill an office; therefore Martesia, I will dispen[n]ce with you this day for talking of me unto Feraulas, provided you will talk of me unto my Princess, and still perswade her, that my extream affection deserves to be preferred before any of my Rivals. After this, Cyrus left Martesia, and went into Mandana's Chamber, where he found none with her, but two women whom the Prince of Cumes preferred to wait upon her; she no sooner saw him, but she did rise to salute him, she received him with as much civility as the Conquerour of A[s]ia did merit, and with as much joy as the sight of a faithful and respectful Lover, and li[ber]ator could inspire into her: Since there was none to observe their actions, she allow[ed] her eyes to satisfie her soul in looking upon Cyrus, yet it was with so much modesty, as that Prince was a little afraid in accosting her; for since he never had any absolute permissi[on] from her to speak openly of his Love, and since when he departed from Themiscira unto Thomiris, he obtained no further from Mandana, but that if he did not find out a way to make himself known unto Ciaxares, and to procure his liking, he should then for ever absent himself, he had apprehensions of this still; therefore, to let her see how this obstacle was removed, his design was, after the first civilities were over, to talk of Ciaxares, and to let her know how much he was in that Princes favour, but that labour was saved; for this Princess, who did ever regulate her thoughts according unto the King her Fathers, and who had an extream desire to know upon what terms Cyrus stood with him, she began first to speak of him.

I pray Sir (said she unto him) before you make any relations of what hath happened unto you, tell me whether the King my Father be pleased with you, and whether he receiv[es] all those Lawrels wherewith you have crowned him well from your hand? He is so well satisfied Madam, replied Cyrus, and hath made me such glorious promises, as if you will be pleased to confirm them, I am the happiest amongst men. You may very well conceive Sir (said she and blusht) that since I was ever resolved to obey him, even in things most contrary to my own inclination, and least agreeable unto you, that I shall most willingly obey him in things most suitable unto my desires, and most advantagious unto you: But though I do not question the truth of your words, yet I will promise you nothing, until I know from his own mouth what he hath promised; yet let me assure you, that if he be as full of acknowledgments as I am, you have good cause to be well satisfied. Though your language Madam be most obliging, replied Cyrus, yet I may find some cause of complaint: But since you have ever accustomed me unto extream securitie, I am most submissive unto your pleasure Madam, provided you will give me leave to relate all my sufferings: Since it were high injustice Sir, not to hear of those miseries which my self hath caused during so long a War, I shall be very glad you acquaint me with all the hardsh[ips] you had in Armenia, all the miseries you suffered at the Siege of Babilon, all those you endured at Sardis, and also at Cumes: Oh Madam (said Cyrus) These are not the things I desire to talk of, but it is of the insufferable sorrowes of my soul to leave you when I left Themiscira; of the horrid apprehensions of my heart at my return, when I understood that Philidaspes had carried you away, and that I had saved his life; my ex|cessive grief in taking Babilon and not releasing you my horrid dispair at Sinope, when I thought the flames had reduced you to ashes, my dismal apprehensions in finding only the King of Assiria on the top of the Tower, and in seeing the Galley with which Mal| <...> carried you away, my deadness of heart and soul when I thought you perished, my vexation to find you in the power of a Rival when I heard you were living, my melanchol|ly <...> , when I delivered the Princess Araminta in lieu of the incomparable Man|dana <...> see you on the other side of the River, and I not able to follow Page 155 you, my grief to hear that you were imbarqued at the Port of Cicilie, my sadness of soul to hear that you suspected me of infidelity, my unutterable grief when I took Sardis and could not find you in it, my furie, when I heard my Rival had found out an art to make you invisible, my torment to be always amongst my Rivals, and still separated from you.

These Madam are the sorrows which I desire to talk of, in hopes, that judging of the greatness of my Love by the greatness of my sufferings, you may know me better: It seems we have long been separated, (replied Mandana with a modest sigh) since you have forgot, that though I permitted you to love me, yet I could never endure you should speak to me of your Love. My Love Madam, replied Cyrus, was at that time a hidden mysterie, I durst not then tell any that I loved you; but now, since all the world knows me to be your Adorer, and since Ciaxares himself approves of it, it were not just that you onlie should be ignorant of my love: For trulie Divine Princess, there is not one Souldier in the King your Fathers Armie, who knows not that he hath fought onlie for you: I could never have any joy in all the Victories I have gotten, because in getting them I could not release you; I acquainted all my Rivals with my Passion, Mazares himself would sometimes pitie me, and would you Madam be the onlie one in all the Universe unto whom it should not be spoken? Oh Madam, this would not be just: Speak on then, said she unto him, since there is no remedie: But I pray Sir give me leave also to relate my sorrows: I am afraid Madam, replied he, that they are not much different from mine; for methinks I hear you aggravate your sorrows, for being so often carried away, and expolsed unto so manie voyages, so much pains, and so manie dangers without your making me a sharer in them; and how to my infinite glorie and delight would it have been, if I had been the cause of your greatest sorrows: But alas Madam, I perceive you do not think me worthe of any such obliging expressions, as to tell me I was any cause of them, nor will you permit me so much as to think it: Yet I assure you, replied she, that my fears lest you should perish in some of those dangers into which you exposed your self for the love of me, was one of my greatest sorrows: Your language Madam, replied he, is most obliging, but since your sorrows might perhaps proceed onlie from generositie, they were not of that nature which I desired: For trulie Madam, did you know how to love, you would know that absence from the person loved is a most horrid torment: But since the Gods have made you onlie to be loved, and since they have infused love enough into my heart, to make me endure this modest coldness, which still opposeth my felicitie, I will not murmur to see you no more sensible of my zealous Passion: Yet Madam, to my consolati|on, I would gladlie believe, that your modestie doth hide some of your thoughts from me, and that I do not see all the advantageous resentments of your heart: Being a Prince of so much virtue as you are (replied Mandana and blusht) and knowing me so well as you do, I will free|ly permit you to believe, that I have all the advantageous thoughts of you, all the esteem and tenderness which in any reason I ought to have of a Prince, unto whom the King my Father is a debtor for his life, and meny Victories, and unto whom I owe my libertie and something more. After this Sir, be contented, and ask me no more, for as well accustomed as you are to get Victories, you shall get no more of me. At these words, Cyrus did render a million of thanks unto Mandana, for the Permission which she gave him; and then they began to make short relations unto each other of all their ad|ventures, but it was in a different manner, for Cyrus feared that he could never say enough to set forth the violence of his Passion; and Mandana was so full of tenderness towards Cyrus, that she feared lest she should say too much, yet the conversation was most sweet and pleasing unto Cyrus; for Mandana was not so absolute a Mistress of her looks and words, but that Cyrus saw by the motion of her eyes, that her heart was not insensible; so that sometimes his excess of joy would silence him, and he would gaze upon her without a word; and sometimes again he would break into such raptures of expression, as it was most plain his love was stronger then his reason: I beseech you Madam (said he unto her, when he perceived the disorder of his own spirits) pardon me, if I cannot master my joyes, for I profess they are so great, that the more I consider you, the more reason I find to devote my whole heart unto you: for since I am now so neer the divine Mandana, after so long and sad an absence, after I believed her lost, and bewailed her death, this is so high a joy, as is absolutel|y unutterable, when I call to mind the miserable condition I was in when I love|d you at Sinope, and compare it unto my present happiness: Oh heavens, what an ad|vantagious difference do I find? For I was then unknown unto you, I durst not then tell Page 156 what I was for fear of being hated, though I knew I could never be loved unless I were known; I had a great King to my Rival, and another Rival in the head of a puissant Ar|mie, and I saw everie thing against me: But now Madam, I find the King your Father for me, I see the King of Pontus without a Kingdome, or any receptacle, I have the Prince Mazares my friend in lieu of Rival, and I see the King of Assiria a Prisoner unto Ar|samones, judg therefore I beseech you Madam, whether the extravagancie of my joyes be not excuseable: Since I am yet far from Ecbatan, replied she, I must confess, I can|not resent the happiness which I enjoy, out of fear it should be molested by some accident which I cannot foresee; yet since it is vanitie, to make imaginarie miseries, I will hope that our happiness will be durable, and that Fortune will be as constant in smiling upon us, as she hath been in her frowns against us. After this, Mandana hinting unto Cyrus that it was late, this Prince retired, and went out of her Chamber, with spirits so full of pas|sion, as he neither saw Martesia, nor Chrisantes, nor Feraulas, who never stirred out of the outer Chamber, and was not able to take his mind of that divine Princess whom he loved; he came unto his own Chamber, and there undressed himself, whilst his fancie was still fixed upon the same object; and sleep, as powerful as it is, could not deface the Idea of Mandana in his imagination.

Now did he begin to accuse himself for making such a bad interpretation upon the Si|bels answer, and upon the King of Assiria's Oracle, and he began to hope, that the Ora|cle rendred unto the Princess of Salamis would be as happily accomplished for him, as for her, His soul was now so sole|ly devoted unto joy, as he never regarded the combat which he was to have with the King of Assiria as a thing of any doubtful event, nor ever troubled himself to consider how sor|rie Mandana would be if she knew it; on the contrarie, he contemplated upon nothing but the beautie-supere|xcencies, and charms of his Princess, and he lul|d himself so in the fancie of Mandana, that he saw her in his sleep as well as when he was awake; he imagined that he saw himself presenting her unto Ciaxares, and saw Ciaxares give her again unto him in recompence of all his travels and pains. Man|dana on the other side entertained her self with her dear Martesia, confessing ingenuously unto her, that she never in all her life saw Cyrus so amiable as now, and that she could not chuse but think her self extream|ly happie in her reigning in the heart of the greatest Prince in the world.

But whilst these two illustrious persons did delight their souls in the innocent pleasures of seeing each other, Mazares, Anaxaris, and the King of Pontus were all full of diffe|rent resentments; a civil War, whose victorie was doubtful, did flame in the heart of the first of these; for sometimes his virtue was weaker then his love, and sometimes his virtue got the upper hand: But for the second, his love of Mandana was so violent, that he had not the least thought of opposing it, though he could not imagine ever to find out any way of satisfaction: So that abandoning himself both to his love and his dispair, he was in a most miserable condition: But as for the third, his miserie did transcend them both; for the truth is, the King of Pontus was in such a deplorable condition, as he would have moved Mandana and all his Rivals to pitie him, if they had but seen him. Since the man who did hide him was not acquainted with the virtue of Cyrus, he imagined, that if this Prince did know how he concealed the Ravisher of Mandana from his revenge, he would sever|ly punish him; so that for more suretie, he put this unfortunate King into a little Cabin in a corner of the Garden, where the Gardiner lodged. This bad lodging yet was not at all resented by this unhappie Prince, though he was much wounded, and could hard|ly be dressed: But when he considered that Mandana would treat Cyrus as her Deliverer, that he had for ever lost her, that she would eternally hate him, that he was miserable in the same Town where his Rival was happy, that he knew not how to get out, and that <...> he should fall into his power, his resentments of these were unexpressible: The <...> also he had an addition of double sorrows, for Mandana having a desire to ren| <...> to the Gods as well as Cyrus, this Prince would needs have her go unto the T| <...> so magnificent ceremonie, to the end the People might better see her: <...> not go unto the Temple of Neptune, so much celebrated in Cum| <...> , <...> tie pass under the Walls of this Garden, and under the Wind o| <...> the King of Pontus was, this magnificent Pomp did pass that wa| <...> . So <...> te Prince hearing the noyse which the Troops made, as they passed be| <...> , he asked that Souldier which followed him what noyse it was; and he <...> , that it was the Princess Mandana going unto the Temple of Neptune to tender Page 157 thanks unto the Gods, he was so transported with Love, that he would see her once more before he died; and therefore did rise out of his homely bed to look out of this little Win|dow, which was made only of a few Reads, and where indeed he beheld all that passed: But when he saw Mandana in a Triumphant Chariot with such joy in her looks, as aug|mented her beautie, he was sensible of more sorrow then ever was man before; that which grated him unto the verie heart of his soul, was to see Cyrus on horseback next Mandana's Chariot, and to see him in a Garb so high, and Port so majesticall, as in spite of his sorrows and jealousy, he could not chuse but think him worthe of this Princess; and to sum up the total of his miserie, he saw more joy in the face of Cyrus then in the face of Mandana, conjecturing from thence, and truly, that he had been very favourably relceived, and in an instant did imagine a thousand favours done unto Cyrus, more then he himself could have wished to himself. This thought so disordered his soul, that love, jeal|lousie, rage and dispair depriving him of reason, he violent|ly broke down the little Win|dow which did hide him from sight; but as good luck to him was, he was so weak, that as he pulled the Window away, he fell backward upon his bed; so that his wound opening and beginning to bleed afresh, he was not able to rise again, yet he endeavoured, though the Souldier did verie respectfully hinder him, knowing that if he now looked out of the Window, he would certainly be known. In the mean while, his sorrows caused by such a violent agitation of spirits, did cast him into a sound for above a quarter of an houre, and when he returned out of it, his dispair was no better then madness. Thus the renowned Cy|rus had four Rivals nothing so happy as himself; but though the state of their fortunes was very different, yet had they a conformitie in their sorrows.

The King of Assiria a Prisoner, and forced to ask succour from his Rival, he thought himself the most miserable Prince alive; The King of Poutus vanquished, wounded, and lurking in a poor Cabin, thought never any so unfortunate as himself; The Prince Ma|zares, who would needs have his virtue triumph over his Passion, and who yet saw him|self every minute ready to be overcome by his Love, he was perswaded that none could suffer more then himself: And Anaxaris, in love without one spark of hope, and yet re|solved to love Mandana till he died, come what could, considering the state of his soul, and the state of his fortune, he could not conceive it possible any should be so miserable as himself. Thus whilst Cyrus and Mandana were rendering thanks unto the Gods for their happy conditions, the King of Pontus, Mazares, and Anaxaris, had much ado to forbear murmuring against the Gods, for exposing them unto such disastrous and fatal destinies; yet the misfortunes of these three Rivals did not hinder the universal joy that was in both Town and Camp: But to be short, at their return from the Temple, Cyrus after he had taken orders from Mandana, sent unto Pactias and Licambes to acquaint them with the state of things, and to induce them to lay down arms: He sent also to the Xanthians, and Caunians, to confirm the offers which they made: He sent dispatches also unto Ciaxares and Cambises: The Princess writing unto the King her Father to thank him for his cares in procuring her libertie, and unto the Queen of Persia also, to testifie her obligations unto the Prince her Son. After this, was to be seen (according to the orders which Cyrus sent over night) the two Fleets of Thrasibulus and Timochares, enter into the Port of Cumes, and as they passed in sight of Mandana's Chamber, where Cyrus then was, the Flags of all the Fleets vail|ed Bonnet, in honour of that Princess. As soon as Thrasibulus, Timocha|res, Philocles and Leontidas came ashore, they came also to salute Mandana, unto whom Cyrus presented them: You see here Madam (said he and spoke of Thrasibulus) a Prince who was my Conquerour, and whose valour did exceedingly help me to finish the Arme|nian War: In telling me (replied Mandana) that the Prince Thrasibulus hath conquer|ed the Conqueror of others, you oblige me to esteem him infinitel|y: The victorie I got Madam (replied Thrasibulus) did cost me so dear; and the defeat of the illustrious Arta|menes was so glorious unto him, that if I might have chosen, I had rather have been the conquered then the Conqueror.

As Cyrus was ready to reply, and with modesty to him, the King of Hircania, the Prince Artamas, Gadates, Gobrias, Persodes; and many others of Noble Quality, came into Mandana's Chamber, who entertained them with as much sweetness as Majesty. Croesus and Myrsiles came a little after; the first of these asking pardon for protecting the King of Pontus, beseeching her not to be less generous than Ciaxares and Cyrus had been: To testify unto you (said she unto him) that I will not yield unto them in that virtue, I assure you, I am much joyed at the alliance which you have made, with such a renowned Prince Page 158 as the Prince Artamas, who hearing what Mandana said of him, returned a most ingenious and civil answer.

But since such kind of visits as these, never use to be long, this crowd of renowned persons did soon disperse themselves: Cyrus also was obliged to go out of her Chamber into his own, to receive two Deputies from Susiana, which Orsanus sent unto him: So that Mandana in this interval talked with Chrisantes and Feraulas, unto whom she had not yet spoken; therefore she went into her Closet, whether Martesia brought them. Now was the glory of Cyrus aggravated with much zeal, by these two faithful servants unto their Master, and she did much better understand from them than from him, how much she was obliged unto him. In the mean while, Cyrus being come to his Chamber, whether Mazares and Hermogenes also resorted to hear some news of Belesis, he received the Deputies which Orsanus sent. He understood from them, that all the Grantees in the Kingdom of Susiana no sooner saw the Testament of Abradates, who gave him his Crown; but all were joyfully disposed to become his Subjects, and acknowledged him for their King: That the people did submit unto it with abundance of satisfaction, that Belesis had done him very good service in this business, that Adusia's according to his order stayed at Susa, to command in that Kingdom, until he himself could honour that state with his presence; that all things were there very quiet, that both Grantees and People had taken oaths of fidelity to him, and that he was absolutely King of Susiana. These men having ended their speech, Cyrus did treat them as men who brought him a Crown, and began to transact with them, as with good and faithful Subjects. Then appointing them to be lodged in the Town, he dismissed them, keeping Orsanus with him, purposely to tell him some news of Belesis, whom he infinitely esteemed, knowing that he did ever confirm Mazares in those resolutions of virtue, which he had planted in his soul, seeing then there was none but Mazares and Hermogenes near him: Well Orsanus (said he unto him) hath the voyage of Belesis been as happy for himself, as it hath been for me? Will Cleodora acknowledge him for her Slave with as good a will as the People of Susa are to acknowledge me for their King? Sir (replied Orsanus) it is not so: Why (said Mazares and interrupted him) had Cleodora accomplished her last vows which the women consecrated unto Ceres use, when Belesis came unto Susa? No Sir, (replied Orsanus) we came thither some daies before she was to perform them: I pray, said Cyrus, relate unto us the business.

Hermogenes understanding by the discourse of Orsanus, that Belesis did not thrive in his affection to Cleodora, his curiosity augmented, and his sorrows diminished, for his belief was that Belesis was gone to take possession of her; so that he lent a most attentive ear unto what Orsanus said: Since you are pleased to command me Sir, (said Orsanus unto Cyrus) to acquaint you with the adventure of Belesis, be pleased to know Sir, that when he came to Susa, he presently enquired whether Cleodora had power to come out of the Temple unto which she was retired, and whether it was believed she would remain there? He understood that the last ceremony which was to bind her for ever, was not to be performed of a month after; that the general opinion was, she would remain there, because she might live a retired life there, every one telling her, that she was none of those, who in lieu of seeking out a solitude amongst the veiled Virgins, and preserving their innocence, would trouble the first, and lose the second; and so dishonour them in lieu of adding glory.

Yet Belesis was not very much grieved at the thought that Cleodora would remain in the Temple, because he hoped she might change her mind; so that not to omit any title of his duty in matter of love, he writ unto Cleodora, and gave his Letter unto Alcenor to carry, soliciting her also by many friends for leave to see and speak with her. But whilst Alcenor and the Ladies his friends were negotiating for him, he took order for all things which related unto your services; and in the mean while he understood that Cleodora refused his Letter; that she would not see him, that she obtained leave to shorten the time of the last ceremony, and that it was to be accomplished the next day: You may judge Sir, what sad news this was unto Belesis, who no sooner heard it, but he went unto the Temple of Ceres, and so tampered with her who had power to command Cleodora, that she commanded her to see and speak with Belesis, an hour before she was to engage all the rest of her life. Belesis then saw her, and spoke to her, but never saw her so fair and lovely as then, nor never more inexorable unto his prayers; and to render him the more unhappy, she confessed unto him, that she was induced unto this course which she was going to take, only because she was so weak, as not to hate him if she would; and indeed Page 159 she spoke this unto him in such a manner, as it was easy to see, she did not hate him still, and that what she did, was rather out of a punctilio of honour, which moved her never to pardon Belesis, then out of any hatred she had unto him. I shall not need to tell you Sir what this unfortunate Lover said unto Cleodora: For since you know the nature of Belesis was to be zealous and passionate, and knowing what his mind and affection was, you may easily imagine that he used all the most moving expressions that was possible, and all to no purpose, for this fair one was unalterable, maugre all the sorrow she saw in his face, and very well it may be said, that the sorrows of Belesis did make her joyful, for the more earnest he was in praying her, the more easily did she deny him. To be short Sir, this fair one retired, and maugre all the importunate desires of Belesis the ceremony was accomplished, and Belesis lost Cleodora for ever; for since that she would not see any, no not her dearest friends: So that Cleodora who was wont to be the only lover of news, did not now know whether Asia was in War or in peace; and this excellent woman did very sufficiently make it appear, that she could be Mistress of her self when she pleased. In the mean time, the despair of Belesis did so appear in his face, and in all his actions, as every one feared he would steal away from Alcenor as soon as he could, and return unto his Desert, and so deprive Susa of the most accomplished man in it.

Whilst Orsanus was speaking thus, Cyrus and Mazares did interest themselves in the sorrows of Belesis: But as for Hermogenes, all the affection he bore him as his friend, could not keep him from rejoicing, that he was never like to enjoy Cleodora; yet he did what he could to hide a thought which had more love than generosity in it; and he might the more easily hide it, because Cyrus, who was not able to live without Mandana, did in all haste give orders that the Works should be thrown down, that the Forts should be demolished, and that the Army should still keep in a posture ready to receive an Enemy, not daring to think of carrying Mandana out of Cumes, until he heard the Enemies Army was dispersed, because he would not hazard a person who was so infinitely dear unto him. After then he had given all the prudential orders requisite, he returned to the Princess Mandana, where all the Ladies of Quality in that Town were come to make their first visit. Since the Princess spoke the Greek Tongue very fluently, and the Language of Cumes differed from it only in pronuntiation; it was as easy for her to charm so many Beauties by the sweetness of her conversation, as to charm their eyes by her Beauty; and since she knew that commendations are very well received by all the world, especially when they proceed from a person of much merit, Mandana did extremely commend every Lady in whom she could find any good ground for it; She also did double her applauses when Cyrus came in; for beginning to speak as soon as he was set down, Though I know very well (said she unto him) that Artaxates, Babilon, and Sardis, are for greater Towns than Cumes; yet I assure you, the conquest of this was more glorious than of them, since I do not think you ever took any Town wherein there are so many Beauties as in this: There are so many reasons Madam, replied Cyrus, Why you should know a Beauty better than any else, that though my eyes did not tell me you had reason for what you said, yet I should believe you: However, (added he, and turned towards those Ladies whom Mandana commended) you may well value at a high rate, the commendations of a Princess, who is used every day to see the fairest person in the world: Mandana blushed at the discourse of Cyrus, but could not answer it; for one of the Ladies, whose name was Atalia, began to speak: If the commendations of the Princess (said she) were addressed unto me, or that I had any reason to apply them unto my self, doubtless I should think my self the most glorious woman in the world, for being commended by one, who every day in her mirror sees enough to make her scorn the greatest Beauties upon Earth. You know very well, amiable Atalia, (replied Mandana) what share you ought to take unto your self of those commendations which I give unto the Ladies of Cumes in general; and I know also what share I ought to take in those you give unto me; however, without putting you to the blush by any particular applauses, I pray agree with me, that there are few places in the world where are to be found so many beauties as here; and certainly, Mandana had good reason for what she said, since there were in Cumes at that time a most prodigious number of Beauties. Amongst all those who were then with Mandana, there were four of the best quality in all the Town, and highest beauty: Atalia was tall, and of a handsome Mine, she had brown hair, eyes gray and sweet, her complexion whitish and lively, seeming alwayes very serious: The second, whose name Page 160 was Cleocrite, was fair and lively, yet her eyes black and sparkling with a sprightly fire: her looks though sweet, yet nothing of passionate, but it was easy to see she loved to look upon her self in a glass, and loved her self better than all the world besides. Cleocrite was of a good stature, she had most handsome teeth, and fresh roses upon her lips: her nose was of an exact proportion, and all the features of her face pleasing: she had an aspect of joy and tranquility in her Physiognomy, which was a great addition to her beauty: so that without any flattery I can assure you, Cleocrite was a high beauty, and had been infinitely amiable had she known how to have loved any.

The third whose name was Lysidice, was of a low stature, but a high beauty, and infinitely charming: her neck was white, her arms and hands the same: her eyes fair, her complexion rare, and her mouth admirable: She had a kind of austerity and pride in the corner of her eye, and in the corner of her mouth, which though it was very sweet, and did much contribute unto her beauty, which though it expressed some inequality in her humour, yet did exceedingly become her. The fourth who was called Philoxene, and was a widow, was of a stature something above the common height but very handsome, her hair, was chesnut colour: the model of her face was something on all, her complexion whitish and smoother nose was something Aqueline, but well proportioned, her eyes full, black, sweet and smiling; her Physiognomy was noble and pleasing, which did as well speak the sweetness and equality of her humour, as the tenderness and generosity of her soul; and which did invite abundance of esteem, and forced a disposition to love her: These four persons being such as I have described, and being mingled amongst many others who had beauty enough, it was not without good cause that Mandana commended them: Not long after she had as good cause to commend the sweetness of their minds as well as the charms of their faces: for they all made it appear, that if Cyrus had been able to have endured that any should have shared with him in the society of his Princess, he had not stifled his desires as he did of talking with her in private, yet he did so hide it, as none of the Ladies could perceive him: and Mandana only could know that as amiable as these Ladies were, yet he desired that they were absent from her, yet it was a long while before he could be in private with her; for besides those Ladies that were already with Mandana, there came another under the conduct of Araxaris, who though she was well in years, yet was a Lady of a very handsome carriage, and seemed to be a woman of quality. Araxaris in presenting her unto Mandana, told her name to be Niside, and said her quality to be the most considerable in all Cumes. After which, this Lady beginning to speak, Since I know Madam, said she unto the Princess Mandana, what power you have with the illustrious Cyrus, I conceived it my best course to address my self unto you, for the obtaining of my Sons liberty, who is now his prisoner, who as the Fate of Arms would have it, did take prisoner the Generous Anaxaris who presents me unto you. I should not have been so bold Madam, as to ask liberty for a man who took him prisoner that did so courageously fight for yours, if the same Anaxaris had not made me a most generous promise to join his prayers with mine to obtain of you, that the same men who once took him captive, but at present is his, may enjoy the general act of grace with the invincible Cyrus, at your desires Madam did grant unto the meanest inhabitants of Cumes.

For my part (added Anaxaris) I assure you Madam, (said he unto the Princess Mandana) that you will extremely oblige me if you would grant my Conqueror his liberty: and I am the more obliged to serve him, because if I had not fallen unto his power, I should not have had the glory to have done that little service for you Madam, which I did: so that Madam, to recompence me fully, It beseech you, let Thrasyles be at liberty: and I am confident, that he is a man of so much merit, as if you had known him, he had been at liberty ere now. Certainly it is not at all necessary to make any addresses unto me, (replied Mandana, and spoke unto Niside and Anaxaris) to obtain a favour from the illustrious Cyrus, which he doth so usually grant: And less necessary Madam (said Cyrus, and interrupted her) to use my name in a business which depends absolutely upon your self: However, replied that Princess, I will intreat you to set Thrasyles at liberty upon my request. Thrasyles, replied Cyrus, is more a prisoner unto Anaxaris than unto me, but I believe he will confess with me, that you have power to set at liberty whom you please: therefore Madam you need only to command, and be obeyed. What are you say (replied Mandana) I intend that Niside shall be no more a debtor unto you for the liberty of Thrasyles, then unto me. To end this generous contest, replied this Lady, my Son and I will both be equally deb(tors Page_161 unto you both, and will both of us make our acknowledgments as if we were obliged unto one and the same person. I beseech you Madam (said Anaxaris unto Mandana) Command then that Thrasydes be set at liberty? Since it is the pleasure of the Illustrious Cyrus, and since you have a peculiar right to consent unto it (replied he) you will do me a pleasure to go and set upon his prison, and to let the first use of his liberty be employed in making me acquainted with a man who is so valiant as to make you his prisoner. Most certainly he is a very brave man (replied Cyrus not suspecting that Anaxar's was his Rival) who is the Vanquisher of Anaxaris. Anaxaris who in his heart resented more disorder than he was well able to master when he heard himself commended both by his Rival, and by Mandana, did seem as if he heard them not: but did say something unto Niside, who being very glad of her Sons liberty, took that pretence to go our, and set open her sons prison, and acquaint him how much he was a debtor unto this Princess. For Madam (said Niside to her) I know Thrasydes hath so strong an inclination to acknowledg a benefit, that he would exceedingly complain against me, if I should not acquaint him with his obligations to you, before he hath the honour to see you. After this Niside retired, and went with Anaxaris unto the Tower where Thrasydes was: As soon as she was gone, there was not one of those Ladies who desired not to be gone also, having no mind to be in that place, when Thrasydes entered: But the Princess Mandana not thinking they had any interest in the Prisoner, addressing her discourse unto them, she did engage them to stay. Since valour is ever accompanied with all necessary qualities to make a compleat man, said Mandana unto Lysidice, I would gladly know whether Thrasydes have as much wit as courage. Since those who can judg of wit in others (replied Lysidice) had need to have much themselves, doubtless I am not fit to be a competent Judge in such a matter. The fair Cleocrite who hath it in a superlative degree, and who besides that, hath all the indifference desirable in an impartial Judge, is better able to tell you than I am. This indifference you speak of (replied Cleocrite, and smiled) and which you think so good a quality in an impartial Judge, may cause me to do a piece of injustice: for I do not sufficiently know him, and therefore if the Princess would have an exact account of Thrasydes, she much have it from Atalia, or from Philoxene: for the one is his ancient friend, and the other is his newest acquaintance: According to your own words, replied Atalia. It is so long since I knew Thrasydes, that I have almost forgot him: And for my particular added Philoxene, I do so little know him in comparison of you, that I may well say I do not know him at all. For my part (said Cyrus, and smiled, (addressing himself unto Mandana) by seeing so many beauties so sweetly deny being Judges of Thrasydes wit, I do believe him to have very much: and I am apt to believe that these Ladies do think more then they speak. The discourse of Cyrus did put Atalia, Lysidice, and Philoxene to the blush: but as for the indifferent Cleocrite, she never changed colour for it, yet those three Ladies blushed more, for as soon as Cyrus had spoken that which made them blush, Anaxaris returned and Thrasydes followed, who entered with so good a grace, and seemed to be a man of so good behaviour, and of such a noble and gallant Air, that as soon as Cyrus and Mandana saw him, they had a good disposition to believe that those Ladies who had no mind to commend him, did esteem him much more then they would speak of. In the mean time, Thrasydes spoke so well, so reverently, and so pathetically both unto Mandana, and unto Cyrus, that they esteemed him as much for his wit as his courage. It is most generous and nobly done Madam, (said he to the Princess Mandana) to give liberty unto a man who endeavoured all he could to hinder yours. Though his zeal unto the Prince of Cumes, and unto his Country, was his only motive to fight against you. Since you have done nothing but what honour did oblige you unto, replied Mandana, I do not think any thing you have done against me ought to keep me from my dictates of Generosity: and doubtless it is upon the same reason that the Illustrious Cyrus doth so easily and with so good a will grant me your liberty. Since I know Madam (replied Thrasydes) Lysidice would have me wholly obliged unto you, I dare not in your presence express my gratitude unto him, though it be infinite. No no, replied Cyrus, you ought not to give me that which I ought to have no share in. In all places where the Princess Mandana is present, she is the Authoress of all good, and she deserves the disposing of all favours, and therefore unto her from whom you received a benefit is your gratitude due. Whilst Mandana, Cyrus, and Thrasydes were talking, Atalia, Lysidice, and Cleocrite, and Philoxene looked on, and looked often upon Thrasydes, who for his part, was not attentive to what he said, or to what he heard, as he was to observe Philoxene, and to observe whether Atalia, Cleocrite, Page_162 and Lysidice observed him. But Anaxaris perceived it not, for he was so wholly taken up with the sight of Mandana and Cyrus, as he thought upon nothing but his own passion, and never minded others.

But the most observable passage of this day was, that this company who was then with Mandana, and stayed very long, was composed of persons who had no mind to be there; for Philoxene wished she had not been there, Lysidice was extremely perplexed at her being there, Atalia was vexed at her presence, and Cleocrite as neutral and indifferent as she was, had rather have been any where else: As for Thrasydes, he was much non-plust at his being amongst four Ladies, with whom he had held various correspondencies; and as for Anaxaris, though the sight of Mandana was the essential part of his life, yet he cared not for being there, since he could not be rid of his Rival, so that except Cyrus, all in the Chamber desired to be out: 'Tis true, this Prince was as restless as the rest, for though he had no mind to be from Mandana, yet he wished with all his heart that none else were with her, yet they stayed a long while: But at last Atalia, Cleocrite, Philoxene, and Lysidice being gone, Mandana asked Thrasydes, whether these Ladies were his friends, and whether he much esteemed them? But ask what she would, he was as much reserved in his speeches of them, as they were to talk of him, yet he commended them more then they commended him, but yet it was after such a manner, as was apparent that he was zealous in the commendations of none but Philoxene. After some other indifferent discourse, the rest of the company parted also. But just as Cyrus was ready to fall in talk with Mandana, Anaxaris brought in an Inhabitant of Cumes, who had a Letter unto the Princess from the King of Pontus. Mandana no sooner looked upon it, but she knew it to be his hand; so that giving it unto Cyrus to read: Will you spare me the pains (said she unto him) of reading this Letter, which I believe will but anger me: I will obey your commands Madam in all things, replied he) though it be no pleasing office to read a Letter from a Rival; lest in lieu of anger, it should invite you unto pity; after which, Cyrus opened the Letter, and found these words.

The most unfortunate of all men living unto the Princess MANDANA.

MADAM,

Since revenge is the sweetest thing in the world, I thought it my duty to let you know, that though I can give you no other satisfaction in my life, yet I can acquaint you, that never any was so fullie revenged as you are; for truly Madam I suffer more then ever any did; I suffer without any hope; and which is the greatest of my misfortunes, I suffer without your pitie: And I resolved to let you know my sorrows, that I might thereby force you to pitie an Enemy, who now hath no power to hurt you: Imagine Madam, what sadness of soul it is, after I have lost two Kingdomes, after I have ruined Croessus and the Prince of Cumes; after I have so long loved you without any hope but to hinder my Rival from being happy, what horrible I say it is to see him the most happy and most glorious of all men, and to lose my verie hopes of ever seeing you again, I am gone away Madam the most unfortunate Prince that ever was in the world, the most desperate Lover that ever was or ever will be, and the most miserable man that ever lived: Since I am almost alone to seek my death in the same element, in which I had the happiness to save your life, and since in all probabilities my end will have no witnesses, I had a desire to let you know, that mangre your insensibility towards me, and in spite of all those miseries into which my passion hath precipitated me, I shall still die your adorer, and can never repent of my adoring you, though that be the onlie cause of all my misfortunes. This Madam is the Passion which you have scorned, and these shall be my thoughts of you, when the excess of my sorrows shall end my life; believe therefore I conjure you, that you, you onlie shall be my last thought; and that when I expire, my last gasp will be a gasp of love, and happy enough shall I think my self, if after my death you shall onlie say, I was wortie of a more favourable Fate.

When Cyrus had read this Letter, he looked upon Mandana and said, Doubtless I have good reason to fear Madam, that the King of Pontus his Letter will move your heart more unto pity then anger, for though he be my Rival, yet I profess I cannot read it without compassion: Since pity is natural unto persons of Heroique generosity, replied the Princess, I wonder not your soul should be sensible of it: But since I will not pity a Page_163 Prince who had none of me, I will take all occasions of it from my self; therefore (said she, taking the Letter and tearing it in pieces) I will not read it, lest it should incline me to pity, as it doth you: I know not Madam (said Cyrus then and smiled) whether your fears of being pitiful should cause some sparks of jealousy in a Lover, whose temper is to be jealous: Nor do I know (said she and smiled also) whether your compassion of him would not move any other then my self to accuse you of want of affection: Oh Madam, replied Cyrus, that accusation would have a very bad foundation; It may be as well grounded as the other, replied she: Then I had rather confess unto you Madam, replied Cyrus, that they are both of them built upon a bad foundation, then to dispute it with you.

After this, these two illustrious persons did both of them agree, that this unfortunate Prince deserved pitie; they also understood the same day, in what place he had been hid; and as soon as the Port of Cumes was open, he got out in the night as weak and wounded as he was, in a Fishers Boat, without any with him but the man who rowed the Boat, who was the same Souldier, who went out of the Castle with this unfortunate Prince: So that this news did cause both Mandana and Cyrus, much more to pity a King who had saved both their lives, for it was he who advertised Artamenes of the conspiracie amongst the forty Cavaliers who should have killed him; and it was he also who saved Mandana from drowning, after she had suffered Shipwrack; therefore since they could do no less for him who had saved their lives, they pitied him in his miserie, though he himself was the only cause of it. The next morning they understood that Pactias and Lycambes had layed down their Arms; but Pactias having no mind to come into an Army where Croessus was; whom he had betrayed, he imbarqued for Mytilene, and that meeting by chance with Harpagus, who durst not look Cyrus in the face, after his being the loss of that Armie which he commanded, they both contracted friendship, and chose the same place for their exile. So that Cyrus seeing no Enemy to fight with, and that the field was clear, his thoughts were all how to get Mandana out of Cumes, and to advance towards Medea, though he had promised the King of Assiria not to marrie that Princess until he had fought with him, and though Cixares had in a manner consented unto it, and though he was fully resolved to keep promise with him, yet he knew not how to acquaint Mandana with the ill news of it; yet he conceived it a kind of blemish unto his honour to go unto Ecabtan before he had fought with that Prince, since he knew he would not go thither; but the way being long between Cumes and that Town, and since the Princess could not go fast, he hoped that before he got thither the King of Assiria would be released, either by ransom, or by force. So that still entertaining his first raptures of joy, he rejected all angry thoughts whatsoever, and commanded Chrisantes and Feraulas not to mention a word unto Mandana of his intended combat with the King of Assiria. Thus minding onlly how that Princess should arrive triumphantlie into Ecabtan, he gave all requisite orders for the regulating her house, and that her equipage should be magnificent. Now was the time, when the Souldiers which Anaxaris had suborned, and which made him Master of the Castle, did demand in recompence which they had done, to have the glory of being a Guard unto that Princess, which was granted unto them: But the greatest wonder unto Cyrus, was to see Anaxaris, who had refused very considerable employments in the Armie, should only desire to be Captain of the Guards unto the Princess; until now, Cyrus thought Anaxaris to be of some very extraordinary high Quality; but seeing now, how he confined his ambition unto so low a sphere, he thought he refused all higher employments out of his modesty, and desired only such employment as was suitable unto his birth: So that consenting unto it with all joy, Anaxaris became Captain of the Guard unto that Princess whom he loved, and was in that office with the approbation both of his Rival and his Mistress, who being ignorant of the passion in his soul, expressed a thousand testimonies of amity unto him. But whilst all things were in preparation for Mandana's departure, all the Ladies in Cumes resorted unto her, and did strive how to divert her; amongst the rest, Cleocrite, Atalia, Philoxene, and Lysidice were very assiduous. Thrasydes also was often with her, where also all the men of any Quality and wit about Cyrus were present. As for that Prince, this press of company was often troublesome unto him, and the better to colour his vexation, he was often constrained to go out of her Chamber, and to comfort himself, would go into Martesia's, and talk with her of Mandana: But as he was one day with her, and making her repeat many passages which he knew before, one came to tell him the Princess would speak with him: Cleocrite, Page_164 Lysidice, Atalia, and another Lady called Lyriana and Thrasydes were with her. As soon as he came into the Princess Chamber, I beseech you Sir, said she unto him, do not employ your self only in being the Arbitrator of Asia, in ordering the interests of Kings and Princes, and in taking and giving of Crowns and Scepters, but I beseech you be a Judge in a difference wherein ambition hath no share, and in which I do confess I dare not take upon me so much boldness, as to give a definitive sentence: I do not think my self more knowing in any thing then you are Madam, replied Cyrus, and I hope you do not think me so presumptuous, as to imagine my light of reason or knowledge to be above yours. Since I must suit my words according unto your modestie, replied she, I must tell you there are many things which very handsomness requires that you should know better then I do; for example, in all the terms and phrases in the Art of War, were it handsom in me to express them so well as you? or were it not a shame for you to speak of such things so simply as my self? Truly in some things one of my Sex ought not to express so much perhaps as she doth know, for a kind of voluntary ignorance doth well become us: You know (pursued she, and would not give Cyrus time to interrupt her) that Cleocrite, Alitalia, and Lysidice, who would not speak any thing concerning Thrasiles, when Anaxaris asked his libertie, do now all speak unto me of him, and after they had told me a thousand of his good qualities, do describe him to be the most unconstant man alive. But as they were speaking to me of these things, Thrasiles entered, and peremptorily maintained, that he was as faithful as any man living, but the thing which most puzzles me is, he confesseth withal, that he hath successively one after another loved Atalia, Cleocrite, Lysidice, and some others, and that at this time he is in love with Philoxene; How Thrasiles (said Cyrus) so many several loves, and yet faithful? Is it possible you can maintain, that you do not merit the name of unconstant? Sir, replied Thrasiles, To know rightly what I am, it is requisite you knew my life, to know perfectly all those whom I have loved, and that you take so much pains as narrowly to examine what constancie and what inconstancie is? for I am fully perswaded; that one may love many, and not be at all perfidious, nor deserve the name of inconstant: For truly Sir, I conceive, that though the King of Assiria and the King of Pontus should now quit that passion which hath so tormented them, yet they could not be charged with inconstancy, but rather on the contrary, deserve to be commended for overcoming themselves, since all reason in the world requires it; therefore it must be granted, that in some cases one may cease to love, without any brand of infidelity, and begin to love in another place; without deserving the title of inconstant; and I think that in some cases, I may very well say, it is rather obstinacie then constancy in those who continue loving where they are certain never to be loved: So that in my opinion such men in lieu of a virtue, have a vice, which they thought not of: If it be a vice (replied Cleocrite and laughed) I assure you, that you can never be suspected of it, nor be accused for being too obstinate in your love: No (added Lysidice, but in exchange he may well be charged with inconstancy. The word obstinate doth so little suit with an inconstant man, said Atalia, that I cannot consent it should ever be applied unto Thrasiles, who considering the number of his several Loves, is the most unconstant man living: For my part (said Lyriana, who had not spoke yet) I must confess, that I cannot absolutely condemn him, and I think that without manifest injustice, he cannot be charged in reason with inconstancie, though he have loved many persons: It is very generously done (replied Cylrus) to undertake the defence of Thrasiles, who is assaulted by three such terrible Enemies: Lyriana (replied Thrasiles) doth so perfectly know my reason, why I cease from loving, that she cannot accuse me as these do, who accuse me because they do not know themselves. Moreover Sir, since there are some reasons which may induce one to cease loving without any charge of inconstancy, I hope generosity will move you to presuppose that I have some such reasons which induce me unto it, and not to look upon me as a perfidious man; For indeed Sir, I am of this belief, that that which may rightly be termed inconstancy, is a certain disgust, and a kind of weariness in spirits, which causeth the very same things that once pleased, not to please any longer, though they be the very same things they were before, and which takes novelty to be an inevitable charm: So that by this means the love of an inconstant person doth slack, and cool, and die, without any cause but what is in it self: So that because there is in the heart of such a one a kind of natural levity, he cannot love the same person any longer, be she never so accomplished, or be he never so well treated; but for my part. I can assure you without any dissimulation, that if the first person I loved had been found to be such a one as I fancied her to be. Page 165 should never have loved those who upbraid me with inconstancie. It seems (said Cleocrite then) that Thrasiles hath found some horrid faults in all the persons he hath loved: For my part, said Lyside, that since Thrasiles hath spoken thus before the Princess, it will much concern our honours, that he declare before the Princess his reasons for quitting us. I believe (said Atalia then) that a relation from his mouth will not be verie advantageous to us. If you will, replied Lyriana, and if the Princess desire to know it, I will make a very exact and impartial relation of all the passages which have befallen Thrasiles. You would do me a great pleasure in it, replied Mandana: I assure you, said Cyrus and laughed, you will undertake a very difficult task, to perswade me that Thrasiles could love, and quit three such Beauties as these, and not deserve the title of inconstant. Lyriana hath ever been so much the friend of Thrasiles, (said Lysidice) as I can hardly consent that it should be she who should relate the story unto the Princess. For my part, said Cleocrite, I am so confident that Lyriana cannot speak any thing to my disadvantage, as I value not whether or no she be more a friend unto Thrasiles, then she is unto me. To testifie, said Lyriana, that I intend to speak nothing but impartial truth, I am willing that you all be present at my relation, and that you correct me if I utter anie untruth. For my part (said Lysidice) though Thrasiles were the most unconstant of all men, yet I had rather acknowledg him constant, then to be a hearer of all those follies which have passed betwixt us. That the relation may be more equal, replied Thrasiles, It is requisite that none of the persons interested be present, and that Lyriana be alone with the Princess. Lysidice, who till then could hardly consent, that Lyriana should relate any business wherein she was concerned, was the first who according to the inequality of her humour, consented that Lyriana should be alone with Mandana: And so the thing being resolved upon, Thrasiles went with Cleocrite, Lysidice and Atalia into another chamber where Martesia was: and Lyriana prepared her self to relate the various loves of Thrasiles: after which, he was to be declared either an inconstant man, or else confirmed in his pretence to be a most faithful lover. But though Lyriana intended to speak before none but the Princess Mandana, and before Cyrus, yet she had more Auditors: for the Prince Artamas being entred with Alglatidas, Cyrus said that they who were the most faithful Lovers in the world, were verie fit to be judges in the business: so that everie one taking their places, Lyriana addressing her discourse unto Mandana, she began thus.

The Historie of THRASILES.

Since Truth, Madam, ought alwaies to be inseperable from the words of them who undertake to relate any thing; doubtless I shall be induced in the sequel of my discourse not to make an equal commendations of all those persons of whom I am to speak, though otherwise they be infinitely laudable: Therefore, I beseech you Madam, do not think that to justifie Thrasiles, I will unjustly accuse Cleocrite, Lysidice, or Atalia: since certainly I will tell you nothing which I will not make them confess, & which is not known unto all of any quality in Cumes. I will not stay you Madam, with a relation how Thrasiles is of a very noble extraction: how he hath upon manie occasions made himself Signal in war, and how he hath abundance of wit: But give me leave to tell you, Madam, that never man had a more passionate soul then Thrasiles hath: for that passion of love is so predominate in him, as he cannot live and not love: but to manifest it unto you, that he is not of the same temper which unconstants are, I must let you know that all the loves which he hath professed, were not bare Gallantries and Courtships, but they were zealous and violent, as well as tender and passionate: And it is my opinion, that if Thrasiles had been so hapie to love the first time, one who had in some sort answered his affection, I am most confident he would never have loved any but her, and would have loved her until death. And to let you see, he is capable of constancy, you may judg of his love by his friendship; for he had a friend called Egesipes, whom he constantly loved from his verie cradle: yet the odness of his destinie was such as that he hath loved manie, as I shall tell you. Be pleased to know Madam, that as soon as Thrasiles was out of his Tutorship, and began to make visits of his own head, he fell as much in love as the age at which he was would permit him. But since you know, young men who first enter into the world, are not alwaies treated so well as those who have been longer in it, unless by women who never use to repulse anie, and such who would have slaves of all sorts: so Thrasiles, though verie handsome and of much Page 166 spirit, did not then meet with an equal civility amongst those Ladies who had the greatest reputation of beauty, and he easily observed, that they made some difference between men of his form and age, and others who were elder then himself: So that since it was glorious for him, he did not fall in Love with such as would not treat him as a man of power to become their Lover; but he fell desperately in love with a Lady, who being of such an humour as I spoke of before, was beyond all measure civil unto him, omitting none of those fond fooleries (which women who make it their professions use) to enslave the poor Thrasiles: The small experience he had in the world, suffered him to be extreemly joyed at his good usage, and to see that this Lady treated him as if he were the most accomplished man in all the Court: When he made a visit any where else, he sat upon thorns and stayed not; for as it is usual unto such green men, they either talked not at all to him, or else talking something that angered him; so that he hath often protested unto me, that he hath been extreemly troubled at it, when they either spoke low in his presence, or else spoke only of his exercises, or of his Parents, and so would leave him.

I leave you to judg Madam, what sweetness he found in those places where he found different usage, where he was talked unto as others were, and where a hundred trifles were imparted to him; and he loved this Lady as desperately as ever any did, and he loved her so much, that for almost six moneths time, he thought himself the happiest man in the world, in being respected by a Ladie who really had both beautie and wit, but who was the veriest cheat, and the veriest Weathercock that ever was, for she would write Letters of Gallantry unto a thousand several Gallants, she would let all in Cumes love her, and desired to be loved of all the world, she would put all that ever loved her in hopes, and yet jeer'd at all without exception: I think Madam you will not at all wonder that Thrasiles being very young should be taken with her, and that you will wonder less he should leave her, when he discovered her cheats and fooleries, and when he knew she loved him no better then she did a thousand of his Rivals; if to justifie the change of Thrasiles, it were requisite to give you a Catalogue of her tricks, I could tell you, that he met with many of her Letters, that he understood she shewed his unto all his Rivals, that she would jeer with them at his passion, and with him at theirs, that she would often send him word he could not see her, whilst she was talking with others in private, and that indeed she was the weakest, and most foolish person of her Sex. I leave you to judg Madam, whether Thrasiles was able to continue loving her, and whether his change could be called inconstancy: I will not further aggravate the matter, since for the justification of Thrasiles, it is enough to say, that I conceive he would have been extreemly to blame, had he persisted loving such a contemptible woman after he knew her: However, since the amorous inclination of his heart would not let him live long without loving some or other, after his return out of the Country, and after he had broke off with his first Mistress, he layed siege to a second: But since now Thrasiles began to be reputed one of the completest Gallants in all over Court, he was looked upon in a different manner from what he was at his first entrance into the world, since there was not a woman of any qualitie who thought it not a glory to have some share in his esteem, and his choice was not bad in fixing upon Atalia, for the object of his second passion, for as you see her a Lady of much beauty and wit, so she is Mistress of much generosity, goodness, and freedom. Thrasiles then finding her infinitely amiable, did infinitely love her, and he loved her the more, because he found her of an humour different from her whom now he slighted; for indeed Alitalia affected neither gallants nor gallantry, she rather shunned the tumult of the world, then Courted it, she was handsome without any affectation, and of a sweet, easie, and agreeable conversation, though of a little serious temper: So that finding a thousand good qualities in her, opposite unto those ill ones which he scorned in her he had quitted, he applied himself unto her service, and that very violently, continuing a long time in doing all that love useth to incite the greatest Gallants to do, for indeed he made her many magnificent Feasts; and his love to her was not only violent, but it was also apparent, and made a great noise in the world: He seeing that maugre all his endeavours, Atalia did not answer his passion, but on the contrary, did slight it as much as in civility she could, yet he perceived that it was not out of any aversion or scorn, and that he had a share in her esteem, though not in her affection; so that he still applied himself to her service with all imaginable exactness, and he was so obstinately devoted unto it, that this Lady who did really esteem him, and who feared lest her Parents should force her to marry a man whom they highly esteeme, resolved to tell him the reason why she would not answer his Page 167 affection. One day when he was alone with her, and when he had a desire to speak of his passion to her, and to beseech her she would not scorn his affection, she imposed silence upon him, and acquainted him with as much sincerity as sweetness, with the true cause of her coldness to him: Since I do intend (said she unto him) to give you very ample testimony of my esteem, I do conjure you to let me acquaint you with a business which will anger you the most of any thing in the world, if what you have told me be true, and that you love me as well as you would make me believe, for truly Thrasiles, I were very unworthy of the honour which you do me, if I should let you engage your self any further in an affection wherein you can never receive any satisfaction: Alas Madam (said Thrasiles and interrupted her) can I never hope to be loved or endured? No (said she unto him) you cannot; and if I could obtain so much power of my self, as to tell you the reason, you would agree with me, that unless I should wrong you, and be unjust, I must deny you my affection: Why Madam (said he) can you not love me, because you love some body else? Can there be any in the world so happy, as to be loved by Atalia? Can any upon earth be so little transported with joy at so high a happiness, as that he can hide it? Fie Atalia, it is not impossible: If he were a man of this Court, who hath this honour, I should discover the joyes of his soul through his eyes; and the truth is, if there were any truth were in your words, I should have seen him with you, and if I had seen him, certainly I should have known his happiness and his passion: Yet you may easily conceive, said she unto him, that what I tell you is not invented: But I beseech you Madam (said he unto her) who is this too happy man that hinders me from being so, and who hath the glory of your affection? I did not tell you, replied Atalia, that I do love any, but only that I would have you know, that there is one whose love I could admit of: If that be all, replied Thrasiles, it is not enough to hinder me from loving you; and I beseech you Madam, give me leave to love you as well as my Rival, be he whom he can be, and if it so fall out, that you love him better than me, then it may be my respects of you may make me endure my misfortune with patience.

Atalia seeing she had said either too much, or too little to satisfy him, was at a little non plus; so that resolving to drive the nail to the head at one blow, she confessed unto Thrasiles, that she was in love, though she would never confess with whom: I beseech you Madam (said he unto her) tell me who is this invisible Rival, the noise of whose sighs could never reach my ears, though I have been almost perpetually with you? and what hath he done to win your heart, and undo me? He hath loved me (said she) before you did, and whilst you were in love with another; and he hath loved me with so much fidelity and obedience, that he never revealed unto you the secrets which were betwixt us: How Madam (replied Thrasiles much astonished) is the Rival you love my friend? No, no Madam, this is not possible; for truly I have but one only friend, which is Egesipes, and I am most confident he would reveal his very heart unto me, if either of us two be faulty, I am sure it is my self, in never telling him that I loved you; and besides Madam, Egesipes hath been absent this three moneths: 'Tis true (said she and blusht) Egesipes hath been out of Cumes this three moneths; but it is as true also, that he hath been above a year in my heart; therefore Thrasiles, since I would not expose you unprofitably to lose a friend, I had a mind to discover that unto you, which yet he knows not, and will acquaint you, that I shall never love any but Egesipes, who only knows that I do not hate him, but knows not at all how my heart is wholly his: Oh Madam (cried he out) I had rather he knew it, and that I knew it not; But is it true, that Egesipes should be my Rival, and I have no cause to hate him? Doubt it not, said she, for indeed he knows no more that you are his Rival, then you did within this quarter of an hour know that he was yours: However Thrasiles, (said she and assumed a very serious countenance) If you be not faithful unto me, and if you do not make good use of this secret wherewith I have trusted you, I do profess, I shall most horribly hate you: I beseech you Madam, replied he and sighed, what shall I do to make good use of it? You must never tell it unto any (said she) no not unto Egesipes himself. You must also cease to be my Lover, but never cease to be his friend. Alas Madam, replied Thrasiles, how difficult are your commands to be obeyed? how hard a task is it to love a Rival, and leave loving a Mistress? When one cannot without injustice hate the first, replied she, nor with any hopes continue loving the other, the most rational, the most generous, and fittest course is to be taken, and not obstinately to run on headlong in a design which will never prosper.

Page 168 For all Atalias fair language, she could not that daie persuade Thrasiles; but he persisted loving her as before: he thought also to have quarreled with Egesipes as soon as he returned to Cumes. But upon serious consideration, finding that the affection of Egesides and Atalia was indissoluble, and all was both unjust and in vain, to root his friend out of the heart of th- < > one, he began generously to strive with himself, he left Cumes for a certain time, and when he returned would not visit Atalia any more: so that absence, reason, generosity, friendship and all, overcoming his passion, he left off loving Atalia, since he saw an absolute impossibility of ever obtaining her love. Thus I conceive it may verie well be said, that though there was a great difference between her and the first Ladie he loved, yet he might verie well quit her without any aspersion of inconstancy as well as the other.

However, since in changing his thoughts of her, he had not changed his temper: and since the amorous inclination of his soul could not be idle, he fell insensibly in love with Cleocrite, who indeed was verie capable of captivating a heart, but was absolutely incapable of making a Lover happy, for her humour was opposite unto any such things of that nature. Since the love of Thrasiles unto this fair one was extreamly violent, I shall insist longer in relation of the passages between them, then I did in relation of the two first: And since it doth verie much concern Thrasiles, that you perfectly know Cleocrite, to the end you may not accuse him for quitting her, it is requisite I describe her unto you: As for her person, I need not speak of it, because you know her, yet I can assure you, that since she hath of late been sick, you never saw her beautie in its full lustre, for certainly when she was in perfect health, she was much fairer then now she is, though now at this present she be very fair. For Madam, there was so great a lustre in Cleocrites complexion, and in her eyes, when she dressed up her self with a designe to make a Conquest, that she always struck all beholders with admiration: Moreover, Cleocrite had an excellent, gallant, and knowing it: she spoke admirably, and inspired a soul into all company; she would be so sweetly merry as pleased very much, and she would out with a thousand pleasant quibbles in a pleasant manner: But for all the charms of her beauty and wit, and maugre all the excellent qualities which she was Mistress of, she had one which did not only lose her all her Lovers, but also all her friends: and which made it a thing almost impossible to love her long and zealously. Every one did questionless always much esteem her, and love her also whether they would or no: but it was with a murmur against her, and with a concession they did not well in loving her: for truly Cleocrite had such an universal, and so great a neutrality and indifference unto all whatsoever, that she made those who knew her to despair, who otherwise esteemed her very much; yet do not think, I mean, Madam, when I speak thus of her indifference, that she is incapable of either violent passion or violent friendship: but my meaning is, she is absolutely incapable of any particular application of her self unto any one whosoever; and if she loved any thing much, it was pleasures in general: She could leave any place without any trouble to her self, new acquaintance never vexed her; She could easily endure the absence of her best friends, though yet she would have been glad to see them: and it may be said, and truly, that she accustomed her self unto all Companies, and disaccustomed her selfe from all. Since she had wit in abundance, and could verie well discern degrees of merit, and distinguish men of parts from others, She < > much delighted to have her chamber always full both of wits, and blockheads: But when-chance would sometimes have it so, that there was none of the first sort there, so there were but a number of mean capacities, who could but talk and fill up seats, she was never troubled at it as any other would have been: And I believe Cleocrite, as witty and sprightly as she was, did so love a multitude, that she had rather have been in the company of five or six shallow wits, then in the company of the most accomplished man upon earth, if he were long with her. I assure you Madam, Cleocrite was never better pleased then when she saw much company both at home and abroad, and pass continually from pleasure to pleasure, and from feast to feast; as for solitude she d'd abhor it, yet this must needs be said to the glory of Cleocrite, that she was verie ready to do her < > any service whensoever any occasions were offered; and would often treat them as if she d'd most tenderly love them. But to tell you truly, it was because she knew that decency re < > it- and that when she saw them, she would be merry with them; and being a lover of pleasure and mirth, she would love them that would be merry and < > as the < > and pleasure lasted, and no longer. She was of such a cold < > , that though she would have been glad that one should love her, yet she cared < > not for being loved with any tenderness or violence, provided people did esteem her, and love her enough to see her often, to be complaisant and merrie, she cared not a straw for any more. However, this strange indifference, which vexed both her Lovers and her friends, did not so eclipse Cleocrite, but as for all that, she was one of the most accomplished Ladies in the world. She being such then as I have presented her unto you, Thrasiles loved her, and loved her with so much the more hopes, because he thought he did not expose himself to love one who loved a thousand, nor unto such a rockie misfortune as he did in loving Atalia, being sure that she had no particular affection unto any which could hinder her from accepting his, since she was generally accused for loving none at all. He hoped also that this her cold indifference might one day prove advantageous to him, if ever he could win upon her, and that he should be much more happy in having one who would be cold unto all the world but himself. The truth is Madam, he loved Cleocrite, and did not despair of obtaining her love; for she being of a free, and open, spritely nature, and entertaining all that diverted extraordinarily well, Thrasiles was at the verie first mistaken, and thought that she was so for the love of him, though indeed it was only for the love of her self; so that he engaged himself more and more, and loved her far better then ever he did before.

Thrasiles being of a free and liberal inclination, invented a hundred diversions which were agreeable to the disposition of Cleocrite; sometimes he would give her a dancing entertainment, another while he would surprize her with musique: If he walked with her, she was sure to meet with a costly collation, and for a whole Summer together, there was no day without a pleasant diversion from Thrasiles: You may verie well imagine Madam, that Cleocrite, having a soul so devoted unto delights, would verie civilly treat the man who procured them, especially a man so accomplished as Thrasiles was. In the mean time, as much in favour as he was, he could never tell her of his passion; for such was the general neutrality of Cleocrite, that she never repulsed any acquaintance: So as there was continually so many men with her, and sometimes men verie impertinent, as it was not possible for him to get a minutes talk with her in private: But at last, being one day in the Garden with her, and with foure or five persons more who he wished further off, he led her apart from this troublesome company. But since Cleocrite did naturally love a general conversation, better then any private, she turned several times to see whether the company followed, and seeing them to walk a slow pace, she offered to call them, as if she had been weary of Thrasiles. But this Lover having a hot desire to discover his passion unto her who caused it, did hinder her, and would not lose an occasion which he had so long looked for: Why Madam (said he unto her) is not my companie enough to entertain you in a place, where Trees, Flowers, and Fountains may delight the eyes, and divert the mind? Pray pardon me Sir (said she verie obligingly unto him and smiled) for I was afraid that my companie was not good enough to please you, and therefore I desired to call for more: I beseech you Madam (said Thrasiles) do not think I can desire better companie then yours, especially now when I have something to tell you, which I have long desired to impart: Reallie Thrasiles (said she unto him, without any application of it to her self) you do verie ill in staying so long before you tell it. Thrasiles surprized at her speech, did perceive she did not much mind what she said, and indeed Cleocrite never staying for Thrasiles his answer, began to ask him, whether the Ball was to be kept the next day at the Prince of Cumes his Palace? I know not Madam, said he, whether there be any Ball to morrow; but I am most sure, my heart will be much perplexed to day, if you will not hearken unto what I shall tell you, and if you do not hearken verie favourably: For the truth is Madam, I have discovered in my soul a thought so contrary unto that wherewith you are upbraided, that I am extreamly afraid you should hate me when you know it: No, no (said Cleocrite unto him) I am not so unjust as you think me; therefore though you be not of my opinion in every thing, yet I shall not hate you; for the same indifference wherewith they upbraid me, makes me to allow others their opinions, so they will let me enjoy my own, and suffer me to follow my own will: You do much joy me Madam, replied he, and for this day onlie I shall love this indifferent humour, whereof you are so much accused, if it will permit me to tell you, and not anger you, that I am infinitely in love with you. Cleocrite was so surprized at the discourse of Thrasiles, that thinking perhaps it was onlie a piece of Gallantry, she began to answer him laughing: Though it were true you did love me, said she, and though I could hear it without any anger, yet I believe you would not be a jot the better, for I never heard that < > indifference was any great favour: It is most true, it is not (replied Thrasiles) but yet I must needs think it a piece of good fortune, if you can know I love you, and yet not hate me; and trulie my passion is of such a nature, as you would be unjust if it did offend you, since my desire is onlie to see and adore you, and if it be possible, to talk with you sometimes in less companie, and more privacy. How's this Thrasiles (said she unto him) are you so bold as to talk of any matters of Love unto one who is accompred for neutrality and indifference in the verie abstract? And can you ever think, that since I am accused for not loving where I ought to love, I will ever begin to entertain any vitious affection, or any Gallantry? No, no (pursued she and laughed, and desired to avoid angring him) though it were true you did love me, and hoped to obtain my life, yet your proceeding is not discreet, but you ought to stay until you saw me inclinable unto any amitie at all; therefore Thrasiles, I would advise you as a friend, to continue living with me, as formerly you have done, until you see my heart a little softened; for to think I should in a moment pass from one extremity unto another, is to imagine impossibilities: I know verie well Madam said he unto her, that it is a verie difficult task to engage unto the love of any; but to shew you that I am not at any impossibilities, I do not now ask so much happiness, as that you should love me, but I only ask so much favour, as to let me love you: I am so accustomed Sir, replied she, not to care what thoughts men have of me, that what you ask, I think will be no difficultie to obtain; yet since your companie doth infinitely please me, I wish with all my heart, you would not drive me to the necessitie of being deprived of it. as infallible I must, if you continue persecuting me with any talk of Love, which doth but trouble both the Lover and the loved; for indeed Thrasiles, why do you think, I endeavour so much to preserve this indifference, which is so much talked of? The reason is, because I see all men who are not so, are miserable. This fine tenderness of heart, which is so highly applauded, makes those who are capable of it, not onlie sensible of their own miseries, but of others also, or at least they say so: So that knowing so many as I do, if I were of such a tender composition, I should be perpetuallie in miserie; for there is not a day in the year in which there is not some one of my friends either absent, or sick, or in some affliction or other: But I know how to pass away my time a little better then so, and am more rational, then to grieve excessively at any thing but what reflects directly upon my self. It seems Madam, replied Thrasiles, that you are the happiest person in the world: Not at all, said she, for I have as many vexations, as others have. As for example, when I have a design to walk, if it chance to rain, or the day not prove fair, I am vexed to the heart; or if it prove too cold or dry, and the dust disturb the pleasure of it, I am grieved at it to the soul; if any covetous fellow will not be at the charges of keeping a Ball, I shall murmur and grumble at him, as if he had done me some manifest injury; if I chance to be a little ill upon any day of diversion, I shall be so sick as if I were ready to die: So that though I have none but my own sorrows to be sensible of (said she and laughed) yet I have enough to put me to all my patience; therefore Thrasiles, do not perplex me with that which of all things in the world I cannot endure, for I assure you, if you be obstinate, and will be talking to me of any such things as Love, you will find, that though I am not capable of any tenderness, yet as indifferent as I am I am capable of anger; yet for all this, Thrasiles did not take her counsel, but on the contrary, began to protest most seriously and earnestly, that his affection to her was infinite, and that he was fully resolved to overcome her indifference by a million of services, by as many prayers, sighs, and submissions: So that Cleocrite foreseeing she must be deprived of Thrasiles, who furnished her with a thousand diversions, and that she was not to accept any of his feasts, as she did before he had discovered his passion unto her; also considering that he would endeavour as much as he could to talk onlie with her, and hinder her from talking with others, she was so extremely vexed at it, as she gave him very angry language, and Thrasiles could not give any appeasing answers, for the rest of the company joining with them, he could not speak to her all that day: Since the anger of this fair one was very high, and since he never before had any trial of it, he feared that it would last long, and not daring to revive it, he kept very close three whole daies, and durst not see her, nor would he go any where else, since he could not see her there: Yet at the last, since he was not able to live and not see her, he resolved to go unto her, but it was in such a trembling manner, and with such a dull sadness in his face, as made it evident he had spent his time very ill, since he saw her last.

As for Cleocrite, it was not so with her, for she had been every day in the Walks since Thrasiles told her of his love; and though she had not been in company of any so accomplished Page 171 as himself, yet Cleocrite was never melancholy for the matter; but was as gay, and pleasant, and merry, as Thrasiles was said. This miserable Lover then going to her with a look as pitiful as Cleocrite was pleasant, he entered into her chamber with fears, that he should find but verie bad reception: But the wonder of the passage was, that Cleocrite having spent those three daies in feasts and pleasures, and had talked with a hundred several persons since she saw Thrasiles, had so quite forgot that he had ever mentioned any matters of love unto her, and that she had given him any sharp answer, or was ever angry at him, as she entertained him with a free and pleasant countenance as formerly she was wont to do; asking him where he had been? what he had been doing, and why he was not at those feasts She had been at? Telling him, She had been very merry, and that She did not think She should ever see more pleasant dayes then these last.

Thrasiles was so amazed at the carriage of Cleocrite, as he knew not whether he should be sad or glad at it: yet not thinking it possible she should so soon forget the passages between them, his hope was that she repented her self of her course treatments to him; so that desiring to close with an opportunity which he thought favourable for him: Had I thought Madam, (said he unto her) that my company would not have disturbed your pleasures, I should not have failed to be in those places where you have been so pleasant: But I must ingeniously confess, that I durst not see you so soon after the harsh language you were pleased to give me: and I did not come hither now but in fear of your discovering the, zeal of my passion. Cleocrite hearing Thrasiles say so, did presently remember what she had forgotten: at first she blusht for shame, but presently after she began to laugh so heartily, that she was not able to speak: Thrasiles did now as much wonder at her at her merryness, as he did before at her civility, and stood stone still; but at last Cleocrite beginning discourse: I ask you pardon Thrasiles, said she, for the injury I have done you, in quite forgetting what you said, and what I answered the other day: and for not remembering that I was angry with you; for indeed I know that my present civilities are most injurious. But I protest, I did not remember it; yet to repair my fault, and to testifie that I am not so indifferent as you think me, I will rowse up my anger, and quash all my civilities. Thrasiles was so astonished at this, that he neither knew what to think or say; but at last, not being able to hold. Is it possible Madam, said he unto her, you should forget how I told you that I loved you? Yes, said She, and so forgot it, that I should do you the greatest wrong in the world, if I should remember it; for indeed I should then have lived with you, as I did before.

But Madam, replied he, Can I believe this to be true? To make you certain of it, said She, keep only five or six days out of my sight, and when you come again to me, speak not a word that may revive your crime, and my anger in my memory, and see whether I shall remember it; for unless I be much mistaken, I shall not, and it will be long of you only, if we do not agree well together as we did before. No no, Madam, replied Thrasiles, much incensed, I must not do so; for since you cannot remember a thing three days, I must tell you every day that I love you, and that I shall for ever love you whether you will or no, in spite of that cruel indifference wherein you so much glory, though it be the greatest fault you have. As Thrasiles pronounced these last words, I came into the chamber of Cleocrite, and heard them very distinctly: so that prompting them to go on with their discourse, I need not ask (said I unto Cleocrite) what that fault is, wherewith Thrasiles upbraids you, for since you have but one it is easie to guess it, especially since it is so generally known unto all the world. I protest Lyriana, (said she unto me and laughed) you are very plain with me, and I do not think there is any person upon earth who is so freely upbraided with her faults as I am. Since you do vainly glory in that one you have, replied I, the world speaks of it without fear of angering you, and without any hopes also of ever mending you. Then they should never speak of it, replied She. You take so much pleasure in their speaking of it (replied Thrasiles) that it is the least piece of complacencie they can use to you to speak of it, as they do the reason why I am not angry, said Cleocrite, is the same why the greatest beauties are least angry when they are called ugly: For to speak with the same plainness, Lyriana, that you do, if I had only that fault which the world so twits me with, I were the rarest woman upon earth. Yet you go too far, said I unto her, if you perswade your self that a cold faint indifference is a good qualitie. Perhaps (replied Cleocrite) you call indifference something else which I know not, and which I am a stranger unto; but I dare maintain that all my thoughts are just, and that the amitie wherof Page 172 I am capable, is the most convenient, and rational of all others: As for the most convenient for you, replied Thrasiles, I do agree with you, but as for the most rational, I think it is disputable. The most tender amity, replied she, cannot produce any thing which is good, that may not also be expected from mine; For truly, I think there is none, who loves better to serve their friends, nor is more glad to see them, then I am: You might have added, replied I, nor none that can better tolerate their absence: It is true, said she, that when I lose the sight of them, I do not lose my wits: But I pray tell me, if I were the most grieved in the world at the absence of my friends, what good would it do them? Doubtless I am sorry to part with friends, but it is without any mad excess, or troubling my friends which remain, by an insupportable grief, which does them no good who see it not, and troubles them who do see it, and casts down my self, without any other benefit but getting the reputation of a tender-hearted thing; but in my judgment, these are arguments of a weak soul.

Did I not really esteem my friends according to their merit, and serve them whensoever they stand in need of my assistance, I should set a worse face upon them when they come to see me; I should not let them condemn me as they do, onlie because forsooth I do not give them my whole heart, and because I am not sensible even to the very last gasp; and because I do not mix with my talk words of tenderness, zealous amity, and such like, therefore I must pass for a piece of hard indifference, though to speak truly, I am no more then what is requisite and concordant to reason; this is it which I cannot endure; And indeed (pursued she and laughed) do not all the Sages who are so famed in the world make prudence to consist in a self-denial of all things? and according to their precepts am not I temperate, as they by their sapient documents would have me? None of the Sages you speak of, replied Thrasiles, did ever condemn amity; No more do I, replied she, but I do regulate it, and give it limits: For to think that amitie should be a heavy burthen, and an overload unto those who have it, is a thing most unjust; if so, I had rather chuse ambition, hatred, or anger, then amity, which is praised tender amity, heroicque amity, since certainly I should suffer less by those three violent passions, then by that you call amity: You might have wished jealousy as a higher aggravation (replied Thrasiles) If one could be jealous, replied she, without love, I should have put it in for company; and if you will, I will also add envy, which is no less tormentive then jealousy, that I may let you see how inconvenient I think this kind of tender amity is; I am confident, that if the hearts of all men were layed open, as mine is, even those who make the greatest profession of tenderness, they would not be found more tender nor sensible then mine is, even those who make the greatest profession of tenderness, they would not be found more tender nor sensible then mine is; all the difference twixt me and others is, that I speak what I think, and would not pass for what I am not, or for what I would not be: Oh I beseech you, said I, content your self with your own indifference, and do not undertake to condemn amity, which is the most innocent, the most just, the most sweet, and the most heroicque quality in the world; for truly this amity which you so much slight is of such a Nature, as without it, there is no true satisfaction in the world, all other pleasures without it are but imperfect, they reach no further then the senses, but never fill the soul, or charm the heart with abundance of sweetness: 'Tis amity, doubtless which sweetens all sorrows, which doubles all delights, which makes one to find comfort and consolation in the greatest misfortunes, and indeed it is that which prompts every one unto a thousand heroicque actions: The truth is, pursued Thrasiles, It is had in veneration amongst all Nations, and there is not one person in all the world except Cleocrite, who is not offended at it, if they be charged with want of amity: I pray do not except me, replied she, for I should not be pleased that I should say I do not love my friends: But it is true, I do not much affect, that any should think my amity to be worthy of any Elogies: If you did but know what true amity is, replied I, you would be ashamed to call such an affection as your heart is capable of, by so glorious a name: Howlever it be, said she, I would not alter my opinion: After this, Thrasiles and I, did argue a long with Cleocrite to no purpose, for we could not argue her unto any repentance, nor make her acknowledge she was in the wrong. However, since my design was only a bare visit unto Cleocrite, after I had stayed out a reasonable time, I went out, and left Thrasiles alone with her, who not being able to leave her, before he had expressed his affection, as soon as he saw I was gone, he began to speak unto her. Because I dare not ask a favour Madam (said he unto her) which would be opposite unto your humour, I shall Page 173 this day only desire of you, that you would be so indifferent as to let me love you, and not be angry: I have already told you Sir, replied she, all that I can say upon that question: But not to deny you everie thing, I shall further say unto you, that upon condition you will live eight daies, as heretofore you have done, and mention not a word of that pretended passion which you say is in your heart, nor by any of your actions manifest it unto me, I will do what I can to forget all that you said unto me the other day, and to day: And after this, I protest I will never examine upon what grounds you visit me; and to testifie how pleasing the sight of you is unto me, I promise you never to attribute any thing which you shall do for me, to any thoughts of Love: Oh Madam (cried out Thrasiles) I do not desire this last favour, but on the contrary, I conjure you to believe, that whatsoever I shall do or say, are only such effects as my love of you doth inspire into me: When you see me sad, think that I am so onlie because I am not loved of her whom I adore; if you see me joyed, the onlie reason is because I am neer you; if I be in a deep studie, imagine it your self who hath sole taken up my soul; if I look upon you, think that is in hopes you will cast a favourable eye upon me again; and if I do not look upon you, conceive it is because I am afraid to anger you, and find it in your eyes; and indeed Madam, without any interpretation of my actions, as actions of indifference, believe that whatsoever I shall do, is done with a premeditated design and hope to obtain your love: To testifie unto you, replied Cleocrite, that I am of a verie pliant humour, I shall believe as you would have me to believe: Oh Madam, said Thrasiles, Shall I be so happy? As for happy, said she, I know not whether you will be or no; all I know is, and I will say it again, that I tell you I will believe you love me, and that you would have me love you; but at the same time I declare unto you, that I will transact with you, as if I did believe all this, this is, I will see you no more, that I will shun you with all imaginable care, that I will deprive my self of a thousand delights by it, and by consequence, that I will most horribly hate you. Oh Madam (cried out Thrasiles) rather then so, I beseech you think that I do not love you: I shall do so, said she, and do it with abundance of pleasure: Yet I beseech you Madam, replied Thrasiles, believe, or not believe, as you shall think good: Since I am to believe what pleaseth me, replied she, I shall easily believe you do not love me, because I do extreamlie wish it; therefore Thrasiles take your measures accordinglie, and be confident, that the readiest way in the world to make me hate you, will be to create a disposition in me to part from this neutral indifferencie, which causeth all the tranquillitie and sweetness of my life; content your self with my accustomed civilities, regulate your self accordinglie.

Thrasiles used all his Rhetorique to make her change opinion, but all would not do; and before he could obtain leave to see her, as he was wont to do, he must promise her to carrie himself towards her, as formerlie he used: However, he thought it a kinde of happiness that he had let her know he loved her without a banishment; for since he could not imagine she should believe he did not love her, he hoped that she her self would take it to heart, without his further telling her—So that assuming to himself new hopes, and consequentie new joyes, he continued in his obsequious wayes of serving her, and Courting her with a thousand delights; yet this serenitie of soul and tranquillitie of heart was not long, for the more he applied himself unto her, the more indifferent he found her, and he more clearlie found it, because having two Rivals who were nothing so gallant as himself, and who Courted Cleocrite with some diversions, yet he observed that she was not more faintlie indifferent unto them, then unto himself, provided the musique was good, that the Ball was finelie carried, and the Banquet sumptuous, she cared not a straw for him who was at the charges of them, and would have been as well contented to have received all these diversions from any other, as from him: So that Cleocrites man|ner of living, did put this pittifull Lover to a thousand secret displeasures, yet he could not accuse her of any inconstancie, or any secret under-hand dealing, for she held cor|respondencie with none, nor treated any better then himself, nor did she treat him better then any other, though she had a thousand reasons to put a notable difference betwixt Thrasiles and all the rest; for it was his fortune to render her many considerable services concerning her familie, and having verie much credit, several occasions presented them|selves, wherein he did highlie manifest his affection unto her. But do what he could, he could not move her heart, nor never extinguish her humour of indifferencie, yet he did accustome himself whether she would or no to tell her he loved her, but it produced no more effects upon her soul, then upon a stone, insomuch as he grew so much incensed Page 170 <1 page duplicate> Page 171 <1 page duplicate> Page 172 <1 page duplicate> Page 173 <1 page duplicate> Page 174 against her cruel indifferencie, that he was not only grieved because She would not love him, but it vexed him also that She would not love anie of her friends: and he hath som|times sworn unto me, that he should have thought himself less miserable, if Cleocrite had loved anie of his Rivals, then he was to see her so insensible and indifferent as She was.

I beseech you Madam, (said he one daie unto her when he had found some new signe of her insensibilitie) Perswade me by some example, that it is not absolutely impossible you should love some or other: Chuse out of the whole Universe whom you shall think good; for were I once convinced you could love anie, I should be in some hopes: it not being possible that anie sensible heart should know my passion, and not answer it: but to see that nothing will move it, that your soul will not fix upon anie, that though you have a most discerning eye in all things, yet that you will chuse none, this is a thing which is most intollerable. Yet you must endure it, replied She, for I will never change, nor do I think I ought ever to change; And indeed She was as good as her word. Yet Thrasiles as inconstant as he is said to be did still continue loving her, that for my part I did both pitie and chide him: Also I had reason to double my pitie; for the indifferencie of Cleocrite went so near his heart, and grief so filled his spirits that he fell sick, and that most extreamlie sick. At first Cleocrite who knew his disease, and was not ignorant that She her self was the cause, sent to see how he did, and said She was verie sorrie: but for all that, though all Physicians thought him desperate, She lost not a daies diversion from it, nor was a jot more melancholie, nor worse dressed. And questionless this last insensibility was like to have been the death of Thrasiles: For since he had his reason free, and since the heat of his feaver had not a jot cooled his love, he did everie daie carefully cause his men to enquire what Cleocrite did, so that sometimes he would hear She was in the walks, other times that She was at some great feast; and almost everie daie that She was never so jo|cond and merrie: But one daie amongst the rest, when he was exceeding ill, and Cleocrite sending to see how he did, he sent her word as he believed, that Shewas now like to lose the most faithful of all her servants, & that he thought he should never have the honour to see her again: yet he understood that this sad message did not keep her that daie from making several visits, visits of pleasure, and no necessity at all. You may well imagine Madam, that this went to the verie heart of Thrasiles: yet maugre all his discontents he recover|ed: but could not so soon recover the disease of his mind as of his body; for he returned as deep in love with Cleocrite as ever, though he was much vexed She should be so little sensible of his sickness, yet She did easily appease him, for as soon as ever She saw him in a capacity of giving her fresh diversions, She received him with such joy in her counte|nance as would have perswaded anie one, that She had been verie sorrie for his sickness: Thus did Thrasiles suffer himself to be deluded, insomuch as he courted her in such a man|ner as would have moved even crueltie it self. In the mean while Thrasiles being engaged to go unto the wars; and the day of his departure being come, he sent to ask her favour that he might come and take his leave of her, but because she was engaged with Lysidice to go unto some place, I know not where, about a business not worth a rush, and even where some of Thrasiles his Rivals were to meet her: She chose a verie mean pleasure, rather then deprive her self of it, in giving Thrasiles so much satisfaction as to bid her adieu. You may well imagine Madam, what thoughts Thrasiles carried with him, and whether Cleocrite was verie sorrie for his absence; yet sometimes She would think upon him, but it was only to lament the want of those diversions he was wont to give her; and not one tender or obliging thought of him: This Madam, if I be not much mistaken, is sufficient to justify the change of Thrasiles.

Be pleased to know that towards the end of the Summer, it chanced that I went one morning unto her, to ask her if She should make a visit with me that day? At first, She told me that She was engaged unto Philoxene to go with her unto a place; but upon exa|mination whether She should find more pleasure in Philoxenes visit or mine: She resolved upon mine, and sent to excuse her self unto the others: Then She began to make her selfe ready, and to ask my counsel how She should dress her self. As we were then in contest what She should wear or not wear, one of her women entred into her Chamber with such sad looks, as was easie to perceive She had some bad news to tell. Madam, said the woman unto her, you will be much surprized and verie sorrie if you knew all: Cleocrite whose mind ran all of dressing her self, and never had the least thought of Thrasiles, did think that her gown which was to be brought that morning, was not yet ready: or that Page 175 the Car|ket of Diamonds which She had borrowed of a friend, and which She intended to wear that day, was broken or lost; so that She hastily asked the woman, which of those mischances it was? No Madam, replied She, the news is worse; Thrasiles is killed, and news of it is brought unto Niside: Alas (cried I out with extream sorrow) is Thrasiles kill'd? Yes (said the woman) and all the world does infinitely lament him. To tell you Madam, that Cleocrite would have been more grieved if the Car|ket of Diamonds had been lost or broken, then at the death of Thrasiles, perhaps had been a lie, and perhaps a truth; for Madam, all that ever She did in the business was to send unto Nisides to know whether the news was true; and in the mean while She did a little lament the death of Thrasiles, but it was with a very quiet mind, and without one single tear or sigh: Alas, said She unto me, I was in such hopes of a thousand delights from Thrasiles this Winter, that I must needs lament the loss of the poor man. For my part, said I unto her, I lament the loss of himself, & not for the loss of any delights; and although he would have contributed unto no diversions at all, yet I should pity him as much as I do. Whil'st we were talking thus, the news of his death was confirmed; and immediately after I saw Cleocrite look|ing in her glass, and being but half dressed, She dressed her self with as much spruseness and alacrity as She designed before the sad news was brought: For my part, I must confess, I was so surprized at the obdurate insensibility of Cleocrite, as I was speechless; so looking upon her actions with as much amazement as sorrow, and with as much anger as amaze|ment: I observed that she ranged her locks, and curled her hair with as much niceness and care, and dressed her self as trimly as if She had some designe of conquering a fresh Lo|ver in lieu of him She had lost. After I had forced my patience a long while in silently seeing her deck her self, and after her woman was gone out, my choler could contain no longer: Fie Cleocrite, said I unto her, does not those thousands of delights which Thra|siles hath given you, deserve one day of mourning for him, and to deprive your self for his sake of a poor mean diversion the day you hear of his fatal death? If that would raise him from the dead, replied she, I should do it with much joy; but since I have passed my word unto Philoxene, I am resolved to keep it. But you did resolve to break it (said I unto her) and to make a visit with me; and may you not as well break it to mourn one day for the poor Thrasiles? I can mourn for him better in company then in solitude (replied this hard hearted Ladie) and if I should this day hide my self, I might perhaps be accused of mourning too much for him: Fie Cleocrite, said I unto her, you are not in any such re|putation of tenderness, as that you need fear any such aspersion; and certainly they would wrong you much, if they should think you so inclined: Why (said She) do you think I do not grieve for Thrasiles? I protest I think so, said I unto her. And I protest, replied she, that I grieve as much as I can, and more then ever I did for any: I do believe it, said I unto her; yet it is because you love nothing in the world but your self; and as long as you can look in you|rlass, and find your self fair, you care for nothing else; yet I would gladly know whether you could resent the loss of your own beautie. Cleocrite then offer|ed to give me some poor reasons, but I rise up and left her, not being able to endure such a stonie hearted piece of insensibility. Howsoever, she went with Philoxene unto the place agreed upon, where She found more diversion then She expected, for they danced until night. But Madam, all this was happie for Thrasiles: for you must know, that the cause of these reports of his death, was, that there was one Thrasiles killed, but it was Thrasiles of Xanthes, and not of Cumes: For that Thrasiles who was an Ador|er of Cleo|crite, and whose death I lamented, being chosen by the Prince of Cumes to carry the news of the victorie which he had lately gotten, he came to town that very evening after his death was reported, his first care was to enquire how Cleocrite did, and he was let know that She was at a Ball: and at the same time he was informed that every one thought him dead: he understood that Cleocrite sent unto his mother to enquire of it, and that it was from her confirmed; so that he could not doubt but Cleocrites heart was harder to him then any flint. This did so much surprize him that imagining perhaps Cleocrite was not told of it; or that perhaps she had heard the news of his death contradicted, he resolved to go unto the place where they said she was. But in his way thither, he took my house in his way to ask me what I knew concerning Cleocrite; so that after my expressions of joy to see him alive, and desiring to cure him of his passion, I told him that the hard hearted indifferencie of Cleocrite was unworthy of his affection: and I brought his mind into such a state as to wish he could love her no longer: After which he went unto the place where she was in a strange perplexity: As he entred into the hall, she was dancing, and Page 176 danced so very well, as it was apparent her mind was wholly upon it; and the thoughts of his death did not hinder one step of her dancing. You may imagine Madam, how Thra|siles was troubled to see how indifferent Cleocrite was of him; but much more after she had done dancing, when he saw her talk to his Rivals with as much jolity in her looks, as ever she had in her life.

There being much companie in that place, Thrasiles was not at first perceived, but anger upon a sudden rowzing up his heart, and desiring to reproach Cleocrite with her horrible insensibility, he broke through the crowd, and came unto the place where she was discoursing: Imagine Madam, how Cleocrite was surprized to see Thrasiles by her, whom she thought to be dead, she shrieked out, as if she had seen some horrid apparition: So that all the company flocked about Thrasiles, and rejoiced to see him. As for Cleo|crite, she was as glad as if she had grieved extreamlie for his death, and for half an hour the talk was so tumultuous, as it was not possible for Thrasiles to speak particularly unto Cleocrite; but at last when every one had complemented themselves out of breath, he had opportunitie of speaking to her: I would believe Madam, for my satisfaction (said he unto her in a twitting kind of jest) that you are of the same opinion which some Peo|ple in the world are of, who think they ought to rejoice, and be finest at the death of their kindred and friends, and who laugh at those which weep and put on mourning; for if I were not perswaded of this, I should have cause to think my self the most miserable of all men living, since the reports? of my death will not oblige you to bestow one sigh upon me, nor stop the full carier of your joyes for one minute. Cleocrite hearing Thrasiles say so, as insensible as she was, yet she blushed, but it was more out of anger then any shame; in lieu of confessing any fault, or any repentance, or seeking out for any excuses, she answered him sharplie: If you be risen from the dead, said she unto him, onlie to make perpetual complaints of me, because I did not weep for you, you put me to the necessitie of grieving more for your life, then I did for your death; Therefore if you will take my advice along with you (said she with a forced smile) be contented that I am glad to see you again, without any further enquire, whether I grieved when I thought you dead: Your insensibilitie Madam, said Thrasiles, goes too too far, and certaintie I should be the least generous of all men, if I should endure it; I am sure Madam, that the loss of my affection will never trouble you, since the loss of my life did never reach your heart; and it is not out of any humour of revenge that I withdraw this affection from you, but it is onlie from my own tranquillitie; for it is a thing most impossible for any man to love a person of such a rockie disposition, and such a flintie insensibilitie as you are, any long time.

When Thrasiles was silent, and expected an answer from Cleocrite, one came and took her out to dance, and she went with as jocund a countenance, as if Thrasiles were not at all displeased, nor did take the least care in the world all the day after, to give him any occasion of talking with her, nor ever offered to excuse her insensibility: I think Madam after all this, you will not condemn Thrasiles, for resolving to use all his endeavours to leave loving such a stony-hearted person as was not capable of loving any, yet heaven knows it was a hard task for him to bring it about, and he was a long time consulting which ways might possibly reach the heart of Cleocrite, yet in conclusion, growing out of all patience, verie angry in a few daies did that which his reason could not, and he cured himself of a disease which he thought incurable, and the more to confirm him in his recovery, Cleocrite did care as little for the loss of him, as if she had esteemed him at the value of a rush; yet I do believe, since that, some resentments of honour made her a little angry, that such a Slave had broken prison; but I am certain, that though she did apprehend the loss, yet it was not at all out of any tenderness: I conceive Madam that after all this, Thrasiles cannot be charged with any inconstancy, since there never appeared the least levitie in all his carriage; and that if he did leave loving her, it was onlie because it was most fitting he should do it.

Since the love of Thrasiles to Cleocrite made a great noise in the world, it was soon perceived they were at odds, and since the matter was never made any secret mysterie between them, all the world did know the cause, and I dare boldly say, all the world did lay the fault where it deserved, and blamed Cleocrite: But amongst the rest, Lysidice could not chuse but much condemn her: So that since Thrasiles did naturally love to be pitied, and loved such as took his part, and hearing what Lysidice said in his behalf and against Cleocrite, he desired me to carrie him to her, knowing that I was frequent with her; I Page 177 being glad to contribute any thing unto the consolation which he had found in one who condemned the insensibility of Cleocrite, did willingly consent unto his desire, not being ignorant, that Lysidice would think her self obliged unto me for bringing Thrasiles unto her, whom she esteemed verie much, though he never saw her at her own house. But as I have described the other Ladies whom Thrasiles loved, so it is requisite I describe this, whose person you know is all beauty, all amiable, all charming, in whose mind was a million of beauties and admirable graces; but as for her humour, it is such, as none living can represent it unto you, for indeed Madam there was never any more sweet, more compliant, nor more agreeable at certain times, on certain daies, and certain houres, and at certain minutes; but also, never any was more austere, more imperious, more crabbed, nor insupportable at other times; so that there was such a prodigious miscellany and inequality in the humour of Lysidice, as I conceive she may be fitly compared unto one of those daies in the Spring time of the year, when one shall see the Sun guild all the world, give a fresh fragrance unto the Meadows and Trees, and disclose a thousand flowers, and upon a sudden a terrible storm of Hail and Snow doth fall, together with thunder and winde; so that one may in one day see all the beauties and all the rigours of the whole year: Indeed Madam, the inequality of Lysidices humour is so great, as I have often seen her most pleasant in the morning, most melancholy after dinner, and as merry as might be before night again, having no cause in the world to be more merrie or more sad at one time then at another: Perhaps you will ask me Madam, how Thrasiles could ever fall in love with such an uncertain person; and I must answer, that the good howers of Lysidice were so pleasing and charming, that it is no wonder at all if she did captivate the heart of Thrasiles, which was so apt for love: It may be further said, that the humour of Lysidice was always to prefer the society of men, before that of women, and less various in her unequal humours with new acquaintance then with others: Also Thrasiles did not at first know her temper, but on the contrary, was never better satisfied with any person then with her the first time he saw her: For truly she had served her self into all his thoughts of Cleocrite, and did so inveigh against her rigid humour, as he had good reason to think, that she had a heart as soft and sensible, as Cleocrites was hard and indifferent: So that according to himself by little and little to see her, he came at length to love her. Since he had already loved three persons in one Court, he did for a while conceal his passion, fearing that the world would, as formerly upbraid him with inconstancy. Whilst he was thus silently in love with Lysidice, he began to discover the oddness of her humours, and I cannot tell whether or no he did wish, that he did not love her, if the fate of it had been in his power: However, since he believe her not to be insensible and indifferent, he counted all her other defects as nothing, and to speak the very truth, Lysidice had no other but this unevenness of temper, and that was not then strong enough to hinder Thrasiles from loving her, and applying himself to her service: But it is very observable, that the same imperfection which all the friends of Lysidice did continually chide her for, was partly a cause why he discovered his passion, sooner then otherwise he would: For Egesipes, Thrasiles, and I being one afternoon with her, it chanced so, that I began to chide her, for the inequality of her humour, which hindered her from being without any fault: That which did give me a subject for it was, that when Thrasiles and I came into her Chamber, she did entertain us with such a hollow kind of gravitie, as if she did not care for our company, or as if she were in some most deep melancholy, yet within less then a quarter of an houre Egesipes coming in, she passed upon a sudden from her dumphish humour unto the quite contrary, and was extremely civil, sweet and pleasant. In the mean time, I knew it could not be the sight of Egesipes which caused the alteration of her humour, knowing that she loved me, as well as him, and that she esteemed Thrasiles more then Egesipes: So that making this my pretence of chiding her: Really Lysidice (said I unto her) I am very glad that I came not by my self to see you, and I believe Thrasiles is not sorry that we came together; for since you would have entertained us so coldly, it would have vexed us to have seen it, especially seeing you receive Egesipes with so much joy; but since we came both together, I believe this coldness doth not relate unto either of us: For my part, replied Thrasiles, I respect Lysidice more then to suspect her of any coldness unto you; and I had rather take it all upon my self, though there is none in the world could be more sorry for it then I should: No, no Thrasiles, replied Lysidice, never trouble your self in a thing wherein you have no share, nor trouble your self with satisfying Lyriana, for I assure you, She chides me, rather to correct me then for any thing else: It Page 178 is most true Lysidice (said I unto her) and I should be extremely joyed if you were always in the same mood as you are now, and that you would be never in that humour in which you were when Thrasiles and I came in: Did you but know how much fairer and more amiable you are when you are out of this dogged fit, certainly you would for ever banish it; for questionless, there is nothing more becoming, then an even, smooth and equal temper: For my part, replied Lysidice, I am not of your opinion, but am perswaded it is more pleasant to find several persons in one, then to see still the same glutting equality of temper, which never sheweth you but one and the same thing several times. Certainly, added she, and laughed, it is with equal and unequal humours, as with waters in general, where those which are still the calmest, are not the most pleasing: I think none will deny, but that the Sea with all its storms and tempests is more pleasant then a standing lake, in spite of its tranquil serenity: The inequality and fury of the Sea, replied Thrasiles, is doubtless very pleasant unto those who stand upon banks, and look upon it, but very troublesome unto those who are upon it: 'Tis true, replied she: But as the Sea doth sometimes swallow up some unfortunate persons, so it pleaseth a hundred thousand who look up in safety. Moreover, this inequality of temper which is so much vaunted of is often, only a good effect of a bad cause: For to speak in general, if one do well, observe those who are of this even temper you speak of, he shall find much stupidity in some or most, others of a grave and silent temper; it is more out of sluggishness then virtue, that they do not vary and change their humours; others are so continually in the same temper of merriment, that they seem fools, and others of such an insufferable tediousness of spirit, as that their equality of temper, renders them wearisome. Moreover, I will maintain, that most of these equal-spirited persons, have the thoughts of a base and crouching soul: And on the contrary, to speak in general, those of a little uneven temper, and something fantastical, have hearts most high and heroic. I know there are some in whom all the virtues meet, wit, spirit, generosity, complacencie, and equality, are their own, but this is very rare; and I am confident that ordinarily, if men of greatest spirits have this equality in their humours, it comes to them more by reason then by temper: You defend a bad cause with so much eloquence, said I unto her, that I cannot think you are fully perswaded, it is as you say: Seriously (said she) I think as I say, and I do not think my self deceived; for indeed, from whence do you think proceeds the fantasticalness and inequality, wherewith Poets, Musicians, Painters, and all those who make profession of the Liberal Arts are charged? Have they not all their raptures? Do you think the Rules of Poetry, the instruments of Musique, colours and Pencils, are tyed to the same evenness of temper? Fie no, not at all; but the very same temper which makes the highest Poets, the greatest Musicians, and the best Painters, makes humours a little unequal and fantastical. Moreover, it is a gross error, to think that one alters humour always without cause or reason, and most certainly there are reasons which are not visible unto others, for when the imagination is quick, and the mind very sensible, a very small matter will be a great vexation: In my own particular, my very own thoughts will put me into a bad humour; and when I am not pleased with my self, I am never pleased with any, nor can I please others: But I pray, said I unto her, how is it possible, that having so much wit as you must needs have to speak as you do, you should not employ it to bridle the vexation of your humour, which alters the very air of your countenance, and which sometimes makes the sweetest and most amiable woman in the world become imperious, and as Peevish a thing as is imagineable? The reason is, said she, because I am such a lover of liberty, that I cannot be a slave to my own reason in a thing almost indifferent, and which does not expose me unto any crime; and also, my reason it self tells me, that I am obliged to change my temper; for as I do not know almost any one who has not some quality or other which is to be desired she had not, my friends ought to bear with my faults as I bear with theirs: This word Fault is very rough (replied Thrasiles) to express any quality that can be found in Lysidice: If you consult with Lyriana, replied she, I am confident she will think the word mild enough: Since you are not in your retting humour (replied I unto her) and that one may speak any thing unto you, I find it so strange a thing, you should be capable of such extream inequality, that I think it not rough enough, for you who can judg so clearly of others, who can make such good choice of your acquaintance, and who can hardly endure those who are but meanly qualified men: Ah Lyriana (said she) when did you ever see me fret or vex, but when I do see men that please me not, or that I have seen some such, or that I know I shall see Page 179 them, or that I only fear to see them: I beseech you Madam, replied Thrasiles, do me the honour to tell me, which of these four did cause the coldness in your face, when Lyriana and I entered?

As to that, said she, and laughed, I must ingeniously confess, that I do not know the reason. After such a sincere acknowledgment, we continued chiding Lysidice; who was in so good an humour that day, as that she was not at all angry. Presently after a friend of mine coming to fetch me from Lysidices, I left Thrasiles alone there; for Egesipes would needs carry me to my Coach, and went with me. I understood since, that Thrasiles finding such a favourable occasion, he would not let it slip, not knowing when he might find Lysidice, both alone, and in a good humour; also the last discourse with her did give him a good subject to talk unto her: and since I knew he was in love with her, I turned towards him at my going out, and told him thus; If to your misery (said I to him, and laughed) you be in love with Lysidice, I would advice you to tell her now as much; for in the humour she is now, I think you may tell her any thing without fear of anger: The counsel you give, replied Thrasiles, perhaps is more dangerous to follow then you imagine. Not at all (replied I, and laughed still) for as Lysidice useth to be angry at every thing when she is in the fretting humour: I am confident, she will not be angry at any thing when she is in the pleasant fit: After this I went out with Egesipes, and Thrasiles stayed. I understood since from himself, that as soon Lysidice and he had taken their seats, he resolved to discover himself, so that making use of my advice, as a Prologue to the business: As dangerous as the counsel of Lyriana is (said he unto her) yet Madam I will follow it: And after I have a long time adored you in silence, it is just you know what thoughts your beautie hath inspired me withal. I beseech you Thrasiles, replied she, do you think that the sharp language of Lyriana need engage you to give me anie sweeter; for I am confident she knows not what she said unto you, nor what you answered: I know not why Madam, replied he, you should speak so much of Lyriana; But for my part I do protest, I know very well what I do say; and that I never in all my life spake more sincerelie then now I do, when I assure you that there is none upon earth that loves you better then I do; and that I never loved anie neer so much as I do you: Fie Thrasiles, said she unto him, you have said too much to be believed; for I am confident you have loved three better then ever you loved anie else. Truth is, the first passions are ever most violent; and I think it may verie well be said, that the more often one loves, the less he knows how to love. I know not Madam, replied Thrasiles, whether it do often fall out so as you say; but I am most sure it is not so with me: for I loved Atalia much better then I loved her who caused my first passion; I loved Cleocrite much better then I loved Atalia, and I love Lysidice much better then them all three. Since you have told me the several degrees of your love unto three such amiable Ladies (replied she and smiled) I pray tell me also unto what point did you arrive in obtaining the love of them? I thought I had obtained the love of the first, replied he, and I was in hopes of obtaining the love of the other two, but did not obtain the love of anie of the three; yet for all this I must love the fair Lysidice, and not despair to obtain her love. Certainly, said she and smiled, to love and not be loved, is not so great a miserie as is reported, since you are so resolved to endure it so often. I beseech you, replied Thrasiles, hearken a little more seriously unto what I say: and do me the honour to tell me how you would have me live? I dare not undertake to regulate your life, answered she, but I shall be verie willing to regulate your words; for truly Thrasiles, you have spoke so much, that I cannot desire you should speak any more. Content your self therefore with the qualitie of my friend, and never offer to perswade me that you are my Lover: Moreover, I must tell you, that you would not be so happie as you imagine, if I should suffer you to love me. For first, you may be assured, that though I would have you love me above all the world, yet I would do all that ever is in my pow[er] never to love you again. But I beseech you Madam, said he unto her, did you not con[demn] indifference in Cleocrate? 'Tis true, said she, and I condemn it to you, for I would have had her to love you, but it should have been by virtue, and not by insensibility. This distinction, replied he, is verie nice; but though there cannot be a more miserable condition then to love, and not be loved by the person one loves: yet Madam, I would with all my heart, that the fair Lysidice were once put to the necessitie of striving not to love me. You see, (said she and laughed) that I begin it now; since I do what I can to believe you do not love me; and that you speak as you do, only because Lyriana hath engaged you. Oh Madam, replied Thrasiles, do me not so much wrong; for if you do, I shall be induc[ed] Page 180 to tell all the world I love you, to the end you may not be ignorant of it: Take heed, replied she, lest you do as you say, for though it be true you do love me, yet I had rather know it only my self, then that every one should know it, not that I would make any such secret of your Passion as should be advantageous to you, but because I do hate above all things in the world, that any one should be known unto the Court to be my Lover; for if I would treat him ill, it were good for him they should not know it; and if I would treat him well, it would be good for me they did not know he loved me, lest they should suspect I love him; therefore Thrasiles, if you do not love me, you ought not to tell any that you do, since that would be to tell an unprofitable lye; and if you do love me, yet you ought not to tell it, for whether I should be mild or rigorous, it is equally requisite that this pretended Passion be kept close: Then Madam, said Thrasiles, I will tell it unto none but your self, and provided you will be pleased to let me tell it unto you, I will be silent unto all the world besides: I beseech you Thrasiles (said Lysidice to him) either hold your Peace, or talk of something else; for believe it, my crabbed humour will come upon me if you continue any longer: Then Madam, it's best for me to leave you before it come (said he unto her) And indeed Thrasiles seeing company coming in as he said so, did retire, not knowing whether he was more to hope or to fear, yet he thought himself very happy, in that he had discovered his love unto Lysidice; but the Gods do know, his happiness did not last long, for this changeable humoured woman was so ill saltisfied with her self after Thrasiles was gone from her, and thought that she had spoke too kindly unto him, as to repair that fault, she resolved to treat him the most sharply the next time she saw him: And indeed she was as good as her word, for she would scarcely look upon him, or answer him when he spoke; yet Thrasiles could not that day discern perfectly whether this rigid usage from Lysidice, was only a simple effect of her unequal humour, or proceeded from what he had spoke unto her the last time: But a few daies after I gave him light in the business, as I am going to tell you: You must know Madam, that going to Lysidice, I found her in her Mothers Chamber, where there was so many women, that there was scarce any room for me, but there was not one man amongst them all.

I cannot relate every particular passage of their discourse, but I must confess it was not very pleasant, for it was composed only of this and that dress, and of such trifles; and I may very well say, that I never in my life heard so much spoken, and to so little purpose. I easily perceived that Lysidice was in a fretting humour, and perceived it with delight: because it was a kind of whetstone to her wit. As she was very weary of this tumultuous company, which went against the grain of her inclination, one of her Cozens came in, But the most observeable thing was, that though this man who came in was far from one of the finest wits, but of a very common form of men, yet the discourse did presently alter, and became more regular, more witty, and more pleasant, though there was not alteration at all in the company, but only this man, who was none of the best Speakers: The truth is, though I cannot give a true reason for it, they talked of other things, and much better, and the very same persons who before did weary me, as well as Lysidice did now extreemly delight me. However, when all the company was gone, I stayed with Lysidice, who seeing her self at liberty, did upon a sudden lay aside her crabbed humour, and assumed her pleasant: Well Lyriana, said she unto me, do you yet condemn me for preferring the company of men before the company of women? and must it not needs be confessed, that if all were written down that fifteen or twenty women together should talk, it will be the most pitiful book in the world: I do confess (said I unto her and laughed) that if all I heard this day were written, it would be found a very fantastical piece: For my part, said she, I am almost mad at my own Sex, especially when I am in company whose talk is all of dresses, of household-stuff, of Jewels, and such like; not but that I would have such things talked of: for truly I have sometimes so well dressed my self, as I should be glad to be told of it; and sometimes my Gown is so rich and well made, that I love to hear it commended; but I would have such things spoke of but selldome, that they should talk of them handsomly, as it were by the by, without making it the main business, and not as certain women I know, who make it the whole business of their lives, to talk of such things, and never think of any thing else; and yet do think upon them with so much irresolution, as that they have not yet determined the question in their minds, whether the Red becomes them better then the Blue, or the Yellow, then the Green: I must confess Madam, Lysidices discourse did make me laugh, and the more Page 181 because there was a Lady in Cumes, whose mind was wholly upon such things, and never talked of anie thing else: whose greatest glorie did consist in the guilding of her Palace, in the richness of her householdstuff, in the fineness of her clothes, and fairness of her jewels. After I had laughed heartilie at Lysidices discourse, I would needs take the Ladies part in general, and told her that there were as manie men as women, whose companie and dis[course] was not verie pleasing. Doubtless, replied she, there are some whose companie and talk is intolerable, but yet there is this advantage in them, that one may more easily be rid of them: nor is one obliged to observe an exact civillite towards them.

But Lyriana, said she, this is not my meaning: for the thing I say is, that the most amiable women in the world, when manie of them are by themselves together, and not a man amongst them, do use to talk of nothing worth a straw, and wearie one another more then if they were by themselves. But it is not so amongst men of able and accomplished parts: Their conversation, its true, is not so pleasant without Ladies, as with them, yet though it be more serious, it is more rational: For my part, replied I, I could live very contentedlie, though I never saw anie but women, provided they were such as Lysidice. To answer your civillite, replied she, I could be as well contented as you, provided my companie were all Lyriana's: But for all that, one to one, two to two, or three to three at the most makes the best companie; for I had rather see none then twelve to twelve. Yes Lyriana, (pursued she with the pristiest anger in the world) though there were a dozen Lyriana's in the world, I should not desire to see them altogether everie daie, unless there were two or three men amongst them. For though I never heard anie impertinencies proceed from you in my life, yet I am confident that if there were twelve of you, there would: or else you would do like manie of hers, who sit and say nothing, but makes conversation languishing and wearisom: The truth is Lyriana, unless you dissemble you must confess, that there is something in it, which I cannot tell how to express, that makes one accomplished man more to divert and please a companie of Ladies, then the most amiable women of the world can do: I shall go further then this also; for I will maintain, that if there be but two women together, unless they be intimate friends to each other they will be less pleas[ed] then they would be, if each of them were talking with a man of spirit and wit whom they had never saw before: Judg therefore, if I have not reason to murmure against my Sex in general. But I do wonder (said I to her and smiled) since the societie of men is so necessary, that you do not manage the companie of Thrasiles better: for I perceive you treat him with as much sharpness as if you intended to banish him. Thrasiles (replied she and blushed) is questionless a very compleat and pleasing man: but he hath given me such cause to complain against him, as that I cannot pardon him: & I should more easily pardon him, if I were not in the humor in which now I am. Since I had a great desire to know how the case stood between Thrasiles & Lysidice, and since this she told me did much augment my curiositie, I pressed her to tell me what he had done; so that she desiring to be rid of my importunity without telling me directly what she thought. Thrasiles, replied she, hath or would have done a thing which would have displeased me the most of any thing in the world. This is a verie fine accusation (said I unto her) for you know not whether Thrasiles hath or would have committed a fault. However it be, said she, he is culpable; for you must know that in all probabilitie he endeavoured to deprive me of my dearest friend, and the man whom of all the world did please me best: and he hath made me so to fall out with him, as I shall be constrained to see him no more. I confess Madam, Lysidice spoke this with such an air, that my curiositie was higher then I could devise whom she should mean; I named two or three whom I knew to be her friends, and She alwaies answered mean; I named two or three whom I knew to be her friends, and She alwaies answered that I could not guess him: and to puzzle me the more, She seemed to wonder that I could not hit upon him: But, said I, who is this friend with whom you must break, and with whom Thrasiles hath made you quarrel? He is such a one, replied she, as hath not only made me out of conceit with him, but out of conceit with my self also. I must conf[ess], said I unto her, that I cannot understand you; for if Thrasiles have told you anie thing concerning this friend, which gives you matter of complaint against him, why you doth grieve for him? Because, answered Lysidice, that I had rather not have known the crime which Thrasiles hath revealed unto me, then to be deprived of him who did com[mit] it: But (said I innocently unto her) Can you not wink at it as if you knew it not? for so he do not know that you know it, you are not obliged in point of honour to punish him. If Thrasiles should know, replied She, that I could pardon such a crime, I should be extreemly ashamed. But, replied I, though I must not know the criminal, yet may I not Page 182 know the crime? No (answered she and smiled) you must not know it now: Yet I do wish, said I unto her, that Thrasiles whom I made you acquainted with were not so much out of your favour; and I must confess, that I cannot well see by your words why you should treat him as you do: If I should speak so plain as to be understood (replied she and laughed) doubtless then you would understand me, but since I spake purposely that you should not understand me, you will hardly find me out. Really Lysidice, said I unto her, You are a verie strange woman; and it may be said, that in this business you are both one of the most dissembling Persons, and one of the most sincere in the world: Since you both commend me and blame me (replied she) I conceive, that I ought neither to thank you, nor complain against you; yet do not think, that I keep this secret from you, ibecause I do not think you worthy to know my heart; but the reason is, because accord[ing] to inequality of humour wherewith you have so often upbraided me, there are some daies on which I make a secret of every thing, and others, on which I keep close nothing. But Madam, I could not perswade Lysidice to tell me directly: So that not being obliged to observe fidelity with one who would not trust me; I must confess, I was very impatient to see Thrasiles, and to get out of him what I could not out of her, desiring to do a good office between them, and to make them friends.

So that the next morning, chance bringing Thrasiles to see me, I began to ask him what he had done to incense Lysidice so much against him? How, replied Thrasiles, hath Lysidice complained of me to you? Yes (replied I, seeming to know more then I did) But why did you tell her that which you told her the other day? What I told her, replied Thrasiles, ought rather to have obliged, then to have angered her: But Lyriana, I pray tell me what she did tell you concerning me? For heavens sake, if you know the cause of her coldness to me, do not conceal it; for I do profess, I cannot understand why any thing I said unto her should provoke her to treat me as she did: I must confess Madam, that when I heard Thrasiles say so, I thought that he had indeed advertised Lysidice, how some one of her friends had either done or said something which deserved her anger, and that it was out of this reason he should say, he never said any thing unto her which might provoke her to treat him as she did: So that without moving him to tell me what I desired to know, I told him that Lysidice complained against him for causing her to lose one of her dearest friends. This accusation did at the first surprize Thrasiles, but afterwards he thought that Lysidice, because she would not tell me that he had spoken unto her of his Love, had invented this little lye to excuse it: So that giving no credit unto my words, he told me, that it was impossible Lysidice should think so of him, for he had been so far from making her lose any friend, that he ever wished all the world did adore her: She did not say (replied I, being angry that I was not credited) that you made her fall out with this friend; but she said, that you have either done or spoken something which hath made that friend fall out with her: I understand you worse then I did before (replied Thrasiles) do for I know that I am not naturally any Mischief-maker, nor any Tale-teller; and I am sure, I never spoke any thing of any body unto Lysidice: Certainly then, replied I, some or other hath done you an ill office to her: But Lyriana (said he and interrupted me) you think you did rightly understand her? Yes certainly Thrasiles, said I; and let me tell you, that if you do not quickly justify your self, you will be excluded out of her fa[vour]: How can I justify my self, answered he, of an accusation which I understand not? To give you a good occasion, replied I, I will permit you to tell her, how I acquainted you that she complained against you, and that she said you were the cause of her falling out with one of her dearest friends; since she did not make her complaints any secret, but on the contrary, made a mysterie of a thing which she might well have imparted to me, I am willing you should tell her it was I who told you, and so you may justify your self: I spoke this so confidently unto Thrasiles, that he could not chuse but believe me; and fancying more sweetne*s that Lysidice should be offended at him for any thing else, rather than at the Declaration of his love, he resolved to go the next morning unto her, and did so, and he we it so opportunely, that he found her alone: Since I hear from Lyriana Madam, said he unto her, that you make some complaints against me, and that you accuse me for causing you to lose one of your dearest friends, I come to know Madam whether it be true: Yes (replied she sharplie) I did say all that Lyriana told you, but I have not yet said all I think upon the business: Why Madam (replied Thrasiles) Can you say that I did ever make you lose any friend, I who have ever spoke enough to make all the world love: You have spoke that unto me, replied she, which is enough to Page 183 make all the world love: You have spoke that unto me replied she, which is enough to make me break off with him. I would gladly know Madam, replied he, who this friend is, unto whom I have unwittingly done so ill an office: You shall quickly know him, said she, and all the world shall know that I will see him no more. But Madam, answered he, if this friend be faulty, you are unjust to grieve for him, and punish me: Lyriana, replied she, hath already said as much as you, but to no purpose: for I have better reasons then either of you for what I do. For Heavens sake Madam, replied Thrasiles, tell me who this friend is, who on my score hath lost your favour? It is your self, (replied she, and blusht for anger) who might have enjoyed my friendship as long as you had lived, and who hath forced me against my will to banish you, and also who hath deprived me for ever of your company, which was verie pleasing, but which now is odious unto me. How Maidam, answered Thrasiles, in a great amazement, Am I he? Yes certainly, replied She, You are, I beseech you Madam, said he, what did I ever say against my selfe that could move you to hate me? You have told me, said She, that you loved me, and that is enough. Yet I would gladly know, replied he, whether your anger proceeds from because I love you, or from because I was so bold as to tell you so: It proceeds, answered She, from because you told me so: for to be sincere, one cannot be angry at being loved,

Then Madam, replied, Thrasiles, if it be not my passion which incenceth you, but only my bad expressions of it which angers you, I will not Madam, speak anie more, and be contented to let you know it by my looks, by my services, and by all my actions. If you had done thus before, replied she, we had been friends: but since what's past cannot be undone, I must do as I resolved: And indeed this was all that Thrasiles could obtaine of Lysidice that daie, and he parted from her in a belief that she would cast him off. Lysidice also for her part, thinking to see him no more. After Thrasiles was gone from her, he came to me, who was extreemly desirous and impatient to know who this friend was who Lysidice was so much out with: Well Thrasiles, said I unto him, do you now know the name of him, unto whom you have done such ill offices? Yes Lyriana, said he, I do know him; and I come hither to tell you and to desire your pitie for him. You see then, replied I, that I did not lie: Nor do I think, said She, that you told the truth. For Heavens sake, said I unto him, explain this riddle. Thrasiles then, seeing I was very earnest with him; and hoping for some pitie from me, began to acquaint me with his love to Lysidice: and afterwards to tell me of the passage between them, letting me understand that this friend whom Lysidice would banish, and himself, were both one and the same. Thrasiles had no sooner told me this, but I began extreemly to pitie him: Alas Thrasiles, said I unto him, how infinitely do I pitie you for being in love with Lysidice? Rather pitie me good Lyriana, said he, because she does not love me, and not because I love her: I assure you answered she, I pitie you for both causes, and I know not whether or no you would be less miserable in her hate or in her love: for really Thrasiles, considering the peevish inequality of her humours, I do foresee you would be intolerably puzzled to endure them. Alas, replied he, so she would let me love her, I would endure them all. After this, I used all my arguments to dissuade Thrasiles from any longer loving Lysidice, but all in vain. How(ever, he desired me to let him lament the miseries which he foresaw he was probably to endure; and I consented unto him. And indeed, after this, there grew a great amitie betwixt him and me; insomuch as I dare say, that I knew his most secret thoughts. But to return unto Lysidice, you must know that though she resolved to banish Thrasiles; yet there was so much giddiness in her humour, that she altered her mind: And Madam, not to trouble you with too much impertinacies, Thrasiles was not banished: And Lysidice became one day in so sweet a humour, that She suffered him to love her: yet I think it may very well be said, that She allowed him this favour, to make him resent the toyishness of her humours with more sorrow. And indeed, I believe there was not a day after this on which Thrasydes did not find the truth of my predictions, in saying that his love to Lysidice would cost him abundance of sorrow: yet I must needs confess, that all his hours were not equally ill, but I think I may verie well say, he suffered more in loving Lysidice, then he had done in loving all the three which formerly rained in his heart: and that the foolery of the first, the engagement of the second, and the insensibility of the third, did not put him to so much trouble, as the inequality of Lysidices humours: For indeed he never knew in what state he stood, and could never tell in what disposition to find her mind, when he came to her. He thought some days that he had a deep share in her heart: She Page 184 would impart a hundred particular passages unto him in a most sweet and obliging manner, insomuch as he would think himself sure of her affection: But at next meeting the case would be most miserably altered, and he would find her the most harsh, peevish, austere, and cold woman in the world.

And I must go a little further, and tell you how it was even ordinary for her to go into her Closet in a very good humour, and come out in an extreame bad one: And to set forth her unequal humours a little higher yet; She has several times had several discourses with Thrasiles, and has not ended with the same humour she begun, though there was no occasion in the earth given, which could make her change it. When She was in the good fit, she would commend all that Thrasiles did, and nothing could anger her: and when she was in the bad, She would find fault with every sillable he spake, and would be angry at everie thing: sometimes she would complain of his passion, that it made too great a noise in the world: at other times She would have him do a hundred things to publish it, and She would very often quarrel with him for obeying her own commands. I remember one day amongst the rest when Lysidice was the most charming person upon earth, and the most complaisant, and falling into discourse of Feasts, Pleasures, and Walks, before five or six persons whom she loved very well, every one propounded their own diversion according to their own pallate, so that Lysidice in her turn, after she had hearkned unto the phancies of others, She began to coment upon them, and said that there was not one in all they had proposed which had not some inconveniencie in them. As for dancing, said She, The trouble in matters of dressing themselves, the crowd one finds there, the setting up late, the spite to see another dance more, and to be more applauded, all these surpass the pleasure of it. As for musique, it moves melancholy, or at least does so take up the spirits, that so long as it lasts, they can do nothing but hearken: also the pains of commending the musique does alwaies follow the pleasure. As for Grand-feasts, they are intolerable by reason of that glutting abundance in them, and by reason of that prodigious variety, which in having so much to chuse of, doth take away the liberty of choise: yet acknowledging that walking came nearest her inclination, provided it was in delicious places and choise company; yet notwithstanding to content all the world, she could fancy such a feast, as should have all those pleasures which they had proposed, without anie of the inconveniences which follow them. I pray, said I unto her, how would you contrive the business? First, said she, I would make choise of a most rare Garden, wherein were many murmuring and cooling Fountains, excellent Statues, shady Walks, open and airy Alleys, great Borders but of Flowers, close Arbors, and all that's excellent for a Garden: Also I would have it near a fair house: But after all this, I would have the libertie of naming all the persons to be present, whom I would order so handsomly in my choise, as they should not be weary of me, as I should not be weary of them, nor they wearie of one another. After this not to be troubled with too much tricking and dressing: I would have all the Ladies there undressed: that there should be onlie so many Coaches as not to make a throng, that the dividing of companies should be sutable, and that every Coach should be filled with those who love best to be together: that none should be put to rise too soon in the morning: and that every one should come to the place, just to have so much time as to see the house before they sit down, and no more.

Moreover, I would have the meat to be most exquisitely good without anie superfluitie: Then order should be observed, and that the odour of flowers should take away the smell of a feast. All dinner while I would have such musique as is more fit to exhilarate the spirits, then to molifie the heart: also I would have the musique in a loft by themselves, and not too near. After all this, I would have us pass into a cool handsom Chamber, and talk, till the Sun gives us leave to walk; after which everie one should follow their own inclinations, and chuse those places they like best. When night came, I would have us sup as we dined, but in a place where the murmur of Fountains might be heard: at rising from table, I would have return to walk again, and to content those who affected dancing: I would have two or three hundred chrystal Lamps fixed in every Tree in a large Walk, to make the night day: Then to let the musique draw near, and those that affected dancing, let them dance: without anie hinderance to those that had a desire to sit down under a purling fountain, to follow their own humours. After which, without going too soon, or staying too late, I would have us return to Cumes, fully satisfied with all innocent delights, without anie trouble and puzzle as usually follows such entertainments.

Page 185Lysidice having done, every one agreed that such a journey as she expressed would be very pleasing; But said Thrasiles, to imagin such a thing is not enough, but it must be really effected before it be pleasant: For my part, said he, I will provide the Garden, the Musique, and two repasts, in which shall be no superfluity. Lysidice hearing this offer, was the first who accepted of it, and so it was a thing resolved upon. Thrasiles taking upon him the charge and care of all the Feast, and Lysidice the choise of all the persons, who indeed were such as pleased her; at last they all had Summons, the day was appointed, Thrasiles ordered all things according to Lysidices expressions, excepting what related to the Table unto which he did not keep within his prescribed limits, for he was more magnificent in them.

The day of this pleasure being come, all the Ladies were readie, and all the Coaches provided, but upon a sudden the whimsey did so take Lysidice, that after she had made a new Gown for that day, which was as gallant and gay as possible: After I say she was drest, after she had put on her Hood, and ready to go, She changed her mind; She undrest her self, and went to bed, praying me to make her excuses unto the companie, saying She was not well; but after I received this message, in lieu of doing as She bad me, I went unto her, and found her more waspish and melancholy then ever I saw her in my life. Since I understood by her women in the outer Chamber that she was well enough, and not at all sick, I went to her bed-side, I drew the Curtain, and set open the Windows: Let me look in your eyes, said I unto her, and there see whether your disease be real or dissembled, for it is by them better then your tongue, that I can know it.

But Madam, in lieu of finding the least languishing paleness, I saw a fresh complexion, her hair so cured, that much pains and art had been used, so that without any answer: No, no Lysidice, said I, I am sure you are not sick, and therefore you must rise and go along with us, and I will not let you be at rest till you rise. At first she answered me in a pitiful tone, but after she saw I did not believe her, she confessed she was not sick, but only said so, because she would not go with us: Fie, fie Lysidice, said I unto her; after you your self proposed the business, after you have made choise of the Persons, after you have engaged Thrasiles unto much care and charge, all which he is at only for the love of you, can you put off thus? Fie, fie Lysidice, I profess I cannot endure it, and you shall absolutely go with us: Were this Feast made for any other then my self, replied she, I would go to it; but since I know it is intended only for me, I neither will nor can go, for I know that theres nothing does more put one out of countenance, then to be the Lady of the Feast: But I pray Lysidice, said I unto her, did you not know it was only intended for you, when it was first resolved upon? Yes, said she, and engaged my self before I had well considered upon it. But did you not consider upon it this morning before you dressed your self, said I? No, said she, for as my woman as she was dressing me, told one, how one of the Ladies who was to be present should say, that she was not at all obliged unto Thrasiles for this Feast, but whollie unto me; this did so vex me, that I saw I had been verie rashlie inconsiderate in suffering Thrasiles to make this Feast, and that it was the most impertinent thing in the world to make my self beholding unto a man for all the pleasures which he give unto a great companie, and for the satisfaction which men will receive, unto whom it is not intended: The truth is, I must be the debtor unto Thrasiles for all this Feast if I go unto it, for the Musique, for the Dancing, and even to the very charges of the Candles, for the verie coolness of the evening, and murmur of the Fountains. Fie Lyriana, this must not be, and I had much rather pay for all, then to acknowledg my self a debtor, as needs I must if I go; therefore Lyriana, as well as I love you, I must not be beholding unto Thrasiles for all the pleasures he provides you this day. Is it possible, said I unto her, that Lysidice should say so? Yes, replied she, and more then that, for Lysidice is as resolute in it, as ever she was of any thing in all her life. Then you make Thrasiles, said I unto her, most desperately sad: There will be so much good company (answered she) as he may verie easilie comfort himself without mine: You were rightlie served (said I unto her) if he did, for he must needs be sensible of the affront which you put upon him: Let him do what he will, said she, so you will go and leave me at quiet. But Lysidice, said I unto her, though you do not consider Thrasiles, yet consider your self, and think how your humour will be talked on: Let them say what they please, replied she, so they will let me do as I will. As she pronounced these last words, Thrasiles came in, and was astonished to find her in bed. Since he knew her now as well as my self, he imagined that this was onlie a fantastical humour, yet at Page 176 first he did not express his thoughts. only asked her, how it came to pass she was such a sluggard, yet adding with a smile, that it was in some sort but just she should make them stay for her, on purpose to let them see that the Feast was prepared for her: It will appear, said she, that I have no great share in it, since I will not be there: I beseech you Madam, said he unto her, how comes this sudden alteration to pass since last night? Never accuse Lysidice of any alteration (said I in an angry mood) since she hath no reason in the world for it, but that she is still her self. Then did she tell Thrasiles that she was not well, but he did not believe her, and he Courted her in the sweetest and most persuasive language in the world, not to refuse him this favour, but all was in vain. Thrasiles then seeing all his persuasions and arguments could not prevail, proposed unto her to put it off until another day, but she did with abundance of violence forbid it. Then was Thrasiles so vexed, as he said, that since she would not go, he would not go neither; and for above half an hour I was in a belief, that neither she for whom the Feast was made, nor he that made it, would be present at it.

But in conclusion She was so earnest with Thrasiles, that he himself should go, and She herself to stay behind, that obey her he must, and accordingly went unto this Feast without her. You may imagine Madam, in what a sullen humour Thrasiles was in all that day, yet he did bear out this peevish passage with abundance of patience, and as inconstant as he was reported to be, he did not desist from loving Lysidice, though in my opinion he had verie great cause; but on the contrary, he desired me to tell all the company, that Lysidice was really sick, lest they should speak something of her which might be disadvantageous unto him. But the oddest Passage of all was, that the next day she would needs persuade him most unjustly, that he was very merry at the Feast, though he never seemed so melancholy in all his life, and charged him with a crime for obeying her in the entertainment of those Ladies which she herself made choice of. However, her waspish humour being over, She easily appeased Thrasiles. But since it was not possible the fantastical humour of Lysidice should be concealed, She made the love of Thrasiles to her more apparent, insomuch as one who was an Enemy unto Lysidice, and had a squint eye herself upon Thrasiles, did give it out, that Thrasiles did not only love Lysidice, but also that Lysidice suffered Thrasiles to love her: And She spoke this before so much company, that some friend of Lysidices did acquaint her with it: So that She never considering that it was only the reports of an Enemy, did take the matter as hainouslie, as if it had been the vulgar talk of all the Court, and charged Thrasiles never to see her again, yet She did a little moderate her doom, and confined him only not to see her at her own house: So that Thrasiles, who was all obedience, sought out all occasions of comfort to himself in seeing her at other places, either in the Temple, or in the Walks, or at other visits which she made, insomuch as though he did not see her at her own house, yet he saw her very often; but he did not long enjoy this favour with any tranquillitie for Lysidice, growling into a worse mood, began to be very harsh to him, and to think that he slighted her, since he came not to see her, though She positively commanded the contrary, and though he never in his life loved her more. In the mean time, Thrasiles seeing himself so coarsely treated, could not devise unto what to attribute the cause, and I believe would never have found it, unless he had by chance come unto <...> when Lysidice was there, where casually I was speaking of a man in Court who was one of my friends: One of your friends (replied Lysidice sharply) how can that be, since I never see him with you? I do not say, replied I, that he is in the first rank of my friends; yet however, since I see him almost every day in several places, I may say he is my friend: Oh Lyriana, said she, you do strangely mistake your self; for it is my opinion, that though I should see you every day at Philoxenes house, and not at mine, I should look upon you only as my friends friend, and not my own. But if Lyriana should only aim at seeing Lysidice in Philoxenes Chamber, replied Thrasile, what would you think of her then, I would then think, replied She, that She might have spared her labour, for I am not at all obliged unto her for it: There is such a notable difference between visits at ones own house, and visits at anothers house, one is not Mistress of the conversation, but must submit in civillitie to the pleasure of her whose house it is. Moreover, when one is not at home, one is obliged to see a thousand persons whom they care not for meeting with, and who sometimes desire not to be seen. So that the humour taking me, as oft it doth, I shall be a whole after noon and not speak a word; and there is so great a difference between Lysidice in her own Chamber, and Lysidice in anothers, as one would say she was two Lysidices: Yet (replied Page 187 I and laughed) yet there is not necessity of being so different in your self: However it be, said She, it cannot be denied, but that it is incomparably more sweet to have good company at home, then any where else; and that any one is fuller of life and spirit in ones own Chamber, then in anothers. According to your Maxims Madam, replied Thrasiles, I am only to be the friend of your friend; You need not doubt it, replied She, and from this verie hour I will look upon you as Lyriana's friend and not mine; for I do profess and declare unto you, that all the men I find abroad, do never make any particular impression upon my heart, and it would be an Age before I should look upon them as having any right unto their amitie, but should rank such men in the Catalogue of my acquaintance, and not of my friends. But I beseech you Madam, replied Thrasiles, if one do forbid any one of their friends to come unto their house, does such a friend lose the glorious title and quality of friend, by being obedient unto their commands? Yes, replied She, if such a one will willingly be obedient in such a thing as might be disobeyed, without disobliging her who did command it. I know one of your friends, replied he, unto whom I will give this counsel: Be not too hasty, said she, for perhaps the counsel which I give in general, is not good for him you speak of in particular. The truth is Madam, Thrasiles did easily understand her, for since he had a mind to go the next day unto Lysidices, she did treat him most abominably ill, and told him, that since he would scarce ever see her at her own house, he should not see her any where else, so that there was a fearful quarrel between them; but for all this, it ended to the apparent advantage of Thrasiles; for since that, he obtained leave to see her at her own house, as before. But Madam, it was to torment him more then ever he was before; for I am confident, that there was not one day on which the inequality of this fantastical woman did not torment him with a new punishment, the greatest cruelty was, that she would so smooth him up with her sweet and pleasant hours, that he could not for his life disengage his mind: For truly (said he one day unto me when I was persuading him to desist) were She always in her ill humours, I could easily break those bands which tie me to her service: But Lyriana, did you but know how amiable She is when She pleaseth, you would not wonder I should love her, maugre her fantastical inequality, and her good hours forceth me to endure her bad ones with patience. In the mean time I plainly see, this sweetness serves only to make me the more miserable. Thus Madam did Lysidice live with Thrasiles, who did a long time endure her impertinent inequalities; and I am verie confident, that any other would have forsook her sooner, yet I am most confidently persuaded, that until this last passage, he loved her in spite of her humours, but for it, he was not able to endure it, and certainly he had good reason; For Madam, be pleased to know, that Thrasiles taking her in the critical minute, when she was all sweetness and civillities, he won her to let him ask the consent of her Parents unto her Marriage with him. He had no sooner obtained this libertie, but being even ravished with joy, he went unto Niside, (for Father he had none long since) and moved her to transact with him. Niside who was extremely tender of her Son, did give him all desirable satisfaction, and spoke of it unto Lysidices Parents, who liked very well of this Alliance. So that imagining Thrasiles would never have put her upon this motion, unless he had known her mind before, they accepted the Proposition with much joy, not at all questioning but Lysidice would like of it as well as themselves; but it was not as they imagined: For Madam, this sickle humoured woman having altered her mind, since Thrasiles left her, disliked of that which before she approved of. 'Tis true, She writ a Letter of Revocation unto him, but he did not receive it until a quarter of an hour after he had received the favourable answer which Lysidices Parents gave unto Niside. I leave you to judge Madam, how this surprized Thrasiles, but his astonishment was much greater when he understood how Lysidice had declared herself that She would not marry, and when he understood that the Parents of this uncertain woman came to Niside with a hundred excuses for engaging themselves so far as they had done, before they knew the mind of her who had the greatest interest in the business. Judge Madam, how Thrasiles should resent this affront which Lysidice put upon him, and whether he had not good cause to leave loving her; his anger was so great, that he made a solemn oath never to go unto her again, but absolutely to break off with her; yet I do verily believe, he would have violated his oath, had not I prevented him; but since I knew he would never find any joyes in this most alterable humoured woman, I did so confirm him in his design, that he resolved to execute it. Since he had already found by experience, that absence was a good remedie against such diseases, he left Cumes, and at parting left this Letter for Lysidice, which contained these words.

THRASILES unto LYSIDICE.

Madam,

Since in loving you with a most constant violence, ever since I began to serve you, I cannot obtain your love: Perhaps in changing my mind, you will change also, and perhaps grieve for your loss: However, I depart from Cumes with a most strong resolution never to return until I have quite banished you out of my heart: Be most confidently assured, that if ever you see me again, it shall be without the least spark of love unto you: And if you never see me, it is because I cannot rid my heart of the most fervent passion that ever any was capable of.

THRASILES.

When Thrasiles, gave me this Letter for Lysidice, I know he desired an answer: but I must confess, I would not press her for one, lest if it should be writ in one of her good moods, it might re-engage him to love her, yet since he wished that she had it, I did deliver it, and made her read it in my presence: After which, I began to chide her a thousand times, and pressed her to tell me, why she would ever grant Thrasiles any such permission as She did, since it was against her mind. When I gave him that Permission, said She, I did really think it, and it was my very mind: But afterwards, when I considered this engagement which was to be as long as I lived, I found it fondness for one who could not tell in the morning what humour She should be in at night, to think that the same which pleased me now, should please me at the latter end of my life: so that it might perhaps have made me miserable, without contributing any thing unto the felicity of Thrasiles. For truly Lyriana, said She unto me, when I think upon the extreme perplexitie I am in, when the humour takes me in a place out of which I cannot get: and how grieved I should be if after I were married unto Thrasiles, I should change my mind, and repent; I must needs protest, that as much as I esteem him, I am verie glad he is out of Cumes: and shall hardly desire his return for the reason he expresseth in the conclusion of his Letter: yet Lysidice blushed as She pronounced these last words, and blushed so much as I could easily see her heart and her tongue were at odds. In the mean time I writ unto Thrasiles enough to cure him, yet for all that he was not so soon quit of that passion which tormented him: But during his absence I saw Lysidice remembered what he had writ, and believed that the reason why he returned not, was because he was still in love with her. That which induced me to think so, was, That Philoxene going into that Countrey where Thrasiles was, She came to bid me adieu just as Lysidice was in my chamber, so that falling into discourse of that solitude whereunto She was going, I told her that I thought her very happy in that She was to have the neighbourhood of such a most accomplished man as Thrasiles was. It's so long since he went out of Cumes, replied Philoxene, that it's very probable he will not stay long in the Countrey: Since you are in it, replied Lysidice, and smiled, its to be thought he will not so soon leave it: For my part (replied I purposely to let Lysidice know I understood her) I am not of your opinion: for I think it very likely Philoxene will make Thrasiles come sooner unto Cumes, then you imagine. I must confess, said Philoxene, I do not well understand your meanings; for me thinks you both do commend me, and yet speak contrary to each other: It's a Riddle, said I unto her, which happily you may explain hereafter: If She do not return until Thrasiles returns, replied Lysidice and laughed, it will be a long time before She know what you mean. After this, and much other discourse which I remember not Philoxene went away. But within a month after She was gone, as Lysidice and I were together, and coming o <...> of Atalia's house, who should we meet but Thrasiles, who saluted us very civilly as he passed by, but stayed not a jot with us. I no sooner saw him but I looked upon Lysidice, who as soon as ever She saw him changed colour: so that I turning to her, and speaking low lest our women should hear. Well Lysidice (said I unto her) did you think Thrasiles would ever return? Provided Philoxene did not send him, replied She, I do not care though he be returned: For my part, replied I, I care not upon what reason he return, so he think upon the end of his Letter which <◇> writ unto you. However it be, said She unto me, you would do me a great pleasure, if you would tell Thrasiles, I am much joyed at his return: I promise you I will, said I unto her, though on my conscience you are not so glad of it as you say you are. As we were thus talking, we came to a Ladies house unto whom we intended a visit: which done, Page 189 I waited upon Lysidice to her own house, and returned to my own, where Thrasiles stayed for me: I no sooner saw him, but I seemed very joyful at his return: But yet, said I unto him, before my joys be full, I must know whether you be returned free from this thing called Love: for if you be not, believe me, in lieu of rejoicing, I shall be extremely grieved.

Grieve then you must, said he unto me; for I was never more in love in all my life then now, and in all probabilities shall be so till death. Fie fie, Thrasyles, said I unto him, you are not so much Master of your self as I imagined, nor care I for the friendship of a man, who since he can so easily forget injuries, can as easily forget good offices: But Thrasiles said I, have you forgot how you writ unto Lysidice, that you would never retur unto CuImes until you had left loving her? Pardon me good Lyriana, said he unto me, for I have kept my word. You are not then in love, as you say you are, replied I. I am more in love Lyriana, said he, then I say I am; yes, much more then I am able to say: But, my dear Lyriana, it is with Philoxene, and not with Lysidice, whom spite and reason banished out of my heart, before Philoxene came into the Country. Though it be not my custom, replied I, to be very glad that anie of my friends should be in love; yet I profess I am infinitely joyed that you are in love with Philoxene, since it is an infallible argument you are not in love with Lysidice.

After this, I began to vaunt that I should so foretel his passion; and I related unto him what Lysidice and I had said when Philoxene came to bid me adieu: After this he acquain|ted me, how having seen Philoxene every day since she came into the Country with all the freedom which the Country could afford: he had seen her more in a month there, then he should have done in Cumes in a whole year: and that indeed he had found that in her alone which he had vainly sought for in those four persons which formerly he had loved. How Thrasiles, said I unto him, Are you not only in love, but loved also? No, replied he, you do not well explain my words, for my meaning is, that Philoxene hath more good qualitties then all the rest together have: And certainly Madam, Thrasyles had good reason thus to commend this lovely Widow, since questionless there cannot be a more accom|plished person. Doubtless he might have found one of as great beauty, and as much wit, and spirit; but never any so without fault. For truth is, she had none: her beauty was infinitely pleasing, her behaviour was high, noble, and modest; her Phisognomy spake goodness and sincerity: and there was such pritty mixture of mirth and seriousness together in her face, as did exceedingly become her: She had a million of charms in her hulmours, as many graces in her mind, and as many good qualities in her soul: virtue was alwayes the end she aimed at in all her actions: She affected glory, She is most tender to her friends, She serves them with joy, and never disoblighd any. It may be said her anger is an ornament unto her, in raising up some lovely blushes, but vanishing so soon as it will not give her time to do any injustice. It is impossible but to judg favourably of her: She is fair, She is young, She is rich, and She is a Widdow: She knows so well how to re|gulate her life, that her reputation is high, though her vertue be neither salvage nor aulstere; but on the contrary sweet and sociable. This Madam, was Philoxene, when Thrasilles began to love her, and this She is at this very day: yet I understand by him, that he durst not discover his passion unto her▪ but tells me, that he is fully perswaded She knows it, or at least suspects it. Since he came only unto Cumes upon some little business, and to let Lysidice know how he did not now love her, he stayed but three days, and returned to Philoxene.

To tell you how vexed Lysidice was, is not an easie matter, especially when Philoxene returned to Cumes, and Thrasiles followed her the next day; for when she perceived that he was in love with this fair one, She was vexed to the very soul. Then did she contract a great amity with Cleocrite, and both of them had a plot to make him pass in the world for the most unconstant man in it, hoping thereby to ruine him in the opinion of Philoxene: and indeed, I believe these reports which they had scattered abroad, did not do him much good nor hurt. But the great obstacle which Thrasiles met with in the mind of Philoxene, was not that: for indeed after he had served her a whole year with extream assiduity and fidelity, She saw he was far from inconstancie: But Madam the love She had to liberty, kept her from the reception of Thrasiles his services: I know she esteemed him above all men living, and that if ever she married, Thrasiles would be her choice: But yet, for all this favourable inclination which apparently she had to him, She did not chuse him, nor put him in any hopes: yet for all that Thrasiles whom they said was so unconstant, desist|ed not, but suffered all, because he did not find in her such things as stifles the very soul of Page 190 Love: As the foolerie of his first Mistress, the engagement of his second, the insensib|littie of the third, and the fantastical humours of the fourth: But he stood firm and con|stant to his loving her, and seemed as if he were resolved so to do as long as life was in him, and I am most confident it is true; for since Thrasiles loved Philoxene, his con|stancy hath been put unto all sorts of trials. First, it is certain, that Cleocrite and Lysidice either out of vanity, or malice, or some other reason, laid all the stratagems they could invent to disingage him for her, and to reduce him unto their services. Niside also for a while had a strong desire her Son should marrie one of the fairest Ladies in the world, and much richer then Philoxene, yet his passion resisted against all, even absence it self, for he was three whole moneths in Milete, where the greatest Beauties in the world re|side, yet he continued faithful, and returned to Cumes as much in love with her, as when he went away: Moreover, it cannot be said, that the favours of Philoxene did restrain him, for none could live more reservedlie, and use more severitie then She did to him, though without any rudeness or incivility. Thus Madam it must consequentie and neces|sarilie be concluded, that Thrasiles may very well pass for a verie constant man, though he have loved many Mistresses: Yet Madam, since friendship may be partial, I will suspend my judgment until you have pronounced your sentence. After Lyriana had finished her relation, Mandana did extreamlie commend her, and thanked her for her pleasing recital of Thrasiles his adventures, applauding her especiallie for epitomizing five several Loves into so short a method, as any one else would have made so many several stories. After which, asking Cyrus, the Prince Arta <...> , and Aglatidas in what rank she should repute Thrasiles, they would not give her any couns*, but would leave it unto her judgment: So that appointing to let Cleocrite, Lysidice, A <...> ia, and Thrasiles to enter, it was found that Lysidice having altered her humour, since She went out of the Chamber of Mandana, was gone away, and had carried At <...> <◇> her, and so there remained none but Thrasiles and Cleocrite, whose indifferent humour made her not care much whether Thrasiles should pass for a constant or an inconstant man; and accordinglie She came into Mandana's Chamber with Thrasiles, as pleasant as if She valued not the indifferencie whereof She imagined Lyriana had accused her. You see Madam, said she to the Princess Mandana, that as indifferent as they say I am, yet I am more full of revenge then either Lysidice or Atalia, since I my self do bring him in who is to be condemned: 'Tis more then you know, replied Thrasiles, whether I shall be condemned or justified: We shall know it presentlie, replied she, since it is the Princess who must teach me what I ought to think of you: I assure you, replied Mandana, that if you regulate your thoughts by mine, you will think nothing that is advantagious to him: For indeed, added the Princess, after a serious consideration of the several changes which hath been in Thrasiles, I do not find him so clear as I did imagine; therefore without either favour or injustice, I do doom him to be named

The unconstant man, without inconstancie.

The Judgment is so just, replied Cyrus, that I cannot think the fair Cleocrite will mur|mure at it, nor that Thrasiles will complain: Since the name of Inconstant is his doom, replied Cleocrite, I should be injurious to murmur: And for my part, said Thrasiles, since the most wise Princess in the world declares me to be without inconstancy, I have good reason to be satisfied, and to commend her Justice: Since I have pleased you both, replied Mandana, I have done more then I thought I should, but certainlie done that which I desired. As she said so, Philoxene entred, and Cleocrite went out: But as Man|dana observed that Anaxaris thought himself obliged by the favours she did unto Thra|siles, she took occasion to speak unto Philoxene in his behalf; and the occasion did the more fittie present it self, because Philoxene knowing that the Army was to march verie shortlie, she came unto the Princess, beseeching her to obtain from Cyrus a Protection for a fair house which she had, which stood just in the way they were to march. Cyrus for his particular, did so love to do all good offices for unfortunate Lovers, that he spoke very much unto Philoxene in behalf of Thrasyles, insomuch, as though she had till then very resolutely defended her liberty, both against Thrasyles, and against her own incli|nation, began now to <...> unto the Conquerour of Asia. And indeed Thrasiles did thrive so well under the <...> tion of Cyrus and Mandana, that within three daies after the match was made up, and their Marriage was honored with the presence of MandanaPage 191 and Cyrus, But though all the Ladies in Cumes were invited, there came none but Cleo|crite and Lysidice of all the Mistresses of Thrasiles: The first of these, because all things being indifferent unto her except pleasures, she would not lose such a feast of joy, and Lysidice, because coming thither accidentally, and being in a merry humor, she thought it would be most glorious for her not to express any sorrows for the loss of Thrasiles. In the mean time, those who were sent to the Xanthians, and the Caunians, being returned, and re|porting that they received all the conditions with joy, there was now no obstacle to the departure of Mandana, for such hast was made in the preparations of all things requisite to her journey, as that all things would be in readiness within a day or two. To loose no time, Cyrus gave out all necessary orders, either for the march of the Army, or for the departure of the two Fleets which were in the Port, or to dismiss the messengers from the Prince Philoxippes, and the Prince of Cicilie, with thanks to their Masters. But whilst hope did so nourish the joyes of Cyrus, as the engagement with the King of Assiria never troubled him; Mazares and Anaxaris seeing the dismal day of Mandana's departure drew neer, they were extreame|sad; for when they considered that the end of their voyage would be the beginning of felicity unto Cyrus, and the end of his miseries, their sorrows were beyond all expressions; yet there was abundance of difference between the thoughts of these two Rivals, and one and the same beautie, and one and the same Passi|on produced in them effects very unresemblant. Anaxaris without any hopes, was so bewitched with his passion, as he could not for his life resist it: But as for Mazares, he did so continually strive with himself and his passion, that it was impossible for man to do more. Anaxaris to be more in Love, if it were possible, did see the Princess as much as ever he could: Mazares on the contrary, was so afraid of a beauty which was above his virtue, as he did most carefully avoid all occasions of seeing her: Indeed, he had never any parti|cular discourse with this Princess, since she was delivered; but the night before their de|parture, Cyrus being busie in writing to the Queen of Corinth, to the Prince Philoxippes, to the Prince of Cicilie, and in giving orders for securing Cumes, and dispatching the De|puties from Susiana, so it happened, that Mazares being then with Mandana, he was insensibly ingaged to be alone with her. At first there was a great a silence observed be|tween them, for the Princess remembering how this Prince in whom she trusted had betrayed her, and how she never was alone with him since he carried her away, she began to blush, and Mazares for his part, seeing he was alone with that Princess whom he extremely loved, and whose greatest miseries he had caused, he found in his heart so much love, and so much shame both, as he was a long time before he could tell what to say unto her; but at last, not foreseeing what the sequel of his discourse would be, he began to speak unto this Prin|cess.

Though I doubt not Madam, said he unto her. but since you have honoured me with the promise of your friendship, and to let me enjoy it as I did at Babylon, you will be as good as your word, since I have kept mine with you; yet Madam, I cannot chuse but beg new assurances of it: For truly Madam, when I think how unworthy of it I have made my self. I dare not trust either unto your promises or your generosity; and methinks I have reason to fear, that since you cannot restore me to your esteem, you cannot restore me to your friendship. Since I find you the same at Cumes, replied Mandana, that you were at Babylon, I will quite forget all that passed at Sinope, and rank you amongst my dearest friends: The Crime I did commit against you was so great, replied Mazares, as I dare not hope you can forget it, unless you know something more that may extenuate it; for truly Madam, you do not yet know two things which I do most humbly beseech you to let me now acquaint you with, and which questionless will the more willingly induce you to re|store me unto that esteem and friendship which you are pleased to promise me. It is suffici|ent for that (replied Mandana) that you have repented, and that you are resolved to keep within those thoughts that now you have: No Madam, replied Mazares, my re|pentance is not enough, since it does only repair my Crime, but the two things which I have to tell you will lessen it: Then tell them, replied the Princess, for I assure you I should be very glad of new causes to esteem you: Since you are pleased to permit me Ma|dam, replied Mazares, I must tell you, that it was passion which made me <...> ninal against you. Methinks, replied Mandana, and blusht, that this is but a bad way to me to restore you unto my esteem and friendship, since it revives in my memory a thing which made you lose them: I beseech you Madam (replied Mazares, seeing the disorder in her face) do not fear that I will ever repent of my repentance, and do not imagine I pretend, that the Page 192 passion (whose grandure I would have you know) shall serve me unto any other end, then to lessen the crime which I committed in carrying you away. No Madam, I promise you never to tell you the thoughts of my heart as long as I live: and that I will never ask any thing from you but this esteem and friendship which you promised me: But for Heavens sake Madam, give me leave only once to tell you with what imperious violence you com|manded in my heart, when you ravished away my virtue.

This is a favour which Cyrus himself, if I asked would not deny; but would give me leave to tell it: for I profess Madam I desire not to talk to you of that love which made me criminal, out of hope of any recompence: but only to lessen my punishment, and to justify my self: I do not beg permission Madam, to tell you that I love you, I desire only to let you know, that I did love you to such a height, as that I was out of my wits when I carried you away from Sinope: To the end, that if you do not look upon me as a wicked wretch, who sinned without any provocation or repugnancy, you may the more easily keep your word with me. If to believe you loved me (replied the Princess) be all that's requisite, I had rather confess it, then doubt of it: to the end I may spare my self the pains of hearkening unto a discourse which cannot please me, nor be at all advantageous unto you: However Madam, said he, I beseech you let the greatness of my crime convince you of the greatness of my love which moved me to commit it. I pray Mazares, said Man|dana, and interrupted him, do not infuse any scruple in my mind, to poison that friendship and esteem I would have of you: and know, that the more you peswade me that you l|oved me, the more I shall think you did not love me, and the less share will you have in my friendship; therefore do not expose your self unto a thing which perhaps may make you lose it: For heavens sake Madam, replied Mazares, do not threaten me with such a dire adventure, but give me leave to acquaint you with my real thoughts; to the end you may entertain no unjust ones of me. Think Madam, I conjure you, that I would never speak any thing that should displease you: and that I court nothing but your esteem and friendship; and that I will eternally fight against my self in your behalf; that I will regulate my thoughts as I do my words: I will forbid my eyes to shew you the thoughts of my heart: and for a testimony of my reverent esteem of you. I will serve Cyrus as if I had never been his Rival. Judg Madam, after this, whether you can be so severe as to deny me the favour which I ask; for I protest Madam, that this is the last time of all my life that ever I will speak unto you concerning my self: I will engage my self never to pronounce the word Love in your presence: but I beseech you, let me assure you, that since love hath caused me to commit these crimes, that I could never have done it, unless it had been forced by such a violent passion, as that which forced me to forget my reverence of you. But for all this Madam, I must tell you, that never was repentance more real then mine- nor more fit to repair a great crime; for there is nothing upon earth which I would not do, rather then to give you the least cause of suspicion that I do entertaine one thought which might render my self unworthy of that glorious friendship, which you have done me the honour to promise me, & which I beg with all imaginable zeal, and possible respect. Mazares pronounced these words in such a serious manner, as Mandana having no mind to insult over a Prince whose passion only had made him miserable, did answer him with as much civility as virtue: and spoke unto him in such a generous manner, that if the love of Mazares had been capable of becoming friendship, he had made the exchange at her instance: But though he was not able to regulate the thoughts of his heart, yet he did as much as ever he could, and did regulate his words: And solemnly protested unto Mandana never to speak unto her again of that love he had unto her at Babylon; to the end She might give him new assurances of her esteem, and friendship, which Mazares received with joy, though not without a sigh: For truly if this Prince had been only the friend of Man|dana, She had given him language obliging enough to content him: but since he was still her Lover, it was impossible the friendship and esteem of this Princess should ever make him happy, though out of his reason and vertue he did look upon this friendship of hers as the utmost term of his desires, and limits of his hopes. In the mean time, the hour of their departure being come, Mandana after she had received the complements of all the Cumean Ladies, did mount into a glorious triumphant Chariot, none but Martesia with her; all the rest of her women being in another Coaches which followed her. Anaxaris who com|manded her Guard, did immediately follow; and as for Cyrus, Mazares, Artamis, and all the Volunders, they did m (<...>) a Body by themselves some twenty paces before Mandana The Prince Thrasibulus, T (<...>) anes, and Philocles, would not embarque until they Page 193 had waited upon Cyrus and Mandana a days journey out of Cumes, but they would by no means permit them, and they were forced to obey. The parting of Cyrus and Thrasibulus was very tender; as for Timochares, he charged him with so many obliging things to tell the Queen of Corinth, as it was evident he did highly esteem that Princess: he did not content himself with all this, but said more unto Philocles then unto Timochares: also he willed Ligdamis, Thrasibulus, Menecrates, Parmanides, and Philistion, to leave him, and to return unto those who for his sake they quitted as soon as they married them: There was not one of them upon whom he did not bestow a thousand thanks and rich Presents, as well as upon the jealous Leontidas, who returned unto Cyprus. As for the generous Megabates, though the way of Army was partly his, yet Cyrus would hinder him so much as to go so softly: for remembering that the illustrious Aristeus told him that he was in love with the Philonide, he would by all means have him take his time; and at parting, did him all the honours that his Quality and rare merit deserved, the Princess Mandana also honouring him with all possible civilities.

In the mean time, Cyrus who set a higher rate upon his honour then his life, did fear that if the King of Assyria should be released, and come to Cumes after his departure, he might perhaps imagine that he would not perform his word, since he took the way towards Ecbatane: therefore he left a man in Cumes, with Orders to stay there until the King of Assyria came, and to deliver him a Letter, by which he assured him, that he would not fail in the least tittle of his promise: so that omitting nothing which he owed either un|to his glory, or unto Mandana, he satisfied both differing duties. For the greater security of this Princess, he so ordered his march, as that she was to be always in the midst of his Army, that he could not imagine any enemy he had reason to fear. When this Princess came out of Cumes, all the people flocked together in the streets, who having had tryal of Cyrus his clemency, did make the Air ring with acclamations of prayses and thanks: This magnificence was worthy of sight, and worthy her for whom it was made, in respect of the great number of Souldiers; the abundance of Camels which carried the baggage, the richness of their Sumpter clothes, the glorious Chariot of Mandana, and the multitude of Heroes about her. Since Thybarra was in the way, Cyrus resolved to rest there a day, lest the Princess should be too much wearied: of which, the Prince Myrsyles was not a little glad, in hopes to find Doralisa there, with whom was Arianita, whom Mandana also was glad to see again, though she had not found her so faithful as Martesia: This Princess also was very glad she should see two Persons whom Panthea dearly loved, meaning Doralisa and Pherenice: Never was journey fuller of pleasure then this; one might see in the face of all the Souldiers such a sprightly jolity, as that they marched with abundance of alacrity, and as if they rejoiced to be at the end of all their labours and travels: one might plainly see, that though they were not really crowned with Lawrels, yet that they were returned victors, and that nothing had resisted them: Mandana for her part, imagining every pace to bring her nearer the King her Father, and not further from Cyrus, was so abundantly satisfied, as that she found a notable difference between this voyage, and those she had made with the King of Assyria, and the King of Pontus. Cyrus for his particular, thinking that Ciaxares could not deny him Mandana, had no other inquietude, but how to vanquish the King of Assyria: And there was not one in all the Army, except Mazares and Anax|laris, who rejoiced not at the carrying of Mandana, unto Medea. In the mean time those of Thybarra made a most magnificent entertainment for the Princess, at her entrance. Cylrus presented Doralisa and Pherenice unto her; And She received them as persons unto whom She was obliged when She was at Susa: making very much also of Lyriana, and forgetting her past infidelity. Since Mandana was full of generosity, she was not able to look upon Doralisa & Pherenice, without some sighs in the memory of the Susanean Queen: conjuring them both to keep about her, the same place they did about Panthea: And indeed they did so, for Mandana did oblige Doralisa's Aunt to let her Neece go along with her: and Pherenice was very willing to follow such a Princess as the Queen of Susiana had dearly loved; so that at the departure from Thyabarra, the Princess Myrsiles was joyed to see that Doralisa was to go this journey; and that he might have the happiness sometimes to talk with her. But as for Andramites, in lieu of rejoycing, he grieved: for having dis|covered that the Prince Myrsiles loved Doralisa, he had rather not see her, then his Rival should be always in her eye. In the mean while, since the Monument which he had cau|sed to be erected in memory of Abradates and Panthea, was not far off, Cyrus went very early before the Princess waked to see whether his Orders concerning it were executed: Page 194 desiring also to render the last honor unto a King, who dying in his quarrel had left him a Kingdom, and unto a Queen, of whom he had a most particular esteem. Since he resolv|ed to go very fast, that he might return again before the Princess Mandana was ready to depart, he carried with him only Aglatidas, Chrisantes, Feraulas, and five or six others.

When he was come to the Monument of Abradates, and lighted from his Horse, he saw that he had been punctually obeyed, that the order of it was right, the Architecture stately, the inscriptions such as he had appointed, and that they had forgot nothing to eter|nize the memory of those renowned persons, whose Ashes it inclosed, and the acknow|led gments of him who caused it to be built; the sight of this Monument did fill his soul full of melancholy thoughts, deep studies seized upon him, and after he had looked upon it, he walked a long time about it, and spoke not a word, the Company not daring to interrupt him, kept themselves some twelve paces off, and spoke not a word neither. As he was thus contemplating the deplorable destiny of Abradates and Panthea, and was thinking in what a miserable condition he was when he lost them, he heard a great noyse of horses coming towards him, which caused him to turn his head, and he saw five or six Horsemen coming towards this Monument, in the head of whom was the King of As|siria, who being no less surprized to find Cyrus there, then Cyrus was to see him, alight|ed from horse and advanced towards him, with all the civility that could be expected from a man unto his Deliverer, but yet with all the sharpness of a miserable and incensed Ri|val. Since it does ill become a Prince (said he unto Cyrus after he had saluted him) who expects you should keep promise with him, to fail in his duty, I must begin in discourse with my gratitude; and though you be my Enemy, yet I must thank you for the liberty which now I do enjoy: Since I have done nothing but what I ought Sir, replied Cyrus, you may spare your thanks, unless it be for commanding Hidaspes to procure your liberty as soon as possibly he could: Hidaspes (replied the King of Assyria) hath most exactly executed your Orders; for Arsa nones having refused to release me, he delivered me by sur|prizing the Castle when I was Prisoner: So that I am forced to confess you have done a most heroicque Act in it, and that if it were possible I could cease being your Enemy, it would be upon this occasion; but I am confident, that your affection unto Mandana will easily hint unto you, that I cannot change my thoughts either of her or you, and that you will take no other advantage from my liberty, but to be the sooner in a condition to fight with me: I am obliged Sir, replied Cyrus, to interpret my own actions, as I would do yours upon the like encounter, since certainly I intended nothing in your releasement, but that you should enjoy your liberty freely, nor did I expect any acknowledgments for doing a thing which Honour invited me unto; and to testifie that I had no intentions to spare my self a Combat by delivering you, you must know, that at my parting from Cumes I left a Letter for you, to the end you may be assured that I was ready to keep my word: Since so, replied the King of Assyria, you must tell me Sir when you will have me keep mine; for since it hath not been the will of Fate that I should be so soon released, as to help you in the releasement of Mandana, and since you have a new right unto her, which I cannot dispute, yet before you can be a quiet possessor of her and all Asia in general, you must be Vanquisher of me in particular; therefore if you please Sir, let us end that controversie to morrow morning neer the Monument of Abradates, which was begun at Sinope in the Temple of Mars. I know very well (pursued he) that I owe you Sir my life and liberty; but I know withal, that as the condition whereunto you have brought me stands, I cannot be more miserable; nor am I insensible how I speak unto you in the midst of your Army, and that the few Forces I have are not able to secure me; but since I know you, I need not fear any thing; therefore without any further consideration, what the sequel of our Combat will be, I beseech you let me see you as soon as you can with a Sword in your hand: Should I humour my own inclination (replied Cyrus very sharply) I should quickly satisfie your impatience and my own, and I should not stir off the ground I stand on, before I were either Conquerour or Conquered. But as earnest as my desires are to end the difference that begun at Sinope, there is a most prevalent reason which moves me to desire a little time before I give you satisfaction, and I desire it the rather, because I do not fail in my word by it, for I did promise to fight with you before ever I marry Mandana, and I do promise still not to fail, but I never promised to fight before I had put her into a place of safety; you know how many battels I have fought to release her, and would you have me leave her in the midst of an Army composed of different Nations, in a Country newly conquered, in the midst of so many newly subjected Princes, who gape Page 195 for occasions of revolt? Fie; no, no; neither love nor honour will permit me to do so; and therefore you must needs let me carry the Princess into a place of safety: But when I have carried her into Medea, if I do not return to fight you, count me for the basest co|ward of all men living; and to speak rationally, your own interest as well as Mandana's requires I should do thus, for if the Fate of Armes should make you Conquerour, what safety can you find in the midst of an Army whose General you have killed? No, no, an|swered the King of Assyria sharply, mingle not my interest with Mandana's, for I know that whether I be Conqueror or Conquered, I can never hope for any thing from Man|dana, She hated me in Babylon before you inthron'd me, and certainly She would not love me if I should kill you; so that I would not fight with you in any hopes to enjoy her, but I would overcome you if I could, and so keep you from enjoying her; so that for my part all places of Combat are to me indifferent, since Conqueror or Conquered, I can|not expect any thing from Mandana: The Gods (pursued this violent Prince) have del|luded me by their Oracles, but do not you delude me by your words, and rid your self of an Enemy who is infinitely obliged, but ungrateful to you, who envies all that you enjoy, who cannot brook your glory, and who would pull your heart out, so he could pull Man|dana's out of it; therefore Sir never study so much for reason in the business, for I know all you can produce as well as if you told them, and if you be Conquered, perhaps Man|dana will not be without a Protector: Did you know Sir (said Cyrus and interrupted him) how much it is against my mind to oppose your desire, you would see I desire to give you satisfaction as much as you; but I must confess, that since it concerns the safety of the Princess, I cannot think I ought to do it: Since I know your heart, replied the King of Ass|syr|ia, I do not entertain a disadvantageous thought of you: But I know not, added he harshly, whether all the world will think so, when they shall know how you defer fight, and whether they will not think it strange that you should go to Ec|ba|tan, as if your inten|tions were, either to arrest me there, or to cause your self to be arrested. Have I not told you (replied Cyrus, and blusht for anger) that I will only conduct the Princess unto Ec|ba|tan; and that you have been in safety in Ciaxares his Army, when he was there himself in person, though he knew what I had promised you. Forbear then, unjust Prince that you are, to tell me of such things as I cannot hear without fury, and without preferring my honour before my love, which I ought not to do: And forbear you (replied the King of Ass|syr|ia) to make a miserable Prince languish, who hath nothing to hope for but your death and his own, and force him not to tell some disadvantageous lye of you: Fie, fie, said Cy|rus, this is too much to be endured, and I cannot any longer resist either against my self, or against you, but both my reason and my love must submit. Know therefore most assuredly, that ere I be four daies older, you shall be either my Conqueror, or I yours; that is as much as to say (pursued the King of Ass|syr|ia) as that either you or I must die for it: Our Combat should be to morrow, if I could (pursued Cyrus) but since it cannot possibly be so soon, I must take a little longer time. In the mean time, to the end that those who see us, may not suspect any thing of our design, let us go unto them, and go together unto the Castle where the Princess is, and doubtless staves for me to depart: I will do so, said the King of Ass|syr|ia, though heaven knows it is the most cruel thing in the world for me to go and see Cyrus Triumphant with Mandana; but I pray remember, that a Rival may be un|grateful, and still be generous, to the end that if I be overcome by you, you may not stain my reputation in speaking of me to our Princess: I do not know, replied Cyrus, that it is permittable to be ungrateful in any business, but I am sure that neither you nor I am so now; but since you are so earnest, I promise you again, that within this four daies the fate of Arms shall decide your Fortune and mine for ever.

After this, these two furious Rivals took Horses, and putting on more calm countenan|ces, the better to hide their design, they took their way towards Mandana, who not fore|seeing the misfortune which threatened her, had dressed her self, and was talking very plea|santly with Doralisa, Pherenice, Mazares, and Anaxaris.

The end of the Seventh Part.

ARTAMENES, OR, THE GRAND CYRUS. THE EIGHTH PART. BOOK. I.

THE Princess Mandana was no sooner ready, but according to her Pious Custome, shee would goe to the Temple, before she departed: So that Mazanes leading her by the hand, she went out of her Chamber: But she was no sooner upon the top of the stairs, but she saw the King of Ass|syr|ia lighting from his Horse at the other side of the Court, & who never staying for Cyrus, hasted towards her, before she could get into her Coach. Mandana's wonder was so great, that in lieu of going forward, she stopped, and gave this unfortunate Prince time enough to com unto her, with the same reverence he used to observe, maugre the impetuosity of his humour, and violence of his Passion. I make no doubt Madame (said he unto her, after he had saluted her) but my sight doth both surprize and dis|please you, and that I am still the object of your anger and hatred: But since the King your Father suffers me to be in his Army, as great an Offender as I am both against him & you: and since Cyrus can endure me, as much his Rivall as I am, I shall hope you will give me leave to wait upon you: and that since for the love of you I have lost all, you will not deny me the favour to be one of your Convoy, especially since you allow the same favour unto the Prince Mazanes, who hath been as great an Offender as my selfe.

The Prince Mazanes replied Mandana, having washed away his crime by a gene|rous repentance, is now in the number of my friends, and not my persecutors. But however it be Sir. I do assure you Sir, I had rather see you in the King my Fathers Ar|my, then see you in Babylon again. When you came Sir, I was going to render thanks unto the gods for delivering me out of your power, and giving me that liberty which you had lost me: As if you will be advised by mee, you shall be as acknowledging as my selfe, and thank them you have an Enemy so generous as to let you enjoy a benefit Page 2 which you took from me, and which your selfe had lost. Since the Gods are just (replied the King of Ass|syr|ia fiercely) they will recompence the generosity of my Ri|vall: And Madam you must give me leave to ask them nothing, but to be revenged of your extream inhumanity. Unjust Prayers (replied Cyrus, who was not till now come up to them) do seldom reach the eares of the Gods, but to punish those which make them, and therefore take heed how you ask them any thing against the Prencesse, and if you have any revenging thoughts, pray let it light upon me.

Whilst Cyrus was talking thus, the Princess took Coach, and took Doralisa, Phere|nece, and Martesia with her: After which she went unto the Temple, and Cyrus the King of Ass|syr|ia, Mazanes, Myrsyles, Anaxaris, Andrumelis, Chrisentes, Fe|raulais, and many others followed him: As long as the Sacrifice lasted, the Princess was so zealously devoted unto the Gods, as she never turned her head or eyes upon a|ny of the company: all of whom, being not so intent at their prayers as shee was, had thoughts as different as were their Interests. The heart of Cyrus was wholly upon the ruine of his Rivall, whose presence interrupted all his Joyes: The King of Ass|syr|ia, though full of impatency to see Cyrus with his sword in his hand, yet he had a kind of delight to see Mandana, but it was delight without any tranquility: And if his mind was upon the Gods whilst he was in the Temple, it was in praying for the death of Cyrus, the enjoyment of Mandana, for the Crown he had lost, and to be revenged upon Mazanes: Indeed it may be said that he murmured rather then pray'd. As for Anaxaris whose flaming passion was the more violent, because it was smothered and conceal'd, he wished that these two Rivals might ruine each other, or he them both: and though he could not imagine which way in all the world he could pretend any thing unto Mandana, yet he was most desperately in love with her, and prayed to the Gods most zealously that she might love him. As for Mazanes, his vertue was so confin'd and confirmed, as howsoever he loved the Princess of Medea, yet he asked no more from the hands of the Gods, but that he might have her esteem and friendship; and he had so accustomed himself unto combates with his owne desires, as he durst not suffer the least impertinent wish proceed from the root of his heart. But it was nothing so with the Prince Myrsyles, which did most fervently pray unto the Gods to change the heart of the severe and insensible Doralisa, and neither thought nor asked for any thing else. As for Andrumelis, who was no lesse in love with this faire one then he was, his desires went something further, for he equally prayed for the ruine of his Rivall Myrsyles, and the enjoyment of his Mistriss Doralisa. As for Chrisantes and Feraulas, who knew of the engagement that was between Cyrus & the King of Ass|syr|ia: they consulted with each other, whether or no they should acquaint the Princess Mandana with it, and prayed unto the Gods that this invincible Hero might have as glorious successe in this dangerous occasion, as in all the rest he ever undertook. As for Doralisa, Pherenice; and Martesia, all their prayers were for the Princess whom they waited upon, knowing that they could never expect any hap|pinesse unlesse she were so: The truth is, all these different persons did make such different prayers, that the Gods whom they invoked could not accord unto them all: They were like unto those upon the Sea, some with designs of going East-ward, and some West-ward, and pray for contrary winds, as each did need: So Mandana, the King of Ass|syr|ia, Cyrus, Mazanes, Anaxaris, did all of them aske the Gods point blank contrary unto each other, and by consequence, impossibilities.

The sacrifice being ended, the Princess returned to the Castle, but she stayed not there, purposely to shun the King of Ass|syr|ia's company; yet before she departed, she would needs know of Cyrus, how he met with his Rivall, and chidd him a little for his over-generosity in releasing his most mortall enemy. Had he been only your ene|my, said she, I should not have had any right to accuse you; but since he is my perse|cutor, me thinks I have cause to complain against you as over-generous.

The King your Father, Madam, hath set me such a glorious example, replied Cy|rus, as I were most unworthy of your esteem, if I did not imi|tate him. And truly Madam, (added he) if you did but know what joy it is unto me to see you put so great a difference between the King of Ass|syr|ia and Cyrus, you would not wonder I should give my self so much satisfaction.

But for all that, I beseech you Madam doe not alter your thoughts, nor too much pity the miserable condition, wherein the King your Fathers Armies hath Page 3 brought my Ass|syr|ian Rivall: For I must confesse, though Compassion be a quality becoming such an heroic heart as yours Madam; and since it doth so infinitely con|cern me that your heart be hardned towards him, yet I cannot wish you should have any pity upon him.

I do assure you Sir, replied Mandana, that I cannot be very inclinable to pity a Prince who hath caused all the miseries of my Life: but in relation to your selfe, said she, I must needs sometimes think, that looking upon him as the cause of all your Conquests, and that great glory which you have gotten, you should hate him a little lesse: For truly had he not carryed me away, you had never taken Babylon, you had never brought all Ass|syr|ia into subjection, you had not conquered Armenia, you had not vanquished Croesus, taken Sardis, subjected all Lydia, the Xanthians, the Cauneans, the Joneans, the Ghedeans; you had not taken Cumes, nor ever have been the Conqueror of all Asia: 'Tis true, Madam, replied Cyrus, but however I should have still been prostrate at your feet, adoring you, and my endeavours, my sighs and services might perhaps have engaged your heart more then it is: so that I may say, my Conquest had been farre more glorious unto me by them, then by the Armes of Ci|xares your Father. I could if I would (replied the Princess Mandana) answer you obligingly enough, and tell you, that in taking Babylon, Artaxates, Sardis and Cumes, you have perhaps gained my heart more, then you had done by your sighes and services without them, but I am too ill satisfied with you to doe so: Not that I would have you now change way of dealing with the Ass|syr|ian King, since he is at li|berty: but I must confesse, I should not have been sorry if you had not released him: and I had rather I could have chidden you for your too little generosity, then for your too much. However I doe conjure you, added she, not to be far from me; for if you goe and visite any more Monuments, I shall feare that you will bring back the King of Pontus with you, and therefore I pray let no such thing come to passe. Not that I think the King of Ass|syr|ia to be in any Condition able to attempt any thing against me, unlesse it be in attempting something against you: but yet for all that his pre|sence is so tormentive unto me, that I stand in need of yours to comfort me.

Cyrus hearing Mandana speak thus, feared that she suspected something of the truth: Therefore to cleer all matters, he answered her, as if he had not any angry thought in his mind against the King of Ass|syr|ia. It seems Madam, said he unto her, you would have me comfort my self with the sight of an Enemy, who as you say is the cause of so many glorious advantages unto me? However it be, replied this Princess, Let me always see you, whersoever I shal see him, until I come unto such a place where I may obtain of the King my Father to banish him, as I do intend: As for your selfe, as troublesome as his presence is unto me, I would not have you attempt any thing to free me from him Since he is a cause why you Madam do treat me so well (replied Cyrus, and laughed) I shall most willinly obey you. After this the Princess went in|to her Coach with Doralisa and Martesia; Pherenice and Arianeta and the rest of the Princess her women, went in another Coach which followed hers.

In the mean while, Cyrus, whose thoughts were upon all that related unto the safe|ty of Mandana, and the execution of his design, he altered the orders of his march, and caused the Ass|syr|ian Troops to be placed on the wings, and as faire off the Prin|cess as possible: Also he gave particular orders unto Anaxaris, to have a special guard upon Mandana; not thinking that in being so cautious against one Rivall, he trusted her with another. On the other side Chrisantes and Feraulas had not yet acquainted Martesia with Cyrus and the King of Ass|syr|ia's engagement, but resolved to ac|quaint her at night, to the end that she making it known unto the Princess, she might by her sovereign authority oblige all the Princes in the Army to have vigilant eyes, and become guards over these two terrible Rivals. Yet though they had not spoken of it unto Martesia, since she was a woman of an excellent spirit, the King of Ass|syr|ia's arrivall did make her very melancholy; for shee was better acquainted with the violence of his temper, then Mandana was, from whom he was observant to hide it. Yet for all that she did strive with her selfe, that her vexation might not ap|peare to the Princess; I he pleasant humours of Doralisa did much facilitate her con|cealement of her thoughts; for whilst Mandana was musing, and studying upon her own thoughts, she would descant upon the thoughts of all the Princes which ridd by Mandana's Coach by the Aire of their Countenances; and she had such pleasant fancies [Page 4 upon them, which suited so patt to their adventures, and unto their garbes, that Martesia not being able to forbear laughing, did put the Princesse out of her dum[pish musing; who being desirous to know what it was which made them so merry, she caused Martesia to repeat all that Doralisa thought of Cyrus, of the King of Assyria, of Mazanes, of the Prince Artamas, and of all the rest they had talked of. But I beseech you tell me (said Mandana to her, when she saw the Prince Myrsyles, and Andramches neer her Coach) what are the thoughts of these two Captives, whom your beauty hath taken? and whether Cupid hath made them Equals by making them Rivals, since the one's a Subject, the other a Sovereign? Alas Madam, replied Doralisa, I cannot tell what they think; and I am so farre from knowing it, that I have done as much as ever I can, not to understand what they said, when they spake unto me as intelligibly as they could. But Madam, in lieu of telling you what they thinke upon, I will if you please tell you what I think of them. I beleeeve Doralisa (replied the Princesse) that you will be so far from sincerity in such a businesse, as I will not oblige you to tell me any lies: but I had much rather you would tell me, what you fancy they think of you, then what you think of them. Since you will needs have it so Madam (replied Doralisa, and laughed) I shall tell you; That to see with what a gloomy countenance Andramches looks upon the Prince Myrsyles, I think he is very sorry this Prince is not still dumb: and to see how earnestly that Prince doth talk with others, makes me think, that if he have talked upon any matters of Love, it is only because he takes a delight in talking of something which he never talked of before: After this, Mandana began to chide with Doralisa, and to make her tell her whether shee did not use to talke more seriously and more obligingly unto a Prince so accomplished as he was, whose heart she had captivated.

But whilst Doralisa was diverting Mandana with her pleasant humours, and had her Quibbles of wit, upon a thousand passages, and every object. Cyrus was thinking how he should keep touch with the King of Assyria as soone as possible, and imagining how he should slink aside from so many men as were continually about him. But his greatest care was, to contrive it so, that in case he was vanquished, then the King of Assyria to have no power in disposing of the Princess. However, he was much perplexed; For honour would not permit him to impart a businesse of this nature unto many men: and therefore he took a middle course, and told all the chief Command[ers only thus much, that the King of Assyria's presence did move him to have a more especiall care of Mandana's safety: he conjured them to remember the Fidelity which they owed unto Ciaxares, and whatsoever hapned, never to faile in that. Yet he thought not this enough: But the high esteem he had of Anaxaris, prompted him to impart the secret unto him; for since he was Captain of the Guard unto the Princess, he thought him the fittest to trust with her, and that it was by him he might get out to fight with the Assyrian King: And therefore Mandana was no sooner come unto the place where she was to lie; and as soon as Anaxaris according to his Custome had placed his Guards, he sent for him, and began to talke in private with him: At the first, Anaxaris knowing by the action of that Prince, he had something of great importance to say unto him, did imagine that his own eyes had betrayed him, and that Cyrus had dived into the bottom of his heart, and discovered the flaming and smothering Passion in it: But he was not long in this error; for as soon as ever Cyrus and he were together, he began to talk unto him: Doubtlesse Sir, said he unto him, though you be a stranger unto me, yet certainly you are a man of extraordinary vertue, and uncommon fidelity, since I am resolved to trust you with a business, which is a thousand times more dear unto me then my life, for it concerns my honour: And since I know you to be a man both brave and generous, I question not but that you will carry your self in such an important business as this, as you ought to do: But yet, as highly as I esteem you, and as gteat an opinion as I have of your honesty, I cannot trust you with the secret, untill you have made a solemn oath unto me never to reveale it, nor never do or say any thing which might raise the least suspicion of it, especially unto the Princess who of all in the world ought not to know of it. Sir, said Anax[aris, (much amazed, and impatient to heare what Cyrus would say) since honour doth sufficiently oblige one to conceal the secrets of another: And since none are Master but of their own secrets, I may with some justice complain of you, for exacting from me an oath never to speak of what you will please to honour me with the trust. Yet Sir, to [Page 5 testifie how easily I can do what is my duty: I will promise you with all the sincerity of a man who never uses to betray his trust, never to speake what you shall impart.

After this, Cyrus embracing Anaxaris, asked him pardon for the wrong he did his vertue, in not trusting him at first: but my deare Anaxaris (said he unto him) did you but know what a contention there is in my heart, between my love of Mandana, and my love of honour, and what turbulent agitation these two violent Passions do at this present cause in it, doubtless you will excuse me, especially if ever you were in Love: But that you may ore clearly pardon me, I must open my soule unto you, and acquaint you with the cause of that injury which I have done unto your Fidelity. After this, he acquainted Anaxaris in few words, with the promise he had made with the Assyrian King upon the Tower at Sinope, and how he had since confirmed that promise at the Monument of Abradutes. You may judge (added Cyrus) that such a secret as this ought not to be revealed: Most true Sir, replied Anaxaris, but he who discovers it, may give the man who he trusts share with him in the glory, by letting him partake of his perill. That's not my design Sir, replied Cyrus, but the thing which I require of you generous Anaxaris, is, that you solemnly swear unto me, that if the King of Assyria do Conquer me, you will with all your power keep the Prin[cess Mandana out of his: For since I cannot be vanquished but by death, I am very confident that if he become my Conqueror, he will do all he can to sow fedition amongst the Souldiers, purposely to become Master of the Princess. And therefore app[re]hending, that an Army composed of so many severall Nations, and people newly conquer'd, wherein also are some Assyrian Forces, may be apt to mutiny, I thought it necessary that you, who have got much credit amongst the Souldiers, and has an especial care of the Princess, should be acquainted with the state of things; to the end that multiplying your Cares, you may make sure of your Souldiers: And that I may leave orders with you to shew unto all the Commanders <◇> the Army, if I should fall in the Fight which I am to make, and which most certainly I shall make very shortly, since having taken but four dayes, whereof one is already past, I will before the last keep punctuall touch with the Assyrian King. Anaxaris hearing this was much joyled, that he desired nothing which he could not easily promise, and which he could not keep, though he was somewhat ashamed that he could not choose but be a Rival unto a Prince who treated him so obligingly. But at last, striving with himself to hide the agitation of his spirits, he promised Cyrus, with all the zeal of a man that was re[s]olved to keep promise, that he would dye a thousand deaths, rather then the King of Assyria should ever have Mandana in his power, if it so hapned that he were Conqueror. Oh my deare Anaxaris (said Cyrus then unto him) the assurance which you give me doth so elevate my heart, that I am confident I shall vanquish the King of Assyria, since now I do not feare he shall triumph over Mandana, though the fate of Armes should let him triumph over me: Yes yes, my dear Anaxaris, I shall owe unto you all the glory I shall get in vanquishing my Rival if I do surmount him; for really, if I should have fought in feare, that my death would have put Mandana in his power, I should have been half overcome before I ever fought: But since you pro[m]ise me to employ the same valour wherewith you have done such miracles, and whereof I am a witness and an admirer, in behalfe of the Princesse, I shall never feare my Rival will ever joyce in the fruits of his Victory, nor do I fear he can vanquish me.

Moreover I remember, my generous Anaxaris, that Mandana is a debtor unto you already for her liberty; and this I would have you now doe, is not more difficult then that you did in the Castle of Cumes. Sir, replied Anaxaris, could you but see my heart, you would never offer to oblige me by any more new promises, nor would you doubt but that I am resolv'd to dye for the Princess Mandana's service. Be confident therefore Sir, I beseech you, that as long as I am living, she shall never come under the King of Assyria's power: but Sir, I beleeeve I shall never need to defend her against him; for if I be not much mistaken, his valour will thrive no better against you this second time, then it did the first: but I am confident you will overcome him now as you did before. If I do overcome him (replied Cyrus) then Sir, I will come and give you thanks for my victory: so that whether I be Conqueror, or conquered, I shall be still obliged to you, and the Princess will be infinitely your debtor. If I be vanquisher; I promise you to let her know her obligations; and if I be vanquished, Page 6 since she her selfe must be both Witness and Judge of your valour, doubtlesse she will acknowledg your merits, and consequently, my deare Anaxaris, your own vertue will purchase you the esteem of the most illustrious Princess upon earth. Yet remem[ber above all, to be faithfull unto me: you know how delicate a thing this honour is, therefore for Heavens sake Sir, do for mine, as you would have mee doe for yours: Yet this is not all Anaxaris that I require of you, for it must be by your means that I must ridd my selfe of so many eyes as are upon me, that I may steale from them to goe and fight with the King of Assyria, which you may easily do by a way which I have contrived, and which I shall acquaint yon with when time is fit: Oh Sir replied Anaxaris, should the Princess know that I should facilitate your Combate, she would extreemly hate me; since she shall never know it, replied Cyrus, you will not be exposed unto any danger of it: but though she should come to know it, I would engage my selfe to make your peace if I be not vanquished.

After this, Cyrus, and Anaxaris parted; the first of these was well satisfied with his confidence in Anaxaris: and the second had his heart so full of different app[re]hensions, as that he was not able to master them: The confidence which Cyrus put in him, made him ashamed that he did not give him a sincere answer; but his affection to Mandana, stuffed so full of fancies contrary unto that, as sometimes he could not choose but be over-joyed, that these two Rivals were ready to ruine each other. Yet since his soule was of a brave and generous composition, he stifled his Joyes as much as he could, and condemned his owne thoughts: Fie fie, unworthy Anaxaris, would he say unto himself, canst thou suffer thy heart basely to joyce, that two of the most valiant Princes in the world are ready to kill each other? and that thou shouldst be rid of two Rivals at once without any danger to thy selfe? Repent, repent for shame of thy ignominious weaknesse: and if these two Princes be any obstacle unto thy designs, do not wish that they should ruine each other, to the end that thou mayst have the honour of ruining them thy self.

But alas, unhappy Anaxaris said he, and sighed, how vainly art thou base in thy wishes? For though Cyrus & the Assyrian K. were both dead, yet Mandana is still none of thine: and thou hast more reason to think she will never be any ones, but that the death of Cyrus will cause hers: But what doe I say? (said he, and reprehended him[self]) I do very unjustly accuse my selfe; For indeed I cannot conceive that honour forbids me to joyce at the losse of a Rival, as long as this joy is no cause of it: wait then with hopes, the successe of this furious Combate, between two of the greatest Princes upon Earth, disputing for the possession of the fairest Princess in the World: But alas, unfortunate Anaxaris (added he) how much sorrow wilt the end of this Combate cause thee? For if Cyrus be vanquished, thou wilt see Mandana swimming in teares for him: thou wilt heare all her sighs and dolefull complaints, and wilt be a witness of all her sorrows; if Cyrus be Conquer or, then thou wilt heare all her applauds of him, thou wilt be a witness of all those testimonies of esteem which she will give him, and thou wilt with thy own eyes perhaps find as much Love in hers to him, as there is in thy heart to her. Think therefore of it Anaxaris, consider seriously, and resolve to vanquish thy selfe: Consider how many great things ought to possesse thy mind, and that Love is not the passion which at this present ought to reign in thy soule: Do not deceive thy selfe as thou dost others, and do not think thy selfe to be Anaxaris: Remember, that thou hast a name more illustrious, which must have all the glory, and that this of Anaxaris which thou hast borrowed, must not be always thine; Never brand it with a piece of folly in obstinately loving Mandana, who will never love thee. But who knows, said he (and reprehended himself) what the Fates have resolved of thee? Perhaps they have reserved for thee all the Victories of Cyrus. The Princess whom thou ador'st does not hate thee, she thinks her selfe much obliged unto thee, and the only man upon earth that hath any share in her heart, as exposing him[selfe unto eminent danger. Leave then the conduct of thy life unto the same Gods, who breathed thy Love into thy soule: and without committing any business, act no[th]ing against thy selfe on the passion which posseseth thee.

But whilst Anaxaris was thus consulting with himselfe, Christanes and Feraulas were seeking for an opportunity of speaking unto Martesia, and of disposing her to tell the Princess of the promise which Cyrus made unto the King of Assyria, upon the Tower of Synope: But do what they could, they could not get a sight of her, because Page 7 Mandana to avoid the sight of the Assyrian King, would see none that night, nor suff[er] Martesia to leave her.

On the other side, Cyrus, whose greatest pressure of mind was how to fight with his Rival, he resolved it should be the next day, whilst the Princess was at Dinner: so as he employed the rest of that night in making sure of all those whom he thought fittest to oppose all the violences of the Assyrian King, if the Fate of Armes would have him subjected by him: Yet was it so handsomely carried, that he gave not the least suspicion of his secret design, colouring the matter only with the King of Assyria's presence.

But to the end his Rivall should not long waite for his promised satisfaction, he told him that the day following should make it appeare which was Conqueror, and which was conquered: hinting unto him the time and place where he should expect his satisfaction: So that this violent Prince seeing himself n̄er his fatal time which was to decide all Controversies between Cyrus and himself, his heart began to beat high, he rownd up all his hatred, his jealousy, and his fury, as a better preparative to fight. He called into his memory all the rigours of Mandana, and as much as in him lay did forget that he owed his Life and Liberty unto his Rivall: So that stirring up all the wormwood of his miseries, and setting an edge upon his anger, the fury of his heart did more appear in his eyes then usuall: and indeed, he found that he was so little Ma|ster of himself, as fearing lest he should discover the secret, and be an obstacle unto his own design if he were seen, he would not expose himself the next morning unto sight. But since his turbulent humour would not let him rest long in a place, as soon as it was day he took horse, and would take the Aire untill the time he knew Mandana would set out: so that without any with him but a Page, he went to consult with his own thoughts by a Rivers side not far off.

In the meane time Chrisantes and Feraulas no sooner knew that Martesia was gone into her Chamber, but they went unto her, and acquainted her, that they thought it requisite she should acquaint the Princess as handsomely as commonly she used with the business: Alas said she unto them, how difficult a task it is to acquaint her with such bad news, and not extreemly trouble her? but since it would be an ill peece of service to spare her this trouble, because it might perhaps expose her unto a greater, I will leave you, and put her to it. As Martesia said so, and made her selfe ready to leave Chrisantes and Feraulas, she understood by Arianita, that Cyrus halving received some Letters from Ciaxares, he was gone into Mandana's Chamber, so that Martesia could not speak unto her. The conference between this Princesse and Cyrus being very long, and did not end untill it was time to go unto the Temple, hee waited upon her thither, and back again. Whilst they were there, Cyrus did a little wonder that he saw not the King of Assyria who was not wont to be from Mandana, when he could be with her: But his wonder was much more at his return from Church, when being upon the top of the Castle stairs where the Princesse lay, he saw five or sixe Souldiers to bring this King extreemly wounded• his amazement was so great, that he was not able to expresse it: and the Princess turning aside her head, and seeing it also, her surprize was as great as his: Martesia also, who stood behind Mandana had her share in the admiration, but it was mixed with some Joyes, since this accident put Cyrus in safety. Anaxaris on the contrary, he grieved at this misfortune which hapned unto the Assyrian King, because it did at least deferre his Combate with Cyrus: And though he had a will to choak any thought that was opposite to generosity, yet he was not able, especially because Mandana and Cyrus were together, and in sight.

In the mean time, those who carryed the King of Assyria, could not carry him to his Lodging, but they must needs passe by the half Pace where Mandana and Cyrus stood, therefore this fatal Lover could not choose but see them: So that being both extreemly asham'd and angry to be seen in that condition, both by his Mistriss and his Rivall, he blushed for very anger, though he had lost much blood: He strived to seeme lesse wounded then he was, insomuch as turning himself a little towards the Princesse with more respect then his salute was able to beare; and shunning the eyes of Cyrus because he would not receive his Civilities, hee appeared very angry and furious. However, since the Princess had not any mind to insult upon a miserable man, she went into her Chamber, and Cyrus asked leave to goe and know, who it was that Page 8 wounded the King of Assyria; for truly Madam, said he unto her, this Enemy is of such a ranke as requires this Civility from me. And having the honour to command the King your Fathers Army, its fit I know all passages in it, and prevent all injustice. I shall not be against any reasonable civility, replied Mandana, provided it be not over long, nor hinder me from departing within an hour. After this Cyrus left her, and went unto the place where they carryed the Assyrian King; but being told that he was dressing, he would not see him untill the Chirurgions came from him: As they came out of his Chamber, Cyrus asked them how he did, and they answered him, that of three wounds which he had received, the most dangerous was in his right arm, which was very ill, and they would not answer for it; telling him further, how that the Prince desired them to say, he was not in any danger. After this Cyrus went unto the King of Assyria's chamber, who was calling one of his men to send unto him: So as he no sooner saw him, but striving not to seem weak, or dangerously wounded, I am glad Sir, said he unto him, that you have taken so much pains as to come & see me: And truly Sir, replied Cyrus, I am very sorry you should be in such a Condition, as obligeth me to render you this visit. Trouble not your selfe so much for my hurts (replied this furious Prince in a low voyce, least any should hear but Cyrus) for if I be not much mistaken, I shall be well before you can come at Ecbatane. Though I should come there before that, replied Cyrus, it should not make me start from my promise. I conjure you not (answered the King of Assyria) And to oblige you unto it, know Sir, that though this hurt in my right Arm were greater then it is, & that I had lost the use of it, yet I would fight with you with my left hand rather then voluntarily yeeld the Princesse unto you; for there is a fatal necessity in it, you must either be my Conqueror, or I yours: To testifie unto you Sir, replied Cyrus, that I donot wish to spare a fighting with you upon the score of your hurts, nor to any advantage of that weaknesse which your wounds have caused, I beseech you take as long time as you please to recover in, and make choise of whom you will to keep you company: but I beseech you Sir tell me, what Heroe, or what Assassinate hath brought you into this Condition? Certainly you will have it from the mouth of my Conqueror (replied the King of Assyria sharply) for I make no question but Intaphemes will come ere long, and aske a recompence of you, for ridding you of an Enemy, though he fought only upon his own score, but yet he has reason Sir to give you thanks for his victory; for if my extream desire to vanquish him presently, that I might fight with you also this day had not made me run head long into his Arms, as brave as he is, he had not so easily vanquished me. Since I have such experience of your valour Sir, replied Cyrus, I shall easily believe what you say. In the mean time, I assure you, that if the Prince Intaphemes were not the sonne of Gadates, unto whom I stand bound in many obligations, I should hardly receive him well, as accomplished as he can be, since he is the cause our Combate is deferred; but because I will not my selfe deferr, by augmenting your paine with too long a visit; You shall give me leave to retire after a second confirmation of my promise, not to faile in the least tittle of my word; and after I have assured you, I will appoint some of my men to wait upon you with as much respect as upon my self, and to have as great care of your life, as if it were absolutely necessary unto my felicity.

Most noble Rivall, said the King of Assyria (lifting up his eyes to heaven) do not over-load mee with your generosity; but let it suffice, you have promised me not to faile in your word.

After this, the violent King of Assyria not being able any longer to master himselfe, turned boisterously on the other side, and began to accuse the Fates for being so opposite unto all he desired. And Cyrus, having no more to say unto him, went out of his Chamber commanding those that were to wait upon him, to have especial care of him. Thus this generous minded Prince, in point of perfect magnanimity took care for the preservation of an Enemy, who wished not for life, but to be his death: But Cyrus was no sooner out of his Rivals Lodging then this unfortunate King called for one of his men, and sent him unto the Princess Mandana, to tell her he was very sorry he could not waite upon her as he designed: but that he hoped to overtake her before she cawe to Ecbatane: Yet conjuring her, that if he was mistaken in his Conjectures, and dyed of his wounds, she would be pleased to favour him so far as not to rejoyce at his death. The man who was to deliver this odd message, did very hastily perform Page 9 his Commission: yet he found the Princess ready to take Coach, and Cyrus with her, rendring her an accompt of the Assyrian Kings condition: But she no sooner received this Message, then she prepared to answer him that brought it; Tell the King your Master, said she unto him, that I never use to rejoyce at the death of my greatest Enemies, because I cannot do it without a piece of inhumanity: but withall assure him, that I should exceedingly rejoyce, if in the recovery of his wounds, he should recover the health of his mind as well as the health of his body:

After this, Mandana, with Doralisa, Pherenice, and Martesia took Coach, and departed immediately: And then Cyrus took Horse, with all the rest of the Princes, except Mazanes, who stayed a quarter of an hour behind the rest to visite the King of Assyria, but he found him in such a fretting and distempered humour, as he was forced to leave him presently, so as he quickly overtook the Princess Mandana. In the meane time, Cyrus having left order with one to send him exact word of the Assyrian Kings condition, and to send it secretly for some Reasons best known to himself. He also sent to seek Gadates, and to tell him that it was his sonne who had wounded the King of Assyria, and to aske him if he knew where he was: Sir (said Gadates unto him as they ridd) I did write unto him by the Messenger of Arsamenes, and com|manded him to come and pay some of my obligations unto you, by rendring you some considerable services; knowing, that since the King of Bythinia had now no Warrs in his Dominions, he would willingly come hither; but since that I heard nothing of him: It is credible, replied Cyrus, that we shall shortly see him: For by the manner of the King of Assyria's speech, I collected that Intaphemes was not wounded.

Though the King of Assyria (replied Gadates, and sighed) hath heretofore given my sonne a thousand causes of complaint, in the life time of the Queen Nitocris: and though its likely he hath given him some since in Bythinia, yet I must needs be sorry both for his Combate and his Victory; For indeed, since he was born his vassall, unlesse he were forced to fight, he ought not to have fought with him.

You speak with so much wisdom, replied Cyrus, as it is not credible, that the son of a man so prudent as Gadates, would ever make any indiscreet combate, and I can assure you, that he has no <...> conquered the King of Assyria without glory.

Whilst Cyrus and Gadates were thus talking and riding together, Cressus and the King of Hircania discoursed together upon the vertues of Cyrus: The Prince Myrsiles and the Prince Artamas did also sweetly communicate the passions of each others souls unto each other; The first of these affirming that Love might still subsist without any hope: And the second maintaining, that whosoever doth truly love, doth not cease being a Lover, in becoming a Husband.

As for Mazanes, when he overtook the Troops, he marched and discoursed with none, having enough to contemplate upon in his owne thoughts, without the converse of others.

On the other side, Anaxaris, whose soule was tossed with a thousand various thoughts, and seeking out for one to be the Confident of his heart, he talked with Andramites, whose spirit pleased him, and whom he knew did particularly esteem him. And indeed the truth was, Andramites had as strong a desire to answer the Amity of Anaxaris, as Anaxaris had to enjoy his.

Again, Chrisantes and Feraulas, seeing the King of Assyria was wounded, and that dangerously: Also that they were far enough from him, they told Martesia before she went into Mandana's Coach, that they would not have her impaart the businesse unto the Princess, since it would but trouble her to no purpose, considering the King of Assyria's estate: so that Martesia assuming her ordinary humour, and Dc|ralisa continuing her usuall jollity, that days journey was very pleasantly passed over: It might well be said, that the Country had decked it self in its best ornaments to place so many Gallants as fortune had assembled together; for all the Province through which they travelled, was a pattern for an exquisite Painter to draw a Land-skip by. The Rivers were most delightfully twined amongst pleasant Medows, set with Osyers and Willows upon the Banks: The Plains through which they passed were neither too vastly open, nor so close as to make them solitary: The Villages were such as were full of pretty Cataracts of water, purling Springs, and pleasing Shades: The Hills over which they passed were nothing rough and rocky, but afforded most delightfull prospects of Towns, Villages, Houses, Rivers, Woods, Ways, and men travelling in them; Page 10 abundance of grazing Flocks, many magnificent Buildings, huge Rocks afar off, and the Sea the furthest: Insomuch as though the Princesse had wanted the company of those three excellent persons who were so amiable, and so full of diversions, yet she might have found enough in the very variety of the Countrey to feed her eyes withall, and to contemplate upon, without any melancholy: And she passed over that day with more pleasure, then she had done a long time before, and so soon, that at her journeys end, she did not think she had gone above halfe the way.

But that this dayes Journey might end more pleasingly, chance would have it so, that as she came out of her Coach to go into a house of Sacrifice, which was the fairest in all the Town, she spied coming out of this house into which she was to enter, a man of a most admirable Grab, who both by his habit and aspect seemed to be a man of noble quality: But her wonder was, to see him slink out of a back-door, and in lieu of coming towards her, he took another way, though she could not imagine upon what design.

But she was not long in this wonder; for no sooner was she in her Chamber, but Cyrus brought this stranger unto her whom Gadates presented unto him: I thinke it sufficient Madam (said this Prince unto her in presenting this illustrious stranger) I tell you, that he whom I bring unto you is sonne unto the wise and generous Gadatites: This I say Madam, will be enough to make way for his reception as a man of most rare merits. It is most true Sir, replied she, for to let me know, that it is the Prince Intaphernes, is sufficient to move me unto a high esteem of him: But yet (said she very sweetly, and looked upon Cyrus) I know not whether I should give credit unto your words: For Sir, how can I imagine that a man who hath fought such a Combate, and overcome such a furious Enemy as the King of Assyria, should be in such a condition as I see him? Since Madam, it is fortune (answered Intaphernes most modestly) which decides combates, she often makes them Conquerors, which should be conquered: And to say the very truth Madam, I am a debtor unto you as well as unto the illustrious Cyrus for my victory; for certainly the reason why the King of Assyria is not my Conqueror, is, because the Gods would not suffer a Prince who is an Enemy unto the one, and a persecutor of the other to be fortunate in any thing: so that Madam, since I am Victor only by you, it is without any glory un|to me: and if I did not hope to merit your esteem by some considerable service more then by this act of your vertue, not my valour, I should be very sorry: Modesty does so well become true valour (replied Mandana) as I must needs extreamly com|mend you for speaking with so much moderation of a businesse which might make a thought of vanity excusable in any other heart but that of Intaphernes.

After this, Mandana to alter the discourse, least the King of Assyria should be any subject of it, began to talk of the Princess Istrina his Sister, and of the Princess of Bithinia, and to aske him whether Arsamenes was still resolved never to consent unto the marriage of the Prince Spitridates with the Princess Araminta? He is so farre Ma|dam from consenting unto it, replied Intaphernes, as I believe him capable of any thing sooner then that Alliance: and if you did but know his actions during the imprisonment of the Prince Spitridates, and the imprisonment of the Assyrian King, you would not doubt Madam of what I say.

Cyrus hearing Intaphernes speak thus, had a good mind to say that Arsamenes was injurious, not to let Spitridates marry one of the most vertuous Princesses upon earth: But remembring that Mandana had some sparks of Jealousie in her mind, he durst not commend her enough at that time, and only said, that Arsamenes was unworthy of that favour which the Gods had shewed him, in restoring him to his Dominions, since he treated so ill his sonne who was one of the most illustrious Princes in the world. Mandana then would have engaged Intaphernes to tell her, how Arsamenes arrested Spitridates the second time, how he got out of prison, and why the King of Bythia arrested the King of Assyria? But he answered her that these were things which could not be related in few words: For indeed Madam, said he unto her, before I can acquaint you with the thoughts of Arsamenes, it is requisite I should relate un|to you the severall interests of four or five persons, who have not the honour to be so well known unto you, as that you should desire to know them.

After this Cyrus endeavoured to engage him onely in a relation of the cause of the Combate with the Assyrian King; but he could not oblige him to it, this Prince telling Page 11 him that that quarrell begun at Babylon during the life of the Queen Nitocris, and that the story would be too long to trouble the Princess Mandana with the hearing of it. Intaphernes saying so, hee rather augmented then diminished the curiosity of Mandana and Cyrus, yet they would not then presse him any further, conceiving there might be many passages which he would not speak of before so much company, so that the rest of that discourse was all upon things indifferent: But Intaphernes was found to be a man of such an admirable spirit, that he purchased a high form in the esteem of Mandana and Cyrus, and of all the rest of the Princes: he also wonne much upon Doralisa's esteem, which was a thing she never bestowed upon slight grounds; But as for Martesia, she did not content her selfe with bare esteem, for she did ever love him, thinking she could not do any lesse for a man, who in conquering the King of Assyria, had quitted her of a necessity in telling the Princess Mandana a thing that would have extreamly troubled her: So that not acquainting him with the cause, she lived with him, as if they had been of old acquaintance; She did him also good offices in talking very advantageously of him unto the Princess Mandana: But to say truth, it needed not; for Intaphernes was very amiable, a man of great courage and wit, so that his presence did much contribute to the pleasure of the Journey.

In the mean time Mandana having observed some terms of friendship to be between Intaphernes and Martesia, and being also very desirous to know the sequell of that Princes life, the beginning whereof she knew at Babylon, she commanded Martesia to endeavour the knowledg of all passages.

On the other side, since it nearly concern'd Cyrus, not to be ignorant in any thing wherein his Rivall had an interest, he intreated Intaphernes to tell him all passages in Bythia concerning the imprisonment and liberty of the Assyrian King, wondering much that Hydaspes should not return with him, nor send unto him: Sir (said Intaphernes unto him) The businesse you desire to know is of such a nature, as it is impos|sible you should know it without some sad thoughts. For I cannot acquaint you with the passages in Bythia whilst the King of Assyria was prisoner but I must also acquaint you, how never any gave greater testimonies of his love then this Prince unto the Princess Mandana; Ju• then Sir whether I had not reason to deny the Princess a relation which I cannot make, unlesse I should do your Rivall and your Enemy a good office: Generous Intaphernes (said Cyrus) I am infinitely obliged unto you for denying what I asked, since you cannot do it unless you favour the King of Assyria: I beseech you keep still in the same mind, and never satisfie the Princess Mandana's curiosity: Not that I am at all injuriously jealous of her, but because it is the most difficult thing in the world to let the person whom one loves, know any expressions of the Rivals love: and I had rather Mandana should accuse me of some fault, then know that my Rivall hath given any testimonies of his Love.

Then she must never know (replied Intaphernes) what hath passed in Bythia: No, I conjure you, replied Cyrus, but I must confess I desire to know it my selfe, and I know not whether my sorrows to heare that my Rivall hath had an occasion to signalize his love, be above the pleasure of satisfying my curiosity.

As Intaphernes ready to reply, a second Post came from Ciaxares: But whereas the first came with thanks unto Cyrus for releasing Mandana; this acquainted him, that Thomiris being recovered of a long languishing disease, did revive her first designs against Medea, and that the generall Rendezvous of her Forces was some three dayes march from Araxes. This newes which had extreamly perplexed Cyrus, had it come during the siege of Cumes, did never trouble him now Mandana was released: and he believed that the reports of her liberty would alter the design of that incensed Queen, so that without any disquiet at this newes, his only care was to conceal it from the Princess Mandana, lest it should trouble her. In the mean time his cares of keeping Intaphernes from letting the Princess know all, that what he told her the next day before she departed, was a cause that she came sooner to know it; For as Martesia did divers times presse Intaphernes unto it, he did so earnestly forbid him, as this made her more earnest to know it: But why Sir (would she say unto him) will you not be pleased to honour me so farr, as to tell me this which I have so vehement a desire to know? Do you think Sir I do not know the beginning of your life? believe me Sir, I have been too long at Babylon to be ignorant of it: and to testifie unto you that I doe know it, I will, if you please, repeat word for word all that long and sharp language Page 12 which passed between you and the King of Assyria in the time of the Queen Nitocris, when you argued in defence of the brown Beauties against the fair; and when he gave you such words as provoked you to answer him in such a manner, as made it appear you had a heart too high for a Subject, or at least for a Vassall

Since you are so well acquainted with my life (said he, and would have civilly put her off) what would you have me tell you more? I would have you Sir acquaint mee, replied she, with your adventures in Bythia: Alas, Amiable Martesia (said he) doe not ask me that, for indeed I cannot consent unto it. Intaphernes uttered these words in such a tone, as moved Martesia to think that he had some reasons for it, so that her curiosity was much more eager then before. That which did most exasperate her, was the Princess Mandana's prompting her to perform her promise which she made to get it out of him: this Princess wittily twitting her with want of wit to bring it to passe: and since it was in the Coach, and in presence of Doralisa, that she thus geered her, she was even mad upon it: For my part (said Doralisa, seeing it pleased the Princess to torment her) If I did attempt to get the friendship of any one, as I see you have courted Intaphernes for his, I should be extreamly ashamed to thrive in it no better; for as full of Charms as you are; I see you have but small power over him, since he refuseth to tell you a thing, which doubtlesse all Bythia knows: I have been as solicitous Madam (replied Martesia, and looked upon Mandana) as if my design were to Court the love of the Prince Intaphernes: As for matter of Love replied the Princess, I do not think you can be charged; but I am sure it must be confessed, that either you have very ill obeyed me, or the Prince Intaphernes hath very ill obeyed you. Alas Madam replied Martesia, since I have no right to command him, I have no way but to be contented, and have recourse unto my prayers; Alas Martesia (said Doralisa, and interrupted her) It seems Intaphernes hath treated you worse then I did imagine, since in my opinion it is a greater offence to deny a request, then to disobey a command; and to speak sincerely, my heart does naturally so hate to be commanded any thing, as I should much more readily pardon such as reject my commands, then such as deny my requests: Therefore, since you have requested, and requested in vaine, it does extreamly touch your honour to be thus denied by the Prince Intaphernes. But Martesia (replied Mandana) if you use no other stratage <...> to get out of him what I desire to know, but prayers, you have not done enough; for there are some certaine things which you must seem as if you did not desire to know them: Did you but know Madam, replied Martesia, what I have done, you would be satisfied with my endeavors. The more you have done (replied Doralisa) the more you may be ashamed, since none takes effect. I beseech you Doralisa, said Martesia, try what you can do upon him to scruce out what the Princess so much desires; Were her Commands upon me replied she, as they are upon you, I should have obeyed her: but since she hath not done me that favour, I have no mind to rob you of the honour in doing her this small piece of service: And therefore since your prayers have no influence upon Intaphernes, goe some other way to work; make him bolt out that at severall times, which he will not do at once: Puzzle him with a hundred far-fetchd questions, pump him, and make him confesse what he has no mind to do: Seem sometimes to know what you ask him, and as if you were carelesse of knowing more; be sometimes mild, sometimes sharp: And when you have tryed all wayes, and all in vain, yet I know one infallible course to make him tell what the Princess desires to know. Pray then instruct me, replied Martesia; for I have done all that you have yet advised me unto, and more: Therefore I beseech you instruct me with this devise whose event you think so certain. I am confident replied Doralisa, and smiled, that the Princess will agree the most sure way to know the secrets of another, is to trust them with their own. I cannot tell, said Martesia, whether that be true or no, but I am sure you never pumped out the secrets of any one by imparting your own. However it be (said Doralisa) begin from this very night to tell the Prince Intaphernes all the particulars of your life, especially since the time that the illustrious Cyrus came to Sinope under the name of Artamenes, omit not so much as the long discourse you had yesterday with Feraulas: And if after all this, Intaphernes do not impart his secrets, I will engage my self to tell you mine, which is a thing I use not, but hate most of any in the world.

Mandana hearing Doralisa speak thus, could not choose but laugh, especially when she saw Martesia was a little nettled: For though she had wit at will, and was excellent Page 13 at Raillery; yet the very name of Feraulas having put her to the blush, she began to study revenge upon Doralisa, yet could not hit upon it; for she was of such an hu|mour, as the names of Myrsyles, Andramites, and all the rest of her Lovers had never reached her heart, so that Martesia was forced that day to endure whatsoever Doralisa pleased to put upon her. However, after all this Raillery, the Princess Mandana told Martesia in a more serious manner that Intaphernes his deny all did extreamly augment her Curiosity, imagining that either Cyrus or her self, or both were concerned in the relation he was desired to make: So that Martesia to satisfie Mandana, and to stop tanting Doralisa's mouth, did bethink her self of a man whose name was Orcames, of good rank about the Prince Intaphernes, and in great favour with him; from him she thought to have what she desired to know: For at their last discourse, he let her know how he was obliged unto the interests of this Prince, ever since he was at Babylon. & her greatest hope was, in that Orcames was a man the best at relating stories in the world, and loved to employ his talent, and would often when he had no ad|ventures of others to relate, he would voluntarily out with his own. Martesia then upon this hope of perswading him to tell her all he knew concerning his Master, and o|ther passages in Bythia, did promise Mandana afresh to satisfie her Curiosity, and indeed she did not faile in her word. In the mean time, since she could never talke with Orcames but at nights, it was three dayes before she could perswade him to relate the adventures of Intaphernes, though his inclination to such relations was good e|nough: Yet she did so handsomely tamper with him, as she perswaded him that it was requisite the Princess Mandana should be acquainted with the interests of Intaphernes, to the end she might serve him when occasions were: Insomuch as Orcames who was ignorant that Cyrus had desired his Master not to acquaint the Princess with any passages in Bythia: And who knew he had related unto that Prince all the ad|ventures, never dared to let Mandana know what Cyrus did already know; and he was the more induced unto it, because he could not tell any thing which was not glorious unto the Prince his Master: so that Martesia having fitted him to her desired mould, she went immed <...> nto Mandana, with whom Doralisa was. Mow Ma|dam, said she unto her, yo <...> know the secrets of Intaphernes, at an easier rate then his knowing mine, For O <...> es hath promised me to tell you them, whensoever you shall please to appoint him. That shall be to morrow at night (sayd the Princesse) for then I know our journey will not be long, and that we shall come to our Lodgings betimes, so that I do intend to retire sooner then ordinary, purposely to give him the more convenient opportunity for it.

The business being thus resolved upon, Martesia acquainted Orcames with it, and the day following, Mandana seeming as she were weary with her journey, would not be seen all that Evening as she did usually, yet she had a desire to acquaint Cyrus with the true cause of that wearinesse she complained of, and to let him be an Auditor of this relation: But since Intaphernes was then with him, she could not do it: Also, since her vertue was very scrupulous and delicate, as much as she esteemed Cyllrus, yet she would not let him see her, after she had said that she would admit of none; for as for Orcames, the matter was not so great.

Martesia then seeing that none but Doalisa and Pherenice were with Mandana, she brought in Orcames, whom the Princesse received as a man from whom she expected satisfaction of her Curiosity: You need not think it strange, said she unto him, that I should rather desire to know the life of Intaphernes from you, then from him|self: For since the design in my desires of knowing it, is principally because I would the more esteem him: I thought his modesty would hide part of his vertues from me, and that perhaps he would detract from himself, and therefore I desire to receive them from you: but I pray, said she, let not your relation be limited only unto the adventures of the Prince Intaphernes, but I beseech you let the Princess Istrina also have her place, for I know the interests of that illustrious Brother and admirable Sister are so twisted, as it were unjust to separate them in their stories.

Though I would do so Madam replied Orcames, yet I cannot; for truly the Prin|cesse Istrina hath so great a share in all I am to relate, and in all the passages of all Asia, even in this which hath hapned unto you Madam in particular, as one may almost look upon her as the innocent cause of all the Wars. Indeed if the Queen Nitocris had not peremptorily resolved that the Prince her sonne should have married Page 14 her, perhaps he had loved her, or at least not hated her, nor gone out of his Kingdome, and by consequence he had never been an Enemy and Rivall unto the illustrious Cyrus: he had never carryed you Madam away, he would have rested peaceable in his own Dominions; you had never come under the power either of the Prince Ma|zanes, or the King of Pontus. Croessus had at this hour possessed all his Treasures: Armenia had not been tributary, the Prince of Cumes had been alive, & all these great revolutions in Asia had never hapned without the Princesse Istrina. But Madam, I must not only bring in the Prince Intaphernes, the Princess his Sister, and the Princess of Bythinia, but also the Prince Atergatis, and the King of Assyria: And to speak truth, I have so many severall things to relate which are so twisted with one another, as I doubt whether I am able to wind the clew of my relation to the bottom without such a disorderly ruffle, as will weary you. The only favour which I aske, replied the Princess, is, not to do as many relators do, who design to include many things in few words; for indeed there are many passages whereon aggravations are pleasing, and sometimes are necessary, so that I cannot abide this sparing of a few words: and therefore do not confine your selfe unto over-narrow limits, but freely impart all you know. Orcames being glad that the Princess commands did not thwart his inclination. he assured her that he would most exactly obey her: so that Mandana having placed her selfe opposite to him, and caused Cushions to be given unto Doralisa, Phere|niece, and Martesia, Orcames began his story thus:

The History of the King of Assyria, of Intaphernes, of Atergates, of Istrina, and of the Princesse of BYTHINIA.

TO the end Madam you may more easily be <...> *hat the Prince Intaphernes and the Princess Istrina are accomplished with a <...> vertues which persons of their quality ought to be, I must begin my relation with an Elogie to the Queen Nitocris under whom they were educated, and of whom they both were most tenderly loved: But Madam, this Queen hath so many, so great, and such rare qualitties, that if I should undertake to describe but a part of them, I should want time to acquaint you ith wwhat you desire to know. and to speak the very truth, it need not be brought into any question; but a Queen whose name hath filled all Asia, is fresh in the memory of a Princess whose glory fills all the earth: I will not therefore stay you Madam with applaude of a great Queen, whose vertues I do believe you sufficiently esteem, maugre the violences of the King her sonne: Nor shall I stay you long with acquainting you in things so farre fetched, as I should have done, if I had not understood from Martesia, how you are not ignorant of the affection which Gadates had unto Nitocris, and of her vertue in thwarting her inclination unto Gadates: so that I shall content my selfe with reviving in your memory, that she having no mind to put the Crown of that Prince whom she loved for feare of causing a civill War in her Do|minions, but married another whom she loved not: and with telling you how she banished him who had the greatest share in her heart: How she commanded him to mar|ry: How he obeyed her; and how afterwards, to gratifie his obedience, she intended to set the Princess Istrina upon the Assyrian Throne by marrying her unto the Prince her sonne. After this Madam, I believe you will imagine that the Prince Intaphernes, and the Princess Istrina were educated with all imaginable care, it being easie to be conjectured, that the wisest Queen which ever reigned in Assyria since Semiramis, would not neglect the education of a Princess whom she designed for a Throne, and of a young Prince whose Father had such a share in her heart, and whom she looked upon as one who was to be brother in Law unto the King of Assyria: And certainly all her cares were not lost; for I can assure you Madam, that these two young persons did much exceed their age both in beauty and spirit, and were the admiration not only of all the Court, but of all Babylon, w^{ch} you know Madam is one of the greatest Cities in the world. I shall not insist Madam, upon any particular descriptions of Istrina's Page 15 beauty; for since the Prince Intaphernes is a very picture of her, your own eyes may be judge. I shall only say thus much, that never was any brown beauty more lovely then hers, nor fuller of attractive charms: As for her spirit, her physiognomy doth promise what it is, to wit, great and noble: and which is most pleasing, her humor is of such a sweet composition, as it gains her more hearts then her beauty.

Yet for all that, this sweet and lovely Lady has a heart full of ambition, and so sensible of glory, as she is ready to sacrifice any thing, even all her pleasures unto it. She being of such a temper as I have described, her hopes were flattered up with being a Queen, and her mind was so blown up with thoughts of Grandure, as all her cares were how to please the Queen Nitocris, and the Prince of Assyria, whom she was made believe she was to marry: Since you know Madam what Antipathy there was in him towards her, though he had no other reason for it, but because he would not sute his fancy unto the will of any others, I will not insist upon any aggra|vations of it: Let me only tell you thus much, that because the Princess Istrina was of the fair complexion, he hated all the brown, were they never so fair, & hated Inta|phernes only because he was her brother. Indeed you know Madam, how he treated him one day when they were hunting together, when the Prince Intaphernes more dexterous and happy then he, killed a Lyon: But Madam, the thing which I believe you do not know, or at least have but a confused notion of it, is, that whilst all the Court wondered to see this aversion, as the Assyrian Prince towards her, shee made many in Love with her: And amongst the rest, there was a young Prince in that Court called Atergatis, who was most desperately in love with her, and who was no lesse meritorious of her Love, then she of his; the Prince Mazanes who knowes him, is able to tell you, that the Prince Atergatis is one of the most amiable persons in the world, and the fittest to make a faithfull and discreet Lover.

As for his person it is pleasing, and it's hard to look long upon it, and not love it. Since his Quality made him a Companion with the Prince of Assyria, in all his plea|sure, he was often times a witness of that aversion which he had to the Princess Istrina: And I have heard <...> ce say, that this his aversion was partly a cause of his Love; because not being <◇> conceive how a Prince of his spirit could possibly hate so faire a person as she, <◇> he had observed some particular faults in her, hee therefore applied himself unto her, to see what was the reason her beauty did not captivate the Prince of Assyria's heart: so that seeing her very often, he saw her too oft for his quietnesse, for he loved her with as much violence as it was possible for any living to love. However, since he knew that the Queen Nitocris was fully resolved that the Prince her sonne should marry her: and since he very well observed the ambitious veine of the Princess Istrina, he durst not therefore declare himself, and therefore smothered up most tormenting flames: but the oddest passage in his Love was, that he adhered so much unto the interests of the Princess Istrina, as he could not choose but hate the King of Assyria, because he carryed himself harshly towards her, though it would have pinched him to the soule if he had seen him love her.

Since at that time the heart of Istrina was swelled only with ambition; and seeing her selfe looked upon by all the Court, as her that was to be Queen of Assyria, shee did imagine that none durst presume to look so high as she: Insomuch, as though she did every day see the Prince Atergatis, and though he talked with her as much as he could, and Courted her with continuall trifling services, yet she did not perceive he was in love with her, though many others observed it, and though shee her selfe had a good inclination to esteem him.

The Prince of Assyria was the first that found it out, and was very glad of it: for he heartily wished that the Princess Istrina had a Lover whom she loved, purposely that he might have a better pretence for not loving her, as Nitocris would have him: And indeed this violent Prince seeing that the Lawes of the Land required that hee should Marry Istrina, because there was none of her Quality in all the Kingdome whom else he could marry: And seeing that the Qu: Nitocris was resolute, & would exact obedience from him, as soon as the Peace with Phrigia was completed, which was under negotiation, therefore he had recourse unto the most extream Remedies.

Then he made a hundred odd Propositions unto the Prince Mazanes, who would not hearken unto them: so that perceiving the Prince Atergatis was in love with Istrina, Page 16 he sent one day to him to tell him that he would use his best assistance to make him happy. Atergatis much surprized at the Prince of Assyria's Complement, told him, that the only way to make him happy was to give him some occasion of doing him some considerable service: No, no, replied this violent Prince, I meane not to make you happy by your serving me, but by my serving you: I know you are in love with the Princess Istrina: Alas Sir (said Atergatis, and interrupted him) I owe you more respects, then to have any thoughts of that most excellent Princess, but such as I ought to have of one whose Subject I must hereafter be: No no Atergatis, (said he unto him) do not dissemble the truth, but confesse freely unto me that you are the Princess Istrina's slave without feare of being hereafter her Subject, for las|sure you that I will never put the Crown upon her head: Therefore for your owne satisfaction, and to free me from the perpetuall persecution of the Queen, who would have me marry her; give me leave to steale her away for you, and put her into your power, yet so as I may not be seen in the businesse: I will find you a most safe sanctuary for a Retreat, where you may wait untill the Queens anger be over, and untill you have got the Princess Istrina's Love, Sir, replied Atergatis (extreamly amazed and puzled to answer the Prince of Assyria) I have already told you that I have no thoughts of the Princess Istrina, but such as becomes me, though I must needs confess that I doe infinitely admire her: But were it so that I loved this most excellent Princess, I would not Sir accept of this offer, because it is not the way to obtain the love of that illustrious person, & because it would hinder her of a Crown: Therefore Sir, whether I be her Lover, or not her Lover, I ought not to consent unto your proposition.

Your answer (replied the King of Assyria) doth so much surprize me, as I almost believe my selfe mistaken in thinking you to be in Love with Istrina; for I cannot conceive it possible one should refuse the possession of her he loves, though he come to her by the most difficulty and unjust wayes in the world.

But perhaps (pursued he) you do not believe me and are not perswaded of my great aversion to the Princess Istrina: yet I do prot <...> <...> ergatis, I hate Intapher|nes because he is her brother, and should hate you a <...> Lover, were I not in hopes of perswading you be her Ravisher also: I must confesse when I doe force my eyes to examine her beauty, I do find her fair: and my reason sometimes tells me, she has wit enough. But for all this she displeaseth me: I cannot abide her; and I am sometimes vely sorry that I can only hate her, and that I cannot but only in my heart scorn her.

How Sir, replied Atergatis (who could not endure to heare her he adored, so vilified) can it be possible the Princesse Istrina should dislike you, and stifle your inclination? How is it possible Atergatis (replied the Prince of Assyria) that the Prin[cesse] Istrina should please you, charm you, and move your heart, and yet not desire to enjoy her by the way which I propound? Yet you love her; and I do plainly see it in your eyes, that you cannot endure I should speak so sharply against her: Therefore I doe declare unto you, that you must do one of these three things: You must either carry her away, or make her love you, or else make me hate you: For if I find you to be only a bare Adorer of Istrina, I shall hate you perhaps more then if I were your Rivall.

As Atergatis was studying for an answer, as good luck was, the Prince Mazanes and others came in and broke off their discourse, and also gave him an occasion of quitting that where his soule suffered the torments of a Hell.

But to sum up his torments, as he was going from this Princes Chamber, he met with one who stayed him a long time in talk of some business; and as he was talking, one of the Assyrian Princes servants passed by him, and was asked by another whether he went, and he answered aloud, that his Master sent him to seek a Prince whose name was Armatrites: So that Atergatis knowing this Prince to be in love with the Princesse Istrina, and imagining that the Prince of Assyria sent for his Rivall to make the same proposition which he had done unto him, he was so perplexed that he was forced to quit him he was talking with, and to goe home purposely to resolve with himselfe what course to take: I understood since, from his own mouth, that he was more perplexed then ever was any amorous heart: Sometimes he was glad to see the Prince of Assyria's aversion to Istrina; sometimes again he was angry at it, and otherwhiles he repented of his non-acceptance of the offer made unto him, fearing lest his Page 17 Rivall should anticipate him: What a most miserable crosse destiny is mine? (would he say himselfe upon examination of this strange adventure) I do love a Princesse who knows not that I adore her, because my respects unto the Prince for whom she is delisted does hinder me from letting her know it; and yet this very same Prince who thinks my felicity would be his misery, offers me to steale her away for mee, and put her in my power. Think well on it Atergatis (would he say) consider whether 'tis not thy best course to return and tell the Prince thou dost repent of thy refusall: For truly since he is resolved not to make her a Queen, is there any one in all the Kingdome that is more worthy of her then thy selfe in respect of thy violent and respective passion?

But said he, (and reprehended himselfe immediately after) Canst thou be so insolent as to make any Declaration of Love unto her, after thou hast caused her to be Ravished away? Take heed Atergatis, with what eyes a wronged Princesse will look upon thee, a Princess who will think that thou hast taken a Crown from her: Imagine that thou seest Istrina incensed? Let not thy love eclips thy vertue? Remember that thou hast ever thought, and that with reason, that whosoever excludes respect from this passion, doth ruine it: and that to take away a Princess whose heart is not obtained, is the most unjust thing in the world, and the greatest folly one can commit: Hearken therefore unto reason in spight of thy love, and follow its Counsell rather then the King of Assyria's: But alas alas, said he, if thy Rivall should not be so generous as thy selfe, but should accept of what this unjust Prince should offer him, in what a deplorable condition art thou then? what good will all thy respects of her thou adorest do thee, since she does not know thou lovest her? And who cannot think her selfe obliged unto thee for a thing she is ignorant of? Examine seriously Atergatis, what course is best to be taken: If thou wilt not doe as the King of Assyria would have thee, thy Rivall perhaps will: If thou dost carry away Istrina, she will hate thee: If thou dost not carry her away, another in all probability will. What canst thou do, unfortunate man, in such a strange condition? Canst thou suffer thy Princess to be carryed away without acquainting her with the misfortune which hangs over her head? Canst thou give her a greater testimony of thy esteem and love, then by letting her know it? But alas (said he, and sighed) how canst thou at one time acquaint the Princess Istrina, that thou lovest her; that the Prince of Assyria hates her; that thou hast refused the offer of her taking away; that thou art perswaded thy Rivall will not startle at it: The least of all these is enough to tremble thee into a Palsey in telling it, since it would make her both sad and angry: Consider what an angry businesse it would be to tell her all these things at once: Yet why shouldst thou pause upon it: For though there were no other reason to move thee unto a discovery of what thou knowest, yet her interest alone is enough to oblige thee unto it, as her Friend, and not her Lover. But what phrases canst thou make use of to expresse those difficulties, which will so much surprize her? She hath ever looked upon thee as one who was to be her Subject, and then goest to tell her that she must look upon thee as her Lover; and as a man who wisheth with all his heart that she may never be a Queen. She expects the King of Assyria will put a Crown upon her head, and thou tellest her that he would steale her away for another, and that he will perhaps find one who will accept of an offer so unjust, so contrary to generosity, and even Love it selfe. Neverthelesse, the service thou owest unto the Princesse Istrina requires it from thee, and thy Passion commands it.

But yet once more Atergatis, what words wilt thou use? I know not (said he and sighed) yet without more ado leave it unto thy Love to suggest such as shall perswade the Princess, that since the King of Assyria does not adore her, he is unworthy of her esteem: and that since thou lovest her more then ever man loved any, thou dost merit some share in her heart.

After this Atergatis being fully resolved to acquaint Istrina with the passage, and to give her such hints as might make her guesse at his Love, he waited with much impatience untill after dinner. But in the interim, his reason suggested unto him, that perhaps he should expose himselfe to the Prince of Assyria's hatred; if it should so fall out that the Princess Istrina should discover unto him what he should tell her: yet this did not divert him from his first intentions, and from going unto the Queen as soon as the hour, when every one used to goe, was come.

Page 18 Since the Princesse Istrina did much esteem him, and ranked him in the number of her intimate friends: and since the Prince Intaphernes did dearly love him, he hoped to find an easie opportunity of talking with her, either in the Queens presence, or her own chamber: And he found the opportunity more favourable then he hoped, for since it was then very hot, and the Sun began to grow low, the Princess went to walk in those rare Gardens, made heretofore by the famous Semiramis, and which as you know Madam, being vaulted underneath, and supported by huge, high, and stately pillars, has the reputation over all Asia, to hang miraculously in the Ayre, considering their prodigious bignesse. The Princess Istrina having that day made choise of this Walk, there being very few company which frequented it, because the Queen not going the crowd of the Court stayed with her, since it was upon her that all Graces and Favours depended. As for Atergatis, since his business was not there, he followed the Princess Istrina, and was so happy, that when he came first into her presence, she asked him if he would walk with her: He joyfully accepted of such a favourable opportunity, and presented her his hand to lead her out: Since it was a great height to mount into those miraculous Gardens, which she made choise of for her diversion, she was a little weary when she was up: So that to rest her selfe a while, to the end her walk might be the more delightfull, she did sit down in an Arbor made between four Palm trees, which being intertwined with each other, did make a most delicate shade, there being seates of Cyprus wood which perfumed the place. The Princesse Istrina sitting under such a cooling shade, the Prince Atergatis had all the convenience of talking with her he could desire: For since there was no persons with her of his Quality but himselfe, as soon as he began to talke seriously with the Prin[cess], as if he had some secrecie of importance to impart, all the rest of the company did out of their respects retire some distance from them: so that Atergatis, not to loose such a precious moment, Madam (said he unto her with a trembling heart) I have a businesse to acquaint you withall, which I wish it were already told you, because it is most necessary you should know it, and yet I dare hardly tell it, unlesse I have the authority of your Command.

Istrina surprized at the discourse of Atergatis, did look seriously upon the matter, and endeavoured to guess at the businesse; but yet though her faire eyes did look seriously in the eyes of Atergatis, and saw them full of love, yet they could not discover the passion of his heart: So that not knowing what to think, I do confess Atergatis, said she, I cannot imagine what you can tell of such importance for me to know; for since I have ever thought you my friend, in lieu of desiring a Command to speak, you should speak freely without, but since you do desire it, I doe command you: Then Madam, said he, I will obey, and acquaint you with a businesse which will most surprize you of any thing in the world: Oh I beseech you (said Istrina then) do not yet obey me; but tell me first, whether it will be a business which will anger me, or grieve me, or else joy me; for you know that pleasing things may surprize one, as well as displeasing. Since Madam I am full of sincerity, replied he, I must confesse I have nothing to tell which I think will please you, but much which will displease.

If it be so, said she, I pray tell me nothing, unlesse you can tell me a way how to avoid any great misfortune. If that had not been the cause Madam, replied Atergatis, I should never have resolved to acquaint you with what I now intend, but indeed Madam, it does so neer concern you to know it, as it doth concern the whole tranquility of your life: Speak then Atergatis said she unto him, and speak quickly for I long to know your businesse. I will obey you Madam, replied Atergatis; but it must be upon Condition, that my first words shall not move you to impose silence upon me, but that you will suffer me to speak out without any interruption, all that concerns you to know. Since you cannot tell me any thing which will vexee mee more then this incertainty unto which you have put me (replied she) I will heare you as long as you please: For since I have a good opinion of your wisdom, I need not fear you will tell me any thing which I ought not to heare. I shall tell you then Madam, said he unto her, that though all Asia knows how the Queen intends you should weare the same Crown she doth, by marrying you unto the Prince her sonne, and by consequence all the Subjects of this great Queen, ought to look upon you as her who must be their Sovereign: Yet there is one who not being contented with the quality of a Subject which is common to many others, hath a Page 19 devotion to be your slave in a most particular manner. Though I did promise not to interrupt you (sayd Istrina, and blushed) yet it was because I thought you had some business of importance to tell me: but Atergatis I do perceive it to be only a piece of Rallery to divert me, and by Consequence does not merit the performance of my word: I beseech you Madam remember, replied Atergatis, that I desired you not to impose silence upon me, nor wonder at my first words. But the more to oblige your audience, I will submit unto all imaginable punishments, if you doe not confesse at the end of my discourse that you ought to know what I shall tell you, and that I were unworthy to live if I did not acquaint you with it.

The Princess Istrina then perceiving that Atergatis had indeed some serious matter to tell her, resolved to hear him without interruption, not imagining that Atergatis and this slave whereof he spake were both one: so giving him a new permission to speak, he began with as much feare as love.

Be pleased to know Madam (said he unto her) that there is a man in Babylon who began to admire you as soon as ever he began to see you: and who without any hopes of being loved, or thoughts of letting you know his Love, doth still continue loving you; but it is with an affection so pure and so free from all manner of interest, that I am certain untill yesterday about this time, he never intended you should know his Passion, and yet he loves you in a higher degree then ever any could: and had he thought he could pretend unto the enjoyment of you without hindering you of a Crown, he had long since declared himselfe, and avenged you of the Prince of Assyria's injustice. had he thought that the glory of being a Queen had not been the object of your desires, doubtless he would have let you know that you do Reign as Sov[er]aignly in his heart, as ever you can do upon the Throne of Assyria: Hee would have made it known unto you Madam, though he had directly opposed the Queen, and though the Prince her sonne had loved you as much as he ought to do. So that Madam, the reason why this concealed Lover hath not discovered his Passion unto you, is because he was as full of respect, as Love: because he thought it not his duty to make you loose a Crown, and because he could never hope you could prefer the Empire of his heart, above a Kingdome.

In the mean time, since the passion of his amorous heart is most violent, hee hath suffered and suffered more then ever any did: he hath smothered up all his miseries in silence, and without complaint, and would still have done so, if the Prince of Assyria had not yesterday told him a thing which is the cause I now discover his thoughts unto you. For truly Madam (if I may without offence utter it) that most unjust Prince cannot endure you, and will never give you that Crown which he is to wear, though you deserve it better then he. He is not contented with not adoring you himself, and with entertaining the most unjust thoughts in the world of you, but he would also corrupt this Lover which doth adore you: Yet Madam, since it is requisite I acquaint you with the Prince of Assyria's injustice, I must tell you, how he sent for him of whom I speak, and told him that he perceived his Love to you, and protested unto him that he for his part could never love you, & offered him to steale you away for him, and all this with such earnest expressions, as it was rather a Commandement that he made, then a Proposition. How (said the Princess Istrina, and interrupted him) would the Prince of Assyria steale me away, and put me in the power of him you mention? If this be so, though he were King of the whole world, I would disobey the Queen if she commanded me to marry him: and if it were not for the Reverence I owe unto that Princess, I should this very day let him know who thus slights me, that I doe not deserve it from him, and that I have a heart as great, as his is insolent and proud: Can I believe Atergatis, that this is true? so true Madam, replied he, that nothing can be more: Then said she, am I the most miserable woman in the world; for unless the injurious Prince of Assyria have not imparted this unjust Proposition unto a most generous man, perhaps he will accept of it: I cannot tell Madam (replied Atergatis very modestly) whether the man do merit the attribute of generous; but I am sure, that though he loves you beyond all expressions, he refused to enjoy you by any such unjust way, as the Assyrian Prince propounded: His respects of you were so high, as he would not acknowledge unto him that he loved you; but told him that though he were, yet you should never be stolen away, which put that violent Prince into such a chafe, as he told him in the conclusion of their Conference, that he must do one of Page 20 these three things: Either let him steal you away; or procure your Love, or else be hated of him. This last thing (replied Istrina very sharply) is questionless the most easie of the three, and also the most just: Yet (added she, and blushed, because she knew by the disorder which appeared in the face of Atergatis, that it was himself who loved her) the generous proceeding of him who refused the Prince of Assyria's unjust proposition, doth so sensibly oblige me, that I must conjure you not to name him to me, lest being obliged to look upon him as a man who loves me, I should be driven to shun his company: therefore Atergatis since he cannot choose but be a most excellent man, let me have the liberty of treating him with the same Cruelties I use unto such men, and never let me know his name: Oh Madam, said Atergatis, was ever such a kind of acknowledgment invented? Could ever any but your selfe have found it out? For since the proceeding of him whom you would not know doth both please and oblige you, why will you not know who he is? The reason is, replied she, because I cannot know him, unless I resolve at the same time to hold no particular friendship with him: so that to take from me a subject of ingratitude, I must not admit of his acquaintance. Then promise me Madam I beseech you (said Atergatis, and looked most passionately upon her) that you will guess at him whom you will not permit me to name: For if you will not promise this, I think Madam, I shall not tell you what remains, though it concerns you most of all to know it; for I am fully perswaded, that the Prince of Assyria is at this very hour proposing unto another whom I know, to steal you away; who perhaps not being so respective and just as him you would not know, will accept of the offer, and prepare for the execution of his unjust design: Oh Atergatis, replied Istrina, I will promise what you please, provided you will prevent my being taken away, by naming him unto me, whom you think so apt to undertake such violence against me: How Madam (said Atergatis, retreating a Pace or two, and looking fixedly upon her) would you know the name of him that would injure you, and not know his name who gives the greatest testimony of his respect and love that ever any could? Yet since you will have it so (said he and came a little neerer her) and since I am in some hopes that you will guess who it is, I will tell you that Armatrites is the man whom the Prince of Assyria sent for, after he was denied by that respective Lover whom you will not let me name. Alas Atergatis, replied Istrina, hath Armatrites accepted of this offer? he is no lesse violent and rash then the Prince of Assyria, and therefore I cannot imagine any security for my selfe, but by quitting the Court, and acquainting the Queen with it; and consequently by dividing all Assyria, and causing perhaps a Warre between the Queen and the Prince her sonne.

No no Madam, said Atergatis to her, there needs no recourse unto such violent Remedies; for I know that he who refused the Prince of Assyria's unjust Proposition, intends to have a very observant eye over Armatrites: And I dare assure you, that considering his way of acting, you need not fear it: And therefore you need only to keep close for some certain dayes in the Queens Palace, to prevent all feares; for let me once more assure you, that the Person whom you will not permit me to name, had rather dye then suffer any violence to be done unto you: his Love of you will inspire him with policy enough to prevent his Rivall. Therefore Madam, I beseech you do not let it perplex you too much; for I should think my selfe most unhappy, if my intentions of preventing one misery, should drive you into another. I know that the losse of a Crown is great, and will most sensibly perplex one whose affection is all upon glory: and I know also that the Messenger of such bad news cannot be welcom. Yet truly Atergatis (said Istrina, and interrupted him) I think my selfe much obliged to you, though you have acquainted me with nothing but sad things: Then Madam it seems (replied Atergatis & sighed) that you rank amongst sad things, that violent and respective Passion, which this unknown Lover bears you, who hath refused to enjoy you by that unjust way which hath been propounded to him, that the enjoyment of you Madam, is the only thing in the world that can make him happy, and without which, he will be ever miserable: It seems, replied Istrina, that I have cause to grieve at an obligation of such a nature upon me, which I cannot acknowledge, yet I must needs be so just unto him in my heart, as to wish him happy in recompence of his generosity. But Madam, replied Atergatis, you do unawares engage your selfe unto many things, he cannot without you, be what you desire he should be. Page 21 The Princess Istrina having more and more cause to think that it was Atergatis who was in love with her, and who denied the Prince of Assyria, did rise up, least he should tell her more then she desired to hear, and least he should take the boldness to discover himself: Since I perceive this generous person whom I will not know is one of your Friends, I conjure you to oblige him to a Continuance of his Generosity in acquainting me by you with all his discoveries of any unjust designs in the Prince of Assyria, or in Armatrites. Doubtless, Madam, replied Atergatis, you shall by me know all that he who adores you with most reverence, and loves with all violencies of passion can inform you of: After this the Princess Istrina beginning to walk, called the rest of the Ladies which waited, and took one turn in the Garden, to the end it should not be observed that the Prince Atergatis had told her any thing which altered her design of walking: but her Soul was so troubled that she could not take a second; so that retiring to her Chamber, she feigned her self sick, purposely to have the better pretence for her not going abroad. Atergatis at his parting from her used many expressions which confirmed her in her opinion; yet he said nothing which moved Istrina from her manner of familiarity with him, so that he parting upon very good terms from her, he went away with much satisfaction: For though this Princess told him she would not know the Name of him they spoke of, yet it did not trouble him: But on the contrary being of a quick apprehension, he easily perceived that the Princess Istrina's reason why she did forbid him to tell the Name of the man, was, because she knew him: So that flattering up his passion, he thought himself more happy then ever he hoped to be; but his greatest perplexity was his fears that Armatrites should not accept of what he had refused, and that the Prince of Assyria would not take away Istrina from him.

And indeed though it was not known in Babylon, but on the contrary reported that he had received the Proposition as well as Atergatis; yet it was most certainly true, that he did accept of it with joy, and had executed his design, had not his Illustrious Rivall been an Obstacle unto him, as I shall presently tell you how. On the other side Istrina's Soul was so dejected that she was all sadness: She perceived by what Atergatis had told her, that she should never be a Queen, and that her hopes of it were all quast, yet certainly that was not it which most did trouble her; for she did more bitterly resent the Prince of Assyria's scorn then the loss of a Crown; not that she ever had any inclination to him, but because she conceived herself more meritorious then to be so slighted, therefore she could not chuse but extremely hate him, especially since she observed his clashing with the Prince Intaphernes. In the mean time she could not find out any remedy to her misery; she knew the Queen would not permit her to leave the Court, because she had an opinion that the Prince her Son would in the end change his mind. Again, if she should acquaint Intaphernes with what Atergatis had told her, she feared that he being already incensed against the Prince of Assyria, he might perhaps take some violent course; since that he would be out of hopes to see the Crown upon her head, which was the only cause why he stayed at Court after so many affronts put upon him by the Prince of Assyria: Istrina then not knowing what course to take, thought best to pause some certain dayes, before she fixed her Resolution; And to the end she might be that Interim in safety, she dissembled herself sick, as I said before, that she might the better colour her keeping within the Palace. But after a serious examination of all that related unto the Prince of Assyria, the generosity of Atergatis came into her memory; and though she then held him in the rank of esteem and friendship, yet she found no disposition in her self to desire he should not love her: for as she hath since opened her most secret thoughts unto the Prince her Brother; I knew them, as well as if I had been in her heart: Nor did she desire he should love her, but without any further reasoning upon his passion; she only considered the generosity of his Action, without looking any neere into the matter, or forseeing the Sequell.

In the mean time Atergatis employing all his Wits and Policy to discover what he desired to know, did understand that the Prince of Assyria had held a long Conference with Armatrites, that after it they both of them were very merry; and that on the Contrary he observed the Prince of Assyria would scarcely look upon him, insomuch as descanting upon these probably Conjectures, he concluded that Armatrites had accepted of the Proposition which he refused: Also he met with severall Page 22 Orders which both these Princes had given, that confirmed him in his Opinion; for the Prince of Assyria had sent secretly to the Governour of Opis (whether he carried you, Madam, when he carried you away) And Armatrites had sent most of his Train out of Babylon upon a very unlikely pretence: After when he had plotted how he might defeat the design of his Rivall, he conceived the best way was to fight with him, and to make his Quarrell upon something in which the Princess Istrina was not concerned; for since the Prince of Assyria was a Party in the Crime of Armatrites, he thought it no policy to publish it. Atergatis did see very well that since he had no certainty of what he feared, exact Prudence required that he should stay a while and endeavour to make the business clearer; But being extremely in love he apprehended more danger in staying too long before he fought with Armatrites, then in fighting with him too soon; for indeed (said he to himself) Armatrites is my Rivall, that is certain; therefore though I look upon him only as so, and not as a Ravisher of the Princess whom I adore, yet still I must be his Enemy, since there is not such a naturall antipathy in the whole Universe as between two Rivals. Then Atergatis feared that if he overcame, he should then be forced away from Istrina: yet since he knew Nitocris did not love Armatrites, he hoped he should not be banished the Court for it; or at least if he were, it would not be long: Also considering the carrying away of the Princess Istrina, he thought it better he should be banished from her, then expose her unto any such misery: So that to defeat the unjust design of Armatrites, he resolved to ruine him. But to the end the Princess Istrina should not suspect the truth of what he told her, he cunningly got the Prince Intaphernes, to tell her in his presence, as a peece of novelty, how Armatetes was the new Favourite of the Assyrian Prince, and how Atergatis was out of Favour: So that the Princess applying what he said unto herself, according to the wish of Atergatis, she blushed so extremely, that though she was upon her bed where it was not very light, yet Atergatis perceived it, and saw that he was understood. In the mean time, without further delay, he endeavoured to meet with Armatrites the next morning, and seemed as if he had no design in it; And since it was that season of the year when walking upon the Banks of the River Euphrates was much frequented, he thought to find him there: And since he was of a very violent and hasty temper, it would be an easie matter to find a cause of some Quarrell, especially since he had such a Spirit of Contradiction. For truly, Madam, Armatrites was of such a cross disposition, that if two persons were in contrary opinions to one another, he would rather be of a third to contradict them both, then side with either.

Atergatis knowing this humour, did conceive it would be very advantageous to himself to interest the Queen in the Cause of his quarrell, to the end he might be protected against the Prince her Son, if any need were, that he might not be banished if he were the Vanquisher, and by consequence not be separated from Istrina. Consulting then with himself how he might effect his Design, he resolved when he came to the Banks of Euphrates, where he found Armatrites to extoll those great and wonderfull works which that Illustrious Queen had made, to prevent the violence of the River, by turning it severall waies before it came to Babylon, imaging that Armatrites would be sure to contradict him: And indeed Atergatis was not mistaken, for as soon as they met, and as he began to commend that wonderfull work, Armatrites checked him, and said, that the Queen was rather to be blamed, and that she had done much better if she had employed those vast Expences in turning the course of the River, in fortifying the Frontiers of her Dominions: After which he began to condemn in generall all those Princes which busie themselves in publick works, and said, that this which Nitocris had done, was not done for the security of the Town, and to make it more impregnable, but only out of the vanity of that Queen. Atergatis not to let slip such a favourable occasion, told him in an angry tone that he spoke to unreverently of a great and illustrious Princess, who could not be sufficiently admired: Upon this Armatrites returned a tart answer, and Atergatis the like, still engaging the Queen in his discourse; insomuch as he forced him to bid Atergatis meet him with a Sword in his Land; Atergatis did joyfully take him at his word, and told him, their best course was to take a turn in the Walks, and to draw out insensibly from the Company, least their Design should be perceived; for at the beginning of their Contest, severall persons did hear them. Armatrites being very brave, Page 23 he did as Atergatis advised him, and they seemed to be good friends, so that there was no suspicion of a quarrell.

In the meane time, since they were both lovers of Istrina, and knew it, they both longed to see each other with Swords in their hands: so that when they observed there was no notice taken of them, in lieu of returning amongst the people which walked, they continued on their walk along the river side, as if they were men that affected a solitary walk. Since it is the custome of that place, for the Pages to waite upon their Masters at the Gate of the Towne, to the end they should not interrupt the walks of the Ladies, by their uselesse scurrility, the Pages of these two Princes were with the rest, and by consequence could not see their Masters, when they separated themselves from the company. However, since these two Rivals had either of them a sword, they were both of them well enough prepared for a Fight: So that as soon as they came to a place where the River turned, & kept them from the sight of those that walked, because the ground in that place was very low, they began that Com|bate. I shall not trouble you Madam with any particularities of it; for I have so ma|ny other things to relate, that I must not insist too long upon such as are least pleasi|ng. Let it suffice therefore I tell you, that Atergatis was the Conquerour of Ar|matrites, his victory was deep in blood, and fatal to his Enemy: so that being both fortunate and brave, the great courage of Armatrites could not defend himself from foure wounds, two whereof entred into his body. So that losing abundance of blood, he fainted presently, and striving to make a passe at Atergatis, he fell at his feet, yet he strived to rise againe; but his generous Rivall who was not wounded, would not suffer him, but took away his sword: and having no mind to kill an ene|my, who was not in a condition to defend himselfe, but told him that he would spare his life upon three Conditions.

The first, to publish that their Quarrell was upon speeches of the great workes, which the Queen Nitocris had made.

The second, to confesse he had a design of carrying away the Princess Istrina: And the third, to engage his word that he would never think any more of executing his unjust design as long as he lived: I could oblige you (pursued he) never to think any more upon that Princess; but since I know that Love is a thing not voluntary, I will not require any thing of you, but what is just and Possible. Armatrites being much wounded, & hearing Atergatis speak in that manner, was much surprized, for the Prince of Assyria had never told him that he made the same offer unto Atergatis: so as imagining that his Rivall came to know of his unjust de|sign, either by revelation from the Gods, or by enchantment, hee never denied the businesse, but confessed that it was true, he had a design of carrying away the Prin|cess Istrina: hee told him that he did well not to force him unto any promise of ne|ver thinking any more upon that Princess, maintaining with abundance of violence, that never any amorous person ought to make any promise in prejudice of his Love.

As they were upon these terms, the Prince Intaphernes who had been hunting that morning without any company but his own house, came to them: and being much surprized to find them in that condition, he lighted from his Horse and went up to them: who were as much surprized to see him, who coming suddenly upon them did heare the name of the Princess Istrina; and looking upon both Conqueror, and con|quered, Is it possible (said he to them) that my sister should cause two such gallant men to fight? Atergatis whose spirits were incensed against Armatrites for what he said, and thinking that the Prince Intaphernes had heard more then he understood, did force his enemy to confesse before him the cause of their fight, and his design of carrying away the Princess Istrina by the Prince of Assyria's orders; but as he was making this Confession, his anger made him bleed so abundantly as he lost his speech. As guilty as he was, yet the Prince Intaphernes was so generous as to command some of his men to help him, and to carry him to the next house, because Babylon was to far off. As these men obeyed the commands of their Master, Armatrites expired in their armes: so that changing their design, they went to acquaint his men at the gate of Babylon, whilst Intaphernes and Atergatis, 'twixt whom was a great league of friend|ship, they left the high way, and went another blind one, that they might the better discourse together; yet they went a while without any talking, for both their minds was full: And indeed Intaphernes not being able to conceive the mystery of this strange Page 24 adventure, did study how Atergatis could come to know the Prince of Assyria's de|sign: and why he should rather fight with Armatrites, then acquaint him with the businesse.

On the other side, not knowing how he should relate the passage, unless he should discover unto Intaphernes the affection he had unto his Sister the Princess Istrina, he was much perplexed; but at last, knowing his hatred unto the Prince of Assyria, and being acquainted with his generosity and friendship towards him, he resolved to con|fesse the truth: And the rather, because the Princess Istrina had said nothing unto him which he was obliged to hide. So that he first breaking silence: I do not doubt Sir (said he unto him, as they stayed under a Tree which stood in their way) but you do much wonder at this adventure; but before I do particularize unto you the great injustice of the Assyrian Prince, and of Armatrites, I must open unto you the bottom of my heart, to the end you may not wonder how I became thus interested.

I must tell you then Sir, and most truly, that you have ever been the man of all I know whom I have most esteemed and loved: And the Princess your Sister hath ever been the person, whom of all her sexe I most admired, and had the strongest inclina|tion unto: Thus, not being able to say that I esteemed you because I loved her; or that I loved her because I esteemed you, I can only say, that both of you have poss|session of the prime places in my heart. Yet I do believe, that if I examine the busi|nesse very well (added this Prince very sweetly) I shall find, that though I had not the honour to know her, yet still I should have been your Friend; and though I ne|ver had the happiness to have seen you, yet I should have been her Lover: so that owing that high esteem which I have of both your vertues, only unto your own proper merits; if my friendship be a thing worth the valuing, you are not beholding un|to each other for it. Truly Sir (said the Prince Intaphernes) I do set so high a rate upon your friendship, that though I be not beholding unto the merits of my sister for it, but only unto my own, yet I should think my selfe most happy to enjoy it. And if I have any thing to charge my Sister with, it is because she never acquainted me with this noble Conquest which she hath made: Alas most generous Intaphernes (said A|tergatis) the Princess Istrina knows not yet so much as you do, nor do I yet know whether I should wishe she did know it.

After this, Atergatis related unto Intaphernes his intentions of never discovering his Passion, unless the Prince of Assyria should marry some other besides the Prin|cess Istrina, and afterwards telling him how that unjust Prince sent for him what the Proposition was which he made unto him, how he refused it: His design of acquain|ting the Princess Istrina with it: and to be short, related the whole passage with so much sweet ingenuity, that indeed Intaphernes thought himselfe much obliged un|to him: so that embracing Atergatis, I do find such freeness, such generosity, and so much heroic ingenuity in your proceedings Sir (sayd he unto him) that I doe think it much more glorious for my Sister to Reign in your heart then over all Assyria, since she cannot do that unlesse she become wife unto the most unjust Prince up|on earth; and if she will be rul'd by me you shall be happy Sir, if so it be that she can make up your felicity. Atergatis hearing Intaphernes speak thus, he expressed him|selfe with so many tender protestations of friendship and thanks, as Intaphernes did plainly see the superlative affection which he bore unto the Princess Istrina.

Afterwards, they began to consult upon the best course which was to be taken, considering the state of things; for said the Prince Intaphernes, it is to be conceived that the Prince of Assyria will secretly interest himself in the death of Armatr|ites: And it is to be feared, that having such a favourable occasion for it, he will re|venge himself upon you for denying him.

But after a serious examination of the whole businesse, they resolved that Atergatis should not goe into Babylon till it was night: That he should lodg with Intapher|nes, where the Prince of Assyria durst not offer any violence because of the Queen: That it should be blazed abroad how the Combate between Atergatis and Arma|trites did grow, because the first of these maintained the glory of Nitocris against the other: And that they should not at all speak of the intended stealing away of the Princesse Istrina, least it should too much incense the Prince of Assyria; that in the interim, the Prince Intaphernes should goe into the Court to prepare the Queen, and to divulge in what Condition he found Atergatis and Armatrites, and how he heard Page 25 it from the mouth of the vanquished what was the cause of the Combate, divulging also the generosity of the Conqueror, and publishing that Armatrites was the first challenger to fight. And after all this, said Intaphernes I must go into my Sisters chamber. But generous Prince (sayd Atergatis to him) what will you say of that man whom she will not know? I will tell her, replied he, that she ought to preferre him before all the rest of the world; and that being so much obliged to him as she is, she deserved the Prince of Assyria's scorn, if she were not as gratefull as Atergatis is generous.

After this, seeing it was late, and would be dark before they came to the gates of Babylon, they began to walke, and came so happily, that they could not be known by any who could acquaint the Prince of Assyria, that Atergatis was gone unto the Lodgings of Intaphernes. However, as soon as that Prince had carryed him to his Chamber, he left him, Atergatis desiring him to have a greater care of what he said unto the Princess Istrina, then of what hee should say unto the Queen: but as he was ready to goe out, a Page from that Princesse entred, who having heard some confused reports of a Combate with Armatrites, did send to see whether her Bro|ther was returned from hunting, and whether he knew with whom it was that Ar|matrites fought? Tell her, said Intaphernes, that I will see her presently, and that I send her word it was he whose name she would not know, that fought with Arma|trites, and is his Conqueror. The Page remembring word for word what the Prince Intaphernes told him, went back to the Princesse Istrina, and made an exact relation of the Prince her Brothers message, and shee was extreemly surprized when she heard it. The cause of her wonder was not only to know that it was Atergatis who fought with Armatrites and overcame him, and to know of a certain that it was A|tergatis who was in love with her: but her greatest wonder was, to understand that the Prince Intaphernes should be acquainted with the conference she had held with Atergatis; not being able to imagine, that he who would never tell her openly that he loved her, should acquaint the Prince her Brother with his passion.

But whilst she was descanting thus upon the novelty of this adventure, Intapher|nes went to the Queen, unto whom he related the combate of Atergatis, moving her to set a value upon his zeale who had defended her glory against him that oppo|sed it, and was vanquished, assuring her of a truth that Armatrites confessed it be|fore he died. Also, since at the beginning of this contest between these two Princes there was severall witnesse of it, the noise of it was spread throughout all the Court, and had come unto the Queens eare: so that whatsoever the Prince Intaphernes sayd unto her, being but a confirmation of what she heard before, it was an easie matter for that Prince to dispose her unto a Protection of Atergatis: And indeed, though she had no inclination to authorize such Actions, yet she sent to tell that generous Lover how she wished he had nor been so zealous in defence of her glory. However, though she was very sorry for the disastrous accident, yet she thought her selfe obliged unto him, for interesting himselfe so far as to hazard his life for her: Adding, that she would protect him as far as justice and fittingnesse would permit her: But though Nitocris had this good opinion of Atergatis, yet the Prince of Assyria was quite contrary, and undertook to protect the kindred of the dead person in so high a manner, as made it apparent, he lamented the losse of Istrina's intended ravisher: And being a man of an infinite spirit, and penetrating wit, his fears were that Ater|gatis would make his vanquished Enemy confesse his intentions, and knowing it, would acquaint the Queen.

However Intaphernes meeting him as he came out from the Queen, and as he was going unto Istrina, this violent Prince knowing that Intaphernes had already spo|ken very advantageously in behalf of Atergatis, he stayed; I know (said he unto him in an angry tone) that you are the great abettor of the Prince Atergatis: but let me tell you that I am resolved to revenge the death of Armatrites: Since Atergatis Sir (replyed Intaphernes mildly) had not fought with Armatrites, but in behalf of the Queen I had thought Sir, you would have been his protector: and I am confident you will, as soon as you have spoken with that great and glorious Queen: therefore I beseech you Sir, give me leave to rest in my owne opinion, which ere long will be <...> urs: No o (answered the Prince of Assyria very sharply) never imagine I shall a|ter my opinion: whom I love now, I shall love as long as I live; and whom I hate Page 26 now, I shall for ever hate; therefore never hope that the Queen can make me change my mind, either in what relates unto Atergatis, or any else: And therefore by con|sequence it is your part to conform your mind & opinion unto mine. I will ever conform my selfe Sir unto the dictates of Reason (replyed Intaphernes) and will never faile in my duty to you or to the Queen: But Sir, I cannot cease, being the friend of Atergatis, since honour will not allow it: Then be his friend (answered the Prince of Assyria very hotly) but withall, be sure to find me your enemy. Then this violent Prince did leave Intaphernes, who had much a do to keep within compasse of his res|pects: but striving with himselfe not to give any such tart replies as he desired, he ex|pressed himselfe in as sweet Language as his generosity was capable of, and after|wards went unto the Princess Istrina, who expected him with much impatience, which was accompanied with a kind of feare and shame.

As soon as he came into her Chamber, he desired her to goe into her Closet, where he would try whether all Atergatis had told him was true; and whether she knew any more then he had discovered to him: so that beginning to speak, and looking atten|tively upon her; Methinks sister, sayd he unto her, that considering how I have ever lived with you, and since you have known the very secrets of my heart, and have not been ignorant of my inveterate hatred of the Assyrian Prince, you should have ac|quainted me how you reign in the heart of Atergatis. Atergatis (replyed the Prin|cess Istrina; and blusht) hath kept his passion so close, that though it be so he does love me, yet I knew it not, and therefore could not acquaint you with it: 'Tis true, I had of late a kind of guess at it, but I might perhaps be mistaken in my Conjectures. No, no, replied Intaphernes, you are not mistaken sister, if you thought that Atergatis adored you, and he hath given such ample testimonie of his love, as you need not doubt it: But Sir, I beseech you (replied the Princess) tell me how you came to know so much? and whether Atergatis acquainted you with what he said unto me in the gar|dens of Semiramis? when you have related your conference sister with Atergatis (an|s|wered Intaphernes, I shall then relate unto you mine with him.

Istrina hearing her brother say so, began to tell him very ingenuously, all that Atergatis said unto her: so that Intaphernes finding her words concur with what his friend had told him: he acquainted Istrina with all he knew concerning his Combate and his Love: and did so highly applaud the generosity of Atergatis, and hate the in|justice of the Assyrian Prince, as he did what he could to make her love the first, and hate the second. And certainly there was no great difficulty in effecting his design: for the Princess Istrina thought her selfe so obliged unto Atergatis, for hazarding his life to prevent Armatrites from carrying her away, and was so mortally offended at the Prince of Assyria, that there could not be greater dispositions both to love and to hate, then was in her heart. So that not resisting the desires of Intaphernes, which were, that she should content her selfe with the Dominion of Atergatis his heart, and reject the Assyrian Throne, they consulted together how they should negotiate with Nitocris: but since they could not acquaint her with this last piece of injustice in the Prince her sonne without extreemly grieving her, and without exposing Atergatis to the fury of that robustuous Prince, if he should come to know it, they could not resolve upon that course, so that Intaphernes disposed himselfe to return unto Atergatis: As he was ready to leave the Princess Istrina, shee kept him a little longer; But brother (said she unto him, and blusht) doe you intend to acquaint Atergatis that you have told me how he loves me? I must acquaint him Sister (answered hee) if I would be welcome to him: However, replied she, I beseech you do not tell him that you have perswaded me unto any thing: I cannot tell (said he, and smiled) whether I should or no; for it would not be very advantageous for mee to let him know that you would not give any credite unto my words: To save your honour, replied she, you may tell him that I did not doubt of your words, but because I suspected his; for truly brother, if you put me to the necessity of receiving Atergatis as a Lover, and as a declared Lover too, you will expose me to the greatest perplexity in the world: I pray Sister, said he unto her, what would you have mee tell him? would you have me so damp all his hopes, that he shall never dare to tell you that he loves you? or would you only oblige me not to deprive you of the delight in hearing it from his owne mouth, which you cannot so pleasingly receive from mine? You know so well bro|ther what I would have you say (replied she) that I need not tell you what words Page 27 you what words you should use: all I require of you is, that you would not engage me into any Conference of open Gallantry, unless you would have me use that man over well unto whom I am extreemly obliged. After this, Intaphernes went out of Istrinas Chambers, and returned to Atergatis, unto whom he related all the passages between the Queen and him; also what the Prince of Assyria sayd unto him, and what the Princess Istrina answered him; to the end he might prepare himself (when things were brought to such a pass as he might see her) to fit his talk unto her de|sires. In the mean time, the Prince of Assyria used all his arguments to perswade the Queen that the Combate of Atergatis ought rather to incense then oblige her: but he could not do it; On the contrary, the Queen took this occasion to tell him, that he affected alwayes to hate whatsoever she loved, and whosoever loved her: and spoke so sharply, as he went out very ill satisfied; And he was that day in such a huffing Chafe, and gave such harsh language unto Intaphernes, as that Prince as wise and re|spective as he was, did reply so sharply as the Prince of Assyria commanded him to keep out of his sight.

In the mean time, the Queen to calme this Storm, sent Atergatis word that considering the violence of the Prince her Son, she should be glad if he would depart the Court for a while, untill she had appeased the Kindred of Armatrites, and till she had sweetned the spirit of the Assyrian Prince. So that Atergatis out of his respects and obedience unto the Queen, prepared for a departure out of Babylon: But since he could not go, before ht took his leave of the Princess Istrina, he intreated the Prince Intaphernes to obtain that permission for him; No, no, answered that Prince, you must not do so: and it seems that you do not perfectly know the person whom you love, since you do not think it requisite to deceave her, and that way ob|lige her unto such a business as this; but that you may receive your desired satisfact|ion, I will put an innocent Fallacy upon her: Atergatis then thanked Intaphernes, and told him that his fear was, that he should esteem him more then he loved his Si|ster; However, sayd he, I am sure, you have obliged me more then ever she did. In the mean time, Intaphernes to keep his word with Atergatis, did perswade the Prin|cess his sister the next morning, to go walk in a Garden which is upon the Banks of the River Euphrates, telling her, that now she need not fear to go out of the Pallace, since the Prince of Assyria had no more men with whom he could chaffer to car|ry her away: Yet Istrina did a long time deny him, but Intaphernes was so very ear|nest, as she did suspect some hidden Design in it; but her curiosity having got the mastery of her mind, she resolved to suffer herself to be deluded: And indeed the next day Intaphernes carried the Princess his Sister unto the Garden which he propounded, where Atergatis by break of day had got before them, and stayed there untill Evening: For since the Owner of that place was an intimate friend nnto Intaphernes, he was very safe there; so that the man carrying Atergatis in a great and magnificent Closet, he watched there very conveniently for the Princess Istrina. In the mean time, she was no sooner come into the Garden, but Intaphernes motioned to go and see the house; But sayd she unto him, You propounded to bring me out to walk, and now you have no will unto it: If it were best to be in a house, certainly it were best to be in the Queens Palace, which I beleive is much better then that you would have me go into; yet Sister (replied Intaphernes) you shall see something in the house which you could not in the Queens. After he had sayd so, he carried Istrina into a great Hall, from thence into a Chamber which looked into a great plea|sant Meadow; so that finding this Prospective very delectable, she looked out of a Window which stood open, and pleased herself with the sight of it: Whilst she stood there without any other Company but two of her women, the Prince Intaphernes opened the door of a C|loset to let in Atergatis; so that when the Princess Istrina turned about she was extreemly surprised at the sight of him, though she knew the Prince her Brother did not bring him thither without design: I cannot tell, Madam, (sayd Atergatis most respectfully unto her) whether you will pardon the Prince Intaphernes, for the fallacy which he hath put upon you in my behalf; but I am sure, I had no power to yeeld obedience unto the Queens Commands, that I should depart from Babylon, before I had the honour to bid you adieu. It need not be doubted, replied she but that I shall much complain of him; for indeed I cannot endure that any should deceive me, no, though it be to my advantage: However I shall Page 28 very willingly pardon him this trick he hath put upon me, because he hath given me occasion of thanking you for hindring Armatrites from making me the most miserable woman in the world. It is most true (sayd the Prince Intaphernes, and interrupted her) and you are so much beholding unto Atergatis, that if you were the Queen of Assyria, I conceive you could not pay him the debt you owe him, unless you gave him the Crown: O, Sir, sayd Atergatis, you make me so ashamed at your language, as I dare hardly look upon the Princess. Since those, Sir, who are obliged, replied Istrina, have more reason to blush for shame, that those who do oblige, I must con|fess it my part to be ashamed, for being obliged so much beyond my Gratitude. Per|sons of your Merits, Madam, replied Atergatis, do alwayes sufficiently recompence all Services that can be done them by their well acceptance of them: Therefore, Ma|dam, if what I have done for you do not displease you, I am well payed for the Ser|vice, and for all I can do as long as I live. As the Princess Istrina was ready to reply, the Master of the house came and whispered Intaphernes in the Eare, and told him, that there was one of the Queens Officers asked for him, and seemed as if he had some earnest business with him; so that Intaphernes being gone out of the Chamber into the Hall to speak with this Officer, Atergatis had the more liberty to express his thoughts unto the Princess Istrina, though he had none which he desired to conceal from Intaphernes, nor which he did not tell him: But since it is the quality of Love to love Secresie, and since the words of a Lover when he speaks of his passion would not be heard by any but the person whom he loves, therefore Atergatis was very glad of this opportunity; so that not to let it slip (that he did not intend to speak openly of his passion.) I render thanks unto the Gods (sayd he unto the Princess Istrina) that they have not driven me unto the necessity of acquainting you the first time with a business which I could not long conceal from you: and for that the man whose name you would not know, is not unknown unto you, though he hath been disobe|dient unto your Commands of never letting you know it. Truly, I must needs con|fess (replied Istrina and blushed) that you have not disobeyed me, and that in rea|son I have no just cause to complain; yet I cannot chuse but accuse you, though I am not able to give a name unto the Crime wherof I do accuse you: for indeed being so much obliged unto you, as I am, and esteeming you so much as I do, I dare not tell you, that you have not spoken sincerely unto the Prince my Brother, but I am con|fident you did not well know your own thoughts, that you were mistaken, and took one word for another, in speaking of the Princess Istrina unto Intaphernes, and that you gave the small esteem and amity you bore her, some names which did not sute well with them. Do you think, Madam (replied Atergatis) that one can keep a Medium in their esteem and love of you? Since there is a Prince, replied she, who finds in his heart to scorn me, and has a great aversion to me, me-thinks it a peece of vanity to imagine that you should so much as esteem me: Oh, Madam, replied Atergatis, the man you mean deserves not to be ranked amongst men, much less a|mongst Princes. However, Madam, since a miserable man, who is ready to depart from you, stands in need of some Consolation to keep him alive; I will beleive, Ma|dam, that you spake as you did, purposely to give me the happy occasion of telling you myself how infinitely I adore you. No, Atergatis, replied she, that was not my Design: But on the contrary, I did beleive, that by speaking as I did, I should oblige you to take time in the expressions of your affection, since it must be time only that can well do it: I know very well you have done very much for me already, but since generosity only might prompt you unto it, I beseech you give me the freedom of doubting what you say, since there cannot hap a greater mischance unto you then not to be thought very generous. Alas, Madam, sayd Atergatis, I beseech you do not attribute that unto my generosity which belongs unto my love; take away from me that Vertue, if you please, but do not take from me a passion which is nearest my heart; and since you, Madam, your self did create it in me, do not destroy your own Creature, nor dispute it with me. I do not ask, Madam, that you should retaliate heart for heart, and sigh for sigh; All I desire is, you would be pleased on|ly to accept of my heart and hearken unto sighs: for truly, Madam, since the good|ness of the Prince Intaphernes is pleased to interest himself in my miseries; I may belleive, he will permit me to Conquer you in the name of that amity you bear unto him, to accept of my affection without any hatred unto me. If I were not to depart Page 29 from you so soon, I should waite untill my eyes, my sighes, my teares and my ser|vices had given you a thousand testimonies of my passion, before I had made any use of my words to perswade you. But since I am ready to depart, methinks Madam, that a man who hath so long loved you in silence, may have the liberty of expressing his love without incurring your anger, especially having such a Preface as the Prince Intaphernes.

You do make use Sir of such a powerfull name replied Istrina, that I am much puzzled to find answer for you; yet I shall tell you, that since I am a little harder to be perswaded then the Prince my Brother is, I do not engage my selfe to believe all that he doth: And therefore be not offended Sir, if I suspect your words; and to speak with reason, it is to be thought that a Love which begins in absence will not last long. Oh Madam (replied Atergatis, and interrupted her) you do me the greatest wrong in the world to say that my Love begun in absence, since if you did but know when it did begin, you would find me to be the very first of your Adorers. I do not ask any recompence Madam, for all those secret torments which I have already endured for you, so you will but be pleased to set a value upon those which I shall suffer for the future.

I know very well, that since the eyes of all the Court looked upon you Madam, as she that was to be Queen of Assyria, to offer lesse then the heart of a King, was an offering unworthy of you: And I can assure you, Madam, that my intentions were to obey you as long as I lived; and had I as many Crowns as you deserve, I should give them unto you with more joy then I could possesse them: Not that (unless am|bition be the predominate Passion of your soule) I can never hope to be happy, since it is to be feared, that you will not love a King who is not so unjust as not to love you better then a Prince who makes it his glory to be your slave: but the Queens autho|rity forcing the Prince her sonne to obey her, your owne inclination cannot resist her: I beseech you Madam, be not offended at any boldnesse in speaking thus unto you: If ambition were a base and criminal passion, I should suspect you; But since desire of Rule is universally in the hearts of all; and since to ascend a Throne, long and bloody Wars are usually made; and since Kingdoms and Empires are subverted, I may very wel fear that you will make no scruple of loosing me, that you may Reign; for I must confesse you may do it without any injustice to me, since I have no right in the Earth to hinder you: And I assure you Madam I am not so insolent as to offer any constraint unto your inclination: but Madam, I beseech you give me leave to tell you, that though I am fully resolved to be slave as long as my life lasts: Yet I perceive I must not live your Subject. Therefore Madam, I doe begge it as a singular favour, that if it so fall out during my absence that the Prince of Assyria does resolve to obey the Queen Nitocris you will be pleased to remember, that you cannot ascend the Throne, but it must cost the miserable Atergatis his life.

Since Sir, I am resolved to be very sincere, replied the Princess Istrina, I must tell that I will not oblige you by the resolution which I have taken of resisting the Queen more obstinately then the Prince of Assyria respects her, since I do it only for the love of my selfe; for believe it, I think it more glory to scorn a Prince that slights me, then to be a Queen by any unworthy way; so that generous Atergatis, you may assure your selfe that you must never be my Subject, and that I shall have no other power over you, but what you do voluntarily give me.

As Atergatis was ready to answer, the Prince Intaphernes entred, but with so ma|ny signs of discontent in his looks, as it was easie to see, he had met with some bad news since he left them: so that the Princess his sister longing to be satisfied, asked him what it was which discontented him? I understand, said he, that the Peace with Phrygia is concluded, and that the Queen prepares for a publike rejoicing: and that the Prince of Assyria's marriage must follow presently after this great Feast which is to be celebrated for this concluded Peace. The man who told me this, did heare the Queen say as much: so that thinking to do me a notable pleasure in acquainting me with it, he sought me out in severall places, and found me here. This newes did extreamly surprize Istrina, and much more Atergatis; who looking the Princesse full in the eyes to discover the thoughts of her heart, did gaze upon her with extream attention: At first she blusht, and seemed a little moved; but presently recollecting her selfe, I am so sure, said she unto Intaphernes, of the Prince of Assyria's aversion unto Page 30 me, and of mine to him, that be the Court never so much joyed at at his Marriage and mine, yet I shall be in mourning.

Oh my dearest Sister said the Prince Intaphernes, your expressions doe infinitely please me; for what ambition soever be in my heart, yet I desire not to see you a Qu: by becoming Wife unto a Prince who hath wronged me, and who hath wronged me unpunished, because I was his Subject; and whom, if fortune had not put that difference betwixt us, I would make known, that the fate of Armes might perhaps make us equals.

Atergatis hearing what the Prince Intaphernes said, was well satisfied, and was quit of most of his feares, but not altogether; for he knew, that the Queen Nitocris was fully resolved to press the Prince her sonne unto the very utmost: nor was hee ignorant, that the Crown belonged unto her; that she was most absolute in her Dominion; and the ancient amity which she had with Gadates, was the reason why she would have him Reign in the person of his Daughter: so that not relying upon the words of Intaphernes and the Princess Istrina, he was in a perplexed condition, and he made a hundred severall Propositions unto them both, to rid himself of his fears.

Intaphernes for his part, advised his Sister to leave the Court, and never acquaint the Queen; but she would not hearken unto that, telling them that she owed more respect unto the Queen and Gadates, then to take any such course: Also said she, it may chance so fall out, that the Prince of Assyria will sufficiently resist her, and never put me to the necessity of incensing the Qu: Alas Madam (said Atergatis) I beseech you give me leave to tell you, that those who will never enter into Combat, can never vanquish: and so if you will not oppose the Queen, it is as much to say, that you will obey her: I do assure you Sir, replied she, I will not obey her. And if ever I be your Queen, I freely give both you, and my Brother leave to be my rebellious Subjects; but in the mean time I beseech you give me leave to temper the Queens mind as I please: I must confesse Sister, said Intaphernes, that you are very much obliged to the Queen, and that's the reason which makes me feare, that if ever she perswade the Prince her sonne, she will perswade you also. Since I do know my owne heart better then you know it, replied she, I have more reason to trust unto my own generosity then you have: But to testifie that I would not have you suspect me to be so base, as ever to marry a Prince who hath wronged you, and scorned me, I will alter my intention, and beseech the Queen (provided you be present) not to command me ever to marry the Prince her sonne, but that she will please to give me so much liberty as to retire my selfe: After this, both Intaphernes and Atergatis do return him most hearty thanks, and applauded her generosity: But she being a little displeased, that the Prince her brother should suspect her of any weakness, did give him a handsome check for it, which did the more confirm him in his beliefe of her generosity.

In the mean while, since it was resolved upon, that he should go unto the Queen the same night, he prepared himselfe to leave her: And since Intaphernes did most dearly love Atergatis, and thought that the more he engaged Istrina with him, the more averse she would be unto the Prince of Assyria: he conjured her to accept of his affection, and to look upon him as a man who of all the world was most worthy of her.

Atergatis for his part, was full of his tender and passionate expressions: But, say, do what they both could, she would not engage her selfe unto Atergatis further then terms of friendship and acknowledgment. But to tell you truly, I believe her heart did promise more then her mouth; and from that day, she began to put a difference between the amity she used to her friends, & the affection she had to that Prince.

However it were, as soon as she returned to the Palace, shee perceived that what the Queen had spoken was known to all the world, and that they began already to look upon her as Queen; for she saw such obsequiousness in all that addressed them|selves unto her, as it was easie to know their thoughts, and that their own Interests did move them so to doe.

On the other side, the Prince of Assyria knowing more precisely then Intaphernes, how the Queen intended his Marriage did take a resolution, which as you know Ma|dam, hath been very unfortunate unto you, since if he had not left the Court of As|syria, he had never come into the Court of Cappadocia. However, without any further Page 31 deliberation, his design was to leave the Court, to get out of the Kingdom, and to travell unknown, untill the Queen his Mother had changed her mind, and that the Princess Istrina was married,

But since neither the Prince Intaphernes, nor the Princess his Sister did know of his intentions, they spoke joyntly to the Queen, and beseeched her to let them retire from the Court, and never to command them back: But the more they complained against the Prince of Assyria, the more Intaphernes was sensible of his affronts; and the more Istrina begged of the Queen never to marry, the more earnest was the Qu: to have them stay in the Court, and was more resolved to make up the match, which she had so long desired. Istrina added her Tears unto her Prayers, and Intaphernes was very importunate, but all in vaine, for neither side would yeeld, nor change their minds.

In the mean while the melancholy Atergatis hearing from Intaphernes how all things passed, would not yet stir from the place where he had a businesse of that im|portance, but resolved to stay a while conceal'd in Babylon, until he knew a little better how squares would goe; but he stayed in such a melancholy condition, that if Intaphernes had not cheered him up, his melancholy had been stronger then his Reason: That which added the most misery to his melancholy, was, the King of Assyria, who as I told you, having a design to steale out of Court, would needs, to delude the Queen, appeare the next morning at the Feast for the Peace of Phrygia, in a high magnificence. He seemed lesse fierce then ordinary, and more civill to the Princesse Istrina: so that all the Court thinking he would obey the Queen, the noise of it came unto the eares of Atergatis and Intaphernes, who would not participate of t <...> di|versions that day: And so that these two Princes were both of them equa <...> d, though from different Causes. Intaphernes did write that night unto his Sister to know whether it was true that the Prince of Assyria was more pliant to her then usu|all; but as he was sending his Letter, he received one from her, which contained these words.

ISTRINA UNTO INTAPHERNES.

Brother,

I Cannot stay untill the morning to tell you, that though the Prince of Assyria hath changed his behavior to me, yet I shall not change my mind; & if I expres|sed any joyes to see him lesse uncivill, it was out of my hopes to make him better know the aversion which I shall ever have unto him: Adieu, do not suspect mee of any weaknesse, and thinke alwayes of my Generosity as you would have me think of your upon the like occasion.

Istrina.

Intaphernes had no sooner read this Letter, but he went to shew it unto Atergatis, who was both glad and sad at it; for he was glad to hear that the Princess Istrina was constant to her first resolution, but he was very sorry to hear that confirmed which had formerly so much grieved him; so that there being a Miscellany of these two Contraries in his soule, he knew not how to expresse his thoughts by his words.

As for the Prince Intaphernes, he knew not what to think; for he could not im|agine why a Prince who had behaved himselfe so harshly, should change in so short a time. Yet in his answer to the Princess Istrina, he excited her to continue generous, and assured her, that he would see her the next day: yet Madam, this Princess hath confessed since unto the Prince her Brother, that she was all the night following extreamly Page 32 restless, for truly, Atergatis had exceedingly obliged her: Atergatis was very amicable, Atergatis did infinitely love her, and she had no inclination to hate him. Moreover the Prince of Assyrias contempt of her, had strangely incensed her spirits against him: and his affronts offered unto the Prince Intaphernes did extreamly exasperate her. But on the other side, when she considered what Glory it was to be Queen of Assyria, to succeed one of the most Illustrious Princesses in the world: To command in the greatest Town upon Earth, to see none but the Gods above her, and to have but a very few equals in the whole Universe; she found it a peece of difficulty to keep close unto her resolution.

As soon as inclined unto Ambition, Honour and Love did command her to be generous, so that she returned to her first thoughts, and resolutely defended her|selfe.

But whilst Atergatis, Intaphernes, and Istrina were each of them descanting upon this adventure; and whilst the Queen was preparing to speak the next morning un|to the Prince her Son, and to press obedience upon him: That Prince without any company but three of his men, departed from Babylon two hours before day.

It is not easy for me, Madam, to tell you what effects this departure did produce in the Court: It would be task enough to acquaint you with the thoughts of Istrina, Intaphernes, and Atergatis, unless I should also mention the sorrows and anger of the Queen, to see that the Prince her Son should so much fail in his respects; yet she dissembled some part of her Resentments. But as for Istrina, she did so lit|tle hide her Joyes at the Princes departure (though in point of honour, she seemed a little angry) that all the Court perceived it; for she being then but very young she co

<...> ot confine all her tumultuous thoughts unto the Closet of her heart. As for Intaphernes, though he was something more a Master of himself, and went as others did to the Queen, yet he was very glad to observe that the departure of this Prince did not trouble her. As for Atergatis, he had such Raptures of joy as never man had; Such, Madam, as though he did never in his life write unto the Princess Istrina, yet now he writ to acquaint her with his thoughts, asking her pardon for rejoicing at her loss of a Crown, and hinted unto her so many passages of Wit, of Gallantry, and Passion, as it was apparent; the heart which guided the hand that writ this Letter was infinitely in Love. The joyes of Atergatis were the more augmented, because he hoped that now the Prince of Assyria was gone, the Queen perhaps would revoke, or at least shorten his Exile; yet he was deceived in his hopes: for be pleased to know, Madam, that since the friends of Armatrites aimed only at the ruine of Ater|gatis, and knowing that he had seen the Princess Istrina in that Garden where Intaphernes carried her, and having learned also that he was still in Babylon, did advertise the Queen of it; so that the Queen having a most Penetrating Wit, and observing that the Princess Istrina was joyed at the Prince of Assyrias departure, and far from grieving at the loss of a Crown; she began to suspect something from this in|terview, of which she had never told her: And her suspicion was the more violent, because she remembered how zealously the Prince Intaphernes pleaded for Atergatis, after his Combate with Armatrites. So that comparing all these Circumstances to|gether, she desired to be satisfied in the business: and indeed so she was very easily; for since Istrina stood in fear of her, and did highly reverence her, she had not power to deny this interview in the Garden; nor did she in that disorder so much as think upon any Colour for it. Also she was much surprized when Nitocris asked her, why Intaphernes desired her to see Atergatis; Madam (replied Istrina and blusht) since Atergatis was ever a good friend both unto Intaphernes and me, he desired that I should bid him adieu, and I did not deny him: Fy, fy, Istrina (answered the Queen to make her confess) you need not make a mystery of such a business: this meeting hath some other cause more then I know; but I will know it, and that more particularly from your own mouth. The Princess Istrina seeing the Queen so very urgent, did make an indirect answer; but Nitocris still pressing her more, and not giving her time to consider upon the business, she forced her at last to tell her in a tumultuous manner, how she was obliged unto Atergatis, acquainting the Queen with the Prince of Assyrias Injustice, in offering to steal her away: and acquainting her with the generosity of Atergatis, and how she was displeased with the first, and more esteemed the second. But all this did not succeed according to Istrinas hopes: for though the Page 33 young Princess never told the Queen that Atergatis was in love with her, or that she did attribute his action only unto the generosity of his Soul: Yet Nitocris did smell the truth, for since some flying reports went of Atergatis his passion, she had wit enough to consider all these things in the true sence. But the worst was, the Queen imagining that Istrina had of a long time known of the passion of Atergatis, she thought, that perhaps this secret peece of Gallantry was the cause why the Prince her Son was so obstinate. Not but that she knew the Vertue of Istrina very well; yet looking upon Atergatis as an Obstacle unto the thing which she most of any thing in the world desired: she commanded a new that he should depart the Court, and not return till she recalled him. Intaphernes whom Istrina durst not acquaint with what she had confessed unto the Queen, did beseech her not to treat a man so rigorously who had fought in defence of her Glory: but she absolutely denied him, and told him afterwards all she knew, & what she thought of Atergatis his Love of Istrina; So that Intaphernes whose Soul was all Sincerity and Generosity, confessed more then the Princess his Sister did: for he told her positively all the passage, and with so much ingenuity that the Queen perceived she was mistaken in thinking that Istrina did know of Atergatis his love long before; So that being very glad a Princess whom she dearly loved was justified in her Opinion: She did with more moderation admit of Intaphernes his aggravations of the Prince of Assyrias Injustice, in desiring to steal away his Sister both for Atergatis and Armatrites.; I do very plainly see, sayd the Queen, that the Prince my Son is very unjust; But for all that Intaphernes, as long as he is living I shall still be in some hopes of Istrinas being Queen of Assyria: And therefore I would not have Atergatis have any thoughts of her; so that though the friends of Armatrites did not press me as they do to banish him: yet banished he must be, because he loves Istrina, and because he is a man too well accomplished for her to hate him. However, assure him, that if he will change Passions, and let Ambition take the place of Love in his heart: I shall ere long fully satisfy it by conferring upon him so considerable Government, that though he shall be banished from Babylon, yet his Exile shall pass rather for a recompence then a punishment. Intaphernes then offered to oppose the Queen, but she imposed silence upon him, so that it must be as she would have it, and Atergatis, must depart, yes, and depart without a sight of the Princess whom he loved: for the Queen did cause her Commands to be so strickly observed, that Intaphernes could not imagine which way he should procure that satisfaction to his friend, who had departed without any Consolation; if Intaphernes had not promised him to present his Letter unto the Princess Istrina and oblige her to answer him. I shall not, Madam, both trouble you and my self with a relation how the Prince Atergatis spent the first months of his Banishment: nor how carefull he was in writing his Letters unto Istrina, and Intaphernes, nor with what exactness Intaphernes answered him, nor with what zeal that Prince spoke of Atergatis unto Istrina: least she should forget him, and not enough hate the Prince of Assyria; for I should be too long and tedious in telling things so little pertinent or necessary: But give me leave to tell you, Madam, how one that was Cosin to Armatrites, hearing that Atergatis did often write unto Intaphernes; he did advertise the Queen of it, but he was not so cunning as to keep it from the knowledge of Intaphernes, therefore such sharp language passed between them as they fell to blows: And Intaphernes fought with so much courage, that after he had killed his Enemy, he defended him|self most stoutly against three of his men, who seeing their Master dead, would needs be revenged: But though they were valiant, yet he killed one of them, wounded another, and put the third to flight, having none but the Gods and himself; for he met him with whom he fought in a long walk upon the Banks of Euphrates, at the end of which he had left his men, and they could not be so soon in with him, as he was Conqueror: Tis true his Victory was dearly bought, for he was dangerously wounded in two places: But since the Chirurgeons did say there was no danger in his wounds, it may very well be said, that the glory he got in the Combate was worth more then the blood he lost.

In the mean time, the Queen perceiving how zealous Intaphernes was in all things that related unto Atergatis, she resolved to continue his Banishment, not only as long as the Prince her Son was absent, but also as long as that unjust Prince would not marry Istrina: and yet she was very favourable unto Atergatis in a hundred things of another Page 34 nature, both to his person and other his relations. Thus this unfortunate Lover, not setting any period to his banishment, but the marriage of her he loved, with a Prince whom he hated, did lead the most miserable life of any man in the world; yet he received so much consolation as to have some Letters from Istrina; but he received so much sorrow also as to know how that wise Princess told the Queen, that the affection of Atergatis was very indifferent unto her: yet she told him, how she beseeched her to send her back unto the Prince her Father, to the end that she should not hinder the return of the Prince her Son; but she durst say no more, yet she explained herself a little more clearly a few days after the Combate of Intaphernes: for the Prince of Assyria sent one of his men secretly into Babylon to scatter severall Ticklets in the Town, by which he declared that he would never return into Assyria untill the Princes Istrina was married, and beseeching the Queen not to marry her unto Atergatis, for some reasons which he would give her, when she had put him into a condition of return: So that this Prince by this means revenged himself upon Atergatis, who would not suffer him to steal away Istrina for him; for the Queen upon this did confirm her resolutions of keeping that Prince still in Exile.

In the mean time, the Princess Istrina, who till now could never let it be known that she did not hate Atergatis, began openly to inveigh against the Prince of Assyrias Injustice, who did not only affront her in his refusal of marriage, but did most tyrannically prescribe things which did not belong unto him, and such things as upon which the whole tranquillity of her life depended. But the more she complained, the more she retarded the return of Atergatis, who hearing of the passages in Babylon, was grieved to the very Soul: yet there was such resentments in the heart of Istrina, as would have joyed his Soul had he known them; for certainly the Prince of Assyrias Tickets, and the Proceedings of the Queen did make her resolve to look upon Atergatis as the only man in the world, who did merit her affection. But, Madam, not to abuse your patience any longer, I must in a very few words slight over all the petty passages in Babylon, whilst the Prince of Assyria under the name of Philidaspes was a Lover of you, and a Hater of the Illustrious Artamenes at Synope: for it would take too much time to express how sad the Queen was, because she knew not what was become of the Prince her Son, and to express the sad heart of Atergatis at his absence from her he loved: the vexation of Istrina to see the absent Prince of Assyria an Obstacle unto her happiness: How angry Intaphernes was to have an Enemy of whom he neither could nor durst be revenged, & to what a trouble the Prince Mazares was put unto, in being an universall Mediator to appease the Queen whensoever she was incensed, either against the Prince her Son, or against Intaphernes, or against Istrina, or against Atergatis. Therefore, Madam, without more mention of what passed in Babylon, whilst the pretended Philidaspes followed the King your Father in the wars which then he had against the Kings of Pontus and Phrygia, and whilst the Voyage of the Illustrious Artamenes to Thomeris lasted; I shall represent unto you only such things as happened after the Queen knew that the Prince her Son had carried you away. For truly, Madam, I owe this testimony unto the vertue of that great Princess, as I must assure you, that this News did extremely greive her, as but for the Prince Mazares, she had disinherited the Prince her Son from the Crown: Then did she repent that ever she crossed the inclinations of Istrina, and did not only give her most tender and obliging language, but the Prince Intaphernes also who was gone a little before into Bithinia, where Arsamones was waging War to recover the Crown of his Ancestors. In the mean while, Atergatis who did interest himself unto every thing which concerned Intaphernes, did follow him to the War, desiring since he was Exiled, to pass his time in the Service of that Prince unto whom Istrina had relation. I am obliged, Madam, to acquaint you also, that if this great Queen had lived she had besieged Opis, whither the Prince her Son had conveyed you, assuring you that her only design in it was to restore you unto the King your Father: But, Madam, death prevented the execution of her generous Design, which would have saved many a sorrow. But since this great Princess at the end of her daies lookt pale death in his grim face, without any fear, and kept her reason clear unto her very last breath, she would not leave the Princess Istrina exposed unto the violencies of the new King: but knowing how much I ever devoted my self unto the Service of the Prince Intaphernes, she Page 35 did me the honour to make choise of me with the trust of the Princess Istrina, appointing me to convey her into Bythinia as soon as she was dead; and having no mind, she should goe unto the Prince her Father, since he being within the Dominions of the Prince her sonne, he should offer some violence unto her: Therefore, making choise of a more safe Sanctuary, she would have me carry her unto Arsamones, with whom, as I already told you, were the Princes Intaphernes and Atergatis, who both of them had highly signalized themselves in that Warr: so that Madam, I accepting of this charge which the Queen committed unto me, and promising most faithfully to perform my Trust, this great Queen of ever honoured memory was no sooner expired, but I prepared for obedience.

The Prince Mazanes who infinitely loved Intaphernes, esteemed Atergatis, and honoured Istrina, did for the more safety of this Princess give me a Convoy, himself waiting upon her some forty furlongs out of Babylon. I cannot tell you Madam how great was the grief of the Princess Istrina for the death of Nitocris, for I have not words apt enough to expresse it: but I can tell you, that the looking upon the Prince of Assyria as the cause of her losse by reason of grieffe which your carrying away caused, did curse him with as many imprecations as you your self could do. However, as time is the best salve for all sorrows, so when we came into Bythinia, her teares were a little dried up, and her sorrows slacked.

As soon as we were upon the Frontiers of that Kingdom, and quite out of the King of Assyria's power, the Princess did stay to rest her self, & to give me time to acquaint the Prince Intaphernes and the Prince Atergatis with her Arrivall: You may well imagine Madam, that the bad newes of Nitocris death was not sweetened by this, especially to Atergatis, though he was to see Istrina, beyond all his hopes; for Madam, be pleased to know, that the Messenger whom I sent unto these two Princes, who were then at Calcedonia, where the Court was, did find them ready to come unto Babylon in a disguise, purposely for the safety of the Princess Istrina, not knowing how the Queens prudence provided for it.

So that being now out of all feares of the new Assyrian Kings violence, and hearing that they should see her much sooner then they hoped, the sorrows of Intaphernes vanished, and much more the sorrows of Atergatis, since he was not so much obliged unto the Queen by reason of his Exile: However, to loose no time, in lieu of answering Istrina's Letters and mine, they went in all hast unto Arsamones, to acquaint him with Istrina's Arrivall, and to desire Sanctuary for her: since Arsamones was much obliged unto them, he was very glad of such an occasion to gratifie the services they had done him in the Wars: so that consenting very cheerfully unto their desires, he acquainted the Queen of Bythinia with it, the very same hour, who for the more honour of the Princess Istrina, did send her own Coach to meet her a dayes journey from Calcedonia, and also a particular Complement unto Istrina.

On the other side, Intaphernes and Atergatis having an earnest desire to see her, did make incredible hast unto the place where she was, friendship and love being sharp spurrs unto both those Princes, who did very pleasantly surprize us; for wee could not imagine it possible for them to negotiate with Arsamones, and be there so soon. It is not an easie matter for me to tell you Madam, how infinitely these three persons were joyed: Intaphernes and Atergatis let theirs appear, but as for Istrina she partly concealed hers.

Their conversation yet began in tears, but yet their Joys to see each other, dissipating all clouds of sorrow, they began to relate all the passages which hapned since they saw each other; they complained against the King of Assyria with such kind of aggravations as sometimes useth to comfort such as have freedom to complain of any Injustice done them. Yet they did not vent all their thoughts, for the passion of Atergatis forged a thousand which he never uttered, yet he had so much satisfaction as to ease himselfe and his heart a little; for after they had talked a long time with Istrina, Intaphernes being desirous to confer with me, did draw me aside, and left Atergatis at liberty to vent his passion; I know not Madam, said he unto her, whether you remember those cruell words you gave me at Babylon, when you told me that a Passion which begun by absence never lasted long. So many crosse adventures have hapned since, replied she, that I do not remember what we said; but (said she, and smiled) Page 36 if I did say so, I think that I did not speak out of reason; for since absence doth often destroy the most firm grounded affections, well may it destroy a green beginning one.

It seems then Madam, replied Atergatis, that my affection to you is not of such a Nature as time and absence can destroy, since it is most certain I do love and adore you more now, then when I left you; and I may truly say, that there was not a day passed over, wherein my Love did not kindle new fires to burn my heart, and make me more miserable: For the more of the world I saw, the more I knew how to value your worth. And the Court of Bythinia, though full of excellent Beauties, hath let me know, that you are not only a person of most absolute perfection in Assyria, but in the world, since I am most sure that all the places I ever came in could not produce one comparable.

Though Aplauds be very pleasing, replied Istrina, principally from a man whom one esteems, yet I beseech you be a little sparing of them, least I should suspect you of flattery, and doubt of what you shall hereafter tell me: Provided Madam, you do not doubt my affection, replied Atergatis, I do not feare your doubting the truth of my words, when I commend you more then ever I did any; for truly Madam, when I tell you that you are the fairest person of the whole world, if you will not believe me, I beseech you believe your Glass. If I tell you that you have more wit then those who have the most, that very same wit w^{ch} knows others so perfectly, will not permit you to doubt of what I say, nor suffer you to accuse me of any untruth when I extoll all your vertues: And if I were sure you would as well believe I love you, as you must needs believe your selfe lovely, I should be much happier then I am: and indeed Madam, unless you do not esteem me at all, you cannot choose but think that I do admire you.

I do assure you Sir, replied Istrina, I do so little know my selfe, as I cannot tel <...> whether one doth me right or wrong; when they esteem me much, or not at all: However, I do once more intreat you not to commend me over much, and I do conjure you not to tell me any more of your affection; for (said she, and smiled) though I would believe you loved me, yet I ought not to give credit unto your words, therefore Sir, I intreat you to live with me as the Prince my brother doth; for I do assure you that though he does not tell me that he loves me, yet I am very confident of his affection.

Oh Madam, said Atergatis, Love and Friendship are things very different: Friendshipp may be dumb, and indeed it were an odd thing, that all ones Friends should still be telling that they love; but as for love Madam, it cannot be so: Indeed it is so farre from being dumb as you would have it, that it must be eloquent; and aggravations are so naturall unto it, as one may say, it is above all aggravations, since certainly one can never love too much: It is a crime to talke of any thiegbut his passion, when a Lover is so happy as to be alone with the person he adores. Judg therefore Madam, I beseech you, whether I have not cause to complain against that rigorous command of not talking unto you of my passion; and whether I have not reason to make my Complaints unto the Prince Intaphernes, I had rather you made your Complaints Sir, replied she, unto my Brother, then unto me; yet I hope, replied he, that he would move you to do me Justice. However, I beseech you, give me leave to aske you Madam, whether after your once intended thoughts of Raigning over all Assyria, and the thoughts of having infinite multitudes for your Subjects, you can be satisfied with having only the unfortunate Atergatis for your slave?

As Istrina was ready to reply, the Prince Intaphernes came unto them, and told the Princess his Sister that she was to goe unto the Court, to the end she might know how to behave her selfe: He made a short description of the hasty and imperious hulmor of Arsamones, of the vertue and prudence of the Queen Arbiana; but when he came to mention the Princess of Bythinia, he applauded her so highly, and in such a manner, as if he feared he could never commend her enough; insomuch as Istrina imagined that he loved her as much as he esteemed her. Did I not know (said she unto the Prince her brother) that you have been alwayes in the Army, since you came into Bythinia, I should think that the beauty of this Princess whom you so highly applaud, had very much engaged your heart: But since I heare of all your Victories, I cannot believe you will let your selfe be vanquished: Doubtlesse Sister, replied Intaphernes, we have been Conquerors in the Wars, but yet Love hath conquered me: Page 37 And that liberty which I preserved amidst all the Babylonian Beauties is lost at Calcedonia, by the sight of the Bythinian Princess. Therefore my dearest Sister, give me leave to plead for Atergatis unto you with more zeale then ever I did; for now I know by my own experience what this tyrannicall passion is, which causeth the greatest delight, and the greatest miseries of life, and therefore Sister I do interest my selfe more then ever I did in the passion of Atergatis unto you.

I should have thought, replied Istrina, that those who are in Love, would have bin so taken up with their own passion, as they would not have had leasure to employ themselves in the passions of others; but for ought I see, I am deceived in my opinion. Yet I do perceive that I must prepare my selfe for as much friendship to the Princess of Bythinia, as you have Love, if I will preserve my selfe in your good opinion. Certainly Sister, replied he, if you do not love her, you will do me a great displeasure, but that I believe will never happen, since it is absolutely impossible to know her, and not to love her, especially having a soule so sensible of Merit as you have.

This Princesse (added he) hath this conformity in her fortune with yours, that she once thought to have been the Queen of Pontus, as you of Assyria, though both failed upon different causes. She hath a Brother also whom she loves as you have, and who most tenderly loves her: he is absent from her, as I have been from you: and I do find such a sutableness between her fortune and yours; that though you do not love her by acquaintance, yet you must love her by sympathy: When we come to Calcedonia (replied she) I shall tell you more; In the mean time, I beseech you Brother tell in what condition is the War? For I must confess I do heartily wish it were ended.

Though Arsamenes replied Intaphernes hath alwayes conquered, yet he hath much to conquer; for the King of Pontus, though he have lost two Battles, yet he is now in the Head of an Army, having still for his Retreat the prime City which is not easie to be taken; for doubtless you know that Heraclia by reason of the Sea, is very strong, having it for its situation.

On the other side, Araminta his Sister is in Cabara in the hands of one of her Lovers, named Artanus, who was carryed away when the King of Pontus returned unto Heraclia, after he had obtained his liberty by the generosity of that renowned Stranger, called Artamenes, who hath made the Arms of Ciaxares so famous, and whose reputation is so high: so that though he had vanquished the King of Pontus, defeated his Army, and taken Heraclia, yet he must after all that Fight with Artanus, and take Cabura.

Alas deare brother, cryed out Istrina, how many dangers and vexations are to be endured before Peace be in Bythinia, or in my heart? After this, since the love of Intaphernes was new, and violent, he could not forbear speaking of it, so that the Princess Istrina out of complacency did hearken unto him according to his desires: I beseech you Brother (said she unto him) how came Love to be predominate in your heart? Did you love the Princess of Bythinia as soon as you saw her? Is it the charms of her beauty, or her wit that hath captivated you? and was your Passion as violent at first as now? When Atergatis & I came first into Bythinia, replied Intaphernes, we went strait into the Army: so that not having seen the Princess till the Army drew into Winter quarters, it was not untill then my heart began to be engaged: 'Tis true, that I may reckon my Captivity from the first day I saw the Princess of Bythinia, since my eyes did no sooner see her, then my heart admired her; methought I had found that which I had long sought after: her beauty did strike me into admiration, but I fancied the same Idea before.

At the first, I fancied her to have as much wit as beauty, and as much vertue as either; so that fancying her to be full of perfection, I loved her, and told my selfe that he who was so happy as to have her Love, was the happiest man alive. Do not wonder to hear me speak incertainly upon the passages of my heart; for the truth is, deare Sister, I had such different apprehensions, that I can hardly give a true relation. The thing I know of most certainty is, that I admired her as much as I was able; but that which most made me loose my self, was the first words which I heard from the mouth of this admired person, which were not only full of Wit and Civility, but also of Commendations which she gave me; for it seems Fame had flattered me unto her, for some Acts which I had done in the Wars.

Page 38 After this, Sister, never aske me what I did, for indeed I did nothing but endeavour to fasten those chaines which did captivate me with as much care, as others tooke to break theirs.

In the mean time, I suffered without Complaint: And if Atergatis had not given that Princess sometimes an occasion to guesse at my passion, by some discourse he had with her, she had still been ignorant that I was the man who did adore her with most reverence.

After this, since it was very late, it was that night resolved that they should depart the next morning, and to talk together all that day. We departed from that place which was three dayes journey from Calcedonia, and by the way mist Arbianas Coach which stayed for us, with one of that Queens chief Officers, who was charged with a thousand obliging Complements unto the Princess Istrina. The truth is, she was exceedingly well received both by Arsamones, and Arbiana, and the Princess their Daughter: They lodged her in the best Chamber of the Palace, and did her all the honours that were due unto her Merit, as well as unto her Quality. It chanced also that the Princess of Bythinia had as great an inclination unto Istrina, as Istrina, had unto her, so that both of them did quickly love each other most tenderly, and friendship did grow as soon in their hearts, as love did in the heart of Intaphernes. Since their Chambers were very neare together, they saw one another every hour, and were such intimate friends, that they trusted each other with their Adventures: so that the Princess of Bythinia acquainted Istrina with the love of Sinnesis to her, with the death of that Prince, and all passages even unto that very hour. Istrina for her part, imparted the Love of Atergatis unto her, so that there was a mutuall exchange of secrets between those two Beauties.

In the mean time, though the Princess Istrina did much grieve at the death of the Queen Nitocris; yet since she came into a Court which victory had filled with joyes, she must be a sharer in the diversions. Not but that the absence of the Prince Spiritides did much grieve both the Queen of Bythinia, and the Princesse her Daughter, and all of any quality in Court: Yet for all that, since Arsamones was a Prince who would make himself feared, and who as fruits of his victory would enjoy all the delights in Calcedonia, he said that it was but just, that all those who had taken so much pains in helping him to vanquish, should also take the pleasures of the Victory. Yet Madam, you cannot imagine this Court like unto that of a great King in time of Peace, where men of Sword and Blood use not to be, but you must conceive it to be a Miscellany of all sorts of People, Officers of the Army, Voluntiers, Courtiers, Soldiers of Fortune, Justices, Magistrates, Priests, and indeed all sorts: For since the Wars had put all in disorder; and since none did strive to appear above his degree, in those bad times: and since every one would be intruders, one might then have seen in the King of Bythinia's Presence Chamber, some men in such a shabbid habit as durst not look in at the Gates in times of Peace.

But since he stood in need of such to compleat his Conquest, he would not disoblige the men of meanest quality, but suffered them to come into the Court, untill he was se led in his Throne. However, since men of reall worth were mingled amongst the rest, the Court was magnificent, and its Tumult had something so delightfull in it, as was not at all wearisome.

This Court being such as I have described, all delights were as if it were in a croud: There was Hors-races, Barryers, Tilting, Dancing, M^sick and Feasts: But in all these Intaphernes and Atergatis did behave themselves so admirably, as they did attract the admiration of all: The greatest advantage unto them was, that they got the esteem of those Princesses whom they adored, it not being possible to see two so equally excellent in such and so many severall things, but to give them commendations according to their merits.

I remember one day amongst the rest, when there was a great Assembly about the Queen of Bythinia, Intaphernes danced with such a becoming grace, as all the company talked of nothing else all that night. And the truth is, Madam, this Prince who fought like a Lion in the Field, did dance as if he used nothing else; for he did it in so noble a manner, and with so free, so gallant, so easie, and so naturall an Aire, as he could not choose but charm all eyes.

Page 39 But to return from whence I dig <...> ed; one night when a Ball was kept by the Queen Arbiana, the Princess Istrina being retired into the Chamber of the Bythinian Princess, who requested her so to doe, that they might have some talk together; though it was something late, they began to confer together of all passages, and what they had observed at the Ball.

After they had discoursed upon those that were fair, and that those were not; of such as danced much, and such as danced but a little; who did well, and who not. The Princess of Bythinia began to commend Intaphernes and Atergatis: after which, perceiving that Istrina durst neither contradict her, nor consent unto what she said, she began to chide her, affirming that since she would not commend Atergatis, she must needs love him as well as the Prince her Brother: However, said she, if it be so, you do an injury unto our friendship; for truly I have imparted my very heart unto you, but it seems you hide yours, since you tell me that Atergatis loves you, and will not confesse that you love him. I am yet more culpable, Madam, then you imagine, said Istrina craftily (to be revenged on her) for I have more secrets then one, which I will not impart unto you. How Madam (replied the Princess of Bythinia) if so; you must resolve not to sleep this night, unless you impart them to mee: If I do impart them, replied Istrina, it must be this very hour; for I believe if you give me time to think upon it, I shall never impart them, nor indeed do I think I ever shall: Surely they are strange secrets (replied the Princess of Bythinia) since they come so hardly out; there is one amongst the rest, replied Istrina, which I would never impart, but I am sure you will know it, though I never speak a word. If so (said the Princess of Bythinia) my obligation will be the lesse, since I must know it by another; but be what it will, I beseech you tell me what it is? Since you will needs know it Madam, replied she and laughed, I must tell you that you are the most cruell woman in the world, in captivating those who come to sacrifice their lives to set the King your Father upon the Throne. For truly Madam, Intaphernes is at this present so little his, and so absolutely yours, that it may very well be said, you only are able to make his destiny good or bad as you shall please.

How's this Madam (replied the Princess of Bythinia) believe me you are too full of revenge: Surely I did not offend you so much as to make you punish me by any Raillery which hath a false foundation. I wish the Gods, replied Istrina, that it were not true for Intaphernes his sake: Yet Madam (added she, and assumed a more serious countenance) what I told you laughing ought not to incense you either against the Prince my Brother, or against my selfe; for I did not tell it you by any orders from him, nor with intentions to let him know I told you, but only to know of you what you would have me advise him unto? I thought (replied the Princess of Bythinia) that you had spoke in a way of Raillery; but since you speake in a serious manner, and since my love to you will not permit me to conceale any thing which is in my heart from you, I must tell you, that I should be very sorry the Prince Intaphernes should engage himself so farre as to love me, because I do infinitely esteeme him; for after experience, what trouble it is to resist ones self, I will not expose my selfe unto it again.

The King my Father is so bent upon his own will, and doth so absolutely require mine to be conformable unto his, as I will never resolve upon any thing lest it should be contrary to his will; therefore, since it is to be feared that I shall never have the glory to be loved by such an accomplished Prince as Intaphernes is, it is requisite both for his tranquillity and mine, that you advise him only to esteeme me in the way of friendship.

I beseech you Madam, replied Istrina, that you will be pleased to teach me what course I should take to make him obey you; so that knowing how to cure the Prince my Brother of his love to you, I may also cure Atergatis of his love to me. Since Atergatis doth love one that is infinitely lovely (replied the Princess of Bythinia) I do not think it so easie a matter to cure him as Intaphernes. And since Intaphernes, replied she, doth adore a Princess infinitely more accomplished then Istrina, it's probable he will not be so easily cured as Atergatis. Seriously Madam (replied the Princess of Bythinia) you would do me a very notable pleasure if you would remove out of Intaphernes his heart that slight passion which I will believe he hath unto me; yet transact so with him I beseech you, said she and blusht, as I do not loose his esteeme. Truly Page 40 Madam, replied Istrina, I do think it a thing impossible to quench the flames which you have kindled in the heart of Intaphernes: However, replied she, do what you can to hinder him from telling me of his affection: Tell him, that if he never speak of it, I have promised you to behave my selfe as civilly to him as I do at this present, and for your sake, be as free with him as hitherto I have been: Really Madam, replied Istrina, it is very strange you should speak this: However (added she, and smiled) to keep you from treating Intaphernes more coldly then ordinary; I must tell you, that if you do treat him so, I shall acquaint him with the discourse which we have had; for though it be not much in his advantage, yet I am confident he will be very glad to heare how you know of his Love.

I beseech you Madam, replied the Princess of Bythinia, do not so, unlesse you provoke me to a revenge in acquainting Atergatis with some flames which I have discovered to flash out of your heart against your will. Then Madam, you must promise me, replied Istrina, to carry your selfe in appearance as if you did not know of his affection, and yet to be something obliging, as if you did not hate him. I do not see, replied the Princess of Bythinia, and blush'd, that this promise which you would have me make is at all necessary; for truly to speak with the same ingenuous sincerity as we use to do of things. I do not think one can be angry that such a very accomplished man should love one: I know that one may not love him, and fully intend never to do it; but I must confess I cannot understand why one should hate a man for no other reason but because he loves; and I am perswaded, that though one do hate a Lover, yet perhaps they may not hate his passion, unless it force one beyond respect; for in that <◇> conceive; it cannot be termed Love which is not full of respect: and I should easily hate such as should not behave themselves as they ought to do.

Since Madam the Prince my brother, answered Istrina, can never faile in his reverent respects of you, you do me the greatest pleasure in the world to speak as you do; for since Madam you say that one may not love a Lover, and yet not hate his passion, I am most confident that you will tolerate the passion of Intaphernes: And if you will be pleased to give me leave to tell you what I think; I must tell you that I do not despair of my brothers happiness: For truly Madam (said she, and smiled) it is a marvellous piece of cunning to separate a Lover and Love: and for my part, I must freely confesse I cannot do it, nor can I understand how one can affect to be loved by a man whom one cannot love; nor delight in any affection, and hate him that owes it. For my particular, I confesse that I have not so much wit as to distinguish a Lover from his Love; for if the Love please me, it is because the Lover doth not displease me: and I must maintain, that one cannot long take pleasure in being loved by any one, unless his person as well as his passion; for a Lover and love are inseparable, and one cannot love the one, and hate the other.

Did I not know replied the Princess of Bythinia, that your aime Madam is, to draw some advantageous consequences for Intaphernes, and disadvantageous unto me by talking thus, I should extreemly wonder to hear you maintain so bad a cause; For you know as well as I can tell you, that one is glad to be esteemed by ones greatest Enemies: And it is so naturall to desire the being Loved, as it may easily be maintained that Love never angred any: But we are apt to confound the effects of Passion, with the passion it selfe, as well as the faults of Lovers with love; but certainly, separte the faults of Lovers from them, and they cannot displease, though the Lovers themselves may.

However it be, said Istrina, I shall content my self with the happiness of the Prince my brother, because his passion doth not at this present incense you; for I am most confident, that if you did hate him Madam, it would vex you: I should doubtlesse be very unjust (replied the Princess of Bythinia) if I should hate the Prince Intaphernes who hath done the King my Father such glorious service: But Madam, I must tell you, there is a great distance between hatred and love. However added she (to conclude this Conference) since it is very late, it is time to sleep, lest that lively collour in your cheeks lose its freshness in the morning, and lest the Prince Atergatis should be troubled at it, and think he made you sick with over-dancing you. I can not tell Madam (replied Istrina and laughed) whether you have not some ends of your own in the advice which you give me; and whether you think not more of your own Complexion, and those sprightly eyes, then at my health: but however I will Page 41 follow it and obey you: And so these two Beauties parted, and went to take that rest which they took from others, for truly Intaphernes and Atergatis took none: Not that they had any cause to complain against the Persons whom they loved and adored. For the Prince Intaphernes found the Princess of Bythinia the sweetest and most civil in the world; And Atergatis knew very well, for all the reservednesse of Istrina that she did not hate him.

But being both of them men of a deep wit, and infinite spirit, they knew also, that though they should meet with no obstructions from the Princesses whom they loved, yet they could not be happy without much danger and trouble; For they were not ignorant that those Princesses were too wise to displease those upon whom they had dependency, since the Princess of Bythinia had heretofore refused to be Qu: of Pontus rather then disobey Arsamoues: And since Istrina also would not have gon out of Babylon but only because she feared that the Prince Gadates her Father should take it ill if she stayed. So that not doubting but the King of Bythinia and Gadates would oppose their designs, they could not choose but be exceedingly troubled at it. For indeed Intaphernes knew very well, that as long as the Warr lasted, Arsamoues would keep many Princes in hope of giving his Daughter unto them, to keep them close to his interest; and that as long as Spitridates did not appear, he would not think of marrying her unto any; for since it was not then known where that illustrious Prince was, (who we knew since was carried into Persia, and taken for Cyrus) it was doubtfull whether that Princess should be Queen or no, and by consequence Arsamoues would not dispose of her.

On the other side, Atergatis was well informed, that the Prince Gadates, for all the aversion to the King of Assyria, to Istrina, and for all her affection unto you, yet he was still in hopes of seeing her Qu: of Assyria; since she was the only person whom according to the Laws of that State, that Prince could marry: And his hopes was also, that the worst treatment he received from you Madam, at Babylon, the sooner would he be cured of his Love, and reduced unto Reason, by marrying Istrina out of Maximes of State, though not out of affection.

Thus Intaphernes and Atergatis foreseeing these obstacles unto their designs, did suffer more miseries then they would expresse. Intaphernes was the more miserable of the two; for since he had not the liberty to speak of his passion unto that Princess who caused it, he was more to be pitted then Atergatis: Though he did endeavour all manner of wayes to talk with her, yet it was a very difficult thing to find her allone; for when she was with the Queen, there was always so much company, that it was absolutely impossible to find a privacy: and when she was in her own Chamber, there was another obstacle, which for a while he thought invincible.

But Madam, that you may the better understand it, be pleased to know, that there was a Lady in Calcedonia, whose name was Berisa, who though she had a hundred severall employments, yet she was hardly an hour from the Princess of Bythinia: Not that the Princess did love her; for on the contrary, she was very troublesom to her; But this woman did so intrude upon her, to the end that other Ladies of the Town might think her a Favourite, that she was one of the most burthensome creatures in the world.

For truly Madam, she cared not a straw for troubling her, so shee should be but where she would be: She was always the first that came to the Princess of Bythinia; and though she would still be fisking into other places, yet she would return again, and be the last with her: There was no need of talking to her, for she would have her vie in every thing that was in discourse: If the Princess was sick, she would send to see how she did three or four times in a day; she never talked of any thing but what was said, and what was done at the Princess of Bythinia's: she would always walke with her whether she would or no, and would still be thrusting into her Coach before Ladies of better Quality then her selfe was. Truth is Madam, she was as bold and impudent, as the Princess of Bythinia was civil and sweet: And though shee was one of the most troublesome and impertinent women in the world, yet she was with the Princess more then any other all the while she was in Calcedonia: But the oddest passage in the behaviour of Berisa; and if you will, the greatest wonder is, that she would not be only always with the Princess of Bythinia, and with the Queen, but she was also as much in the Town as the Court: She was at all Funerals, at all Marriages, Page 42 at all Christings, and at all both publick and private Diversions. None could be sick but she would go to see them, none could have any occasion of joy, but she would go and be a partaker: but though she had a hundred severall employments, yet she dispatched them so hastily, as one would have thought that she never stirred from the Pincess of Bythinia, since whithersoever she went, she always returned to her.

Moreover it was observed, that Berisa was never ignorant of any thing that was said in her presence; thinking it against her honour that any one should know a thing which she knew not: she would say that she knew a thing, though she was altogether ignorant of it; yet she had many cunning fetches to make one relate a business unto her, and to seem as if she was very well informed, she would tell them that talked to her, that there was yet many particulars which she knew of and they did not, which she would tell them another time: after which, she would usually tell others what was related unto her, as confidently as if she knew it before. Moreover, she had a fancy to hold secrecy, or rather a shew of secrecy with all men she saw, provided they were Courtiers: she would alwaies be whispering one after another with all she met, either upon matters of War or business of State, or Cabinet news, or business of Gallantry, or some little tattle or other. Indeed, Madam, I do not think ever any was so earnest in every thing without any business: I remember one day amongst the rest, the Prince Intaphernes who did not love her did observe her actions: and it will let you see, Madam, how she used to employ her time. Be pleased then to know, Madam, that there is a Church in Calcedonia, unto which all the Beauties used to pay their Devotions, sooner then any other; except the two Princesses who used to go unto a little Church neerer the Palace: so that Berisa to loose no time went betimes unto that where all the Beauties were, which used to begin betimes, & from thence unto the Church of the two Princesses which used to be later: After this, she went to comfort a man whose wife was dead, & after that she went and dined with a Lady whom yet she did not very well love; as soon as ever she rose from the Table, she went to the Wedding of a woman of her acquaintance, and from thence to see one of her Cosins: then she came and took her turn with the Princess of Bythinia, and after she had related all that she had gleaned from those places, she went out again, to go and see a stately Ship which a friend of hers had built by the Kings orders, and was then to be lanchd to Sea the first time; after that, she made two or three Visits which lasted no longer then the Complement of going in, and coming out, after she knew who was in the house; after these Visits, Beris|sa took a turn in the walks by the Sea side, where many Beauties used to walk in that Season: from thence she returned to the Princess of Bythinia, for whom she under|stood there was a magnificent Banquet prepared that evening in a Garden; so that going with her she was a partaker of the pleasure: yet all this was not enough, for the Princess returning to the Palace very timely, Berisa went to make her excuses unto one who had invited her unto Supper, from thence she went to a Bal at a Ladies house, who had married her Daughter; but before she went home, she went unto the Princess of Bythinias bed-side, to bid her good-night: Judge, Madam, whether this day was not well employed, and whether it had not been enough for any two, ex|cept Berisa: yet this I must say, because it is true, that this Lady would not have been so displeasing, nor her company so wearisom, if she had not been so earnest in going every where, and in talking upon every thing, and intruding herself into all manner of things: but as she was, I must needs say, that there were very few of any Quality in all the Court, unto whom she was not once a day troublesom, since she was continually with the Princess of Bythinia, who was the greatest Ornament of the Court, and attracted all the Gallants about her. After this, Madam, you may easily imagine, that a person who was troublesom unto so very many, was also very troublesom unto Intaphernes, by taking from him opportunities of talking with her whom he ad|ored; and he became as great a hater of her, as he was a Lover of the Bythinian Prin|cess: and though he was one of the most civill men in the world, especially unto La|dies, yet he had so great a disposition to cross this, that he did continually contra|dict her, unless when she commended that Princess whom he loved: yet sometimes he found occasion to contest with her about that, affirming that she did not commend her enough, or in such a manner as she deserved. Furthermore, he was so unhappy, as Page 43 that she was more troublesom to him then any other: for since she observed that he was much in favour with Arsamones, with Arbi|ana, and with the Princess their Daugh|ter, she intruded upon him more then upon any other man: so that she was more assiduous about the Princess when he was there, then when he was not: However, his fears to pass for an uncivill man, and the example of the Bythinian Princess, moov|ed him to endure against his mind, and contented himself with continually contra|dicting her. But when he was with Istrina, how full of invectives was he against Beris|sa? Dear Sister, sayd he unto her one day in my presence, why do you not perswade the Princess of Bythinia, that it is not for her glory to be so eternally troubled with this impertinent woman, which haunts her every where: who is such an ubiquitary, that she is every where, especially with her? For truly, its fit that persons of her Quali|ty should have such only about her as she desires to have: No, Brother, replied I|strina; but on the contrary, it is the quality of the Princess which deprives her of the liberty to choose who she would have about her; For the Gates of Princes, and the Gates of Temples ought alwaies to be open: and because Kings are Gods, and above all others, they ought to expose themselves unto the sight of all the world; And in|deed what do you think Berisa would say, if the Princess should forbid her to come so much into her presence? and what would those say, unto whom Berisa is most trou|blesom? As for my part (sayd Intaphernes and interrupted her) I would say she did very well, and that she had done me a very great pleasure: nor can I understand why the Princess, because she is a Princess, should therefore be obliged to endure the perpetuall persecutions of such a troublesom person. I know very well, replied Istr|ina, that it is a Torment; but yet as the state of affairs stands with Arsamones, the Princess must take heed of disobliging such a person as Berisa, who hanting so many places, would make a strange hurly burly, if she should be stinted in her Visits. You may say what you please, sayd Intaphernes, but I cannot abide that Berisa should al|waies be where I would not have her to be. For my part, sayd I then unto the Princess Istrina, it would be a very good Office unto Berisa, if she were confined unto her own Quarters: for truly, if she were alwaies where she should be, she were a person very amiable, and would be no more troublesom then others: but she is still where she is never bidden, and often where she ought not to be; questionless she seems worse then she is: Therefore I would have her told, that none but persons of extraor|dinary Merit, and invited ought to intrude into the company of the Bythinian Prin|cess: for amongst persons of unequall quality, nothing but extraordinary Merits can give such a Privilege. But who told you, replied Istrina, that Berisa does not think herself of much merit: Though she had, replied I, yet she ought to have stayed un|till the Princess of Bythinia allowed her so much familiarity as she takes, and admit her merits were high enough; it is not fitting to blaze it: But for all this Berisa is to be excused; for since sometimes the most sad effects of the most violent passions are excused, and since men do ordinarily make use of Love, Ambition, and Jealousie, to justifie their ill actions, certainly some indulgency ought to be used towards Berisa, who assuredly hath a passion in her heart, which is as stronge as any of those I na|med, and which many others are troubled with, as well as she, though they do not make it appear. Oh Orcames (sayd Istrina) do not insult so upon the poor Berisa, or accuse her of a Crime which she never thought of: For my part, replied Intapher|nes, I think she may be supposed to have a thousand in lieu of one; therefore Orcames I pray tell us what is the passion which Berisa is troubled with: It is, Sir, replied I, an earnest desire to pass for a Courtier: and I beleive this kind of envy to be a pas|sion, and a most violent one. For my part, I know women in the Town more sprightly and more amiable then Berisa who are haunted with this passion, which doth so tyrannize over them, as it makes as great an alteration in their hearts as Love, Jeal|ousie, or Ambition could; for they cannot abide any thing which is not of the Court: and indeed men whose Professions are insufferable unto them, women of their quality make them ashamed, they know not what to talk off, and their passions are so strong, as that they think they cannot live, but where they ought not to be, unless, as I sayd before, when they are called and invited thither: for in that case, I confess the Court is a very sweet and pleasing life, and of what quali|ty soever one be they may keep their Ranks with decency and honour. However, this will serve to excuse the poor Berisa, since certainly the passion of the Court is Page 44 more violent then you imagine: However it be, sayd Intaphernes unto Istrina, you would do me the greatest favour in the world, if you could banish her from the Prin|cess of Bythinia; for I cannot endure to see a person perpetually with her who ne|ver does any thing what she ought to do; who is never where she ought to be, who is still talking what she should not, and who is more troublesom to me then any other, though she is a continuall trouble unto all the Court: And if you cannot banish her, yet I beseech you do me the favour, to talk with her alwaies when I am where you and she is: for I profess I cannot endure she should talk to me, or to the Princess whom I adore. Istrina hearing Intaphernes speak thus, did easily apprehend the reason why he hated Berisa: so that not being able to forbear laughing, she told him by way of Raillery, that Envy was too poor a Passion to be entertained in his heart, ther|fore I pray let the poor Berisa quietly enjoy a happiness which she hath taken so much pains to obtain: As Intaphernes was ready to answer, the Princess of Bythinia entred, and Berisa only followed her, the rest of her women waiting in the outer Chamber. Since the Princess Istrina was then in a laughing humour, the sight of Berisa did so augment it, that for all the reverence which she desired to pay unto the Prince of By|thinia, she could not hold: so that being obliged to a Complement, I ask your Par|don, Madam, sayd she unto her, for being in such a merry vaine, as that I cannot ex|press my joyes of seeing you more seriously: I will very willingly pardon you, re|plied the Princess, upon condition you will tell me the cause of your joyes and mirth; for since you do not use to laugh unseasonably at nothing, I am much mistaken, if it be not worth the knowing: I assure you, Madam (replied Istrina and laughed still) I should wish you knew it, if I did not fear that the Prince my Brother would op|pose it: To prevent him (sayd Berisa, who would have her vie in every thing) I will promise you to talk with him as long as you please; you shall not need to take so much pains (replied he) for since I cannot oppose the Princess in any thing, I am willing she should know what she desires. However (replied Istrina craftily) you must needs entertain Berisa whilst I obey the Princess: for you know I must not speak alowd all that she desires to know; Intaphernes would have sayd something to put it off, but the Princess of Bythinia imposed silence upon him; and since she commanded him to talk with Berisa, he must needs obey. Thus poor Berisa, not knowing that she herself was the cause of that secret which Istrina told the Princess of Bithinia, be|gan to talk with Intaphernes, and employed all her wits and cunning to make him tell her what the matter was, which you may be sure, he did not impart: But whilst he was weary of Berisa, the Princess of Bithinia was very pleasant with Istrina; for she hath since told that she made such a pleasant relation of the Conference which that Prince and I had with her, as she never in her life passed away an hour more merrily: Istrina related it in such a manner as let the Princess understand the principall cause of Intaphernes his hatred of Berisa, thinking it to be advantageous to the Prince her Bro|ther, that she should know his affection to her, caused his aversion unto that woman, yet it proved not so advantageous as she imagined; for the Princess of Bythinia desir|ing to avoid all occasions of being alone with Intaphernes, resolved to cherish Be|risa more then she used, though she did not acquaint Istrina with it at that time. Yet to begin her torments upon him by Berisa, she talked so long with Istrina, that at last she pittied him, and did admit him into their discourse. Well, Madam, sayd he unto her, do you find that I had reason to speak as I did? I find, sayd she, that you had reason, and that you were in the wrong also: I assure you, Madam (sayd Berisa to flatter Intaphernes) I can hardly think that the Prince Intaphernes hath not reason for every thing he sayth or doth; and if I do guess right, he is not in so much wrong as you imagine. Alas Berisa (sayd the Princess and laughed) if you did guess right you would condemn him more then I do; for I say he was right in some things, but doubtless you would say he were wrong in all: yet, replied she, his Crime doth not much trouble you, since you laugh so heartily. Do not think, sayd Istrina then, that though the Princess condemns my Brother, he is very Criminal, since she condemns him unjustly though she have no interest in the business. Berisa was exceedingly puzzled to gess at the business: She called to memory all that passed of late in Court, but since she did not look into herself for the cause of Istrinas mirth, and for the secret which she had imparted unto the Princess of Bythinia, she was not like to find it: so that the more she mused, the more merry she made them. In the mean time, Intapher|nesPage 45 wondered to observe, that the Princess of Bythinia was much more civill towards Berisa, then she used to be; for she did not only suffer her, but she talked after with her, especially when Intaphernes was present: You may well imagine Madam, that one who was wont to go unbidden unto a hundred several places, was very assiduous and officious in a place where she thought her self welcome and desired; and she stuck so close to this Princess, that they were almost inseparable, yet for all that, she had a hundred severall businesses in hand, and would go unto a hundred severall places; but she managed her time so well, that she always went at such houres as the Princess of Bythinia was not to be seen, so as it seemed as if she were never from her.

Intaphernes perceiving this new favour, was strangely surprized, for he knew the Princess did not love Berisa: so that making his Complaints unto Istrina, and conjur|ing her to tell him why Berisa was more in favour then ordinary, he found her as ig|norant and as much troubled at it, as himself.

Atergatis also, as witty as he was, he could not dive into the mystery of the busi|nesse, so that this Prince was in a most pittifull perplexity; yet had he known the thoughts of the Bythinian Princess heart, he had not been so unquiet, for she confessed afterwards unto the Princess Istrina, that the chief reason why she made use of Berisa was only to prevent Intaphernes from all opportunities of expressing his passion unto her: also since she esteemed him in such a particular manner, and perceiving a great inclination in her heart towards him, she would not put her self to the necessity of speaking either too harshly or too favourably: but however, since he could not see into the soule of that Princess, he was extremely unsatisfied. Istrina, who knew all the reasons which might induce the Prince her Brother not to engage himself too farr in a businesse which had so much difficulty in it, did use her best arguments to per|swade him not yet to declare himself, but to stay untill the War was ended, before he told her of his Love.

But though he seemed to adhere unto this advice, yet he liked his own best, and resolved to discover his passion unto the Princess of Bythinia as soon as he found a fit opportunity: But Madam, the difficulty was, to find this opportunity, by reason of Berisa's assiduity about her. After he had many dayes waited for it, and all in vain; he bethought himselfe at last of a way to advance his design; which was, to put Berisa upon such a piece of business as would keep her a whole day from going to the Prin|cesse of Bythinia: so that doing me the honour to trust me with his secret, I helped him to deceive Berisa.

I invited severall of my Friends unto a Feast, upon condition they would all en|gage Berisa to be there; My friends though they did not love her, yet did not deny me, because the noise of Berisa's new favour with the Princess was spread over all the world, and so I engaged her to dine with me, and many other Ladies at a very faire house scituated upon the Sea side some thirty furlongs from Calcedonia; yet she would not promise me but upon Condition I would let her return to the Town as soon as Dinner was done: Since I had a secret design in the business, I promised she should, and assured her that a Coach should be ready to bring her back when she pleased: I assured her also, to the end she should not faile, that there should not be one man or woman of the Town in the company, but named unto her those that were to be there, at whom she was well pleased, because they were all Courtiers; but for all that, the principall reason which mooved her to promise me her presence, was, because she observed that the Princes Intaphernes and Atergatis did me the honour to love me.

This Feast being thus concluded upon, it was kept some two dayes after; yet Belrisa went not out of Calcedonia until she had taken her turne with the Queen & Prin|cess of Bythinia, unto whom she promised to return as soon as ever dinner was done: She made this promise in my presence, for I accompanied her to the Princess, and would not leave her, because I would make sure of her.

In the mean time, I know very wel that she could not return so soon as she intended: And Madam, be pleased to know, that after all my invited Guests were assembled together, we all went unto a place designed for this trick, which indeed was a pleasant place; for besides the Gardens which are very noble and fine, there was at the end of a long walk, by the Sea-side, the point of a Rock which did shoot it self into the Sea, upon which was built a very magnificent house, out of which might be seen from Page 46 three sides of it, the waves of the Sea dashing against the foot of that Rock upon which it was built, and which sometimes according to the agitation of the winds would bound as high as the Windows, yet could not come through, but left a white scum like flakes of snow. The prospect of that place was full of delight, and thither it was I carryed Berisa, and all the Company which assembled purposely to delude her. Yet for the better effecting of my project, I caused that dinner to be very late, and as if chance had shamed me with ill servants, services came on so slowly, that one might have dined sufficiently between every dish: and I saw Berisa thought the time to be very long, and did sit upon thorns to return unto the Princess of Bythinia: But that this longness might seem lesse tedious, I provided the best things that could be got: As soon as the last Course was upon the Table, Berisa began to talk of going, and desired me to command the Coach to be ready; so that not contradicting her, I presently commanded one to be made ready, but it was to such men as I had in private commanded not to obey me: When dinner was done, she asked and I as|ked whether the Coach was ready, and I was as earnest as she, purposely to delude her: and when answer was made that it was not ready, I seemed to be in such a colle|rick fume, as she her self began to appease me.

In the mean time, since I had provided an open Barque, under pretence of diverting the company upon the Sea: I propounded unto them to accept of this diversion, and to set Berisa halfway to Calcedonia, and so (said I and turned towards her) you will loose no time; for whilst they are coming with the Coach, we are still going un|to the place where you desire to be, and though the Coach were ready, yet this is as ready a way: Since I winked upon one of my friends to second this proposition, she pressed it on so handsomely, that at last Berisa was perswaded to it, thinking that she should be as soon at Calcedonia this way, as the other. Then did we all Embarque, and to continue myproject, I commanded my men, that as soon as the Coach which was to carry Berisa was ready, it should go into such a place, where I said we should land Berisa. Since it was then neither too hot, nor too cold, it was pleasant taking the Aire at mid-day, and thereupon I grounded my Plot.

As soon as we were all in the Barque, Berisa began to complain that it went not fast enough, so that adding Oare to Saile we went faster: But having appointed him who was to steer, in lieu of going by the side, to put out to full Sea; he did as I ap|pointed, and Berisa took no notice of it, because I alwayes kept her busie in talk.

But that my plot might better hit, before we came into the Barque, I told all the Ladies (who did not love the humour of Berisa) that it would be a good Jeast, if we could make her faile at this meeting which she had appointed at Calcedonia. So that all of them approving of my design, and since fallacies of this nature are no great Crimes, they assisted me exceeding well to keep Berisa from perceiving that we went quite contrary to the place she intended, for two or three of them would stand before her that she should not see which way we steered: Others held her in talke, and put a hundred Questions unto her one after another; so that flattering her, and treating her as the Princess of Bythinia's greatest favourite, we pleased her so very well, that she did not think the time tedious, nor perceived that we were far from the place where she expected her Coach, and thus was she deluded: But at last seeing we could not hide the truth from her any longer, I cried out first to testifie my wonder that we were so far in the open Sea. As for Berisa, she was so surprized, that if I had not first found fault, I believe she would have quarrelled with me: but I was in such a chafe, and kept such a coile at it, that she could not imagine I intended to de|ceive her. The Pilot said he understood me wrong, and thought I had commanded him to come in the Evening to the place where the Coach was to meet.

In the mean time, every one of us had such an itch of laughter upon us, that we could not hold; and we broke out in such a manner, as Berisa began to suspect the truth, and grew angry in good earnest: But when I perceived that her anger was vely high, I came unto her: If the Lovely Berisa (said I unto her, by such a way of flattery as I knew shee loved) were not a person who knows all the world, and knows also when it is fit to be angry, and when not, I should feare that she had now some occasion of Choller; but being so much a Courtier as she is, though perhaps some of the Ladies to enjoy her company the longer, had corrupted the Pilot to steer a wrong course, yet I know she understands Raillary too well to be offended at Page 47 it, and will rather thank her for so handsomely deceiving her. For my particular (ad|ded I) I should have much ado not to take her part against you, since certainly I am infinitely joyed to see you here, so as I cannot chide her, for being a cause of my hap|ness: For truly (said I unto her in a low voyce) you must know amiable Berisa, that this entertainment was intended only for you, and it would be a cruel piece of injustice not to allow a whole day unto him who cares not for the rest of the compa|ny if you were gone.

Berisa hearing me speak thus, was a little qualified, saying, that she would willingly pardon those that deceived her, upon condition they will make as much hast to Land as they did from it. But the Pilot hearing her say so, and knowing well that it was not my mind, told her, that it was a thing impossible to go in a direct line unto the shoare, because there was many hidden Rocks which would endanger them.

The Pilot no sooner had said so, but all the company bade him have a care of that: and Berisa her selfe, as earnest as she was, did not contradict it, but desired him to carry her as soon as he could with safety to the shoar. As soon as she made that re|quest, we did all so importune her to spend that day amongst us, that she could not deny us: and indeed we carried her back to the place where we dined, still perswading her, that she was much obliged unto us for the violence which we did her.

After we were returned thither, we sent for the Coach which waited halfe way to Calcedonia, and I appointed those which went, not to make over-much hast, but to be as slow in coming as could be, that it was almost night when it came, and then she must needs have so much patience as to stay a banquet before we parted: Thus Madam, to favour the Prince Intaphernes, I carried the matter so, as it was night before Berisa entered into Calcedonia. In the mean time that Prince the better to make use of her absence, obliged Atergatis to go very timely unto Istrina, and keep her from going unto the Princess of Bythinia: not that this Princess was ignorant of his passion, or disapproved of it: but since he knew how she did not think it fit for him as yet to discover himself unto that Princess, he desired to keep secret from her his de|sign: And indeed Madam, he was so diligent, that he came to the Princess of Bythinia when she was newly risen from the table: and since that is the time when least company comes to her, and when Courtiers use not to make any visits, he had conveniency enough of talking with her: When he came into her Chamber she won|dered to see him; I thought (said she unto him, and smiled) that none but Berisa would have visited me at such a time as this; but for ought I see, she hath left her Commission with you to supply her room; or at least I know you are now as hasty as she useth to be: yet I am perswaded you will not be long without her company, for she promised me to be here as soon as ever as she had dined.

Berisa is so very good company (replied Intaphernes, and smiled as well as the Prin|cess) as I can hardly think the Ladies with whom she is, will let her return so soon: But Madam, since I am perswaded that Berisa never useth to speak unto you con|cerning me when she is alone with you; I beseech you let me not speak of her, now I have the happinesse to be here, when she is absent. I assure you Sir (replied the Princess who had a mind to turn the discourse) that you very much wrong the poor Berisa, by being so averse towards her, as I have observed you are; for truly, though she be a little too intrusive; yet you need not hate her so much. Oh Madam (said Intaphernes) did you but know the harm she does me, you would confesse I have no reason to love her. The harm she hath done you, replied she, is onely be|cause you fancy that she cannot divert you; and because she meddles with every thing you would have her meddle with nothing; but yet I do not love such nice spirits, and delicate wits, for it is very hard for them not to be very often unjust: Since Madam, it is your pleasure I should not complain against Berisa, replied Intaphernes, I will reverence and obey all your desires: And to concurr with your opinion, and give you an occasion of calling me the most unjust man in the world, I must confesse, my obligations unto Berisa, for preventing me from being exposed a thousand times unto your anger. For Madam, since I am resolved to confesse all my sins unto you, I must let you know, that had it not been for the assiduity of busie Berisa, I had ere this told you above a hundred times that I am the man who admires you with more reverence then any man in the World, and loves you with a more violent and respe|ctive passion.

Page 48 How a hundred times? (replied the Princess, and blush'd) believe me that should never have been; for after you had told me it the first time, you should never have told it a second. However, since you are more obliged unto Berisa then I imagined, though she be not present, you speak unto me as if she were; for if you do not, perhaps you shall be driven to the necessity of grieving she is not here, though I know her presence never pleaseth you.

When I first resolved to tell you Madam, that I adored you, replied Intaphernes, I did not believe you would give a favourable audience; but I must needs confesse, I did not despair of obtaining a pardon for a Crime which I could not repent of: and un|lesse you had been absolutely the fairest person that ever lived, I should never have committed it, and told you that I was your adorer: but I tell it Madam without any other pretence, but only to obtain so much favour from you as not to banish me for telling it.

You talk in such a serious tone (replied the Princess of Bythinia) as I cannot tell how to answer you, as if you had spoken only out of a piece of gallantry; and my o|pinion is, that those who do not answer precisely unto such things, doubtlesse desire to be told it often: and therefore to spare my selfe much anger, and to preserve you in my esteem, I shall tell you very ingenuously, that I have a very high conceit and esteem of you, and that you are the man, whose esteem I do most desire; but I must tell you withall, that to keep us both in this esteem of each other, you must not tell me any more of such things as you speak of; and that if you do, I will never hear|ken unto it.

If you observe this, you will most exceedingly oblige me; and both for your sake and my own, I will forget what now you have told me. Oh Madam, replied Intapher|nes, this is not the way to stop my mouth; for if you would have mee mention what I have told you, no more, you must honour me with a promise never to forget it: Protesting unto you, that if you will favour me so farre as to assure me that you will never forget it, I will then never speak of it again. You know very well replied the Princess, that this which you demand is a thing which I neither ought, nor can con|sent unto: But I must tell you, that if you will not do as I would have you, doubt|lesse I shall not do as you would have me; for I will so absolutely take all opportuni|ties of speaking to me from you, as you shall never meet with any occasion of telling me any thing that may either please, or anger me.

As Intaphernes was ready to reply, much company came in and prevented him, and they continued there all that day, so as he could not renew it. But the best passage was, the Princess of Bythinia went that night to the Princess Istrina, and Berisa at her return to Calcedonia, would have me carry her thither: so that Intaphernes being there also with many others, it was the best sport in the world to see with what ag|gravations Berisa related the trick which I had put upon her: Ah Madam, said she as soon as ever she saw her, if you do not oblige the Prince Intaphernes to revenge my Quarrell upon Orcames, I shall complain against you as much as against him, for he is the cause of my not returning so soon as I designed, and why I have spent a whole long day without the honour of being with you. I assure you (replied the Princess of Bythinia, knowing that Intaphernes would understand her meaning) I was never more sorry for your absence then this day, and I never more wanted your company: Me thinks Madam, replied Intaphernes, that for all the merits of Berisa, you are inju|rious unto all the company that were with you in speaking, as if you were weary of them: However it be (said the Princess) I wish Berisa had been here, especially after dinner: I assure you Madam (replied Berisa to justify herself) it was not long of me, for I did as much as possible I could to be here again betimes.

After this, Berisa began to relate all the passage how she was deceived; not omitting the least Circumstance: The Princess of Bythinia understood that this fallacy had no such obliging cause as Berisa believed; for she knew that I was no such zealous lover of her, as to take all that pains to hinder her return from Calcedonia; so that desecanting upon the adventure, she imagined that he who had thus deluded Berisa, was well acquainted with the secrets of Intaphernes, & doubted not but that Prince had put him upon this device: At first she was a little angry at it, but presently after anger vanished; and she could not choose but think the passage pleasant, when she considered the busie earnestness of Berisa, and her impossibility to do as she would: After Page 49 which, finding good cause to believe that the Love of Intaphernes was very great, since he was driven unto this shift to express his passion, she thought upon it without any anger, yet telling Berisa, that there can be no fallacy innocent; however, Madam, replied Intaphernes, I hope you will confess that there are some fallacies which are no great Crimes in those who act them. I must confesse, replied she, that perhaps there may be some pleasure to be taken in them; but I must needs confess withall, that there are no deceivers which are not culpable to some or other. There are some Crimes, replied Istrina, which are so easie to be pardoned, as I cannot tell whether the actors deserve the name of Culpable: and whether a terme ought not to be invented which might expresse such men, neither innocent nor culpable.

For my part, replied the Princess of Bythinia, I know no such persons as you mention, nor any Medium between Innocency and a Crime; nor will I take so much pains as to help out the Language with a word which I shall never stand in any need of; For I must declare, that all those which I ever have seen, do see, or ever shall see, do passe in my opinion, either for Innocent or Culpable against me: nor can I imagine any medium between these two.

Then Madam, according to your expression (said Intaphernes, and looked attentively upon her) it seems I am at this present either innocent or culpable in your opinion. You need not doubt it (replied she hastily) since questionless you cannot doubt it unless you do me an injury. However Madam (replied Intaphernes) I would gladly know whether you use to take all necessary care to be well informed of the Innocency or the Crimes of those you condemn or justify? for truly Madam a very small circumstance may alter the case.

The truth is (said Berisa, and interrupted him) if Orcames did deceive me by way of mockery, certainly he deserveth my hate: but since I am perswaded, that he had a reason more advantageous to me for what he did, I shall be more willing to pardon his preventing my return so timely as I desired. I must needs confess Madam, that I could not choose but laugh when I heard Berisa say so, and could not choose but look upon Intaphernes as I laughed; so as the Princess of Bythinia observing it, shee was confirmed in her former opinion, and doubted not but that she herself was a cause of the trick which was put upon Berisa.

In the mean time since she was not well satisfied, what she should think of Intaphernes, she retired; but the difficulty was to be rid of Berisa; for since the Princess had told her, that she wanted her company, she could not shake her off; but was forced to tell her that she would sleep, to make her go out of her Chamber. Yet she slept not so soone, for shee passed away a great part of the night in contriving how Intaphernes should continue his affection to her without speaking unto her of it, and without forcing her to change her behaviour towards him.

But, Madam, without particularizing the beginning and progress of Intaphernes his affection, give me leave to tell you, that his Services being seconded by the Salutations of Istrina, and supported by his own merits, the Princess of Bythinia was moved to let him love her: yet upon condition that he should always submit his love unto her Fortune; and that if it so happened, that Arsamones should dispose of her against her will, yet he should not accuse her of any injustice or infidelity, but endure the misfortune, with all the Patience he was capable of: But, Madam, said he one day unto her, may I not accuse you of Injustice, in desiring me to promise Impossibilities? Can you think a Lover who promiseth to renounce the enjoyment of his adored Mistress, is able to keep his word? I do verily believe he may, said she unto him, and it much concerns you that I do believe it: and happen what can, I make no question but you will exactly keep yours.

This, Madam, was the condition of these four Illustrious Persons, who are the Subjects of my History: who as you may very well perceive were not very happy: For Intaphernes and Atergatis could never make the two Princesses whom they loved, to promise them any thing, against that obedience which they owed unto those who had the disposing of them: but yet they enjoyed many happy hours when they had opportunities of talking freely with their adored Princesses. 'Tis true, these opportunities were not so oft as they desired; and Berisa did make them miss so many occasions of that happiness, as they hated her more then ever: The Princess of Bythinia also, for all her compliance with her, was in the end troubled with her; but yet she Page 50 would not banish her: And I was made choice of to contrive wayes of keeping her from going unto her so often. So that designing to serve two Princesses, in ridding them of a busie body who was extremely troublesome to them; I carried the matter so, that upon a day, when Berisa was incensed against those two Princesses, for leaving her behind when they went to take the Aire, as I engaged her to make her complaints unto me, and to trust me with her very heart; she began to complain against them so sharply, as at first I thought they had done her the greatest wrong that could be offered to a person of her Quality. For she repeated all her obliging Services to the Princess of Bythinia, aggravating her assiduity about her, to be as much obliging as a thousand Services. But after all her talk and complaints, I found the injury to be only as I told you: 'Tis true, this walk being appointed in her presence, and considering how she had been formerly treated, it was an affront not to take her along with them: yet not to let slip such a favourable occasion; after she had disgorged her stomach, and complained till she was weary with complaints, I began to murmur more then she against all Grandure, and against the Court in general, purposely that I might the better perswade her: Protesting that if ever I could get into my Country, I would for ever confine my self to that Province rather then I would endure the scorns and affronts of the Court. Afterwards making a thousand Testimonies of friendship and esteem of her; I advised her to keep home, or at least to retire from such a tumultuous life as the life of a Courtier is: For truly, my dear Berisa (said I unto her) when one is not so happy as to be of a Quality fit for a Court, one ought not to be so forward:

Alas Orcames (said she) I know but too well the truth of your words, but yet since I have seen so many Gallants, I cannot forbeare going unto them: and I had rather be affronted with Courtiers, then be much made of by Townsmen, for (added she to bring me unto her mind) I beseech you, do but observe the difference betwixt them: would not any one say that sees them together, they were of severall Countries far distant? and though they speak the same Language, and as they think, the very same things, yet they express them in such a different manner, as what is gallantry in a Courtier is absurd in a Townsman: But Berisa, said I unto her, this rule is not general; for I do know some men of the Town, that are very compleat men, however I am sure, replied she, that if there be any exceptions, those who do deserve to be excepted, have gotten their merits in the world amongst Company: otherwise I cannot see how they should deserve it; Though I should grant it, replied I, yet that is not sufficient to perswade me that one who is not a Courtier by birth ought to apply themselves unto it, unless Fortune do call them unto it by some extraordinary way: Indeed, were it not a fondnesse to hope that persons of most high Quality should ever care for such Companions? one must owe them all things, and they be obliged by nothing: They love you only because they love themselves; and measuring their affections to you by the diversions which you afford them; as soon as your diversions faile, their loves will cease: Do you not by experience find, that how Princesses, who are the best of any in the world, do slight you? and since they have company enough, they will not carry you with them to take the Aire? Good Berisa, let not the Court deceive you, but undeceive your selfe, and shake it off, before it shake you off: It is but a habit, and may easily be left. Do you think that Provinces far off Courts have not wits and men of spirit in them? and can you think those wits and spirits are idle and weary? No no Berisa, it is not to be imagined; but be confident they think themselves as happy as you or any Courtier in the world: The laws of amity and friendship is regularly observed amongst persons of their quality; there is as much complacency amongst them as amongst others & there being no Lords nor no slaves amongst them, they live much sweeter lives then you imagine. I pray then judge Berisa, what should you do at Court? Oh Orcames said she, I see you never use to make any visits into the Countrey, since you know no better how tedious and wearisome they are. For know Orcames, that all of them either talk not at all, or talk too much, or else talke scurvily: They have not only a pronunciation different from the Court, but their matter and manner of speaking doth also differ: Their gallantry is so grosse, that it is rather an impertinent piece of a talk which is insufferable; To hear them talk of love is enough to procure hatred; to hear them talk of Martiall matters, would move ones pitty of them: If they talk of news, they know so little of the world, and tell such unlikely stories, that they are Page 51 not worth the hearing; yet you advise me Orcames not to stir out of my own Quarters: I must confesse, said I unto her, that I do advise you to it, because the vexations which follow the delights of the Court, are greater then the other, though it were so that no accomplished persons were there to be seen: For the truth is, as I have already told you, persons of high Quality care not a straw for their Inferiours: Their friendship serves only at themselves; they will give you a thousand welcomes to day, and hardly look upon you to morrow: they will promise more then ever they intend to perform; and their delicacy is such, that if you do not flatter them sufficiently, you do them wrong.

Believe mee Berisa, though there were no other consideration then this, to drive one out of all Court-fancies, that one must spend all their, dayes with people that are above one, unto whom they must hold a continuall complacence, and blind obedience, I think it were enough to move one unto my advice: Besides, matter of honour, which cannot endure to be slighted is considerable; for indeed Berisa, you know as well as my self that if a Town or Country-woman chance to love any Courtier, she exposeth her selfe to more talk then any other, since certainly it is a piece of injustice which reigns in the spirits of all men of that quality, & in Courts, to think that a Country Lady is more beholding to them for their services and visits then a Court Lady is.

Moreover, that's not the place where Country Ladies use to seek for Husbands, either for themselves, their Daughters, their Sisters, or their Friends; and the truth is, there is nothing more odious then for a Country or Town Lady to be too much at Court.

Therefore Berisa, if you will be ruled by me, you shall erect a Court in your owne Chamber and attract all the gallants of Calcedonia which are reasonable, thither: the number of whom is not so small as you imagine. I do not advise you, said I, to be troubled with such men whom the name of Court affrights, and who have as great an aversion to Court as Court hath to them; but like some Creatures who live sometimes on Land, sometimes on water, make choice of such friends as are a Miscellany, part Court, part Country, and pleasing in all. No no, Orcames, replied she, you can never perswade me to it; for though I know, that what you say is partly true, yet I assure you I cannot change my opinion: Indeed (said she, and smiled) I am so farr from mewing my selfe in my own Family, that I professe, I care not if I never came at it, so I could but heare all in it were in health. Since you are of that mind said I, I will move you but unto one thing more: so it be not to quit the Court, replied Berisa, I will willingly follow your Councell.

Then (said I unto her) to oblige the Princess of Bythinia not to neglect you again, try if you can absent your self only for three or four dayes, and thereby force her to send for you: But suppose she should not send for me, replied she, I should then be pittifully puzzled how to return again to her; And therefore Orcames, I had rather follow my own inclination then your advice. Then follow it, said I, since I cannot cure you of this fond Court-humour; but if they should chance to slight another time, when they are going unto any diversions, blame not me for it.

After this, Madam, I left Berisa, and was very sorry that I had no better acquitted my selfe of my Commission to perswade her from haunting the Princess of Bythinia; For all I could say against the Court, did make such small impression upon her spirits, as she went unto the Princess that very same night, who received her civilly enough: For, besides her naturall sweetness, there was another reason which obliged the Princess to tolerate her; which was, because the Father of Berisa, who was a very popular man in Calcedonia, had done Arsamones very considerable service: Thus not knowing how to be rid of this troublesome Creature, I was again made choice of by Intaphernes and Atergatis, to counterfeit Love unto her: And indeed Madam, though I did not love to dissemble my thoughts, but ever affected sincerity, yet I begun to make experiments upon Berisa, so that holding her continually in talke, I gave Intaphernes and Atergatis opportunities to talk often with the Princess of Bythinia, and the Princess Istrina.

Thus Madam, was the Winter spent: But the Spring bringing warre with it, it was resolved we must depart: I believe Madam I shall tell you no lye. If I tell you, that the adieu betwixt the Prince Intaphernes and the Princess of Bythinia, and between Page 52 Atergatis and Istrina, was much sadder then mine, and Berisa's; Yet the Princess of Bythinia had such a commanding power over her self, that her sorrows for the departure of Intaphernes did not appear; But in exchange she shewed him so many Civilities, and expressed her self in such obliging language, that he could not possibly complain against her not grieving enough. And to tell you truly, he needed not to look any further then to the eyes of that Princess to see her heart, though much sorrow did not appear in her face.

As for Atergatis, he was a little more happy then Intaphernes; for though I cannot perfectly say that Atergatis had any share in those tears which she shed for her Brother: yet I can assure that her manner of bidding him adieu was enough to persuade him that though he had no share in her tears, yet her sighs at parting were very deep, that he should go and expose himself to so many dangers.

But at the last Madam, we departed, and left Berisa with these two Princesses, unto whom she was more comfort during the absence of Intaphernes and Atergatis: I shall not need Madam, to particularize unto you all the passages of this War, knowing that you are not ignorant of them, I shall therefore only mark out the principall events. I shall tell you then Madam, that Arsamones was always prosperous, though he had to deal with one of the most valiant Princes in the world.

But to tell you truly, it is no wonder if he made use of all Advantages, for Arsamones had all the necessary qualities to effect a great design: For he had not only a great wit, deep capacity, and grave experience: He had not only high courage, and lofty ambition, but he had also a kind of rash prudence (if I may phrase it so) which made him able to attempt the most difficult enterprizes, and which helped him to execute them with as much success as boldness.

Moreover, the politique Arsamones did not confine himself to the ordinary limits of Justice; for I have heard him say, that all unjust means might be used to compass a just design: And therefore striving to get upon the Throne of his Ancestors, I can assure you he employed all to bring it to pass.

Furthermore it cannot be imagined that he would omit any occasion to advance it: And so he carried the matter, that the King of Pontus, after several Combats, wherein Arsamones had always the advantage, was constrained to retreat to Heraclea, which is the Metropolis of his Dominions, and the only Town that was left him in all his two Kingdoms.

During all these Victories, Intaphernes and Atergatis, whose reputations were very high, did often write unto the Princesses whom they adored, for they had obtained permission so to do, upon condition that their Letters should contain only matter of News and Civility without any gallantry. You may well imagine Madam, that this restraint went against their minds; and that it was difficult to love so much, and not dare to speak of it. Yet this command was not disadvantageous to them; for both of them being admirable at their Pens, and since their Letters included nothing which was to be concealed: Those unto whom the Princesses shewed them, did so highly applaud them, as it may well be said, that they spoke in behalf of their Loves in not speaking of them.

However, since their passions were not satisfied, they invented a way to make their minds known without any disobedience unto the commands which they received: For since Istrina had not prescribed unto the Prince her Brother what he should write, and had only forbidden Atergatis to mention any matters of Love: and since the Princess of Bythia did not think of charging Intaphernes not to mention his passion in his Letters unto the Princess his Sister; these two Lovers resolved that Intaphernes to whom Istrina had prescribed any limits, should write unto her all his thoughts of the Bythinian Princess, and all those which Atergatis had of her: so that by this invention, these two Princesses might shew the Letters from their Lovers: and the Princess Istrina durst not shew hers from her Brother. She being a Lady of a most admirable wit, after she had received the first Letter, and shewed it unto the Princess of Bythia, she answered it the most wittily in the world.

Alas Orcames (said Mandana, and interrupted him) I cannot endure to heare a Letter so much commended which cannot be produced: Therefore I intreat to try if you can remember the sense at least, though not the words of these two Letters: For your satisfaction Madam, replied Orcames, I can do more then that; for I think Page 53 I have a Copy of them about me which I got from the Prince Intaphernes, who having lost the Original in coming hither, he complained of it so exceedingly, that to comfort him, I resolved to confesse my crime in stealing that Copy, and let him have a Copy out of mine: And therefore Madam I am able to satisfy your desires; Then he looked in his Pocket, and found these two Letters, the first of which was thus indited.

INTAPHERNES UNTO THE PRINCESS ISTRINA.

Sister,

Since I know you have enjoyed the Prince Atergatis to acquaint you with the News of the Armie: And since I am sure he will obey you as exactly as I shall the divine Princess who hath imposed the like commands upon me. You need not thinke it strange if I doe not hint unto you the same things he doth: I leave it therefore to his care to acquaint you with the Enemies defeat, and victory of Arsamones, and reserve only unto my selfe to let you know the passages of my heart. Know therefore, dearest Sister, that my adored Princess does so wholly take up my memory, as I know not whether I should be so unjust as to forget you, if I did not need your assistance to keep her from forgetting me. For since she hath not forbidden you to speak to her of my passion, but hath forbidden me to write of it unto her, you may without offence protest unto her, that I can thinke of nothing else but her; that I do eternally adore her; that her absence is intollerable: and that her rigor in denying me so much satisfaction as to mention my love in my letter to her, doth put my life more in danger, then all the King of Pontus his valour. I beseech you, deny me not this request; for if you do, there shall not a Messenger come, by whom I will not give the Prince Atergatis so much satisfaction as to let you know, that he doth still and ever will most passionately love you: And that there is not a day on which we are not ready to quarrell, sometimes because he maintains that he loves you as well as I love the Princess of Bythia: and sometimes because I will be always talking of her, when he would be always talking of you. The truth is (deare Sister) he is as melancholy to be at such a distance from her he loves, as I am for being from her whom I adore: speak then unto my Princess in my behalfe, if you would not have me speake unto you in his: And persuade her if it be possible to let me write unto her what my heart thinks. But above all, deare Sister, be sure that this Letter do not passe for a piece of disobedience, and that neither Atergatis nor my selfe be declared Delinquents either to her or you: Adieu, and believe, I beseech you, that Intaphernes loves his dearest Sister, as well as an amorous heart can.

INTAPHERNES.

I Do confess, sayd the Princess Mandana, that I could not possibly believe, that a Brother could speak of Love unto a Sister, as he hath done to her, without some trespass upon handsomness: But Intaphernes hath done it so delicately, and hath disobeyed a Command so respectfully, that I long to see how the Princess Istrina did answer him. Orcames then presenting her Istrinas Letter,

ISTRINA UNTO THE PRINCE INTAPHERNES.

Brother,

I Need not tell you how the Letter surprized me, for I am persuaded you do not doubt it: Indeed, I found it full of Freindship, and full of Love; but to testifie to you, that I would not have you speak unto me, in behalfe of the Prince Atergatis, I do assure you that I will speak in your behalfe unto the Princess of Bythia, and indeed, already have done, yet you are not a jot the better, for shee thinks you culpable, as I do Atergatis, for disobeying. Tis true, I never did forbid you to speak unto me concerning your passion, nor his; but my reason was, I had no right to forbid you any thing, and I will keep within my compasse, and onely make use of my Prayers: But as I have spoken in your behalfe unto the Princess of Bythia, I conjure you to speak in my behalfe unto the Prince Atergatis, and tell him, that if I had as much power over him as you say I have, I will as absolutely forbid him to make you the speaker of his passion, as the Princess of Bythia forbids you by me, to make me the speaker of yours unto her; for the truth is, our Curiosity is onely to know what passages are in the Warrs, and not what passages are in your hearts; obey therefore, that Princess, and cause Atergatis to obey me: And if it be possible, let neither of you manifest your passions by any vaine disobedience. Adue, and beleeve, I beseech you, that I will ever preserve as much amity for you, as any heart, not in Love, is capable of; and by that consequence Istrina is more affectionate unto the Prince Intaphernes then Intaphernes is unto ISTRINA.

Really Orcames (sayd the Princess Mandana, and returned Istrinas Letter) If people should alwayes write so wittily in matters of Love as these Persons do, it were almost to be wished, that they should write of nothing else; but that you may give me more subjects of commendations, I beseech you proceed in the relation of their Adventures.

Since you command me, Madam, I must obey, replied Oreames, and tell you, That the Prince Intaphernes having received Istrinas Letter, he returned her answer, that he should make a doubt whether this was the Princess of Bythinias command, unlesse she did attest and command it under her owne hand: And as for what related to Atergatis, he would not also positively beleeve what the Brother of his Saint did say, unlesse she also did confirm it under her hand: To be short Madam, he carryed the business so handsomly, that though these two Princesses were extream wary how they writt any such Letters, yet they both resolved to write two short Tickets of two lines, because they would write no more then might be seen. The Princess of Bythinias Ticket contained these words, if my memory faile not.

I forbid the Prince Intaphernes to write any thing unto the Princess Istrina but what I permit him to write unto my selfe; upon paine of her displeasure of whom hee speaks unto her, and upon promise of her savour if he impose silence upon himself, and obey her.

Page 55 This Madam, is the Ticket of the Bythinian Princess unto the Prince Intaphernes (pursued Orcames) and see, if I be not mistaken, how the Princes Istrinas was indited.

If you would have me believe that I have any power over you, cause the Prince Intaphernes to mention you no more in his Letters to me, since I desire to know nothing but what I have permitted your selfe to write; and unlesse you obey this second Command as you did my first, you have permission to mention nothing but the victories of Arsamones.

You may perceive Madam, that these two notes were not very obliging; and you see also they were very short, and contained only a bare command: Yet though Intaphernes and Atergatis had many excellent and large Letters from them, since these two Tickets were not sealed, subscribed, nor superscribed, they were much joyed at them, and set a dearer rate upon them then upon all the rest of their fine formal Letters: Intaphernes preserved his with abundance of care, he did not keep it in the same place where all the rest of his Letters from the Princess of Bythia were kept, but in a place more precious: For my part, having nothing so delicate a wit as he, nor could descant so subtly upon passages of Love, I must confess I could not choose but wonder to observe that this ticket which contained only an angry Command, was preferred before all those fine Letters from the same hand, and which were filled with Civilities and Elogies of his valour, I asked him the reason of such an unreasonable act. Alas Orcames said he unto me, it seems you are a Novice in matters of Love, since you know not the difference between the best Letter that can be in this world, which is to be shewed unto every one, and a small ticket which one is obliged to keep secret: but the difference is so great, as there is no comparison between them: Why Sir, said I unto him, can you prefer two or three lines from the Princess of Bythia, before so many elegant Letters which you have received from her? And are these two or three lines which forbids you to mention any matters of love unto the Princess Istrina more deare unto you then all those sweet and obliging Letters which commands you to write often unto her, and to send her the newes of the Army? Yes Orcames, replied he, this little Ticket which contains but few words, which seems carelesly written, whose Characters are hardly legible; and which forbids me to speak of my passion, is a thousand thousand times more deare unto me, and more pleasing, then all her sweet Letters; wherein it appears she culled the words which she employed, whose Characters are so fine and legible, and which commands me to write often unto her: And if you did but know how to love, you would know how to distinguish between a Letter of indifferency, and a Letter of secresie; so that then I should not need to seek for any reasons to convince you. But Sir, I beseech you, said I unto him, are not all those fine Letters, and this scroule both written by the same hand: Yes Orcames said he, but they are not indited by the same mind; for when my Prin|c|ess desires me obligingly to send her the news of the Army, she does me no greater a favour then she might unto any man of quality about Arsamones.

But when she forbids me to mention my passion, she tacitely imp|y|es, that she hath a right to command me, she admits me to be her slave; she testifies that she knows I love her, and indeed gives me some signe of confidence, since she honours me so farre as to assure me, that I shall be happy in her favour if I can impose silence upon my selfe. Truth is Orcames, this rigid scrowl which seems to you lesse obliging then so many fine Letters which applaud me with so much eloquence, hath something in it more satisfactory to the heart of a Lover, then any thing those well pend Letters have which please you so well. The very name of my adored Princess which I cannot pro|n|ounce without a tremb|ing of heart, does take something (as I think) from the ex|c|ellency of those rare Letters; and this Ticket unto which she durst not subscribe, it has something in it which I am not able to express, that renders it the more valuable. For I am fully perswaded, that a Lady who endeavours to conceal both the writer and the party to whom she writes, hath some such sparks of tenderness in her thoug|hts as she would not have flashe out into a flame, and be known: And Orcames, since Love of its own nature loves mysteries and secrecies, it may well be said, that what|s|oe|v|er is not mysterious and secret, is not Love: And if you would precisely know the difference which I put between letters of Civility which I received from my Princess, Page 56 and this little scrowl I must tell you, that I put as great a difference as between letters from a friend, and a Letter from a Mistri|ss.

After this Madam, I left disputing with the Prince Intaphernes, knowing him to be better versed in the doctrine of Love then my self, and seeing I was not able to per|s|wade him. In the mean time, since he knew the Princess of Bythinia's reservedness and severity, he must obey her, and enjoyn silence upon himself as well as Atergatis. Yet I am sure, that though the word Love was not used in their Letters, yet they found an art to use others which signified the same thing, yet without any disobedi|ence unto the commands imposed upon them. But their greatest grief was, that the King of Pontus being retreated unto Heraclea, Arsamones resolved to besiege him, and began to draw that way, so that it was easie to foresee that it would be long be|fore they should see their adored Princesses.

The reason why Arsamones was so hasty to besiege Heraclea notwithstanding the illness of the season, was, because knowing with what zeale the invincible Cyrus under the name of Artamenes did presse upon Babylon, he feared that if Babylon were taken before he took Heraclea, Cyrus would then protect the same Prince whom he protected in relieving him at Sinope, so that he was so earnest upon this great design, as Heraclea in a few dayes was beleaguered. Since it imported Arsa|mones to know how all passed at Babylon; and since Intaphernes, Atergatis, and Istrina did hate the King of Assyria enough to be inquisitive of all the misfortunes that did befall him, all the victories of Cyrus were very well known in Calcedonia, and at the Camp: And Madam, your heroicue resistance of the King of Assyria's violent passion was also known.

If Intaphernes and Atergatis had not been engaged in their affections in Bythinia, they had then with joy revenged themselves of that unjust Prince, by following Galdates, who had already took part with the Illustrious Cyrus: But since Intaphernes could not forsake Arsamones, as things stood, unlesse he should forsake the Princess his Daughter: he resolved to stay with him, since considering the Wars, he might do it with honour: And as for Atergatis, since if he changed Armies, he should be at a greater distance from Istrina, he chose rather to satisfie his love then his hatred. As for the Princess Istrina I have heard her say, that as oft as she was told with what noble resolution you treated the King of Assyria, it joyed her to the heart, to see such full revenge upon that Prince, both by your beauty Madam, by your rigour, and by the valour of Artamenes. It is true, her joyes were something moderated by her feares, least the siege of Heraclea should prove fatall either unto Intaphernes or Atergatis, whose courages she knew would expose them unto the greatest dangers up|on all occasions. This feare in which the Princess of Bythinia shared with her, was not yet all the sorrow which she had; for the absence of the Prince her Brother, and the unfortunate condition of the Princess Araminta did cause her many an ill houre, for she loved that Princess exceedingly: But for all that, the glory which Intaphernes and Atergatis had got in the Wars, did much cheer up the hearts of these two Prin|c|esses, especially the glory which they got at the siege of Heraclea. Since the taking of this Town would be a decision of the Warr, and settle Arsamones in the Throne, this Prince was not negligent about it: And if I had not many things to tell you which are more essentially necessary to understand this story, certainly my relation of the particulars would make you acknowledg, that except the sieges of Babylon, Sardis, and Cumes, there was never any more famous then the siege of Heraclea, nor a siege where more glorious exploits were performed: Since there wanted only this City to make Arsamones King of two Kingdoms, he assaulted it with extraordinary vigour: And since if this City were lost, the King of Pontus would be without a Kingdom, he did defend it with such Heroique courage, as if he had an Enemy lesse valiant then Arsamones, he had not been vanquished: And he did such prodigious acts in defence of himselfe, as if he had uot sullied the glory of them by his violencies offered unto you Madam, he might well have been put into the Catalogue of Heroes. But that which hastned his ruine was some reports in the Camp that the illustrious Artamenes had taken Babylon, and that the King of Assyria had gotten you out, and carryed you unto Sinope: so that Arsamones falling upon the Town more vigorously then before, and being seconded by the valour of Intaphernes and Atergatis, he brought his works unto better perfection in eight dayes, then he had done ever since the siege Page 57 began: The truth is Madam, without further abusing your patience; The Gods hal|ving resolved that the King of Pontus should be forced out, purposely to save your life, by preventing your being drowned, they made use of the valour of Intaphernes and Atergatis to vanquish this valiant and unfortunate King, who was forced to flye away in a ship, not knowing then, that the loss of his two Kingdoms should be the cause of his saving your life Madam, when you suffered shipwrack with Prince Malzanes. You may imagine Madam, that the taking of Heraclea made a great noyse throughout all Bythinia, as well as at Pontus. But particularly, it rejoiced the two Princesses at Calcedonia, principally because they knew that Intaphernes and Ater|gatis had a great share in the happy success of that siege: But that which hindered the full tide of their joyes was to understand, that the War was not yet finished, because Artanus was in Cabira, where he kept the Princess Araminta in his power: And Ar|samones would not make any Conditions with him, unlesse hee would surrender the Town and the Princess Araminta into his power, and therefore his design was to be|s|iege Cabira.

In the mean time, as soon as Arsamones had settled all in Heraclea, he would have the Queen Arbiana and the two Princes come thither to testifie unto his new Sub|jects, that he would be King of Pontus, whereof Heraclea was the Metropolis, as well as King of Bythinia whereof Calcedonia was chief. You may easily imagine Madam, that this resolution was very welcom unto Intaphernes and Atergatis, as it was vexatious to the poor Berisa, who seeing that the Court was to remove from Calcedonia to Heraclea, she was even ready to dye for grief, not knowing how it was possible to live without a Court: And indeed we understood that every one went to comfort her, as one that had lost all she loved. Shee employed all her will to find a pre|t|ence for going unto Heraclea, but her Parents would not permit her: so that she saw a necessity of staying in Calcedonia, where she talked of nothing but her wear|iness of it: and if she made any visits, to satisfie her busie humour, it was only a gad|ding from house to house to tell how weary she was: And she made her self so much hated in Calcedonia, that there was not a Lady who did not wish her at Heraclea.

But Madam, as the design of Arsamones in bringing the Queen Arbiana unto this stately Town was pleasing unto Intaphernes and Atergatis, so I must tell you that it was not displeasing unto the Princess of Bythinia, nor to the Princess Istrina. Yet I am obliged to tell you unto the glory of the Princess of Bythinia, that maugre all the victories of Arsamones, she could not choose but sigh as she went into the Palace of Heraclea, not being able to remember the Condition wherein she had seen the Prince Sinnessis, the Princesse Araminta, and Spitridates, without much sorrow for the death of the first, and for the captivity of the Princess Araminta, and for the absence of the Prince Spitridates her brother. Also her generosity did carry her fur|ther then this; for she would not upon any terms lie in the Princess of Pontus her Chamber: Since I remember very well (said she unto the Queen Arbiana who propounded it unto her) if the Princess Araminta did ever look npon me as the Prin|c|ess of Bythinia, when there was not any hopes of the King my Fathers ever being upon the Throne: I will also still treat her as the Princess of Pontus, although the King her Brother do not enjoy the Kingdom: You may well conceive Madam, that a Princess who was so generous as to be just unto a distressed vertue, would not be un|just unto a victorious and triumphant vertue, and that she received the Prince Intaphernes with all possible civility.

Atergatis found as favourable a reception from Istrina: And since these Princesses had not forbidden them to speak, as they had to write, These two Princes took occa|sion to speak of that they would, and had not written; and to make known unto their Princesses all the torments they had suffered during their absence: But yet they were not long together; for Arsamones being desirous to finish the Warre by taking Cabira, desired them to come unto the Army; but since the distance was not farre from Heraclea, there was such continuall correspondency between them, that this second absence was not so rigorous as the first: yet Arsamones could not march so soon as he desired against Artanus, because he fell sick. But Madam, I think it fit to omit the relation of the Prince Spitridates his arrivall at Heraclea, and all the passalg|es concerning the defeat of Artanus: Since it is not possible but the Princess Ara|mint|a who was so long a Prisoner unto Cyrus, and since the Prince Spitridates was a Page 58 while in Sardis, you must needs heare tell since you were released, the adventures of a Prince who hath the honour to resemble your illustrious Liberator.

The truth is, replied Mandana, I understand by Martesia who had it from Felraul|as, all that happen'd unto that illustrious Prince: and consequently I know of his Arrivall at Heraclea, the day before the Queen Arbiana and the two Princesses were to go unto the Camp, because Arsamones was sick: Moreover, I know how the Queen of Bythinia took Spitridates at first for Cyrus, as heretofore she took Cy|rus for Spitridates: Nor am I ignorant of all that Princes endeavours to obtain the permission of Arsamones to love Araminta: Neither am I ignorant of what Intapher|nes and the Princess of Bythinia did upon the same design: For indeed Orcames, I know how obstinately Arsamones denied them; I know all the defeat of Artanus, the meeting of Spitridates and Araminta upon the bridg|e of Cabira. The generous resolu|tion of those two Persons, and in what manner Spitridates got Araminta out of that besieged Town, stealing her from the victory of Arsamones, who would have kept her Prisoner, if he had taken her. I know also how Spitridates went with that Princess as far as Armenia, where they parted: and that in parting from the Camp, he wrote unto the King his Father, and unto the Princess his Sister: but I wonder, that in relation of all these passages, I should never heare any mention made of Atergatis.

The reason why those who related the history of Araminta were silent of the Prince Atergatis, replied Orcames, is, because he had no hand in the defeat of Artanus, not in any passages at Cabira; because the very day on which the Princesses came to the Camp, he fell sick at Heraclea, where he remained untill after the departure of Spitridates and Araminta, so that he could not contract any amity with that Prince as Intaphernes did; nor by consequence give those who related unto you the story of Araminta and Spitridates, any subject to speak of him. Now Madam, since you know all passages unto the taking of Cabira, I shall say nothing of them, but shall relate things from thence forward, and tell you that Arsamones was so incensed at the action of Spitridates, that he said he should not succeed him, and that he would have every one look upon the Princess his Daughter, as she that was to be Queen of Pontus and Bythinia: And the truth is Madam, he was so violently earnest in it, that el|v|ery one did believe it was his intention: But though it was the design of Arsamones, yet it was farre from the intentions of the Princess his Daughter, who declared her self so highly and so genevously, that she would never thrive by the misfortunes of the Prince her brother, as Arsamones was no lesse incensed against her then him; so that Intaphernes was constraind to grieve with that Princess, for offering her two Kingdoms. It is true, that his love had its part in this grie|fe: For this Prince concei|ved, that as long as Arsamones was in the mind, he could never pretend unto the Princess whom he loved, it being easie to foresee that Arsamones would never give her unto him, though upon no other reason then because he was a professed lover of Spitridates.

But as Intaphernes had this augmentation of his sorrows, so Atergatis who was re|covered of his sickness, was grieved to understand that Gadates who was not igno|rant of his affection unto Istrina, had sent orders unto a Lady who was with her, to have a strict eye over all his actions, and to render him an account of them; this Prince having still a fancy, that when Cyrus had ended the Warr, he might perhaps by a treaty of Peace oblige the King of Assyria to marry Istrina, by obtaining for him a restitution of some part of his Kingdom; for Madam, though this fancy had but an ill foundation, yet he did, and still doth feed himself with some hopes in it: And indeed, because the Queen Nitocris with whom he had been in love, did earnestly desire it as long as she lived, he thought that he was obliged by his respects unto that great Princess, not to let Istrina marry, as long as there was any possibility that the King of Assyria might marry her. After this Madam, you may imagine that the lives of the Prince Intaphernes and Atergatis were not very pleasing, since to live without hopes is the most difficult thing upon earth: Yet I am sure, that if they did not hope, yet they were not altogether desperate, yet they were perpetually full of fears: And all the consolation which they had, was to know that they were not out of favour with the Princesses whom they adored.

Page 59 As for Intaphernes, he was so happy as that the King did never suspect his Love: so that he could see and talk with his Princess when he pleased. But all great changes in Kingdoms must needs be a while unsettled, so there were many commotions and stirrs, which required he should divide his Army into two Bodies, and that Intaphernes and Atergatis should command them. Arsamones residing sometimes at Heraclea, and sometimes at Calcedonia, to give out several orders to places as need required. Thus Madam, did these two Princes and these two Princesses live, whilst the illustrious Cyrus (after he understood you were not dead as once he believed) was carrying on the War in Armenia, thinking that you were there: And thus they continued, untill that generous Prince being upon the Frontiers of Lydia, there chanced that thing, which I believe you are not ignorant of, but yet you neither know the cause nor the consequence of it. I must therefore tell you Madam, that when the valiant Anaxarhis who is now the Captain of the Guard, came to the Camp of Cyrus. I understood how he had told him that he had saved the life of the Prince Spitridates; and that he was at first deceived by that resemblance which is between those two great Princes.

But Madam, certainly you do not know who brought Spitridates into that Paphlagonian wood where Anaxaris found him, nor who kept him there; nor how he went from the place unto which Anaxaris conducted him, after he had so valiantly defended him. Therefore I must tell you, that when Araminta would needs have Spitridates leave her in Armenia, and commanded him to wander from Country to Country untill the Gods were pleased to change the state of their Fortunes; yet Spitridates could not find a heart to go out of Armenia, since Araminta was in it though she had charged him not to stay there, because she feared lest the King her Brother should arrest him; and because she would not have a Prince who had kept her from the power of the King his Father, should fall into the power of the King of Pontus, who did not love him. So that Spitridates searching for a place where he might have best intelligence from Artaxates, whilst the Princess Araminta was there; he thought that he could not better seat himself, then in some house upon the River Araxes, which runs to Artaxates: For as great Rivers causeth great commerce between great Towns, so he thought this place to suite best with his design; and indeed the Village where he stayed was so great a Place, as it was easie to receive information of some things which he desired to know.

But Madam, as all humane Prudence is extremely limited; so it chanced that the same way he thought best to heare news of his Princess, and to keep him neare her, the same was it which set him at a greater distance from her. For Madam, as he was one evening taking the Ayre upon the banks of the River Araxes by himself alone, and being far from the house where he lodged, a stranger did accost him, and speaking to him in a broken Language, he spoke as thinking him to be Artamenes, and as if he had seen him in the Court of Thomiris. Spitridates perceiving his error, would undeceive him, but he could not: For this stranger was so confident that this Prince would only conceal himself, as he never offered to examine seriously whether or no his eyes had deceived him: and indeed not giving any credit unto his words, he executed his design which he had upon the person of that Prince, and did it with ease: For since Spitridates was alone and without any Armes; and since this stranger was seconded by ten men, which lay in ambush, it was easie for them to force him to enter into a Barque which was not far off: and it was the more easie, because the stranger having told him that he would carry him unto a great Queen, where he should receive no harm, provided he would repent himselfe of his flight, Spitridates thought it would be the more easie to undeceive him by arguing with him, then by defending himself in vain, since he was alone, unarmed, and against ten men, thinking that if he should offer to make any obstinate resistance, it would the more argue him to be the man he was taken for. So that going into the Barque, and not being able to hinder the sixe Rowers from putting off the shoar where he intended to stay a while, he began to make a thousand protestations unto this stranger, that he was not the same man which he took him for: but all in vain.

I beseech you sayd, Spitridates unto him, ask every one you meet what Reports go of Artamenes whose name is so famous, and I am sure all will answer you, that he can not be in Paphlagonia. I need not enquire of any, replied the man, when my own eyes tell me I am sure: therefore, Sir, with no murmur against my violence, I beseech Page 60 you give me leave to carry you unto a Queen whose Subject I am, and believe it, it shall be long of your self if you be not favourably received. I came by orders from her, pursued he, to inform my self of the causes of your Imprisonment (the News wherof hath reached the Queen Thomiris) to let you know, that if you will change your thoughts of her, she will march with an Army of a hundred thousand men to force you out of Ciaxares his Fetters, and set you out of a Prison upon a Throne.

In order to this, the Queen Thomiris hath given me wherewith to suborn your Guards, and to attempt any thing for your Liberty, but I perceive, Sir, you have your self procured it. Then Spitridates protested unto him again, that he was not Artamenes, but that he was still a Prisoner unto Ciaxares, but the man would not believe him, and was so obstinate in his mistake, that Spitridates must submit. The reason why this man was so hard to be undeceived, was, that though he had seen the Illustrious Cyrus a hundred times with Thomiris, yet as he told him, he never heard him speak: so that the tone of Spitridates would not undeceive him, though there was some difference between the pronunciation of Spitridates, and that of Cyrus: Yet Spitridates did not a little wonder that he should still be taken for another; for since he did not then know that Cyrus and Artamenes were both one Person, he could not chuse but think it strange, that first they should carry him unto Cambises as being Cyrus, and now carry him unto Thomiris as being Artamenes; yet go he must, for he was so strictly guarded that he could not chuse: But (sayd he unto the man who thus forced him) It does not appear unto me by your speeches that Thomiris ever appointed you to do as you have done: since, Sir, replied he, she could not foresee, I should find you in such a condition as I have done; she could not command me to secure your Person with ten men only: but since she honoured me so far as to tell me that she would arm a hundred thousand men to have you in her power, it was an implicate Command to bring you unto it, if I could by all the wayes that Fortune and opportunity should offer me. Also I have been this eight dayes since accidentally I saw you in the Temple, in following you and waiting for an occasion to find you alone, as now I found you upon the Banks of Araxes.

Thus, Madam, did this man speak unto this Illustrious Captive whom he knew not, & for his more safe Convey, he would have him alwayes lye in the Barque, and not set foot upon land, untill he came to the place where Araxes bounders the Country of the Massagettes. He was no sooner there but the man carrying Spitridates to lodge with a man of his acquaintance, which had a very good Tent upon the banks of that River, he sent one of his men to acquaint Thomiris that he had brought Artamenes unto her and to know her pleasure concerning him, not daring to bring him to her without having speciall orders for it. But whilst this Messenger was in his journey, Spitridates observing that the Master of the Tent where he lodged was of a good wit, and that he understood broken Greek passably enough, which is so generally spoken over all Asia, because contrary to the custom of the Massagettes, he had been a Traveller, he asked him concerning the Queen, and what they sayd of her? Sir, sayd he, the Queen is a most excellent Princess, and if her Passions were somewhat less violent, she would be all Excellency and all Virtue; but indeed they are so predominate in her, that Reason often will not rule her; For if either Ambition, Choller, or Envy possess her, she humours the Passion without resistance. Indeed her Action against the Prince Ariantes her Brother, to Raign in prejudice of him; her Action against the Prince Arilpithes who was long since in love with her, and her Actions concerning the Ambassador from Ciaxares who stole from Court, and is called Artamenes: All these do make it manifestly appear that she has no command over her Passions, and that Ambition, Anger, and Love do easily get dominion over her heart, and raign there in full Tyranny; And indeed the voice is, that this Princess will raise a very formidable Army, either to be revenged upon Artamenes, or else to make him love her: as if it were as great a matter to conquer the heart of this Ambassador as to conquer a Kingdom. I know that Fame speaks this Artamenes to be a most admirable man, and that if the Massagettans had such a King, they might pretend easily to be Masters of both Scythias: But for all that, since the Queen hath a Son, and since Artamenes did steal away from the Court, I believe the War would be unjust, and the Event cannot be happy.

Spitridates hearing this man express himself so wisely, resolved to open himself unto Page 61 him, to try if he could procure his help to make an escape: So that whilst all his Guards stood at the Entry of the Tent, which was very spacious, he told him how the case stood. But, Madam, such was the Fate of Spitridates to be taken for Cyrus, that though this man had never seen either of them, yet he believed that he who spoke unto him was Artamenes: For, Sir, sayd he unto him, if you be not he, you need not fear being Arrested by Thomiris, since you may be sure that as soon as ever she sees you, she will set you at liberty, therefore, Sir, I need not endeavour your escape: But I fear, answered Spitridates, I fear least the Queen should be mistaken in me, as the man who first arrested me is; However it be, Sir, replied the man, your best course to make me endeavour your escape, is to confess ingeniously that you are really Artamenes: for if you be, I must confes unto you, that I am so devoted unto the Queens glory, as I am apt enough to take an occasion from her of doing a thing which would reflect upon her honour, if she should retain you Prisoner. The truth is, Madam, since Spitridates had no other course, he deceived this virtuous Massagettan, since he desired to be deceived; And indeed the man did so well manage the matter, as he got Spitridates one night out of his Tent, by a back-way which his Guards knew not of; and to make his flight more safe, he would not let him attempt to cross the River, which was very broad and deep, since there was not one Fisher-man whom he durst trust. Therefore he conveyed him into a poor Shepherds Tent which belonged unto him, where he lay hid above eight dayes. In the mean time he heard how greived the man was who first took him: how joyed Thomiris was, when she heard that she was to have Artamenes in her power, and how vexed she was when she was told he was escaped. Her grief, Madam, was so great, that setting all consideration aside, she went her self to the River Araxes to search for Artamenes in all the Tents about it: So that Spitridates knowing how the Queen and all her Retinue was to come unto the place where he was, and fearing that his resemblance with Artamenes would betray him to her as it had done to many others; also longing to hear some news of Araminta, he resolved by the help of his deliverer to suborn a Fisher-man, and so they did in all hast. But though they resolved that his flight should be in the night, yet they could not stay so long, but he must depart presently, because they had intelligence that Thomiris was very neer. So that hastning their design, the Fisher-man was presently provided, and Spitridates went into the Bark with a horse which his honest Host gave him: and he took boat just as Thomiris who was that day on horseback was in sight, and followed with abundance of company some two hundred paces from the place where Spitridates was embarked. At first, the Fisher-man who was busie about his Bark, took no notice of them, but rowed as hard as he could: yet when he was as far as the middle of the River, he spied the crowd of people which followed the Queen, and thought it was the Princess who was expected to come: So that being much frighted at it, in lieu of rowing on, he would carry Spitridates back to the place where he first took him in: but that Prince having got a good Cimeter before he embarked, did draw it, and threatened the man to kill him if he did not row on and carry him quickly to the other side of the River: So that being extremely terrified, he rowed with all the strength he had, and got from the side where Thomiris was. But, Madam to make this adventure more extraordinary: The Queen chancing to cast her eyes upon the boat wherein Spitridates was when he drew his Cimeter, she was so surprized, and had her imagination so filled with the fancy of Artamenes, as she did absolutely take Spitridates to be him, imagining him to have the same stature and action, and fancying that she saw the very same features of face though at that distance: So that her Spirits being all Choller and fury, when she saw how this supposed Artamenes threatened the Fisher-man to kill him, if he did not carry him from her: she both did and sayd such things as did not become her great Courage and Virtue. Could this ungrateful man know (sayd she aloud) that I intended to arme a hundred thousand men purposely for his delivery, and can he threaten a poor Innocent to kill him, rather then see me? Canst thou endure this Thomiris? Canst thou suffer it? Fy, no, no, it cannot be endured, it is too much baseness to be suffered. Then would she give a hundred severall and different Commands; one while she commanded to get a boat to go after him, another while being transported with the violence of her Passion, she would go herself, another while fearing that a boat could not be had soon enough to overtake him whom she took for Artamenes; she commanded her Guard to shoot a Cloud of Page 62 Arrows at the Fisher-man, to make him stay the Bark, not considering that she was out of distance for it: then in an instant after fearing they might kill Artamenes in lieu of the Fisher-man, she for bad what before she commanded, and chose rather to let Artamenes live then to be revenged by his death: And all her thoughts were in such a tumultuous disorder, as I am perswaded that she herself knew not what they were.

In the mean time, since those that went after this supposed Artamenes, not being able to overtake him, it vexed her to see him in the boat, to see him land, to see him take horse, and at last to loose the sight of him. This adventure did so much incense her, that he who helped Spitridates to escape, was forced to provide for his own safety, because there was some suspicion of the truth: so that he followed Spitridates, and afterwards meeting with him at Colchides, he acquainted him with all these passages, and how Thomiris employed severall men to pursue him, and how the Queen was so extreemly greived at this adventure as she fell in a sickness, as all Physitians did say it would be long before she recovered. Spitridates being so fortunate as to meet accidentally with his Page, he was well able to recompence his deliverer, if he had been of an humour to enrich himself. But this virtuous Massagetan being declared Enemy unto all Riches, was contented to sacrifice his Fortunes unto the Queens Glory, and refused the offers of Spitridates which was very considerable, for he had great abundance of Jewels in the hands of that faithfull Page. Yet this generous Massagetan would not receive any gift, telling Spitridates that he was very well contented to adore the Sun which produced all those Excellencies without enriching himself by any of those glorious Productions.

In the mean while, Spitridates thought upon nothing so much as Araminta, and enquired of her as much as he could, but meeting with nothing but uncertainties, he embarked on the Euxine Sea, intending for Paphlagonia, where he hoped for more certain intelligence: As for his Page, he knew nothing but common talk went she was not at Artaxates, nor the King of Pontus neither: but that on the contrary you, Madam, was there, and that Ciaxares brought the War thither, under the Command of the Illustrious Artamenes, who was known to be Cyrus.

Spitridates then being embarked in a Merchants Ship, was so unfortunate in his Navigation, and had the winds so contrary, that after the Tempest had tossed him from Point to Point, and side to side, not being able to land any where, he was at last driven to the Meotidan Lake, where he suffered Shipwrack, and that in such a sad manner, as the Ship, the Merchandize, all the men, except himself and five or six more did lamentably perish. This sad Accident had not grieved Spitridates so much, if it had hapned upon the Coasts of Capadocia, or any place where he might inquire of Araminta: but being cast upon a place so far distant from the place where his business lay, it grieved him extreemly: Not that the Euxine Sea was so vast but that it might be passed over in few dayes with a favourable wind. But it was not so easie a matter for him to do it, being without Ship, without acquaintance, and also without his Jewels, since his Page perished, and with him, all he had.

Moreover since all Asia was in Armes, Commerce failed, and the Inhabitants upon the Meotidan Lake, sent out no Ships; Insomuch that the unfortunate Spitridates was forced to go by Land unto the place where he intended, having only as many Jewels as would buy him a horse and bear his charges alone without any train. But, Madam, the way was so long, and he met with so many rubs in it, that when he got into Paphlagonia, the Armenian War was ended: Tis very true, as you know, Majdam, very well, that it did not continue long: but the Illustrious Cyrus was upon the Frontiers of Lidia, when Spitridates after so long and tedious Journy, arrived in Paphlagonia: But when to his misery, he heard by the publick voge of the people (who seldom know, or talk any other thing but untruths, especially in State matters.) When he understood (I say) that for a conclusion of the publick Peace, the King of Pontus was to marry you, Madam, and that the Illustrious Cyrus was to marry Araminta; at first, he gave no credit unto it, but afterwards meeting with a Souldier who was returning into his own Country enriched with Plunder, which he had got in the Armenian War, he understood by him how civil the Illustrious Cyrus was unto that Princess: so that though this Souldier did not tell him that you, Madam, were to marry the King of Pontus, nor that Cyrus was to marry Araminta, yet he did both believe Page 63 what this Souldier sayd, and what the Paphlagonian people sayd also: so that sorrows seising upon all his faculties, one could not be in a more miserable condition then he was. His adventure upon the River Araxes was an addition to his misery; For sayd he, since the greatest Queen in the world was not able to resist the Charmes of Cyrus, though then she did know him to be the Son of a King, and since she loved him without being loved, how should Araminta resist her? since the Conqueror of all Asia is submissive at her feet. After this, Madam, as Lovers do allwayes think that none can look upon the persons they love, but must love them also; So Spitridates was so unjust as to doubt the fidelity of Cyrus: so that his Soul being full of intolerable Torments, there was no violent Resolution which he had not a mind to execute. One while he would go unto the Army of Cyrus, and ask him in the midst of all his Troops, whether he were his Rivall; and another while, he would go unto Araminta herself, and know from her own mouth, whether she were culpable or innocent: but his greatest care was to pass unknown through the Army of Cyrus, by reason of his prodigious resemblance.

As he was in all these uncertainties and restless thoughts, he accidentally met with a man of Quality called Democides, whom he left with the Princess Araminta, when he parted from her in Armenia; and when that Prince sent to enquire of the King her Brother, when she was kept a Prisoner at Artaxates.

This meeting was a great consolation to him; but the worst was, Democides pitying to see so great a Prince in such a miserable condition, would needs perswade him to return unto the King his Father: And the more to induce him unto it, he seemed to believe some truth in these reports, though really he gave no credit at all unto them: And further, Democides thought it expedient to acquaint the Princess of Bythinia with the place where the Prince her Brother was, to the end she might advise upon the best expedients to render him lesse miserable: And he had a fitter occasion for it then he thought of: For since Spitridates was in a condition to attempt any thing, he resolved to send secretly unto the Princess his Sister, to put him into some equipage, either to perform his resolution of going into the Army of Cyrus, or to take the part of the Lydian King, if he found any certainties of Cyrus his being a Rivall: But yet he would not upon any terms let the Princess of Bythinia know the place where he was, and therefore he expresly charged the servant of Democides whom he sent unto her, to acquaint her: But Democritus writing unto her from himselfe, did intimate the truth of all things in his Letter.

In the mean time, Spitridates and Democides remained in their Lodgings, which was in a Village not far from a Forrest, where they used to walk and take the Ayre every day in expectation of his return whom they had sent unto the Princess: For since there is only a Nook of Galatia betwixt Paphlagonia and Bythinia where Arsamones was, his journey was not long. But Madam, not to repeat what you know already; one day, as they were walking in the Forrest they were set upon by certain Robbers, and were rescued by the valiant Anaxanis, who left Spitridates much wounded, not knowing who he was; for Democides whom Anaxaris took to be the servant of Spitridates, would not tell him.

On the other side, the servant of Democides coming unto a Chalcedonian Port, he was there stopped to know who he was, from whence he came, and whether he was going; for Madam, you must know, that though Arsamones was quiet enough in his Dominions, yet he was as wary as if he feared every thing: holding this maxime that a conquering Prince ought not alwayes to trust unto the fidelity of new Subjects: so that a Guard was kept at Chalcedonia, as strictly as in times of War. So that the servant of Democides having answered something suspiciously, and being upon examination trapped, he was stayed to be farther examined: But what needed further? An Officer belonging to Arsamones knew him to be the servant of Democides, who was well known to go from Cabyria with Spitridates, and thought that happily he knew where he was, and therefore he would advertise Arsamones of it: And brought this man before him, who did so terrifie this more weake then wicked wretch, as he gave them the letter of Spitridates unto the Princess his Sister, and likewise Democides to the same Princess; so that knowing by this last Letter where Spitridates was, he was committed unto close Guard, keeping the business close from every one but such as were to execute his intended course, so as no ◊ of it was in all the Court.

Page 64 In the mean while, Arsamones made choise of a faithfull fellow, and gave him twenty for his guard, to go unto the place where Spitridates was, giving him also the servant of Democides with orders notwithstanding to guard him safely least he should escape and acquaint his Master. But to the end that his commands of securing the person of Spitridates might be more punctually executed, he told the man who was to execute this great design, that he did not desire to have Spitridates in his power, but only to force happinesse upon him: so that this man, thinking that his transaction was as well for the good of Spitridates as Arsamones, did protest unto him, that he would not hearken unto any Prayers, Promises, or Threats, which the Prince his Son should make, but would infallibly bring him. After this, Arsamones commanded him that when he did bring the Prince his Son, not to enter into any Town, but to stay a dayes journey from Heraclea, and give notice how all things stood. But, Majdam, without more particulars, be pleased to know, that this man came to the place where Spitridates was, and seized upon him, which was easie to be done; for he found him in bed, not cured of his wounds, though out of all danger. Moreover the place was far from Towns; And since the Prince of Paphlagonia was then in the Army of Cyrus. Spitridates knew not of whom he should ask protection? But to make the matter more easie, Democides being perswaded that this Prince would not be so miserable in his own Country as where he was, and advised him to submit unto the force without murmure against the King his Father, since he was not able to resist: Yet Spitridates did not yeild before he had employed all his rhetoric to perswade the man to let him go at liberty: but at last seeing he could not move him, neither by hopes of recompence, nor by any threats, he resolved to go along with him, not being able to resist twenty men, who at first disarmed both him and Democides, since Spitridates was very weak, they were forced to put him into a Coach: so, as though this Prince was as violent as any that ever loved, yet it was an easie matter to carry him. And he came within a dayes journey of Heraclea without any obstacle: And the man who commanded the Guard sent to acquaint Arsamones with what he had done: So that this violent Prince commanded him to bring Spitridates unto Heraclea in the night time, least the people should grumble, and sent more Souldiers that way Spitridates was to come, that his Guard might be the stronger; And the business was dispatched with so much secrecie, that no reports of it were spread abroad: But since the Policy of Arsamones was something severe to punish many, least all should become Delinquents: Prisoners were so ordinary, that it was no wonder to hear talk that some were brought in the night into Heraclea. In somuch that the Princess Intaphernes and Atergatis knew nothing of Spitridates his imprisonment, no more then the Princess of Bythinia or the Princess Istrina: For indeed, Madam, the Prince Spitridates was put into a Tower by the Sea-side, with a strong Guard; and Democides was also his Companion, though he did earnestly perswade him to go unto Heraclea without resistance.

In the mean time, Arsamones commanded that this Prince should be very carefully looked unto: but so very few did see him, and those that did were so faithfull to the King of Bythinia, that for some dayes Spitridates was never thought of. But Arsamones going one morning to this Tower where Spitridates was, and not returning of two hours after, did move some suspicion of some extraordinary Prisoners; for he returned out with so many signs of fury in his face, as those who waited upon him at the foot of the Tower, did easily observe it and divulge it, so as it was conjectured, that these Prisoners were some of great importance, but they knew no more: And Atergatis and Istrina did not know how much they were concern'd in the Conference between Arsamones and Spitridates: For, Madam, be pleased to know, that Arsamones did not only move Spitridates to cast off all thoughts of the Princess Araminta, but propounded a marriage with Istrina, not doubting but that Princess would willingly be Queen of two Kingdoms, and cast off Atergatis, whom he knew Gadates would not have her to marry. But since nothing could shake the affection of Spitridates unto Araminta, he rejected the Proposition which Arsamones made. How Spitridates (sayd Arsamones) can you be so foolish as to renounce the two Kingdoms of Pontus and Bythinia which I have Conquered, rather then renounce the Daughter of a Usurper, and the Sister of a Prince who hates you, and would heretofore have Araminta preferred Pharnaces before you? Consider Spitridates, consider seriously what the value Page 65 of two Kingdoms, which now you may either gain or loose, by obeying or disobeying me. I have tossed and toyled above this twenty years to set you upon a Throne; It hath cost the life of the Prince your Brother, and twenty thousand more who have all perished to break those Chains which fettered you, and to set the Crown upon your head: And will you rather love a Slave, and be a Slave your self then enjoy the fruits of all my Victories? For to think, that I will ever suffer Araminta to be Queen of Pontus and Bythinia, is a thing which I hate to hear of: For besides my resentments of hatred, revenge, and glory also, which will not let me consent unto it; even Policy only will not allow me to give a new title unto my Enemies, by this alliance. I know very well that Araminta is fair, witty, of much Spirit and Virtue, but since she is Daughter and Sister to my Enemies and Ruinors of my house: you must Spitridates either think no more upon her, or else think your self my Enemy; She whom I motion unto you is as fair and virtuous as Araminta can be. Moreover, she is the Daughter and Sister of a Prince who wisheth my Glory and Sister unto another, who hath helped me to that Throne upon which I would set you: Yet all these powerfull arguments could not stagger the constancy of Spitridates: and as I told you before, he rejected the motion of Arsamones with incredible resolution though his mind at that time was much incensed against Araminta. However Arsamones did not quite despair of changing his mind, but resolved upon three things. The first to acquaint that Prince with the meeting of Araminta and the King of Pontus by the permittance of Cyrus. The second, to acquaint him with all those reports of Cyrus his love to Araminta, though he knew them to be all false: And the third, that when he had enfused jealous apprehensions into his fancy, to acquaint the Queen Arbiana with the imprisonment of Spitridates, that she might go to see him, and carry Istrina with her, hoping that the beauty of the Princess would sooner change his thoughts from Araminta, then all his perswasions and policy. And indeed, Madam, in order to these Resolutions, he did infuse such jealous apprehensions into the heart of Spitridates, as this Prince could not enjoy one minutes rest, and his Soul was so sunk in sorrows, that having found a way how to write to the Prince Araminta, he would not make use of that way to let the Princess her Sister know of his imprisonment.

But as the first design of Arsamones did hit, so his second did not; as I shall presently tell you. However, since the day that Arsamones was with Spitridates, he came out from him much moved, every one was inquisitive of the true cause, but could not find it out: Yet at last Arsamones hearing that Spitridates was much disquieted, and knowing by some of the Guard that he made continuall complaints against the Princess Araminta when he talked with Democides, he thought it time to let him see the Princess Istrina: So that acquainting Arbiana with the imprisonment of the Prince her Son, he permitted her to see him, and to carry with her the Princess her Daughter and Istrina, upon the condition, that they use all their endeavours to dissuade him from his obstinate thoughts of marrying Araminta. But he did not acquaint them with the proposition he had made unto Spitridates concerning Istrina. Since Arsamones was terrible unto all that knew him; Arbiana and both the Princesses did promise what he desired, purposely to see this illustrious Prisoner; so that they were conducted thither the same day. You may easily think, Madam, that Arbiana and the Princess her Daughter, could not see Spitridates in Prison without extream sorrow: And on the other side, that Prince could not see them without some consolation, though his heart was full of grief. As for Istrina, it did exceedingly pitty her heart to see this Prince in that condition: But for his part, though he did much esteem her when he last saw her at Heraclea before he went to Cyrus, yet he was very sorry to see her now, because he thought she was acquainted with the motion of Arsamones, and did interpret all her obliging expressions as a premeditated design to render him perfidious and to drive Araminta from his heart: So that looking upon her almost as an Enemy, which came to assault him by open force, he had much ado to hide the turbulency of his spirits. Furthermore, since Arbiana had promised to dissuade him as much as she could from his thoughts of Araminta, and indeed did wish it; she would say something with as much sweetness and prudence as she could, which might persuade him, that constancy is a virtue which ought to have its Limits as other virtues have; and that when one was resolute upon a thing impossible, it was rather wilfulness then constancy, and therefore she conjured him to consider very seriously Page 66 whether his resolute denyall of Arsamones, was of such a Nature as would merit the name of a Virtue. Spitridates hearing Arbiana speak thus, was much moved, and most humbly beseeched her not to loaden him with new punishments for forcing him to resist her will, as he had the King his Fathers: For truly, Madam (said he unto her) I am so fully resolved never to forsake Araminta, as I shall not only be a Rebell unto the Kings will and yours, but I must declare also that if I could get out of this Prison, I should employ my liberty only in going unto that Princess, though the Conquerour of Asia should love her, as they would persuade me he doth: For the truth is, I cannot live without her. It is enough that the King hath driven the King her Brother out of his Kingdom, without desiring to drive her out of my heart: Therefore, Madam, I beseech your Majesty to beleive, that though the King would resign up all his regall Authority, and set me upon the Throne to morrow, yet I would not accept of it, unless upon condition that the first act of my Reign might be to Crown Araminta Queen. Therefore, Madam, all that I am able to do, is to beseech you, that you be pleased to persuade the King, and persuade your self, how extremely greived I am, that Fortune and Love should drive me to a fatall necessity of disobeying him, and denying you. Spitridates did pronounce these words in such feeling manner, as the hearts of Arbiana and the Princesses did even melt at the hearing them. But since they knew very well, that Arsamones would not have permitted this Visite, but in hopes of persuading him the Princesses of Bythnia told Spitridates, that he must give them leave to tell Arsamones how they had spoke unto him according to his desires: With all my heart, Sister, replied he, provided still you tell him that I am not changed in my mind, nor ever will. After this their discourse changed subject, and Spitridates asked how the Prince Intaphernes did and earnestly desired to see him, adding that his Soul had something which he longed to impart unto him, Istrina hearing this, assured him that there was such a dear Correspondency between the Prince her brother and herself, that he might trust her with any thing he desired to impart unto him; and therefore being uncertain whether Arsamones would let Intaphernes see him, she would willingly do him that Office. That which I would impart unto the Prince Intaphernes replied he, (and a little changed Countenance) is of such a nature as I cannot well impart it unto you: All I can say, is to beseech you by the Queens leave, if so it chance, that one of the most excellent persons in the world do complain of me in his presence, to tell him that I am not culpable, and that I think my misfortune to seem as if I did not esteem her (though really I do infinitely) to be one of the greatest which ever hapned. Since Istrina was unacquainted with the motion which Arsamones made unto Spitridates, she understood him not: but for his part, he being persuaded that she was acquainted with it, did think the least he could do, was to put her off handsomly. But as Istrina was ignorant of it, so was Arbiana and the Princess of Bythnia also: yet Istrina promised to tell the Prince Intaphernes what he desired. On the other side Spitridates, who fain would, but durst not ask the Queen his Mother what he should think of Araminta, he had much wavering in his resolution: but at last, being prompted by some suggestions of jealousy, he asked her some indirect Questions concerning her; And since the Queen imagined that the more faithfull he beleived Araminta, the more obstinat he would be, she only told him what reports were, and not what she thought: After which Arbiana and the Princesses retired. In their return to the Palace, to gain more time they resolved not to do as Spitridates would have them; but on the contrary, to keep Arsamones in hopes as long as they could. In the mean time, Arsamones who was hasty and violent in all his actions, had sent for Intaphernes whilst they were with Spitridates, and discovered unto him his intentions of marrying the Princess his Sister unto the Prince his Son. You may imagine, Madam, that such a resolution did much surprize and perplex Intaphernes: For his love to the Princess of Bythnia required one thing, and his Friendship to Atergatis required another: Also knowing how far the heart of Istrina was engaged, he did not think it possible for him, though he should cast of Atergatis, to persuade her from him. Moreover, he thought that the Prince Spitridates would not obey Arsamones, and quit his pretentions unto the Princess Araminta: yet he knew that if he did directly oppose Arsamones, he should indanger to incense him highly, and to be banished the Court; So that taking a middle course, betwixt confessing and denying what he desired, he told him, that his motion was very glorious for the Princess his Sister: but since it rested absolutely upon Gadates and not at all Page 67 upon him, he thought himself obliged to tell him, that he beleived, Gadates would never consent unto Istrinas marriage, as long as the King of Assyria was unmarried: Also it was not likely, that he being on the Part with Cyrus, he will give his Daughter unto a Prince who cannot marry her, unless he forsake the Princess Araminta whom Cyrus doth highly protect. After this Intaphernes did sweeten the matter with a thousand obliging expressions, which though just and reasonable, yet they disposed Arsamones unto anger. If the Princess Istrina replied he, were in the Camp of Cyrus, perhaps the Prince your Father might refuse the motion; But since she is at Heraclea, perhaps he will be wiser, then to prefer the uncertain hopes of marrying her unto a King without a Kingdome, before the certainty of marrying her unto a Prince who is sure of two. Therefore all I desire of you, is, that you dispose the Princess Istrina to help me to drive Araminta out of Spitridates his mind, since she is better able to do it than any I know, having all perfections which may move him to obey me and love her.

After this, Arsamones not giving Intaphernes so much leasure as to reply, did leave him and left him in a great perplexity. However, after he had seriously considered upon the matter, since love was stronger in him then any other thought, he resolved to speak unto the Princess of Bythnia, before he talked unto Istrina and Atergatis of the new persecutions which were like to fall upon them: And accordingly without more delay, he went unto her, and easily found a fit opportunity of talking with her, since there were no such busie Ladies at Heraclea, as Berisa was, to hinder him: But he had the freedom to talk what he would, and acquainted her with the Proposition which the King her Father made unto him, asking her how she would have him do in the business? Conjuring her, that as she was full of goodness and wisdom, so, that she would consider seriously upon the severall Interests of the Prince Spitridates, of Atergatis, of Istrina, and of himself, and desiring her to examine very carefully, whether she herself had any Interest in it. I have so much, replied the Princess, that (as I conceive) none can have more then I have: for loving the Prince my brother so tenderly as I do, and having promised an unviolable fidelity unto the Princess Araminta; Certainly it is my duty to endeavour all possible waies that nothing should separate them: So that though I had no other motive but this, I should as much as I was able oppose the mind of the King my Father; Judge also what I ought to do, knowing his design of troubling the felicity of the Princess Istrina and Atergatis. But, Madam, replied Intaphernes, I do not hear you mention any Interest that I have in this perverse resolution: Since I do not mention my own (replied the Princess) you ought not to be offended at it; yet I think it would not be amiss, replied he, if you would be pleased to consider, that if I should earnestly oppose the King, perhaps he would banish me his Court, and perhaps also banish me out of your memory (and if I durst say it) your heart. As the Princess of Bythnia was going to answer, the Princess Istrina came unto her Chamber with Atergatis: so that having no time to tell Intaphernes what she thought, the discourse began more quietly then it ended; for Atergatis and the Princess were so surprized at the intentions of Arsamones, that they were not able to speak. At first, Atergatis looked upon Istrina as if he would look into her thoughts: presently after he looked upon Intaphernes, as if his looks begged his protection: and presently after he looked in the eyes of the Bythnian Princess, to see whether she approved of the King her Fathers design. And lastly, he considered with himself for a remedy against all these miseries. On the other side, Istrina looked upon Intaphernes so earnestly, that she did penetrate into the very bottom of his heart, and knew how this troubled him. The Princess of Bythnia, for her part, did love Intaphernes too well to have him banished, and did cast about for some expedient which might keep Spitridates from incensing Arsamones against him, and yet not prejudice any party. But after each of them in particular had considered on the business, and after they had long talked of it in generall, they began by degrees to talke in particular: Intaphernes whispered with the Princess of Bythnia; and Atergatis, with Istrina. You see, Majdam, (said the last of these unto his adored Princess) that Fortune doth Court you with Crowns in all places, and poor I, am destined to Petition against your Grandure: But I most humbly beg of you, Madam, to be no more unjust unto me at Heraclea, then you were at Babylon; and give me leave to wish as zealously that the intentions of Arsamones may thrive no better then those of Nitocris. I am so far from contradicting Page 68 your wishes, replied Istrina, that I assure you Sir, I will add mine unto yours. Not but that I do as highly esteem the Prince Spitridates, as I scorn the unjust Prince who slighted me; but my reason is—Oh I beseech you Madam (said Atergatis, and interrupted her) give me no reasons which concern me not; but let me have the happiness to believe, that if the possession of two Kingdoms be indifferent unto you, it is because the poor Atergatis is not altogether indifferent in your thoughts. There is no necessity, replied she, that I should explain my self as you would have me; for the secrets of ones heart are not to be discovered; and there is a sort of thoughts never to be known, and but only ghesed at: Then Madam, said he unto her, I beseech you give me leave to ghesse at yours to be as I desire them: I give you leave (said she, and blushed) to think all you can for your own advantage, provided they be not disadvantageous unto me. However I pray consider the crosnesse of my Fate: may it not very well be said, that fortune takes a delight to persecute me by the very same things which use to be the felicity of others? And so was the destiny of the Prince my Father, who when he was at the very point of being a King, was for ever banished the Court by the very same Princess who would have had him Reign: I was once looked upon as one that was to be a Queen, though the King of Assyria looked upon me as a slave; yet after I had rooted all ambitious thoughts out of my heart, they tell me again of Kingdoms and Crowns only to torment me, and hinder me from Reigning over my selfe. But since I do not owe so much respect unto Arsamones as I did unto Nitocris, I shall deny him with more force then he imagines, provided the Prince my Father does not take his part. Oh Madam, said Atergatis, what cruell words do you pronounce, after so many favourable ones? Atergatis spoke this so loud, that the Princess of Bythnia heard him, & asked what Injustice Istrina did him? so that the Conference became generall againe, and they consulted together what was best to be done: yet they could not all agree upon the best Expedient; for when Intaphernes for the interest of his love, said that he ought not positively to oppose Arsamones, because he knew that Gadates would oppose it also, Atergatis did not think that advice good: but on the contrary he said, to draw the Princess of Bythinia unto his opinion, that it did extremely concern the Prince Spitridates for Intaphernes to let Arsamones see that his design was impossible, to the end he might let that Prince be at quiet in his Prison, though he would not release him.

He had no sooner spoke this, but Intaphernes did very civilly oppose the opinion of his friend, and told him that if he should do so, Arsamones who had a deep wit, would believe that he opposed him only in favour unto the passion which he bore unto the Princess, his Sister, and so he might perhaps move him to banish them both the Court, and keep Istrina there.

I doe conceive it most fit, said the Princesse of Bythinia, that the Princess Istrina do undertake to oppose the King my Father, and that she do endeavour to move Spitridates not to oppose him so much, purposely to appease him, and therefore I conceive it best for the Princess Istrina and the Prince Spitridates both, to resist Arsamones with equall resolutions. For my part, sayd Istrina then, I am very ready my selfe alone to oppose the Kings design: Yet I am perswaded that if all of us did equally oppose him, our side would be the stronger: I am affraid Sister, replied Intaphernes, that it would be the weaker; for if Arsamones should be incensed against the Princess, against Spitridates, against Atergatis, against you, and against me, who shall be the Mediator to appease so great a difference? The reason of Intaphernes making the rest to concur with his opinion, it was first resolved to spinne out the time as long as they could: and if so it hapned that Arsamones did not alter his mind, Intaphernes should then tell him, that the Princess his Sister protested she would rather dye, then marry a Prince who could never be her Husband, unlesse he were perfidious unto the most victorious Princess in the world.

This resolution being agreed upon, Intaphernes bethought himself how to temper the mind of Arsamones how to spin out the time, and how to give leisure unto the fatherly tenderness and reason of that Prince to overcome that politique obstinacy and desire of revenge, which made him so oppose the love of Spitridates unto Araminta; and indeed for a while his design did take, for since Arsamones had more hopes in the beauty of Istrina then any thing else, to work a change in Spitridates, he would not be over-urgent with his son, to the end the fair eyes of that Princess might have some time to turn him Infidell.

Page 69 In the mean while, the Princess of Bythinia thinking to adde some comfort unto the Prince her brother, as well as to satisfie her selfe, she went every day to see him. But Madam, the most observable passage was, that the Princess Istrina went thither also, because Arsamones did not give the Princess his daughter leave to see Spitridates, unless the Princess Istrina went with her: so that Intaphernes and Atergatis were not at all the happier: and this order of Arsamones did breed such a confusion in a few dayes, that these five persons (as wise and reasonable as they were) there was a kind of division amongst them.

The truth is, Madam, Spitridates complayned in secret against the Princess of Bythinia, for seeming as if she intended to drive Araminta out of his heart by bringing the Princesse Istrina alwayes with her; for since these two Princesses could not speak unto him without witsnesse, they could not undeceive him: so that with murmure of heart he accused Intaphernes, for not being generous enough: Istrina, for not standing enough upon her honour: Atergatis, for a very bad Lover: And the Princess his Sister for not being constant to her first thoughts, & for not loving Araminta enough. As for Atergatis he was in a lamentable plight, for he feared that Spitridates would turn Infidell to Araminta by seeing Istrina, and he feared that Istrina at the Queens desire would turn Infidell to him.

Nor was he well satisfied with Intaphernes, thinking he might move Istrina not to accompany the Princess of Bythinia when she went to Spitridates, murmuring also against the Prince Spitridates for receiving visits from one they would have him marry, and complaying against the Princess of Bythinia, who without consideration either of his case or the Princess Araminta's, unto whom she had promised so much friendship, did still see Spitridates once every day. But all these complaints were nothing in comparison of those which he himself made against Istrina for going every day unto a Prince, whom she knew Arsamones would have her marry.

On the other side, the Princess of Bythinia complained, that Intaphernes in behalf of Atergatis, had pressed her more then once to spare some of her frequent visits unto Spitridates, and that Istrina would hardly be drawn to accompany her: Also she murmured that Atergatis should grumble against her: But she did more sharply resent a kind of hollow coldnesse which she observed in the mind of Spitridates.

As for Istrina, she was off the hooks as much as any of the rest; for valuing the satisfaction of Atergatis very much, she heartily wished that the Prince her Brother, by vertue of his absolute authority over her, would hinder her from accompanying the Princess of Bythinia in her visits to Spitridates: But since he did not so, she murmured against him, and complained no lesse that the Princesse of Bythinia should want that piece of Complacency to her. However, she was very angry that Atergatis should find fault with her too often visits of Spitridates, and she was also something angry to observe that the illustrious Prisoner was something civil towards her. Furthermore, Intaphernes thought much at Atergatis, knowing his Passion to the Princess of Bythinia, that he should offer so obstinately to resist him. Nor did he take it well that Istrina should accompany that Princess with so many signs of unwillingnes, though he would not have her break off with Atergatis. But he took it much worse, that the Princess whom he loved should not give him any hopes of his happinesse in a Coniuncture wherein he thought she might well permit him to make tryall of it by discovering his design unto Arsamones. Thus these five illustrious persons, murmuring in secret without any open Complaints, they knew not what to say when met together.

In the mean time Arsamones after he had given so much time as he thought requisite for the beauty of Istrina to work its effects in driving Araminta out of his sons heart, he began to speak big like a Prince that would be obeyed: and to declare unto Arbian, unto the Princess his Daughter, unto Spitridates, and every one to whom he spake, that he was fully resolved to Court Istrina unto the marriage of Spitridates, and that he was resolved to hinder Spitridates from marrying Araminta. You may judg Madam, how this resolution did perplex all the persons that were concerned in the businesse: Then did the Princess of Bythinia, Istrina, Intaphernes and Atergatis being all together, begin to justify themselves by accusing each other, and laying the misfortune upon every one but themselves: But when this secret poison which lurked in their hearts, & caused many a throb, did begin to evaporate by complaints, Page 70 they began to take fresh comfort. At first, they vented their Complaints tumultuously and in much confusion, but by degrees collecting their thoughts into some order, they did all justify themselves; and their passions teaching them to excuse the passions of others, they made a Peace, and accused only themselves for this secret schisme which was like to have spoiled their whole business: So that esteem, Love, and friendship assuming place in their hearts without any anger, spight, and a miscellany of many other tumultuous thoughts, they began to complayn of their own miseries, & not of one anothers. But though this seemed to be solidly made, yet Atergatis whose love was very violent, he could not hope for any satisfaction of it, untill he had found out a way to make the design of Arsamones impossible. Though these persons had infinite spirits & wit in abundance, yet they were extremely puzzled. For, sayd the Princess of Bythinia, though it should be possible to murder the passion of the Prince my Brother, yet I should never consent unto it: and though I believe his liberty would be his Exile, perhaps cost him his life, at least be very long, yet I wish he had it. It is the only remedy replied Atergatis, which can be found to comfort this illustrious Prince, and perhaps to force Arsamones unto a cessation of his persecutions; for truly Madam, what comfort can you take to see the Prince Intaphernes loaden with fetters, and to see him perpetually tormented by the King your Father? Though its true, replied she, that it would be more advantageous for the Prince my Brother to wander like a fugitive, then to continue a Prisoner; yet there is a strong reason which forbids me to procure his liberty if I could: For since the King my Father, during the exile of the Prince my Brother, would declare me Queen, I ought not to expose my selfe unto any suspicion of such unjust ambition.

Oh Madam (sayd Istrina) your generosity is too scrupulous: How can the Prince Spitridates ever suspect you of any thoughts to reign in his prejudice? you I say, whose soule is so high, so noble, and so disinterested? and who is capable of no further ambition, but to render your selfe worthy of more esteem then ever any had? Whilst Istrina was talking thus, Intaphernes hardly hearing what she said, consulted with himself, whether the liberty of Spitridates would be advantageous to him or no; and after a serious debate with himself he concluded, that as long as Arsamones had any thoughts of disinheriting Spitridates, he could never pretend unto the Princess of Bythinia: so that measuring the interest of that Prince by his own, he thought it better for him that he continued still a prisoner, then to wander over the world as he did during his exile. So that concurring with the opinion of the Bythian Princess, and Istrina not daring to contradict them, Atergatis was singular in his opinion, and consequently did submit in appearance. However he was perswaded that the violence of Arsamones would reach further then they imagined, and that there was no other remedy neither for Spitridates nor himselfe, then that which he had propounded: And he intended to try if there was any possible wayes to set that Prince at liberty, and put it in execution when he thought best.

But whiles these four were thus reasoning with themselves, Spitridates having received no answer from Araminta to whom he had writ, he was extremely sad, in thought that her infidelity was the cause of her silence: For Madam, he knew not how he who carryed his Letter unto that Princesse, and was to bring her answer, was stopped by the Forces of Croessus, and carryed unto Sardis, as we understood, after the liberty of Spitridates, so that this unfortunate Prince being every day forced by his passion to expresse a thousand testimonies of fidelity unto a Princesse whom hee thought perfidious, his despair was sometimes so great, that he wished himself able to hate Araminta. But for all that he still loved her with a most unalterable constancy: and certainly he gave sufficient testimony of it after the Peace was established between Intaphernes, Atergatis, Istrina, and the Bythian Princess: For Arsamones being infinitely enraged at his resolute resistance, went to see him, and gave him such bitter and menacing language, as any other heart but that of Spitridates would have trembled: Yet he kept close unto his prescribed Principles; and without starting the least jot from his fidelity to Araminta, or reverence unto the King his Father, he resisted him without any tartness or complaint. But the more patient and wise he was in his sorrows, the more violent and unjust was Arsamones in his anger.

Know thou base man that thou art, (said he unto him) that since thou wilt not be like the sonne of a King, thou shalt not be one: And to deprive thee of any title or Page 71 right to succeed in two Kingdoms which I possesse, I will declare and renounce the Kingdom of Bythinia, and that I have no other pretence unto it but as a Conqueror. Look upon me (sayd this incensed Prince) as an usurper, and not as a legitimate King: but as an usurper who can sovereignly dispose of what I have usurped, and as one that will never give it unto a man who is unworthy of it, and covers himselfe with eternall shame, if within one moneth he do not repent: this is the utmost minute that I will give him, to choose whether he will be a King or a slave: Then this violent Prince leaving him, he was at freedom to complain against his injustice. But Madam, why should I consume any time in telling you the inquietudes of a Prince whom the Gods had so pointed out for a sufferer? It is more requisite I acquaint you how Atergatis apprehending that Spitridates was resolved not to obey Arsamones, and that Istrina was not so ambitious as to be Queen of two Kingdoms, he resolved as I told you before, to try all manner of wayes how to release him; for being of a most liberrall disposition and a winning spirit, questionlesse he was qualified for such an enterprise. But Madam, that which most advanced his plot was that whilst he was tampering to suborn the Guards of Spitridates which stood at the gates of the Tower, to the end they might suborn those who were neerer his person, this generous Prisoner was tampering with those who were in his Chamber, to the end they should corrupt those which were placed at the gate of the Tower: So that Madam, though Atergatis and Spitridates held not any correspondency together, yet they transacted as if they had; so that by chance working together upon those whom they attempted to perswade, it hapned that when the Guards which were within the Tower did propose the releasement of Spitridates unto those who were without, they found them upon the same design, and ready to make the same Propositions unto them within. So that there being a facility to enter perswade each other, the businesse was quickly concluded, and as soon executed. For since the Tower stood upon the Sea-side, Atergatis having provided a Barque ready the same night which he made choice of for the releasement of this illustrious Prisoner: It was an easie matter for the suborned guards who were much the greater number, to quell the rest to release this Prince, to carry him to the Barque, and to embark with him: But Madam, the wonder was, Spitridates was released, and knew not who released him untill he came unto the Sea side: For then the Prince Atergatis, who would see the execution of the business, did make himself known unto him.

And to compleat his generosity, he gave him a Page, and told him that he should find in the Barque all things requisite or necessary for so long a voyage: After which Spitridates giving thanks unto his Deliverer with all the hast of a man that feared to lose a happiness which he was ready to enjoy, he parted from him, and making all saile and oare they could, he went I know not whither; for after his departure from Heraclea, we never heard where he landed. We understood he was at Atarnes, where you Madam took him for Cyrus, and that he saw you Embarque with the King of Pontus, but we could never learn whether he went straight from Heraclea unto Atarnes.

In the mean while, though he loved Democles very well, who was in the same prison with him, yet he was not released; for the businesse was done so hastily, that the Guards of Spitridates, never thought of going to the Chamber of Democles: And Spitridates himself, doubtlesse all his thoughts were so taken up with Araminta, that he thought of nothing else.

But Madam, the most observable passage was, that the Prince Atergatis was not at all suspected: and if he had not himself confessed it unto the Princess Istrina, and Intaphernes, we had not known it. To tell you Madam, how much Arsamones was both astonished and angered when he knew of Spitridates his escape, were to attempt a thing impossible: As for Arbiana, she was very glad, for she began to feare the violence of the King. As for the Princess of Bythinia, shee both joyed and grieved, foreseeing that this Exile would be worse to him then the other: As for Intaphernes though he was glad for Spitridates, yet he grieved for himself, because he thought that the liberty of this Prince would be an obstacle unto his design: And as for Atergatis, his joyes were as plump as he could either wish or hope; and to make them more sensible to him, he understood that Istrina was glad of Spitridates his escape:

Page 72 In the mean time, since the pride of Arsamones would never let him complain long he affected to seem as if he were easily comforted for the absence of the Prince his son, whom he openly said should never be his Successor. Thus in a few dayes there was as great a calm in the Court, as if this storm had never risen: For since every one stood in fear of Arsamones, they durst neither rejoyce nor grieve openly at the liberty or absence of Spitridates: And all that the Queen could do, was to obtain the liberty of Democles, upon condition to depart from Heraclea. After that things had thus rested some dayes, it was known that the Governour of the Castle which stood upon the Frontiers of Bythinia towards Galatia, had sent a Post unto Arsamones about some important intelligence, and that Arsamones had sent twice to him. But that which did a little surprize all the Court, was, that Arsamones would have the two Princes, Intaphernes and Atergatis goe with him unto the Frontiers of Bythinia. So that going neither to Chalcadonia nor Chrysipolis which are the two chief Towns, we went unto a little Village not above fifty furlongs from this Castle, whose Governour had given this intelligence which we were all ignorant of, but presently after knew what it was.

Be pleased to know Madam, that the King of Assyria, after he went from Sardis, whilst the illustrious Cyrus was gone with Spitridates to the Princess Araminta, and with intention to enquire into what part of the world the King of Pontus had hurried you, this King of Assyria received false intelligence, which caused his imprisonment. For you must know Madam, he was told that the King of Pontus, whose Father Reigned with sovereignty sufficient to have many Creatures there, had yet so many friends left, as had plotted a great conspiracy against Arsamones, which would presently break out into a flame; so that the King of Assyria being informed of the businesse, and that the King of Pontus after he had carryed you Madam from Sardis, had carryed you into Bythinia, to the house of the head-man in the Conspiracy which was very strong: and that he carryed you thither, with intentions to hide you there untill all things were in readinesse to set you upon the Throne, he wended his course that way.

Though this intelligence was not probable, yet there was in it some appearance of possibility, which that Prince thought he ought not to neglect: so that he resolved for Bythinia, to satisfie himself of the truth. But since Arsamones, as I already told you, did keep a very strict Guard in all his Dominions, as if the King whom he had vanquished and driven out were still in the head of an Army, the King of Assyria being to passe a Bridg over the River Sangar, was stopped by the Guards there, to know from whence he came, and whither he went. But he being of an imperious temper, in lieu of answering to those Questions, begun to be angry, and his Examiners being something insolent with him, he drew his sword, and wounded two or three of them. Since he had only one Page with him, since there was above twenty Souldiers there, and since many people of the Town at the end of this Bridg compassing him about, he was arrested, after he had wounded many of them, and afterwards was carryed to the Castle I speak of.

As soon as he who commanded it did look upon him, he knew that he had seen him in the Army under the name of Philidespes, at the same time when Cyrus under the name of Artamenes got victory upon victory in the Wars then against the Kings of Pontus and Phrygia: So that this man considering the importance of his Prisoner, did look very carefully to him, and acquainted Arsamones, who no sooner knew it but he came presently from Heraclea, to the place I mentioned before, to the end he might the better dive into the design which the King of Assyria might have in coming into Bythinia: But being a Prince who never used to impart his thoughts, unless there was an absolute necessity for it, he kept this intelligence very close: so that though the Village where the Court was, was within fifty furlongs from this Castle, yet we knew not who was in it, nor why we were there.

In the mean time, since Arsamones was concerned in all the harsh usage of the Assyrian King heretofore unto Intaphernes and Istrina, he should not have any great disposition to treat this Prince very well: Yet since the rule of all his actions was only his own interest, he never had any Friend with whom he would not break, if it would be advantageous for him; nor ever had he any Enemy unto whom he would not reconcile himself upon the same reason: so that having this Prince in his power, Page 73 he considered what use might be made of him. Then he apprehended, that when Cyrlus had released you Madam, his desires of bringing all Asia into subjection, would move him to make War upon himself, and the Princesse Araminta would prompt him to it; for he knew not yet how the Prince Phruartes had carryed her away.

Arsamones then, considering all these things, he thought fit to give the valour of Cyrus some employment, and to make unto himself an Allie, so brave and couragious as the King of Assyria was. Then his design was, to propound unto him a marriage with the Princess Istrina; and for the better acceptance, he offered to kindle a Rebellion in Babylon, by some correspondencies which he had there, and to joyn with him against all his Enemies: For knowing very well that Gadates was very zealous for this Match; and seeing there was no hopes for Spitridates, he thought it would not be a hard matter to bring Istrina unto obedience. Moreover, since he had indeed discovered that Intaphernes was in Love with the Princess his Daughter, his plot was to give her unto him, upon condition he would moove Istrina to marry the King of Assyria: And upon that condition, he would solemnly declare, that Spitridates should never be King either of Pontus or Bythinia.

And in order to this, he sent Atergatis unto Chalcadonia, under a pretence of some popular stirrs there, which indeed were already appeased, to the end his presence might be no obstacle to his design. Atergatis then was no sooner gone, but Arsamones went to see the King of Assyria, whom he treated with as high Civilities, as if he were upon his own Throne.

But Madam, I cannot tell whether I ought to go on with my relation, and whether you will think good I should speak so particularly of a Princes love, who hath been a cause of your many miseries: Yet the King of Assyria's busines is so intertwisted with the history of Intaphernes, Atergatis, Istrina, and the Princess of Bythinia, as I cannot relate the one without the other.

Since they are inseparable, replied Mandana, I had rather hear you speak of a Prince whom I do not love, then not to know the sequell of their Adventures whom I do infinitely esteem. Besides, you know, that sometimes one may be as inquisitive of the actions of an Enemy, as of Friends: Therefore Orcames, I pray tell me all the passages in Bythinia, as if I had not interest in them, and as if I did not hate the King of Assyria; Upon this command Orcames went on with his relation.

Arsamones then being with the King of Assyria, and treating him, as I told you, with all possible Civilities, did at first condole his misfortunes, and after many obliging expressions, told him, that it should only be long of himself, if he were not more happy: Then he offered to cause a Revolt in Babylon, to give him a considerable Army: And that he would joyn inseparably with him to oppose the Conquests of Cyrus, provided he would marry Istrina as the Queen Nitocris wished. As soon as Arsamones had done speaking, the King of Assyria did sharply answer, that hee would most willingly accept of his Proposition without the Condition annexed to it, but otherwise he could never think of it: For indeed, said he unto him, since I could not love Istrina at a time when I was in Love with none; Certainly I can never love her now, when I am in love with the fairest and most divine Princess that ever lived: Therefore never offer me such a thing as I cannot accept of, but let me go and seek out the King of Pontus who hath ravished away the Princess whom I adore, and that I may gratifie you for my liberty, by ridding you of an Enemy who will be a perpetuall thorn in the Crowns that you have conquered. Since Cyrus seeks him with a hundred thousand men (replied Arsamones) it is probable he will find him before you Sir. Therefore I beseech you, let not that be any hinderance unto your acceptance of this advantageous Proposition.

The King of Assyria hearing Arsamones say so, did think he jeered at him, and began to be angry: And Arsamones being as violent as he, this Conversation which began with Civilities was like to end with Injuries. Yet the King of Bythinia thought his design might take, and that desire of liberty might bring the King of Assyria unto his Bent: so that desiring to prepare Intaphernes for his ends, he took him aside the same night: and after he had told him how the King of Assyria was his prisoner, he began to propound the marriage of Istrina with him. Arsamones had no sooner pronounced those words, but Intaphernes being transported with some violence, How hath Sir (said he unto him) can I ever consent my Sister should ever marry a Prince who Page 74 hath most injuriously affronted me, and that she should cast off one who is my intimate friend? Fye, no, Sir, it is not possible, nor do I take the heart of Istrina to be so base, as to have any such thoughts, though the King of Assyria were upon his Throne: Be not so hasty (replied Intaphernes coldly) and to let you see, that I know a way how to make you like the motion; know, that if you do perswade Istrina unto my desires, and unto what you know very well the Prince your Father desires, I will consent you shall marry my Daughter whom I know you love; upon condition notwithstanding that you promise me never to restore the Kingdom of Pontus, nor the Kingdom of Bythinia unto the unworthy Spitridates.

This Proposition did so amaze Intaphernes, that for a time he was not able to answer: but as he was ready to reply, Arsamones left him, and said, that he saw so much turbulency in his mind, that he would not have him answer confusedly, but would give him time to consult with his ambition and his love; after which he left him in a most perplexed condition: For on the other side, he found abundance of joyes in having a possibility to enjoy the Princess whom he adored: But when he considered, that to enjoy so great a happiness, he must give his Sister unto his Enemy, betray his friend, and usurp the Dominions of a brother unto his Princess by accepting it, his Soul was in a very Hell. Nor did he believe that the Princess of Bythinia would ever marry him upon those terms, though he should promise her not to take any advantage of this declaration: for he had heard her express something which intimated as much; So that whether he considered his hatred of the Assyrian King, his friendship to Atergatis, the aversion of Istrina to the one, her inclination to the other: or whether he considered his duty to Spitridates, and the high generosity of the Bythian Princess: he saw that Arsamones offered him a benefit which he could not enjoy upon such conditions, though he did accept of them: and consequently his sorrows were not mean. In the mean time, he knew not whether he should acquaint first the Princess of Bythinia, or Istrina with it: But going unto the Chamber of the Bythian Princess, and finding them both together, he could not any longer let this vexatious secret lye lurking in his heart. You may easily conceive, Madam, how these two Princesses wondered when they heard the King of Assyria was Prisoner, and when they heard the King of Bythinas Proposition unto Intaphernes. Truth is, there wonder was so great, as they both did extremely blush, though for different reasons. But since the Princess Istrinas heart did extremely hate the King of Assyria, and was very tender towards Atergatis, she was the first that spoke, though it was not she unto whom the Prince Intaphernes addressed his speech: Oh Heavens (said she very heartily) can Arsamones ever think of forcing me to marry the King of Assyria; Oh, Madam (added she and looked upon the Princess of Bythinia) I beseech you pardon me if I do not obey him: It is most just I should (replied that generous Princess) since I am resolved to commit the same Crime my self: For though I do esteem the Prince Intaphernes, and have given him a higher place in my heart, then ever any had; yet I assure you, I shall never consent he should take two Kingdoms from the Prince my brother, nor be ever happy by making him miserable. However, Madam (replied Intaphernes and sighed) I beseech you honour me so far as to allow me some comfort for refusing a benefit which you will not let me accept of, and which Honour forbids me as well as my Sister, since she cannot endure to be wife unto the King of Assyria, rather then unto Atergatis: Do but acknowledge, Madam, that the generosity of your Soule is the only Impediment, and that if it were less, you could consent unto my happiness. I do acknowledge, said she and blushed, that I wish you were, but if you should be calpable of desiring it by any unjust wayes in lieu of wishing your happines, I beleive I should wish the contrary. But, Madam, not to consume more time in repeating the discourse of these three Illustrious Persons; It was resolved that they should write un|to Atergatis to invite his return, and that in the interim, Istrina should take upon her to resist Arsamones, since Intaphernes had not power to incense a Prince who had made him such a motion as might make him happy, if some unjust Conditions were not annexed to it: But that which most troubled them was, that they could not know whether the King of Assyria had denyed Arsamones; but on the contrary had cause to beleive, that he had not, and that desire of liberty had altered his mind.

In the mean time, the King of Bythinia who was ever wedded to his own will, asked Page 75 Intaphernes the next morning, if he had considered upon the motion, and that Prince in order unto their resolutions, assured him, that there was so much glory to him in it, that he thought himself capable of committing Crimes rather then not accept of it: but also he was obliged to tell him, that he verily beleived that the Princess Istrina would never obey him if he commanded her to marry her Enemy. To this Arsamo|nes answered, That a Prince who knew so well how to bring two Kingdoms into subjection, knew well enough how to make Istrina obey him; so that assuring him|self of that, he bent all his endeavours to perswade the King of Assyria: But all to no purpose, that Prince still telling him, that you, Madam, and you only should Raign in his heart as long▪ as he lived: that he had nothing to do with Kingdoms, that he had no need of any Army, and that he only desired his liberty, adding some expressions which denoted his extream aversion unto Istrina and Intaphernes, of whom he spoke with intollerable scorn, as we afterwards understood by one of the Guards in his Chamber.

Moreover, when Arsamones did one day press Intaphernes to the Declaration which he would require of him, never to restore the Kingdoms of Pontus and Bythinia unto Spitridates, he perfectly perceived notwithstanding all his handsom answers, that they did not proceed from his intentions: So that being very angry, and finding his design to be impossible, he plotted another which he thought more eas|sie, by which he thought to be better revenged upon Spitridates, and to hinder Ara|minta and all her family from having any part in his Dominions, and this it was. His design was not to speak of Istrina any more unto the King of Assyria, thinking his aversion to her was chiefly his reason for not accepting his offer. However, Arsamones would have the Queen visite the imprisoned King, that she should carry the Prin|cess her Daughter with her; And so they did, who not being able to guess at his de|sign, were very glad to see a Prince whose Adventures were so extraordinary, and who was so much talked of over all Asia. Since you are all goodness, Madam, I hope you will give me leave without any anger to tell you, that he received these Princesses with much civility, and used many expressions which were full of spirit, full of gene|rosity, and full of love to you: for he did most earnestly intreat them to be Media|tors unto the King for his liberty, that he might go and recover yours: And the more to oblige them unto it, he fell into most high Elogies of you. But after that, since the naturall impetuosity of his honour could not longer be hid, the Queen by chance naming Intaphernes, this violent Prince fell into such an angry chafe both a|gainst him and Istrina also, and used such unjust and injurious expressions, that these two Princesses were not able to endure it, yet having no mind to quarrell with a Prince whose imprisonment seemed to them unjust, they retired, promising him their inter|cessions unto Arsamones for his liberty. But as soon as they were out of the Chamber, the King of Bythinia sent to tell him that he would mention Istrina no more unto him, but would offer unto him the Princess his Daughter, and two Kingdoms, that he would recover Babylon for him by help of some intelligence which he had: and assu|ring him that within fifteen dayes he would give him an Army able to resist Cyrus, if he would make War with him. Tell the King your Master (replied this Prince unto the man by whom Arsamones sent this message) that if I could cease being the Rivall of Cyrus, doubtless I should become his friend: for besides all his rare Qualities worthy of my amity, I must acknowledge that I owe him my self: so that were I not his Rivall I should never raise an Army to oppose him. But assure Arsamones also, that though the Princess his Daughter be full of perfections; and though I have as great a disposition to esteem her, as I have aversion unto Istrina, yet I cannot hearken unto a second Proposition with a more favourable eare then unto the first; For since I must ever be the Lover of the Princess Mandana, I can never be the Husband of the Bythnian Princess. But, Sir (replied the man) were you in any hopes of ever obtaining the love of this Princess whom you adore, I should not think it so strange, that you should refuse this Offer: But I must confess, when I consider how you have lost your Kingdom, that the Princess Mandana does not love you and that yet you should refuse two Kingdoms with one of the fairest Princess in the world; for one that hates you, my wonder is beyond my words: What ere it be (replied the King of Assyria very sharply) such are my reall thoughts; and if the Empire of all Asia were offered me, with a condition not to pretend unto Mandana, I would refuse it, Page 76 as I do the Kingdoms of Pontus and Bythinia: Oh Heavens (cried he) was ever any Fate like mine? Arsamones would give me two Kingdoms, and a Princess worth more then both, yet will not give me that liberty which unless he violate the Laws of Nations he cannot take from me: Is it possible that I alone should be the only man in all the Universe unto whom he can give his Kingdoms, and the Princess his Daugh|ter? I see very well (pursued this violent Prince) that he makes choise of me before any other, because he knows that if I accept of them I shall never restore them unto the King of Pontus, or any of his family, and so the hate he bears unto his Enemies is the cause of his choise: But since his Interest alone doth prompt him unto the of|fer, he must not take it ill, if mine prompt me to a refusall. Tell him therefore, that if I had power not to love the Princess Mandana, and to overcome my self, I had dr|iven her out of my heart, before they drove me out of Babylon, and that I should have conquered my self before Cyrus did overcome me: Or to express my self better, if el|ver I could have left loving this Princess, it would have been when she desired to do it with her eyes full of Tears: and therfore I cannot follow those motions of hatred and revenge, which induce Arsamones to make such odd Propositions unto me that I can|not accept of them upon those terms, though they seem to be very advantageous to me. Tell him then that I can be his friend, but I cannot be the Husband of the Prin|cess his Daughter: and so he needs not urge me to no purpose unto a thing which I cannot do; for the most certain truth is, I do love and am not loved, and I am fully resolved so to do till death or fortune change my destiny. But if after all this Arsa|mones will wilfully keep me Prisoner, and hinder me from releasing Mandana, tell him then, that this King without a Kingdom whom he holds in his hands, and whom he thinks so weak and wanting all protection, perhaps is powerfull enough to cause the ruine of his new Dominions, and make him loose those two Kingdoms which he offers me, since he hath a Rival so generous as to release him, though he be his most mortall Enemy. After this the King of Assyria made a sign with his hand unto the man, which intimated that he had no more to say, and that he should return to the King his Ma|ster, and did it with as much austere Majesty, as if he were still upon his Throne. Also he who was a witness of his violence and choller was so surprized, that after he had reported unto Arsamones, how the King of Assyria received his message, he could not keep that secret which was such a wonder to him: so as imparting it unto me, I was extreemly astonished to hear that Arsamones should alter his resolution.

In the mean time, I thought it requisite to acquaint the persons interested in this odd design: For I must confess, Madam, that as resolute as the King of Assyria's an|swer was, yet I thought he might change his mind. Therefore I resolved to make the state of things known unto those who might find a remedy. As I went unto Intaphernes, I found Atergatis with him, who returned sooner then expected; but returned so sad to hear that Arsamones would marry Istrina unto the King of Assyria, that In|taphernes was not able to comfort him; and as soon as he saw me he called me to help him to settle the mind of Atergatis; Alas, Sir, answered I, I am not very fit to comfort him and you also; for I assure you, when I have imparted all, the Prince Ater|gatis hath no other sorrows but what will be yours; for the truth is, Sir, it is not I|strina whom Arsamones would have the King of Assyria to marry, but it is the Prin|cess of Bythinia. These were such words of wonder that both these Princes cried out: But, oh Heavens, how different were their tones, and how sad was the sound of Intaphernes his voice? Indeed, Madam, I am not able to express what I saw in the faces of these two Lovers: I saw in one minute despair to pass out of the heart of Aterga|tis, into that of Intaphernes; fury was quenched in the Soul of one, and kindled in the Soul of the other; I saw sorrow dye in the eyes of Atergatis and revive in Intapher|nes: and in an instant, I saw the Comforter become the sad man, and the sad man be|come the Comforter. I should abuse your patience, Madam, if I should relate unto you all their Lamentations, or how Atergatis implo|yed the same Arguments of Consollation unto Intaphernes, which he immediately before received from him: Nor will I relate all that the Princess Istrina, and the Princess of Bythinia sayd, when they knew the business; for having formerly acquainted you particularly with their virtues and the innocent passions of their Souls; you may easily conceive they expressed their sorrows unto each other. However these cross adventures produced one happiness unto these two Lovers, since they obliged the Princesses whom they loved, to give them Page 77 as sweet and tender Language, as if their Souls were in much more tranquility: for doubtless there is nothing fitter to induce a person who loves to unmask affection, then misfortunes and sorrows. Whilst things were in this condition, it was known how the King of Pontus carried you, Madam, unto Cumes; And that Cyrus went to besiege it; so that this news having infused other thoughts into the mind of Arsa|mones, who was extreemly incensed against the King of Assyria for his refusall, every one was in a strange wonder to hear that we must all return unto Heraclea: And our wonder was the greater, because he appointed (without giving any reason for it) all those only whom he had told that the King of Assyria was in his power, to keep it secret: After which all departed; this Prince, leaving so many men as he judged fit for the Guard of this Castle where the King was Prisoner, yet not daring to leave so ma|ny as he wished, least that should be suspected which he would not have known. Since this Prince was of a very close spirit, we could not then dive into those mysteries which afterwards we knew: For indeed, Madam, it was at that time, when Arsamones to be revenged upon the King of Assyria, and to get the King of Pontus into his pow|er, did send unto the Illustrious Cyrus this message, that if he would promise to re|store the King of Pontus into his hands when he had taken Cumes, he in exchange would restore the King of Assyria into his power. But as you know, Madam, the Il|lustrious Cyrus having received a Letter from this Captive King, he took a more heroick Resolution, and denyed Arsamones.

In the mean time, Intaphernes and Atergatis were not at all happy: for Arsa|mones leaving Arbiana & the Princesses at Heraclea, he carryed them unto Cabyra, where he grew so melancholy (when upon the return of his Messenger, and the Arrivall of Hidaspes he heard of the generosity of Cyrus) that he fell sick there: yet he would not let the Queen bring the Princesses with her, when she came, but commanded her to leave them at Heraclea; for his soul was in such a fury, that he could not endure Intaphernes, or Atergatis should have so much comfort as to see the Princesses whom they loved.

In the mean time, his sickness continued so long, that it did facilitate the liberty of the Assyrian King. For though they told him that Hidaspes when he departed was gone into Galatia, and Cappadocia; And that he drew out of all his Garrisons unto a boldy, he could not beleive that Cyrus had commanded him to attempt the delivering of his Enemy by force: but rather imagined, that it was to recruit the Army, then out of any desire of his Rivals liberty. So that his Policy being caused to sleep by the violence of his sickness, he gave Hidaspes time to surprize the Castle where the King of Assyria was, and to deliver that Prince. Tis true, that Intaphernes and Atergatis were so afraid, least the fancy should take Arsamones to make him either marry Istrina, or the Bythnian Princess, they were not very forward in giving any advice for his secu|rity: and though they did most horribly hate the King of Assyria, yet they wished his liberty; And they were as much joyed, as Arsamones was angred, when the news of his surprizall was brought to Cabyra: Insomuch as Intaphernes not being able to hide his joyes, this violent Prince suspected, that he gave intelligence unto Hidaspes to surprize the Castle: and his suspitions of it were the greater, when he knew that the Prince Gadates had writ a Letter unto him, which he had not shewed, because it appointed him to come hither; and Intaphernes not being able to be at such a distance from the Princess of Bythinia, would not let Arsamones see it, least he should move him to obey Gadates sooner then he had a desire. However, though this Prince was innocent of that the King of Bythinia did accuse him, yet he was held guilty, upon bare Conjectures, and banished, not only from the Court, but also out of all his Do|minions. Arbiana did what she could to appease him, but all in vain, for Arsamones would set no term when Intaphernes should return into his Dominions; but when he brought with him, either the King of Pontus, or Araminta, or Spitridates. You may ea|sily imagine, Madam, how sad the Prince was, who after a thousand good Services done unto Arsamones, was treated with such Ingrat|itude and Injustice. Intaphernes out of a resentment of honour, had a good mind to ask leave he might carry Istrina with him; but conceiving it would be more for his advantage that he should re|m|ain with the Princess whom he loved, he rejected that thought. However, obey he must, because he could not help it, and the willing, because the Princess of Bythinia commanded him: yet in spite of Arsamones, he had the satisfaction to bid her adieu; Page 78 for since she was at Heraclea, he went out of Cabyra in a disguise thither, and saw her, in the presence of Istrina, of Atergatis who followed him, and of my self. I need not, Madam, make any relation of what these persons did say, the thoughts of whose hearts were so full of tenderness: But I assure you, that never was any love or friendship, so fluent in sweet and passionate expressions, as theirs, when they expressed their sorrows to part from each other, and to part not knowing when they should be so happy as to meet again. The Princess of Bythnia Protested unto Intaphernes, never to be anyes if she were not his. And Atergatis being to loose his Advocate unto Istrina, desired him to press that Princess in his presence unto a Profession never to chase him from her heart. Istrina and Atergatis then made new Protestations of amity unto each other, as well as Intaphernes and Atergatis, so as they tyed themselves unto each other by such knots, as I am most confident are indissoluble. But, Madam, dep[ar]t he must, and indeed I parted with him, to come unto that place where Gadates had so long desired him; But hearing that Cumes was taken, and that you, Madam, were upon your March we changed our way, with intention to meet you upon the Rode.

In the mean time, as the Gods are the only disposers of all Events, so the Prince Intaphernes using to ride alone, that he might the better contemplate upon his Passion, he lost his way in a wild Forrest, having none with him but only one Page: For though I used to keep him company in such solitudes, yet I was not then with him, but stayed behind with one of his men, and telling him how extreamly affraid I was to meet with the King of Assyria, when we came to you. But whilst I was in fear that Intaphernes might meet with this Prince, the Gods who do not use to comply allwayes with the wills of men, but often mock at all humane Prudence, did conduct Intaphernes unto the banks of that little River, where the Assyrian King was taking the Aire, whilst you, Madam, was in the Temple; and staying in the pleasant place untill the hour of your setting out. I understand since by the Page which followed Intaphernes, and by Intaphernes himself, all the passages of this meeting: And since I understand by Martesia that you, Madam, do not know it, but desires infotmation, I shall acquaint you with the particulars; and if I should conceal an Action so gallant and noble, I should not make a perfect relation of Intaphernes his life. Be pleased to know then, Madam, that this Prince riding safely along the banks of this little River, hoping still to meet with us again, least he should be forced to arrive at a place where he thought you was, without any Train or Equipage; Love did so take up all the faculties of his Soul, that he scarcely knew what he did, or saw. On the other side, the King of Assyria who seemed as deep in contemplation as Intaphernes, though according to his naturall impetuosity he went as fast as if he had a great journey to go, he was also on the banks of this River, with one Page only; So as Intaphernes came towards the King of Assyria, as the King of Assyria came towards Intaphernes: who being both of them in deep studies, they passed so neer each other, that there Horses start[ling] at the same time made both of them think themselves assaulted; So that rowing out of their studies, and stopping their Horses, they looked sternly upon each other, to know who it was that assavlted them: and both knowing each other, the King of Assyria he thought that Intaphernes intended to all upon him, as Intaphernes thought that the King of Assyria intended to put a new affront upon him: So as both being high in anger, they first looked upon one another as men who had dispositions to quarrell. Yet Intaphernes gave him a Salute, but it was with so many signs of indignation, that his respects did not deminish the King of Assyria's fury: For as soon as Intaphernes had saluted him, he went two paces back, and began to speak in a haughty and proud tone: For ought I see (sayd he in a most scornfull manner) you are as insolent here, as you were ambitious in Babylon, and it seems also that you have been most unjust in Bythnia, in being so bold as to cause Arsamones to imprison me, purposely to make me marry one, whom I do not think worthy to be the slave of whom I adore. Oh Sir, (sayd Intaphernes) you extreamly wrong me, do not urge me against my will to forget I have seen you upon a Throne, least I should not brook it: For, Sir, hitherto I never failed in my due respects unto you; I was never more ambitious at Babylon then did become me, and was so far from forcing you to marry my Sister, that I must tell you, that she did more resist Arsamones, then you did, not being so base as ever to think of being Wife unto a Prince, who hath so much scorned her, and Page 79 wronged me. Therefore, Sir, I beseech you, with all the Reverence I owe unto you, as Son unto the Queen Nitocris, do not force me to cast of all those respects: I cannot tell what thou meaneest (replied the King of Assyria sharply) but I am sure I cannot brook the insolency of a Subject, whose duty is to reverence me as much in my Fetters as if I were upon the Throne. Upon these words the King of Assyria drawing his Sword he forced Intaphernes to draw his also, but it was only at first to defend himself from the King of Assyria's blows: And indeed, this generous Prince striving to overcome his resentments did recoil some paces in defending himself; and speaking again, in the name of the Gods, Sir, (sayd he unto him) do not urge me any further, for my patience can hold no longer: wish only that thy Valour may hold out (replied the King of Assyria, in pressing harder upon him) unless thou wilt feel the sharpness of mine. After this, Madam, Intaphernes being not able to endure any longer, he did not only fight in defence of his life, but also to revenge himself. And his Page told me of such Prodigies which he did, which are not to be conceived unless one had seen them. For indeed, Madam, though the King of Assyria had fought with the Illustrious Cyrus, and your self, Madam, had been the Prize of the Combate, yet this violent Prince could not have fought with more Courage. But as Intaphernes had all the sincerity of a most brave man, so he told all those unto whom he related the passage, that if the King of Assyria had stood any thing upon his Guard, he should have found a hard task to have vanquished him: and his modesty made him say, that if that valiant Prince had not precipitated himself unto his Armes, in striving to finish the Combate quickly, he had not been overcome. Indeed, Madam, the King of Assyria having wounded himself in striving to gain the Crupper, his Sword being broke, and he run through the right arme with a touch from his Enemy, his great heart was constrained to yeeld. Yet Intaphernes would not abuse his Victory, by insulting over his unfortunate Enemy, as unjust as he was. But on the contrary, he used many generous expressions; he asked him whether he would be pleased that he should conduct him, offering to hold him up, seeing he was not able to sit on horse-back: but this furious Prince would have only his Page to help him; he forbade Intaphernes to come neer him, and commanded him to retire. Since thou art still my Subject, though my Conqueror (sayd this violent Prince unto him) I command thee to get out of my Presence, for I cannot any longer endure a man who hath ruined all my hopes, subverted all my designs, and hath retarded either my death or my happiness. These ambiguous words which Intaphernes could not understand, moving him to think that his sorrows for being overcome did distract the liberty of his mind; he began to pity him, and offer again to help him, but he fell into such a Chafe, that Intaphernes seeing some Souldiers a far off coming that way, he was forced to retire.

In the mean time, in lieu of going unto the Castle where you, Madam, were, he returned back, being resolved not to present himself unto you, Madam, nor unto Cyrus, nor unto the Prince his Father untill you were on your march: Conceiving that the King of Assyria was in such a condition as he would not be able to follow. And indeed, Madam, this Prince having happily met with us, some four Furlongs from the place where he fought, we went to wait upon you, Madam, at the house where you stayed, and where the Prince Intaphernes had the honour to be presented unto you that night, by the Illustrious Cyrus.

Orcames having ended his Relation, Mandana thanked him for the pains which he had taken in satisfying her desires, and to testifie how attentive she had been, she repeated the principall passages which he had related: But since the last words of the Assyrian King had made some impression in the mind of Mandana, she asked Doralisa what she thought was the meaning of those words, that Intaphernes by vanquishing the King of Assyria, he had ruined all his hopes, subverted all his designs, and had retarded either his death or his happiness: For truly (added he) as the state of things stand, it is not easie to conceive what in any reason he could hope for, nor what designs he could have which might be advantageous unto him; Nor could he fear any death from a Rivall who released him, nor could he ever imagine any happiness from me: And yet it is to be supposed, that he spoke not these without some cause. I assure you, Madam, replied Doralisa, to be so brave, so glorious, so violent, and so deep in love as the King of Assyria is, and to be vanquished within a hundred Furlongs of his Rivall, and of his Mistress, is enough to make him not know what he sayd: and therefore Page 80 there is no need to be taken unto what he sayd. Whilst Doralisa was saying so, Martesia was silent, though since she knew of the engagement between those two Princes, she understood those words better then they: yet since the King of Assyria was to stay behind, and since in such a condition as was not to be feared, she seemed as if she did not understand them: And the Princess herself concurring with the opinion of Doralisa, did make no further reflection upon them, but went on with her repetition of the Adventures of Atergatis, Istrina, and Intaphernes. After which, all the rest of the Conversation was only of pleasant and diverting passages, of which the poor Berisa was the subject: For upon good examination of what Orcames had said, the Princess Mandana did conclude that there was no Court in the world without a Berisa, and sometimes many Berisa's: being sure she knew some at Themiscira and at Sinope. Doralisa for her part, she knew some at Sardis, Pherenice remembered many at Suta, and Orcames professed he knew above a dozen at Babylon. After all which, the Princess remembering how it was resolved to be stirring betimes in the morning, she dismissed Orcames and retired, preserving her fidelity so entirely for Cyrus, that she would not so much as call unto her memory, any thing she heard of the Assyrian King: but her mind being clear from all manner of Objects, she slept as quietly as one that had no manner of causes to fear any thing. ARTAMENES: Or The Grand CYRUS. THE EIGHTH PART, AND SECOND BOOKE.

WHILST the Princess Mandana's sleep was not troubled with with any affrighting Dreams; and whilst the huge multitude of Troops which conducted her, did rest themselves from the travells of the day, during the darke shades of night: Whilst sleep, I say, like Death doth equall Kings & Beggars happy and unhappy, and refresh all, Cyrus, Mazares, and Anaxaris could not submit unto one wink of sleep, but employed every minute in thoughts of Mandana. Not that Cyrus, as the state of things stood, was at all perplexed, but was all hopes and delights: yet those delights which proceeded from his hopes, were tempered with some perplexities, which interrupted his joyes: Not that his courageous soule was troubled at the Combate he was to have with the King of Assyria, before he enjoyed Mandana; but the truth is, he was so little accustomed to happiness, that he could not believe he was at the end of his misfortunes: so as not directly knowing what was the obstacle unto his satisfaction, his heart resented some resistance of those joyes which in reason he might hope for. But though the illustrious Cyrus was troubled with a pensiveness of which he was ignorant of the cause; yet it was not so with the Prince Mazares, who being alwayes to strive with himselfe, was every minute in feares, lest his vertue should be vanquished by his Love. Anaxaris was much more miserable then he; for his Passion was so violent and high, that his reason did absolutely submit unto its Empire: and it may be truly sayd that Mandana did not more sovereignly reign over the heart of Anaxaris, then the Passion of Anaxaris did tyrannically reign over his reason and vertue: Yet he was not so stark Page 82 blind, but he knew very well that a thousand reasons did invite him to be the friend of Cyrus, and not his Rivall: But for all that, when he saw it to be an absolute impossibility for him to leave loving Mandana, he thought himself justified, and believed that whatsoever his love inspired him with, were no Crimes. However, though he did never take so much paines as to strive with himself, yet was he far from being happy: For by abandoning his soule unto his passion, he knew very well, that considering the state of things, he abandoned himself unto all imaginable torments: however love Mandana he must, and ever would. But the oddest thing was, that still he hoped against all manner of reasons to hope; and though he knew very well, that his hope had no foundation. Yet to find some ease unto his sick soule, he endeavoured to make some intimate friend; not that upon second and serious thoughts he intended to trust him with his secret thoughts which he conceived not impartable unto any, but yet he would have one unto whom he might impart them if any need were; and in order unto that, he tampered and prepared the mind of Andramites. And since there is no surer way then to keep the secrets of others, before he trust any with his own, he did insensibly engage Andramites to unfold all his thoughts, and contracted such an intimate League of friendship with him, that a greater correspondency could not have been if they had been all their lives well acquainted with each other.

Anaxaris carryed the matter so handsomely, that by degrees he became Master of all the secrets in the soule of Andramites, without hazarding his own, or without giving Andramites any cause to suspect that hee had any which he ought not to impart unto him. But whilst Cyrus, Mazares, and Anaxaris had such different thoughts caused by one and the same passion, there was a strange curiosity in the minds of Mandana, Martesia, Chrisantes, and Feraulas, to know in what state was the King of Assyria. The Princess Mandana durst not enquire, but Martesia asked every one how he did.

On the other side, Mazares and Anaxaris did very carefully enquire of him especially the last of these, so as if this Prince had been an intimate friend unto all his Rivalls; The deliverer of Mandana, and the Protector of Martesia, Chrisantes and Feraulas, they could not have been more desirous to know the state of his wounds, then they were; but as inquisitive as they were, yet they could not know any more then what pleased Cyrus to impart; because those whom he left with the King of As[syria did give an accompt only to him: so that since Cyrus gave it out he was very ill, they knew no other.

In the mean time, this journey being a journey of jollity and victory, Cyrus did not only give order that Mandana should not be distasted at any thing, but contrived all way possible to please and divert her in her journey: so as if Mandana to rest her self in any Town, did stay a day there, the day was employed in seeing all that was remarkable in the place. The Ladies all assembled, they feasted, they danced, they had races, and Cyrus carried Mandana unto no places of his Conquest, but he presented the sweet fruits of his victories unto her, so that betwixt Cumes and Ecbatan, seemed to be but one continuall triumph. And the truth is, the people were so fully perswaded of the vertues in Cyrus, that nothing but universall acclamations were to be heard in all places where he came. Also he had an extraordinary care, that the march of his Troops should not do the least injury unto the Countrey: And it may be most truly sayd that he came unto no place during all this voyage, where hee had not signalized some one of his vertues: For in one Town, he had left testimonies of his humanity in cheering up the people; in another, he made his Justice to appeare, in punishing some insolent Souldiers; In a hundred places he had left glorious marks of his liberality, according as occasions presented themselves: And in what place soever he came, he was alwayes himself, which was, always incomparable.

As for Mandana, she gave severall testimonies of her Piety during this Journey, by re-edifying ruined Temples, and giving them new foundations according to the peoples Petitions: And it is most certain that Cyrus and Mandana passed not a day without some excellent work of goodness. The Prince Intaphernes was such an admirer of their vertues, that he could speak of nothing else, when he talked with the Prince Artamas, with Myrsiles, Mazares, Anaxaris, or any else. And there chanced one adventure which gave him further subject of talk: For Cyrus desiring that Mandana should go but a very little journey that day, by reason of convenient Lodging, she Page 83 came unto a place, which afforded Intaphernes a subject of Compassion, and to talk further of her vertue. Cyrus then having resolved that the Princess should lye in a little Town upon the Rode, not far from the place where she lodged before, it was so long before she set out, that she came as late to her Lodging, as if her journey had been longer, yet she came time enough to observe the extraordinary delighfull, and odd situation of this Village where she was to lye: She saw as she came unto it, that she was sometimes high and sometimes low, sometimes on a mountain, and sometimes in a valley, and between Rocks. Moreover she saw there an ancient and stately Castle standing upon the point of a Rock, whose prospect was towards a Forrest: over against it, she saw three great deep vallies, environed with Rocks, into which they descended by a winding path in the Rocks: And to make the place more pleasant and extraordinary, there was to be seen at the foot of a hill, and on the side of a Torrent, 2. stately Tombs, the one built after the Aegyptian, the other after the Grecian mode: So as the Sun setting that Evening without any cloudy umbrage, it might almost be said that the Sun-beams did guild the whole Countrey, and made it the more delectable.

This magnificent object did make a deep impression in the mind of Mandana, so as when she arrived at this great Castle where she was to lodge, she talked upon nothing else, enquiring very earnestly whose were those Tombs which she saw as she passed, and why one was built after the Aegyptian manner, and the other the Grecian. The questions you ask Madam (replied the Master of the Castle, whose name was Eucrates, a man well in years, of a good spirit, and much travelled) is questionlesse worthy of your curiosity; for the truth is, Love was a cause of their foundation as well as Death; it being most certain, that if he who caused them to be built had not been in Love, they had never adorned the Country about this Castle. The Princess Mandana hearing the old man say so, was fuller of curiosity then before: so as pressing him to tell her all he knew, he related unto her in few words, how a man of quality and high merits, called Menesteus, descended from the race of the first Phoenicians, who left Phocides to go and build Phoeus which the Prince Thrasibalus had taken, being resolved to travel after he had lost his Wife, who left him one Son and one Daughter, he came into Aegypt, where he fell desperately in love with a Lady of Heliopolis, whom he with her consent did carry away: That after this passing through Asia, he came unto this Castle, where this fair Aegyptian dyed within four dayes after he came thither, and from whence he would not depart, but built this stately Tomb after the mode of the Countrey; and since Menesteus would never forsake her who had followed his fortunes, and left her own Country for the love of him, he built his own Tomb near hers, which is also his house where he waits for death to finish his dayes.

How (said Mandana, and interrupted him) does he live yet, who caused these two Tombs to be built? and lives he in that which is built after the Grecian work? Yes Madam, replied he, but it is in such a manner as deserves compassion; It may be said, he lives dying, for he spends whole dayes in the Tomb of her he lost, and never comes in his own but at such howrs when sleep forces him to take truce with his sorrows: so as I assure you, Death and Love together did never make such an emblem of despair, as Menesteus. Yet one would say, that the Gods take delight in his sufferings, and lets him live, to pay an eternall tribute of sighes and tears unto his lost Lady; for he has already lived above eight years in this mournfull manner, and yet cannot dye. I wonder (said Mandana then) that since he is of so good a Quality, his friends and neighbours have not forced him to change his heartlesse habitation. I assure you Madam, replied Eucrates, that the illustrious Peranius his sonne (who should be Prince of Phoeus after him, if the Armies of the invincible Cyrus had not conquered his dominions) has done all he was able, to move Menesteus unto a change of his living, but could never perswade him: All he could obtain, was, to let two servants stay in a house next his Tomb, to bring him once a day only such things as were of absolute necessity.

At the name of Peranius, Cyrus who was then present, began to rub up his memory a little, and afterwards he began to speak; Is this Peranius you speak of (sayd he unto Eucrates) Nephew unto the Prince of Phoeus, whom I understand by Thrasibalus, to be one of the bravest men in the world? Yes Sir, replied he, it is the same Page 84 Peranius, a sisters son of the Phoecean Prince, who rather then submit, when the Prince his Uncle, and Alexidesmus forsook him, did perswade all the Inhabitants of his Town to leave their Countrey, to embarque and acknowledg him for their Head, and to go conquer others, rather then be the slaves of Thrasibalus, or to say better, yours Sir, since it was by your Armes that Prince did wage his Warre. To testifie, that he need not feare, replied Cyrus, that I shall load so brave a man as he with overheavy fetters, I will tomorrow visit the Prince his Father, to let him know, that he who honours the very Tombs of vertuous men, does honour the men themselves, though fortune have made them slaves. When Cyrus said so, and this old man heard Mandana say so also, he told them that they would augment his sorrows by their presence: adding also to keep them from going, that the way unto these Tombs was so rough by reason of the Rocks and a Torrent, that they could hardly passe: But when he saw that all would not dissuade them, he was silent and retired.

However, since Mandanas Chamber did open towards these Tombs, she was no sooner up, but these stately objects putting her in memory of her design, she was more earnest upon it: so that sending unto Cyrus to put him in mind of his last nights resolution, that Prince came and told that he was so mindfull of it, as he had already sent to see whether the way unto these Tombs were so difficult, and that he was told the way was so good, as she might go in her Coach, so that without more adoe she went: But Cyrus being a reverencer of Love wheresoever he found it, except in the hearts of his Rivals, he was so considerate of Menesteus, as that he would not too much disturb his solitude by too great a company; therefore he permitted only Malzares, Intaphernes, and Aglatidas to accompany him: And as for Mandana, she admitted only of Doralisa, Martesia, Anaxaris, and some few of her Guard.

This small company being conducted by Eucrates (though the night before he had no desire to be their Convoiy) they came to these Tombs, the one whereof was much more stately then the other. That which was built after the Grecian manner, was a most admirable structure, but had fewer ornaments then that which was after the Aegyptian, whose Architecture was very regular: Indeed, though the Pyramide of this Tomb was but of a mean greatnesse, yet for its beauty it was comparable unto the Pyramides of Memphis: Its form was triangular, and so excellently well wrought, that the best eyes could not see one joyn in the whole work. A thousand Curiosities of branched works did adorn the Fabrick, and one might perceive Hieroglyphique Characters, which expressed unto such as beheld, & could understand them, the beauty of the Person whom they represented, and the love of the Founder.

Upon the top of this Pyramide was a figure of that Corinthian Copper, which was no lesse prized in those times, then since the burning of the proud Town. So that this Statue did represent Fame, and turned upon a hinge according to the winds, one would have said, that it was set upon this Pyramide with a Trumper in its mouth, only to declare unto the world the death of that beauty for whom this Tomb was built; this Trumpet being made so artificially, that when the wind did blow, it sent forth a sad kind of sighing sound, full of sorrows. This Fame had her wings displayed as if she were ready to flye: The skirts of her Garment was waved by the wind, so as unbarring part of her thighes this gave a good grace unto the Statue, and seemed to be more loose from the point of the Pyramide, whose stately basis was the Tomb of that illustrious Beauty, whom this renowned Mourner did so lament.

As for that of Menesteus, it was built after the manner of a house, the Roof sustained by twelve Columns betwixt which upon the Frize, and under the Cornish these words were engraven in Greek characters,

Love and Death did build me.

When Cyrus and Mandana came near these Tombs, they saw Menesteus coming to meet them, being advertised of their coming by Eucrates; But he met them in an Ayre so sad and languishing, as made it apparant, that Time had not worn out the resentment of his losse, yet for all that he retained a high and noble presence: His Cloaths were mean, but handsom and fit: And this solitary mourner seemed rather a melancholy Philosopher, then a desperate Lover.

Page 85 As soon as he came so neare Cyrus (who led Mandana) as to be understood, I give thanks unto the Gods (said he unto him) that the beauty of that admirable Princess whom I see, hath taught the Conquerour of Asia to reverence the Tombs of those whom Love hath brought under his Dominions; and that in lieu of fearing the Ravages of a victorious Army, I am driven to the necessity of thanking the Conqueror for the favour he doth me in honouring the Ashes of a most illustrious person by his presence. My aims are, replied Cyrus, not only to honour the dead, but this Princess and I both: are come hither to honour an illustrious living person also, whom I wish I were able to perswade out of this solitary Tomb in which he inhabites. For my particular (added Mandana) I should be extremely joyed, if I were able to perswade you Sir unto some moderation in so violent and long a sorrow as yours is: Since you can never know the cause (replied Menesteus) I do not wonder Madam, you should not think my misery incurable. However I think my selfe most sensibly obliged unto your charitable generosity in wishing me capable of consolation. After this, Menesteus fearing lest the Sun should offend the Princess Mandana, did open a door which conducted into a most stately Gallery.

As soon as Mandana and Cyrus were entred into this Tomb, they were forced to say, that the love of him who built it was great and high: The truth is, this Tomb was so richly adorned, that a place destinied for the greatest Feasts could not be more magnificent: there was in the midst of it a Sepulchre of incorruptible wood, inlaid with gold in a most rich and inestimable manner; and to let it be known, that the Corps which was there interred had been the star of Beauty in Heliopolis, upon this Sepulchre was to be seen a Serpente represented by severall glistering Diamonds & Rubies, whose glorious colours made it seem the Sun it self when it was setting, and lending its light unto the other half of the world.

About this Sepulchre was placed twelve young Cupids excellently represented, who all with one of their hands seemed to wipe away their Tears, and with the other held up rich pots of Perfumes, no Garden full of Jessamon and Oranges comparable unto these which Art only composed. Moreover, there did hang in the top of the vault a hundred Christall Lamps, in such order and proportion, as did make appear between every pillar which sustained the Roof twelve stately seates, on which might be seen the statues of twelve women which seemed to weep and lament the loss of her for whom the Tomb was made; and which by their severall aspects and emblemes did represent some of her vertues for whom they mourned: The Engraver having given to every Statue such lively emblemes of each vertue, as the dullest capacity could not choose but know his meaning. Mandana could not choose but admire the excellency of the work, and confessed that there must needs be something that was high in the heart of so faithfull a Lover as Menesteus. As for Cyrus, after he had sufficiently admired at every thing that was worthy of wonder, he began to consider very seriously this mourning Lover, who as soon as he came into the Monument, was so wholly devoted to his sorrows, that without almost any regard either of Cyrus or Mandana, or any of their company, began to fixe his looks sadly upon the Sepulchre, sighing continually with unutterable bitterness of soule. The beauty of Mandana reliving in his mind the Idea of his lost Lady, did renew his melancholy: And Cyrus admiring the sorrows of Menesteus more then his Tomb, did look most attentively upon him: his violent affection unto Mandana did make him most sensible of such a losse as to lose her one loves so, as he had a disposition rather to commend the despair of Menesteus, then to blame him. But whilst Menesteus was sighing, and Cyrus was sadly looking upon him, Mandana went towards the Sepulchre to read some inscription which was written in golden Letters; and finding them to be Aegyptian Characters, she called Cyrus to interpret them: so that when that Prince came to her, he told her, how the love of Menesteus had caused those Letters to be written; but as he was going from one end of the Sepulchre unto the other, he found a very rich Table-book upon which was written in great Characters, and the Capadocian language, To the Princess Mandana.

Page 86 Cyrus no sooner saw this, but he blushed; for he no sooner looked upon the Characters, but he thought it to be the hand of the Pontean King: so as in the tumult of his mind he had certainly concealed it from Mandana, if that Princess seeing through his eyes the agitation of his soule, had not at the same time seen that which caused it: so as Cyrus perceiving by the Roses that blushed in the cheeks of Mandana, that she saw them as well as he, he presented them unto her. Since Madam, said he unto her, it is to you this Table-book is directed, therefore it belongs unto you; but whilst you are perusing it, I beseech you give me leave to ask Menesteus where he is at this present who writ this which I now present unto you.

The Princess Mandana being as much astonished as Cyrus, desired him to read it as well as she: so that opening it, they began to read it whilst Menesteus took no notice of them: but the truth is, it was not only his sorrows that hindered his observance: For since Doralisa could not think so long a solitude & sorrow could be without some distraction of spirit, she began to talk with him, and had engaged in discourse, the Prince Intaphernes and Aglatidas with Eucrates and Martefia: As for Mazares, this Tomb calling into his memory his solitary life which he led in a Grott when he thought Mandana dead, he was taken up enough with his own thoughts, without discourse with others. And for Anaxaris, his thoughts were as much busied as Mazares: so that Cyrus and Mandana reading the King of Pontus his Letter, they found these words.

MADAM,

IT is too much, extreemly too much, to pursue me even to a very Tomb, and to drive me from a Sanctuary, which all Lawes both divine and humane would have inviolable: but since it is your pleasure, it must be so; Could I have hoped to have seen you here without that happy Rivall in your company, I should have stayed here and assumed the glory to express my sorrows and my love. But since it is enough for you to triumph in my heart without him, I must shun you, that I may shun him, since it is not possible for me to do otherwise, though I owe him both my life and my liberty. Yet I doe conjure him (if it be lawfull to entreat a Rivall, and if I may do it with due reverence to you) not to expose himself unto any pitty, if you be not capable of any; Considering that after I have lost two Kingdomes for the love of you only, yet you drive me from a Tomb where I intended to inhabite with the most faithfull Lover in the world. I beseech you Madam, oblige my Rivall neither to follow me, nor to search for me; and the better to induce him, put him in memory, that if I had not had the good fortune to save you from the enraged waves, he had never had the glory to be at this day favourably looked upon: But alas my sorrows make me wander; for after all the rigour, I thinke it had been better for me to have writ unto my Rivall to obtaine a favour from you, then to have writ unto you to obtain any thing from him; However it be Madam, though you should cause me to be searched for, to wait upon the Chariot of my Enemy, yet you should be frustrated, since whosoever is Master of his sword, is also Master of his life and liberty. I aske nothing else of you Madam, but only to believe, that if I do live, it is not in any intentions to comfort my selfe, or to leave loving you: For I doe protest, that as long as I do live, I shall maintayn against all my Rivalls, that there is not one of them which loves you with more zeale and reverence then I doe, as rigorous and inexorable as you are unto me.

The King of Pontus.

Page 87 After the reading of this Letter, which was so sad as deserved to be read without any anger; Cyrus scarcely daring to look upon Mandana, least he should see some compassion in her eyes, he spoke the first. To spare my sorrows Madam (sayd he unto her) that you should aske me a favour for such a Rivall as the King of Pontus, I will prevent your asking, and tell you that as the state of things do stand, I freely consent that a King who hath had the misfortune to loose two Kingdoms, and you also, shall not be so miserable as fall into the power of his Enemy, an Enemy unto whom he thinks himself a little obliged: Yet Madam, I must needs ask you leave to enquire of Menesteus how the Prince came hither? Though I should not for your sake (replyed Mandana) yet for my own, I desire you to aske him: Since I assure you, the adventure doth augment both my curiosity and trouble; For when I consider how it was near the Tomb of Abradates that you met the King of Assyria: And that you were very neer meeting with the King of Pontus in the Tomb of this fair Aegyptian, I do almost believe I shall find persecutors in Ecbatan, when I am there: so they have no greater power to hurt you Madam (replyed Cyrus) then the King of Pontus hath, you need not feare their violence.

After this Mandana went to Menesteus, unto whom she shewed the Letter which Cyrus found upon the Sepulchre, and asked him where he was which did write it, and whether he knew him well? Menesteus was at first surprized to see this Letter, which he knew to be upon the Monument; but coming presently ont of his astonishment, and being not determined what to answer; I assure you Madam, replyed he, I thought him who left this Letter in this Tomb, to be one of the most sadd, the most noble, and the most vertuous men in the world. But Madam, aske me no more, for I neither know his quality, nor the cause of his sadness, nor where he is at this present; And though I did know, yet I think when you know how he made me promise not to discover him, you are so generous as to press me no further: Cyrus perceiving by the speeches of Menesteus, that he apprehended no design of any violence for giving harbor, did engage his word, that though he whom he had harbored were now in the Tomb, yet there should no hurt be done unto him: So as Eucrates hearing what Cyllrus sayd, came neerer, and not staying for the answer of Menesteus, Sir (sayd he unto him) Since it was my self who made this illustrious Stranger known unto Menesteus, so I thing it fit, it should be my selfe who should tell you all I know, which yet will satisfie you little more, then what he hath already told you. For truly, Sir, all I can tell you of him whose name I know not, is this, that about eight dayes since, according to the Laws of hospitality which are inviolably observed in this Country, he came unto this Castle, which hath the honour to lodge you at this present, and demanded of me entertainment; for being then very ill, as still he is, he found himself unable to continue his journey: he had with him only one man, which seemed more like a common Souldier, then any Gentleman, and he seemed to me to be so sad, that I joyfully consented unto his desire, giving thanks unto the Gods for an occasion of assisting a man so handsom as he, and who seemed so extreemly grieved. So that lodging him as conveniently as I could, he looked out of his window, and seeing these two Tombs, he asked me whose they were? And I think he was inquisitive of nothing else, and I beleive this sad Object did suite with his melancholy humour; So as I acquainted him with the retreat of Menesteus, and the solitary life that he led: he was so much taken with the story, that though he was so weak as hardly able to sustain himself, yet he would needs have me carry him thither, and so I did. And after this time, he went thither every day: for though Menesteus was used to avoid all company, yet the melancholy of this stranger admitted him sooner then any other: and Menesteus was so taken with him, that he desired his visits every day as long as he stayed with me. But when news was brought yesterday, that I should have the honour to receive you, Sir, into my house, he appeared to be extreemly troubled, and prepared for his departure the very same hour, though he was in a most unfit condition for it. However, I beleive his apprehensions of your coming hither was the true cause why two wounds which he sayd he had received in the Wars, and which he thought almost healed, did open again: So that then it being impossible for him to go far by reason of the blood which he lost, and resolving not to stay in a place where you Sir, were to come, I advised him to hide himself in this Tomb, not foreseeing your curiosity of seeing Page 88 it: And indeed he took my counsell, staying here untill yesterday at Evening, when I acquainted Menesteus with your resolutions of coming hither, and it must be he who can tell you better then I, how he received the news. It is then you (sayd Cyrus unto Menesteus) who must better inform us, and tell us why he of whom we speak, did fear my coming hither. Sir, replyed Menesteus, he told Eucrates as well as me, that he being engaged in the contrary part unto yours, he would not expose himself unto the danger of being your slave, and he sayd it with so much sadness his face, that I am confident being so generous as you are, you would not have in chained him, if you had seen him in the same condition I did, though he had been your most mortall Enemy. As soon as he heard that the Princess Mandana was to come hither, and you also; he told me that he must be gone, as soon as ever the Moon which then shined, was set, that he might pass unseen: And seeming as if he would rest two hours, purposely to have time to write this Letter, he desired my favour to pass away his time in the Tomb, thinking it as he sayd to be more safe then any other; And so causing his Servant to carry some Cushions for his better case, I left him there untill the hour he sayd he would depart: And he being told that the Moon was set, he prepared for his departure, not speaking a word of the Letter which he left. But truly, Sir, he departed in such a deplorable condition, that I then knew his flight had a more urgent cause then he told me: for though his wounds began to bleed afresh, yet be gone he would, maugre all my desires to the contrary, assuring him that I would find a way to hide him so in the Tomb as he should not be discovered when I saw his resolute intention, I pressed him to tell me the reason of his hast, and he told me with a sighing embrace, that the very same Passion which kept me in the Tomb caused him to go out, and prayed me to think that if I knew his misery, I should say he were the most unfortunate man in the world. After this, Sir, he took horse in extream pain, and without any followers but this one man which waited upon him; he took along the Torrent Mauge the darkness of the night, and the weakness of his condition: So as in all likelihood, he is either fallen into the Torrent, or wandered in the wild Forrest, or dead of his wounds and sorrows: Whilst Menesteus was saying so, Mandana held down her eyes, as being the innocent cause of the miseries of this Prince, she could not chuse but pitty him, who had been as virtuous a man as any lived, had he not loved her too well, or had not his Passion confounded his Reason. Cyrus himself though his Rivall, was moved unto pitty, and doubtless had been more, had he not observed the Compassion of Mandana: yet he kept himself within the prescribed limits of his intention, notwithstanding the contrary gusts of his heart: So then conceiving that if he should give orders to follow the King of Pontus, he should have him in his power; he would not out of his generosity do it; and indeed because he thought Mandana would blame him, and also because he had promised Araminta to wave his revenge for her sake: So that addressing himself unto Menesteus, though the King of Pontus whom you harbored (sayd he unto him) be one of the Princess Mandana's Persecutors, and one of my greatest Enemies in being my Rivall; yet I must commend you for your assistance, and assure you to make your reception of him his Sanctuary, I will not suffer him to be followed. Indeed (added Mandana with as much sweetness as generosity) I do conceive that revenge of Crimes ought to be left only unto the Gods, and not execute it upon any Enemy that cannot hurt.

In the mean time, as the astonishment of Menesteus and Eucrates was great to hear that it was the King of Pontus whom they had assisted; so the wonder of Mazares and Anaxaris was greater, and that of Intaphernes, Aglatidas, Doralisa, and Martesia, was no less. Yet the wonder did produce different effects in the minds of Mazares and Anaxaris: for the first considering that if he had not carried away Mandana from Synope, the King of Pontus had never been reduced unto this pitifull condition, he became extreemly melancholy, conceiving that the Princess Mandana could not call to mind the King of Pontus his Adventure, but she must needs also revive in her memory those fallacies which the excess of his Passion caused, and must in her heart accuse him for it. But for Anaxaris: he had one of the oddest Conceptes that ever love infused into any mind: for though he hoped that the King of Pontus might perhaps dye of his wounds, when he escaped out of Cumes in a Fishers Boat, yet now he was joyed to see that Cyrus had more Rivals living then he thought of: So as never considering that the King of Pontus could not be the Rivall of Cyrus, unless he were Page 89 his also; he thought only that as miserable as he was, that he would be an Obstacle unto the happiness of Cyrus: So as if he was sad at this Accident, it was only to imagine that perhaps he would dye by his own hasty flight. As for Intaphernes though he had closely adhered unto Arsamones against the King of Pontus, yet he could not chuse but infinitely commend Cyrus and Mandana, for their generosity in not following this unfortunate King. However since this Accident was very strange, it caused the discourse to continue so long, that before Mandana and Cyrus had seen the second Tomb, and had talked with this solitary Mourner, of his love and sorrows, before they had got to the Castle and had dined, it was so late that they resolved to spend all the rest of the day in that place, and not to depart until the morning. But whilst Cyrus was busie in giving out severall Orders for the March of his Troops, and the way he would have them hold when they came neer Cappadocia, Mandana called Martesia into a little Closet, and began to talk of this adventure: Certainly Martesia (sayd she unto her) I am designed for strange things; may it not well be sayd, that the Gods have taken from me the power and comfort of hating all those who wrong me, and deprived me of the pleasure of sweet revenge? If reflection be had upon past things, you will see that I have reason for what I say. If I look upon the King of Assyria, Mazares and the King of Pontus, as Princes who have ravished me away, and caused all the miseries of my life, have I not the greatest reason in the world to hate them, and be revenged; and yet the Gods do send such intelligence of them, as must needs abate my hate, and will not let me wish their Ruine. What strong testimonies have I of the grief and repentance of Mazares when he thought me dead? hath not Orcames fully informed me of the Assyrian Kings most violent affection to me? and hath not Menesteus sufficiently told me the very heart of that Prince unto whom I as well as Cyrus are Debtors for our lives, and whom I have cost two Kingdoms? Really Martesia, I could not imagine that ever three Princes should be so unjust as to ravish me away and yet be ever worthy of my pity. The strangest thing, Madam, replied Martesia, and the most glorious for you, is, that all these Princes do merit to enjoy you, if they had not made themselves unworthy of it, by their unjust carrying you away; And if the Gods had not sent a Prince who alone hath higher parts then they all have, and who adores you with such a reverent Passion, as never gave you the least cause of complaint.

The truth is, replied Mandana, I should be very ungrateful, and by consequence very unjust, if I did not rank Cyrus in my highest esteem and friendship, and if I did not think my self very happy in Raingning over the heart of such a man whom the Gods have thought worthy to Raign over all Asia. As the Princess pronounced these words, Cyrus having dispatched all his orders, entred into the place where she was, and as soon as ever she saw him, she blushed, as if she were afraid he had over-heard her. Cyrus perceiving it, did bethink himself what might be the cause of that carnation in Mandana's Complexion: for as the Actions of persons loved are never indifferent; so he was something troubled at this alteration in the Countenance of that Princess whom he adored: Though, Madam, sayd he unto her, that sweet blush seemed to give a fresh Lustre unto your beauty, yet I could not chuse but be troubled at it, out of my fear least I was the cause of it, by interrupting you uncivilly; I could perhaps, if I would (replied Mandana with a smile, and blushed more) consent unto half you say without disobliging you: but since your unjust suspicion of interrupting me uncivilly, deserves a punishment, you shall know no further. Did you but know, Madam, replied Cyrus, what punishment it is for a Lover to be ignorant of what passeth in the heart of her he adores when he has a desire of it, doubtless you would say, your Punishment exceeds my Crime: though indeed I must confess my weakness, and assure you, Madam, that I would do almost any thing in the world to know the cause of your blush. I know very well, that this fond Curiosity is one of those follies wherewith the Passion which possesseth me is upbraided: but yet for all that, I find it to be well grounded. Indeed (pursued he and smiled) since it is the permittable in War to have Spyes in the place which one would take, it is as well allowable to have some in the heart which one would Conquer, and so hold intelligence: Since Spyes are only imployed (replied Mandana) to know what passeth amongst Enemies; you stand in need of none to know what passeth in my heart: for there is no War declared Page 90 betwixt us. However, I assure you, Madam (replied Cyrus) that sometimes one may as much long to know the thoughts of her he adores, as to know the designs of his Enemies: and for my particular, I had rather have a faithfull Spy in your heart, then have a hundred with the King of Assyria, or the King of Pontus, though they were Masters of Babylon or Sardis. Yet, Madam, I beseech you do not think that this my Curiosity hath any smack of Jealousie, nor that I am one of those Lovers, who are extreemly inquisitive for what they would not find: But, Madam, the reason of it is (since I must confess it) because there is a notable difference between thoughts of esteem which are expressed by obliging Language, and hidden thoughts which are concealed almost from the parties themselves, and which others can know only but by guesses. Think it not strange then, Madam, that though I am not so impudent as to think you have any advantageous thoughts of me which you would not honour me with the Participation, yet I cannot chuse but desire that I were able to dive into the secrets of your heart I must needs desire to have a sight of all the Virtues together, and wish your heart were open, that I should know all your thoughts, & all your desires. To satisfie one part of your Curiosity (replied Mandana to divert the discourse) I must tell you, that I have a strange desire to know all the thoughts of Menesteus, since this eight years that he hath lived in the Tomb of this fair one whom he loved and lost. Oh, Madam, sayd Cyrus, by seeming to satisfie my Curiosity, you rather ayme at your own, and not my satisfaction: But it is not my part to prescribe Laws unto you, therefore since it is not yo <...> pleasure, I should be more scrutinous into your Soul: and since you had rather I could talk of Menesteus, then of you or my self, I shall tell you that I cannot easily conceive all his eight years thoughts, for love and sorrow are two inexhaustible gulfs of thoughts, if I may so express that bottomless Abyss in the mind of a grieved Lover, and which wholly possesseth him as long as his love and grief lastes: But the greater wonder is, how he hath lived so long, after the death of her he adored. For really Madam, without any aggravation of my sorlrows at Synope, when I had cause to fear your being drown'd, I can truly protest, that I had not one day more to live, when I heard you were living: I am much obliged to you, Sir, replied Mandana for your engaging sorrows, though I will not beleive it to be so violent as you express, least you should upbraid me with ingratitude: yet truly I must confess, that the most sensible sorrow of all sorrows is the death of the Party loved; and I am so fully perswaded of this truth, that as oft as I imagine that there is an absolute necessity I must one day hear of the death of persons whom I love, or they hear of mine, I am so melancholy as I hardly know my self. Oh, Madam, (cryed out Cyrus) what a dismall image do you make to pass out of your Spirit into mine? I ask you pardon, Sir, replied she; but yet I think you are obliged to concur with me: for since I cannot think without a sad remembrance that you must one day hear of my death, or I of yours, methinks it is a mark of amity which merits a pardon for my sad discourse: your expressions, Madam, are so obliging, replied Cyrus, that I owe you a tribute of a thousand thanks: but for all that, Madam, I beleive I shall scarcely pardon you this day, for infusing into me such apprehensions of your death.

As soon as Cyrus had pronounced these words, Eucrates came to acquaint him that there was a man of Quality from Phoeus, whose name was Thrymetus, whom the Son of Menesteus had sent unto his Father, who desired to speak with him, and who arrived immediately after he was come out of the Tomb: Adding, that he was accompanied with two strangers, unknown either by their Habits or Language. Since Mandana conceived that this man could have no business with Cyrus which her presence might hinder, she desired that Prince, that Thrymetus might have audience before her, which Cyrus accordingly commanded: and Eucrates obeying, Thrimetus with his two strange Companions was brought into Mandana's Chamber, who with Cyrus saluted them, Thrymetus having a Letter (which was only of Credence) to present, he uttered these words; Sir, (sayd he unto him in Greeek) I am sent unto you from a Prince, whose good or bad fortunes you have power to make: but since he hath been so unhappy as to be engaged in a Party opposite unto yours, and constrained to preserve his liberty by abandoning 'his Country unto your Victorious Armes, and to have recourse unto flight; I cannot tell, Sir, whether his hopes of reception be well grounded: but I am most certain that the Prince Menesteus his Fa'ther, Page 91 unto whom I came upon a message, is so charmed with your generosity, that he makes no doubt but that I shall obtain my demands. To testifie, replied Cyrus, that I have a great disposition to grant any thing unto a Prince of his merit who sent you; I will not assume the Right of Conquerors, which nere allows their vanquished Ene|emies the names of those Countries which are conquered from them. But on the contrary, though Peraneus was never yet called the Prince of Phoeus, because he who left him that Title did not perish until since his departure, yet I will be the first that will call him so, and intreat you to name him no otherwise; for since the Prince Thra|sibalus hath given once such noble Characters of his Virtue and Valour, I am resolved to treat him as favourably as I have done others, who merits it no more then he. Oh Sir, reilyed Thrymetus, I ask no more, for since you are pleased to acknowledge Peraneus in the presence of these strangers, to be a Prince, and the Prince of Phoe|ns you have granted as much as I had in Commission to ask: and you have made him the most happy Prince upon Earth, if I may phrase a man so, who hath not the glory to be particularly known unto the greatest Prince in the World. Since the expressions of Thrymetus did surprize both Cyrus and Mandana; and since they observed much joy in the face of one stranger, and much sorrow in the eyes of the other, they were full of Curiosity to know the cause of this adventure: So as Mandana speaking Greek as elegantly as her naturall Language, she very obligingly asked Thrymetus the interpretation of it, and the true cause of his Voyage. Cyrus also desired to know where the Prince of Phoeus was, desiring to be informed of all his Actions since he was chosen chief of that fugitive Troop. Also he asked who those strangers were whom by their habits he knew not, what interest they had in the Prince of Pholceus? and how it was possible, that three or four advantageous words which he had spoken in his behalf, should make him happy? The Questions which you ask, Sir, replied Thrymetus, are not to be answered in few words, no more then those the Prin|cess Mandana was pleased to enquire of: But, Sir, though you should have the goodnes and the leasure to lend an eare unto so extraordinary an adventure, as that of the Phoecean Prince (since you are pleased I should give him his right name) yet, Sir, before I tell it, I must beg one Favour my self, which is, that you would be pleased, Sir, to employ your perswasions and Authority upon the Prince Menesteus, that he would quit the Tomb wherin he dwels, and go into a place where you would establish a new Dominion upon the Prince his Son. The more you speak, replied Cyrus, the less I understand you, and the more inquisitive I am: And therefore since I know the Prin|cess to be as full of Curiosity as my self, I do declare unto you, that I will not grant any thing, unless you will tell her the life of that Prince who sent you. But since it would be perhaps unjust to oblige you unto a long Narration before you have rested your self, I shall intreat Evcrates to have a care of you & those in your company, & to bring you hither in the Evening, that the Princess may have the pleasure to hear you, if you do not deny her. It so much concerns the Prince who sent me, replied Thrylmetus, that you should not deny the Favour which I ask; that I should do very ill service, if I should not relate an adventure which is infinitely glorious unto him: Therefore, Sir, I will obey when you shall please to command.

After this, and many obliging passages from Cyrus, and Mandana, he and the two strangers retired, who one might perceive did perfectly understand what was spoken, but were not so versed in Greek, as to speak it before a Prince and Princess who understood it so admirably well. As Thrymetus went out of Mandana's Chamber, Malzares, Myrsyles, Artamas, Andramites, and many others entred, who extreemly wondering at the uncouth habits of these strangers, asked Cyrus who they were? For my part (sayd Artamas, after Cyrus sayd he knew them not) I had thought that your Valour had set Confines to your Conquests, because it could find no more to Conquer: but yet I see there are people which the Conquer or of Asia knows not. Since we fought only (replied Cyrus modestly) for the liberty of the Princess, we have set Confines to our Conquests in delivering her, unless we should do justice un|to her merits, and make her Queen of all the world, or unless she have a desire to make new Subjects of these strangers whom we know not. I assure you, Sir, replied Mandana, that though I think you worthy to be Master of all the world, and think you able to Conquer it, yet, Sir, your life, and the lives of so many great Princes who have assisted you in your Conquests, are so dear unto me, that if you never make any Page 92 War but to satisfie my Ambition, you shal sheath all your Swords in perpetual peace. Whilst Mandana was speaking thus, Doralisa and Pherenice who had met with Martesia, and who were talking with Andramites in the corner of the Chamber which was not large, they heard what Cyrus and Mandana sayd: and Doralisa finding a kind of barbarisme in the Aire of these strangers, she told Andramites who came to her, that the Princess had good reason not to desire the Conquest of such Subjects: After which, she began to make such pleasant descriptions of the Aires, Garbs, Po|stures, Reverence, and habits of these two men, that though there was some injustice in her fine Raillery, yet those who heard could not chuse but be much delighted: insomuch as Martesia Pherenice and Andramites, laughed heartily: But the rarest part of the accident was, that Mandana who had a marvellous peircing wit, did guess the truth, and imagined that Doralisa had found a subject of Diversion in these stran|gers, though they were very magnificent and handsom: And therefore desiring to give a testimony of her goodness, and find such a subject of discourse as might put off those Applaudes which they began to give her, she told her thoughts unto Cyrus and Myr|siles, who being alwayes glad of any occasion to hear Doralisa speak, beseeched the Princess with a smile, to correct her Injustice: So that Mandana being willing to please Myrsiles, she went to Doralisa: were not you Doralisa making some fine des|criptions of the two strangers (sayd she) when you talked unto Pherenice Martesia & Andramites, and caused them to laugh so loud? I assure you, Madam, answered she, I deserve no great Comends for so easily moving their mirth, for it was such good sport to see these strangers, that the very remembrance of them is enough to move laughter; Really Doralisa, replied Mandana, you are a strange woman, for since they spoke not, since they are very magnificent, and since they are handsom enough, you cannot upbraid them with the fashion of their habits, and Garb which is different from those you see every day: so as doubtless they think you as different from the Ladies they use to see, as you think them different from the men you see, and as amiable as you are, perhaps they think of you, what you think of them. I assure you, Madam, replied she, and laughed, if I make them as merry as they make me, we are much beholding to each other. Fye, Doralisa sayd Cyrus, and smiled, your speeches do make me exceedingly affraid: for I being a Persian born, and you a Sardinian, I fear that the first time you saw me, I seemed as great a stranger to you as these; therefore I conjure you to tell me seriously, how I seem now your eyes are accustomed to see me? Oh Sir, (replied she with her natural and sprightly vivacity) such Conquerors as you, are strangers no where: And I may well say you are the same at Persipolis that you are at Babylon, at Sardis, at Ecbatan, at Artaxates, at Susa; at Themiscira, and at Cumes: So as I assure you, all the world is your Country, and you a stranger no where. Indulgency to strangers (replied Mandana and smiled) is a duty; and if I should humour my own inclination, I would excuse them all: yet since you are such a pleasant Critick to observe so subtly the faults of others, I must confine you unto your own Country and acquaintance. But as for these strangers, who are so ridiculous to you, I do intend to take them into my Protection, and tell you further that if any Ethiopians, Indians, or Scythians come to Ecbatan, when I am there. I will defend them against you, for I must confess I cannot indure this kind of Injustice, though it be almost universall. But, Madam, I beseech you with all due reverence, replied Doralisa, give me leave to justifie my self, and examine the matter a little: with all my heart (sayd Mandana) though I am confident you will have much ado with all your wit to prove it no inhumanity to jeer a stranger, merely because he is a stranger. For my part, sayd Cyrus, I am cleerly of opinion with the Princess. That opinion is so just (sayd Mazares) as I cannot think it will admit of any argument: If I should speak without interest (sayd the Prince Myrsiles, and looked upon Mazares) doubtless I should concur with you in the opinion of the Princess: But since I am no stranger unto Doralisa, I do so much fear that if she be induced to make peace with strangers, then she will declare War with me, as I dare not declare my self against her in this business. For my part (sayd Artamas) my reason is contrary unto yours, since I am not of Doralisa's Country: yet I must adhere unto the opinion of the Princess by interest, though the same reason were not, since justice and goodness are on her side. For ought I see (replied Doralisa undantedly) you have brought me to that pass as I cannot but come off in this dispute with honour; for there are so many Illustrious Page_93 persons against me, that though I be vanquished, yet I need not be ashamed: and if I be not, then I shall have more glory then ever any had; since never any did overcome some of those whom I shall vanquish. But yet (sayd Mandana) what can you say to excuse your self of that injustice wherof you are accused? have not every Nation, every Kingdom their particular Customs? nay, has not every Province, every Town their different Fashions? either in their Habits or in their Civilities; there Graces of body, & all those trifling exterior things which reach only the eyes, but not at all the Soul and mind. I do confess it, Madam, replied Doralisa, but I confess withall, that it is this difference which diverts me by its odness, without any injustice to the stranger; for I give him the same liberty which I take my self, and not caring what he thinks of me, I think of him what I please. But Doralisa you think not right, replied Mandana, if you blame him because he is habited after the mode of his Country, as you are after yours; I do not blame him in particular, replied Doralisa, but I blame all his Nation in generall: Then are you the more unjust (replied Cyrus, and laugh[ed]) to scold at three or four hundred thousand men at once, because one or two of them only does not please you: Furthermore (added Mandana) it is unreasonable to desire that an Aegyptian should be a Persian, when he is at Persipolis; or that a Persian should be an Aegyptian at Memphis, so that changing himself in every Town he comes in, he would make himself called that Creature which assumeth severall Colours as he changeth his Aire: For so Doralisa doubtless must be. All I require in a stranger, Madam, replied she, is to conform himself as much as he can unto the Customs of that Country where he is, and that he do not amaze all eyes by his odd Garments, unless at some stately entrance amongst a great Company. I would have him also, to speak very little, unless he be assured to speak well: I would have him also contented with seeming Liberrall and Magnificent, without pretending unto any Politeness or Gallantry; since they are things of fashion and use, and have their particular decency in every Nation, which a stranger is often absurd in, out of his own Country: But above all things I would have him leave me so much liberty as to laugh harmlesly at all he sayes or does which is against my mind. For truly, Madam, if he will not allow me that liberty, I shall not let him take it; and I do the more desire this freedom, because I should use it without offence: for there is a great difference between Raillery upon a man of ones own Country, and Raillery upon a stranger; provided it extend only to such things as are particular unto his Nation: since the first of these proceeds from malice, and those who divert themselves at that rate do seldom purchase any esteem unto themselves: But, Madam, as for the other, I profess that my laughing at a stranger does not proceed from any malice of heart: And though these two men I saw this day, did much divert me, yet I do verily believe they may be very compleat men, and Gallants in their own Country: So that taxing neither their wits, nor their honesties, nor courages; I do conceive my self not so culpable as you make me: And truly, Madam, if the nature of my laughing at such things be well examined, it will be found nothing so malicious as to laugh (as most of the world do) when a horse throws his Rider, or when ones head is broken: for it argues much more malignity to laugh at such things as do hurt, and is a greater spite unto those upon whom they happen; then to laugh and be merry, as I am, at a fantastical and uncouth Habit: at an out-of-fashion Conge, or a word ill pronounced: yet Madam, you know how ordinary and unhumane it is to laugh at such sad accidents; and as wise, as pitifull as you are, I cannot tel whether you have not been sometimes moved to smile at such an accident. Doralisa spoke this in such a jolly manner, that Mandana and all the Company could not chuse but laugh, and confess withall, that she deserved the liberty of laughing, not only at all strangers, but also at all she knew; and to testifie unto you (sayd Cyrus unto her) that I think what I speak, I give you a free right, to play upon me when you please, and to be merry at my expences when you find any occasion. Should I never divert my self, replied she, but when you give me occasion, I should live a most wearisome life: But, Sir, added she, and laughed, since you are out of your goodness, pleased to let me laugh at these two strangers, I desire no more this eight dayes: yet for all this, all the Company concurred, that it was very unjust, not to be very kind unto strangers, or to take the Fashions of their Countries for incivilities, or arguments of defect in spirit: And all concluded with one voice, that as a man may be but very meanly accomplished, though he be most Page_94 compleat in his Habit, though he have the fashionable Cringe, and Garb of his Country; and though he have the Court tone to a title: So also it may very well be, that a stranger who has none of these Qualities, yet may merit much Esteem and Comendations, though his Cloathes be odd, though Carriage bad, and his Tone worse: And so we must ever be civill unto strangers, and search for their Qualities either good or bad, in their minds and souls: that is the only way to judge of them aright. After this, Discourse began to change Subject, and much Company coming in, it lasted untill Supper-time; Then all the crowd of Princes and Gallants followed Cyrus, and left the Princess Mandana to Sup in private: But as soon as that Prince knew she was risen from the Table, he took Thymetus who supped with him, as well as his two strange Companions, and claimed promise of him, and carried him to Mandana's Chamber, leaving those who came with him in the company of Eucrates; because Thymetus acquainted Cyrus that he had many things to tell, which he would not have one of those strangers to hear. After which, they went unto Mandana's Chamber, and found her prepared with all necessary Curiosity, to give attention unto the relation which Thymetus was to make. Since Cyrus knew well, that one does not love to make a long Narration before much Company, he brought none with him to Mandana's Chamber: so as Doralisa, Martesia, Anaxaris, Cyrus, and Mandana were all the Auditors of Thymetus his Relation, which began in these Termes.

THE HISTORY OF PERANIVS PRINCE OF PHOCEUS; AND Of the Princess CLEONISBE.

SINCE it doth extreemly import the Prince of whom I am to speak, that you should have a perfect knowledge of all his Excellent Qualities, I ask your permission, Madam, as well as that invincible Prince who hears me, to make you acquainted with him, whose Adventures you desire to know. And as to his Glory, I am to relate unto you some of his Heroick Acts, so I must betray some of his Virtues, that all the rest may the better appeare unto you; for without any touch upon his modesty, I shall tell you of his great Courage, Spirit, Generosity, honesty, and all other excellent Qualities of his Soule and body: I shall tell you then, Madam, that the Prince of Phoceus is worthy to be descended from that Renowned Grecian, who raising a Collonie of Gallant men in Phocides, passed into Asia, and there founded the Town of Phoceus, which all his Posterity have peaceably enjoyed, and in great Glory untill the Victorious Armes of Cyrus did subject it, and chase out a Prince, Uncle unto him of whom I speak, whose unjust violence made him unworthy of such a Nepew. But, Madam, without searching amongst the Phocen[sians] for matter of Comendations unto this Illustrious Prince of whom I am to treat; give me leave to tell you, that he was born with all high and noble Qualities: And Page_95 that I am most confident, all Greece which furnished the world with so many great men, never had a soule more herioque then his. Since he had a Father, adorned with all excellent endowments, this Father was infinitely indulgent in the education of his sonne; and not contenting himselfe with what Phoceus could afford, he sent him to Athens, there to be instructed in all requisite Arts befitting his quality, and disposition, which was even from his Cradle martiall, and apt for high things: And he made choise of Athens rather then Phoceus, because hee had no minde to quit his Tomb wherein he lives.

It was then at Athens Madam, where hee was instructed in all the excellencies his age was capable of, yet he would not in that place study the military Art, before hee could put it into practice: Always affirming that the theologie of War was nothing, and that precepts without practice would not profit him: Indeed he became a Souldier at fifteen years of age, and did so highly signalize himselfe, that his reputation made the bravest men jealous of him, even at a time when he might be thought a young Scholler in the school of Mars. I shall not make any exact relation Madam, of all his Acts in severall Wars, from his fifteenth yeare untill his four and twentieth; for as on the one side it is not very necessary, so on the other, I might perhaps make you question the truth of my words, by the multitude of Heroique actions which that Prince hath performed. Nor will I do, like those who commending only in a generall way, do make it suspicious that they have nothing to say in particular.

But to take the medium between these two extreames, and to acquaint you with the martiall inclination of the Phocean Prince, even in his greenest years, I must tell you how he made his first step into the Field, that you may thereby judg of his courage. Give me therefore leave Madam to tell you, that he being at Athens in his fifteenth yeare, and the Athenians in generall being weary of a long and tedious Warr which they waged with the Megarians, about the possession of the Isle of Salamine, they set forth an Edict, by which they did forbid all those who had voyces in the Councell of publike affairs, to make any more Propositions of continuing this War. Inso[much] as Solon (whose name and merits Madam, I am confident is not unknown unto you) being exceedingly angry that they should give over such an important Warre in so ignominious a manner, he endeavoured with all circumspeciall diligence to quash this Edict which was proclaimed, without exposing himselfe and his Countrey unto so much danger, as to lose the assistance of each other. But all his endeavours had proved ineffectuall, if the great soule of this young Prince had not helped him out. Be pleased to know Madam, that the Prince of Phoceus was the intimate friend of Pisistrates, and saw him almost every day: And being one day with Solon, as they were talking of this Edict which prohibited any motions of War, this young Prince seemed so troubled, that Solon taking notice of his herioque sadnesse, did much esteem him for it, especially when asking him the cause, he heard his answer. For as Solon asked him his reason why he was so angry at this Prohibition. Why Sir, replied he, does not the very same reason which forbids the continuance of the War, forbid men also to be valiant? If the Athenians give over a just War because they cannot wage it without danger, of what use is their valour? For my part, if this Edict be observed, I had rather return to Phoceus, then stay amongst a multitude of Cowards who are so base as to suffer it: Yet I know there are many young sparks which murmur at it in secret as well as my selfe.

If any one were so hardy, replied Solon, as to propound the continuance of the war unto the Athenians, would you willingly second him? Never doubt it, replied he, and I am most confident that Pisistrates would follow, and that we should cause the greatest part of all the Sparks in the Town to back us. Solon hearing the young Peranivus to say so, did highly applaud his courage, and without imparting his design, because he thought him too young to be trusted, he only did extreemly commend his generosity: giving him afterwards many Reasons which proved this Edict to be most ignominious and disadvantageous unto the Athenians, not doubting but he would afterwards repeat them unto all those he discoursed with. The truth is, this Prince did so well second the intentions of Solon, that within three dayes Pisistrates and hee had disposed all the youth in the Towne unto a generall revolt unless this Edict was revoked, which would but rust their valour.

Page_96 Solon seeing things succeed to his hearts wish, resolved to make use of that invention, which was such a wonder unto all Greece, to see that man who was so highly fam'd for wisdom, should have recourse unto foolishness to compass his project. But for all that, this invention which had passed for a piece of extravagancy if it had not hit; was taken for a most rare invention, because it did prosper. Since I do not doubt Ma[dam], but you are acquainted with this action of Solon, I shall not particularize it unto you; but only tell you in two words, that he having composed some verses fit to incite all the youth unto a demand of the Wars continuance against the Megarians, he did counterfeit himself to be out of his wits, and went unto a great place in Athens where he knew that Pisistrates and the Prince of Phoeus were walking with a great number of their Friends. As soon as he was there, he got upon a high stone Pace where the publique Cryer used to publish all Proclamations unto the People. He had no sooner recited those verses which he had composed to incite desire of War, but Pisistrates and the Prince of Phoeus clapping their hands, and approving of what he sayd, and causing others to do the like, they went unto every street, and cryed that this Edict must be revoked which was so ignominious to the Athenians, and so contraly to the Weal publique: They spoke with such efficacy, that in lesse then two hours all the young men of Athens, brave and simple did joyne with them; And as young as they were, they spoke with such vehemency and authority, that none was so hardy as to resist them. So that Madam, this Edict must of necessity be revoked to appease the Tumult, and begin the Warr: And well may I say that Solon, Pisistrates, and Peranius only did it.

However, the design of Solon having so well taken, he became wise again the next morning; and so well was he known to be so, that they conferred upon him the conduct of this Warr, wherein the Prince of Phoeus did follow him, and did miracles. But Solon knowing that the rich men of Athens would still murmur at the great charges which this War would put them unto, he found a way how to ease them by a piece of policy, in which the Prince of Phoeus did highly signall himself as well as Pisistrates. He went by Sea unto a famous Temple dedicated unto Venus, unto which he knew many Athenian women of quality did resort; and choosing out a cunning and trusty fellow, he sent him unto the Megarians, which were not farr from thence, with Orders to counterfeit the Traytor, in offering them a prize of all those Athenian women, and assuring them that they would all be at the Temple of Venus such a time, where they might be all easily taken: The plot did take, the Megarians believe the fellow, and come with a ship full of Souldiers to the place at the time appointed.

In the mean time, Solon caused all the Ladies and women to forbear coming unto that place; and dressing a good number of brave youths in the habit of women, he brought them thither, the Prince of Phoeus was of the number; for being both young and as valiant as any Hero, he was very fit for such an Expedition: And placing him|selfe in the front of all these seeming Ladies, who had all swords hidden under great loose Mantles, which they used to weare over their Gowns; He went, according to the orders of Solon, along the water-side, seeming as if they walked and waited untill the hour of sacrifice, as it was the ordinary custome of those who came over soon.

As soon as the Megarians saw them, they made all the Saile and Oare they could, and came to the place where they thought they saw so many Ladies: and landing in all hast, they came to take away those Ladies, thinking after this, that the Athenians would be glad to treat and make a Peace with them, to redeem their Wives from being slaves.

But they were sufficiently amazed, when the Prince of Phoeus (who was the first that fell upon them, seeing them come towards him) threw off his Mantle and Hood upon his head, and put himselfe in a posture of armed defence: This strange Metamorphosis did most terribly surprize them; for he being at that time very faire, one would have said that Venus was in an instant turned into Mars.

The change was not particularly in the Prince of Phoeus, for all the rest in an instant followed his example; and the Megarians were strangely terrified, to find such stout enemies in lieu of Ladies: They offered a retreat unto their Ship, but the Prince of Phoeus seconded by Pisistrates, getting betwixt the Sea and them, they passed all|most all upon the point of the sword after which, being master of their ship, they made use of a second Fallacy, which did thrive as well as the first: For imbarquing all their Page 97 Souldiers, they went towards Salamine as if they had beene Megarians, and as if they had brought all the Athenian Ladies which they designed to fetch: so as the Inhabitants of the Isle never opposing their landing, but on the contrary preparing themselves to receive those in the ship, as men who had done them good service, they were extremely surprized to find that they had suffered Enemies to land, and more surprized to observe with what miraculous valour the young Prince of Phoeus did assault them. The terrour was so great in the Isle, that Solon arriving in a ship presently after, did strike a deeper terrour amongst the people; who believing that this ship would be seconded by a great Fleet, were all so damped with a Panique feare, that Pisistrates and the Prince of Phoeus became Masters of the Isle with much ease, and returned unto Athens with more honour, as well as Solon, whose wisdom was crowned with happinesse, by their valour and his owne contrivance.

This Madam, was the first budd of Peranius his valour: since that, he hath done a thousand glorious Acts: There has not been any glorious business in all Greece wher|in he was not one. But the wonder is, he is as well experienced in matters of Sea as Land, and knowes as well how to be a Pilot as a Captain of a ship. The truth is Ma|dam, the valour of this Prince is superlative: He hath been seen to assault whole Na|vies all lined with Archers; and maugre the thick clouds of Arrows and Darts, hee hath carryed fire, and burned the whole fleet: He hath been seen with one single ship give chase to three others, and take two of them: On the other side, he hath been seen set upon by five, and not taken. Furthermore, what hath he not done both in private and generall Combates, both by Sea and Land? Yet for all this, though he had all the fury of an incensed souldier in his heart and eyes, when there was any oc|sion, yet he had all imaginable sweetnes in the aire of his Countenance & Spirit, when no occasion was for his valour: And I am able to assure you of a truth, that he was as great a lover of the company of Ladies, as of honour: And certainly in his person it might be seen, that Warr and Love were not incompatible. Indeed he was a lover of all merriments which were the consequents of Peace, I meane Poetry, Musique, Painting, and in generall all that belongs to the Muses. He writes most elegantly, either in matters of serious, or matters of gallantry; and I am sure he can both describe a Battle very well, and also a combate of Love in his heart if he would declare his pas|sion. As for his person it is infinitely pleasing, though his voyages at Sea hath a little blasted the great beauty of his youth: His stature is tall and big, his carriage high and noble; the Aire of his Aspect, smiling and serious both, but never was any more sweet, nor of a greater Civility. The first time one sees him, he commonly speaks little, but there appears so much judgment in what he speaks, as it is easie to see, that if hee would he can speak more, and speak well.

Moreover, one should never heare him speak upon matters of War among women unlesse he were forced: and much lesse of any glorious acts which hee had done, for he could not endure that any should commend him. But on the other side he was ex|tremely zealous in commending the valour of others upon all occasions, and would be just even unto his greatest Enemies. Moreover, he was one of the faithfull friends, and the most violent Lover that ever was, and he was as liberal as he was brave; but he was as apt for ambition as love, and no lesse jealous of his glory then of his Mi|stresse. Further then this Madam, I have no more to say of the Phoecean Prince, on|ly that he seemed wise in all his undertakings, and the impetuousity of his humour never appeared but only in love and warre; for out of them he was so composed as it cannot be sayd there was ever turbulency in his heart or disorder in his spirit. This Madam was the temper of the Phoecean Prince: & thus he was, when he heard that his Country was entering into warrs, and he returned to defend it. Though he knew very wel that the Pr: his Uncle was engaged in an ill cause, & knew the pretensions of the Prince Thrasibalus to be just; yet for all that, since it is sometimes Justice to defend those who are unjust therfore he went unto Phoeus, & there behaved himself, as the Prince Thrasibalus hath acquainted the illustrious Cyrus: At his return into his Coun|tre, he found that his sister named Onesienta was grown one of the fairest and most a miable persons that could be seen: Yet he was not joyed at the sight of her, because he found her all in tears, by reason of her fears to see her country ruined. She would have gone out of the Towne if she could, though she had gone and cloystered up her selfe Page 98 w|th Menesteus in the Tombe; but the Country was not open, and there was as much danger in going out of Phoeus, as to tarry in it, so as she was forced unto patience: Also there being a man of high esteem & great merit, son unto one whose name was Sfurius, and whose own name was Menedorus who was in love with her, I believe it no small reason of her stay in Phoeus. However, the Town was in a very deplorable condition, when the late Prince of Phoeus, accompanied with Alexidesmus and many enormous persons who drew the wrath of the Gods upon our Town by lea|ving it in the night time, without acquainting any, or leaving a Souldier to defend it. You may imagine Madam, how the Inhabitants were amazed at such an accident: At first they cast their eyes upon the Prince Peranius, who would have exhorted them to defend themselves; but feare of servitude quashing their spirits, he could not prevail: so as resolving in a tumultuous manner to quit their Country for the preservation of their liberty, they intreated this Prince, that he would be pleased to be their Gene|rall; telling him, that as his Predecessors carryed into Asia the Collony which built Phoeus, so that he would please to conduct them unto some Country, promising him most exact obedience: He would once more have perswaded them to defend their walls, but it was impossible to perswade them unto a certain death. In|somuch as the Prince being forced to yeeld, and choosing rather to fly then yeeld without blows, as he must have done if he did not yeeld unto them, therefore he amuzed the Prince Thrasibalus under colour of a two dayes parley; during which time he tackled up all the Ships in the Port, which was no small number, and in one night loading them with all that was precious in Phoeus, even to the very statues of the Temples, all the people of this statly Town embarqued. But Madam, they embarqued in such disor|der and confusion, that never was a more pittifull sight to be seen, then these misera|ble Inhabitants loadned with their goods and children, followed by their wives and servants, all forsaking their Town with teares, and making the most lamentable cries that ever was heard: Many were so hasty in entering into the Ships, as they fell into the Sea, where death quitted them from that servitude which they feared.

For my part, I must confesse, I never saw the like; for in lieu of prayers which Pil|lots use at leaving the Port for a favourable wind, nothing but a confused noise of crying Children could be heard; women lamenting, men cursing their hard fortune, and Mariners crying. Whole families might be seen striving to get into one ship: Friends with Friends, Lovers with Lovers desired they might perish together if storms did rise.

In the mean while the generous Prince who was Generall of this Fleet, having as|sembled most of the women of Quality together, he put them into a ship that was to be his owne, with the Princesse his Sister, choosing three hundred of the best men for Souldiers. As for Menedorus, he left his Father Sfurius, and was with the Prince of Phoeus, that he might in this generall misfortune be nigh unto her he loved, and mixe his sighes and sorrows with hers.

At last Madam, all being imbarqued, Anchors weyed, and day ready to dawn, the Prince of Phoeus gave command to saile towards the Isle of Chio, hoping the Inhabitants of that Isle would sell unto them the uninhabited Isles which are in that Place, and therefore he made that way. But that you may the better see how strangely the feare of servitude had possessed the minds of the Phoecean Inhabitants, be pleased to know, that they made a publique oath, by which they engaged themselves never to return again unto their Town; and for testimoniall obligation thereof, they cast into the Sea a heavy piece of Iron, with oath never to return untill that iron did float up|on the water again, making a thousand curfes upon him that should be the first pro|pounder of a Return.

This terrible Oath being made, the Fleet set forward; but day no sooner did per|mit them to discern objects, but all this Navy consisting of so many ships, both over-loadned and ill equipped, perceived that contrary winds did rise with the Sunne. For my part, being in the ship with the Prince of Phoeus, I did admire at his experience in the presages of a storm; for he no sooner cast his eyes upon the open Sea, but he knew by the colour only that a Tempest was nigh: and indeed the Sea beginning to swell upon a sudden, there was great reason to feare that this unhappy fleet would be dispersed. However, since they never used any vessels in our Town but such as had Oars, they went on, notwithstanding the contrariety of the winds. I need not tell you Ma|dam, Page 99 in what a fright this great number of women were who never so much as saw the Sea before, but as they walked to take the Ayre in a serene afternoon, for this was not yet the last tempest which we found. At last Madam, we came to the Isle of Chio, but in lieu of being received with humanity, they denied us the entrance into any of their Ports, and were so far from selling unto the Prince of Phoeus the uninhabited Isles which belong unto them, and are called the Isles of Enussus, that they looked upon us as Enemies, and told us that they would not admit of such Neighbors which might become stronger then themselves, and might hinder their Commerce: so as all we could obtaine from them, was some such refreshments as we stood in need of: Thus were we in a most deplorable condition. The great courage of the Phoecean Prince had a mind to make these Inhabitants more pittifull by force, who were so cru|ell as to deny us admittance, which they might so easily have granted. But all the ship being full of Women, Children, and Servants, and having almost no Souldiers, he could not attempt any thing upon them; for though he could easily have possessed himself of the Enussian Islands, yet he would not, because it was impossible to keep them: So then to Sea again we must, not being fully resolved what course to steer: But just as we were ready to weigh Anchor at the rising of the Moon, at which hour the Sea commonly is most calm, the Pilots of the Ships did say, they heard a voyce which bade them goe unto Ephesus, and the Goddess there adored would tell them where they should find a habitation. These Pilots had no sooner told what they heard, but a confused noise was heard in every ship, which said that this voyce from heaven must be obeyed: so as though the Prince of Phoeus gave no credite unto what these Pilots told him, yet he must obey a great number, so that to Ephesus we must. But since it was not a place where this Fleet could safely harbour, nor where it was likely they would receive us, I was made choise of to waite upon the Princess Onesicrite, who would her selfe goe and offer a Sacrifice unto Diana: Indeed, we came to Ephesus in a Boat, and afterwards went unto that famous Temple, where that Goddess was adored, to aske of her what course we should take.

As soon as the Sacrifice was ended, she who commanded the vayed Virgins, whose name was Aristonice, came unto Onesicrite to tell her, that the goddess had appeared during the sacrifice, and had let her understand that she would take us into her protection; That she would have us steer our course towards the Isle of Cymes, and that from thence we should submit our selves unto the conduct of the wind and waves: Adding, that when we were arrived at the Harbour unto which she would conduct us, she would be there adored under the figure of a Statue which she would shew us, and which was like unto that in the middle of the Temple, only not so great: And to evidence unto you (sayd Aristonice unto us) that you need not doubt the words of the Goddess whom I serve.

I must further tell you, that she having absolutely commanded me to go my selfe to found a Temple unto her honour in the place where shee intends to conduct your Fleet, I am ready to go with you, and teach you by my example how to trust unto her promises. I must confesse Madam, that the speech of Aristonice did surprize me as well as Onesicrite, and raised a greater confidence in me then I had before: For I saw one, whom I knew to be a person of great vertue and spirit, ready to quit her Country, and follow strangers whom she knew not. Moreover, be pleased to know, that the physiognomy of Aristonice was so noble, so wise, and so Majesticall, that she attracted the eyes of all beholders: Also there was a great disposition in the Princess Onesicrite to reverence and believe her: And Aristonice having assembled all the veiled Virgins, she told them that the Goddess had commanded her to goe and build a Temple in a place which she did not know: After which, she surrendered her authority over them unto another, and left them, to go with us, waited on only by two of her Companions.

Thus we returned unto our Fleet, who received us with more joy then I am able to expresse: The statue of Diana was looked upon by all the People with unexpressible raptures of joy, and Aristonice was revered by all the Fleet, as if she had been the Goddess her selfe. This Image of Diana for the satisfaction of the multitude, must be set upon the Poop of the Prince of Phoeus his ship, that it might be visible to all the Fleet. As for the Prince of Phoeus, though a Souldier, yet did he feare and reverence the gods: he honoured Aristonice as a woman consecrated unto them; and Page 100 ere long after he admired her as a person extraordinary, when he discovered the greatness of her spirit and vertue.

In the mean time, though he had doubted of the apparition which she said she saw, yet he could not chuse but follow her orders, since the multitude had so great a confidence in what she said. We sailed therefore to the Isle of Cyrne without any obstacle; for since our fleet seemed to be a Navy, and that a great one, there was no feare of any Pirats: and from Chio the wind was so favourable that we came to Cyrne without the least ruffle of the Sea: Hitherto, the Prince of Phoeus submitted unto the conduct of Aristonice without contradiction: But after he had taken in all necessaries at that Isle, she would have perswaded him that the Pilots must submit all unto the wind and waves, and make choise of no Course but as the wind directed; then his Faith began to stagger, and he would never have obeyed, if the multitude stronger then he had not compelled him.

Sturius, who was the most considerable man in the Fleet next the Prince of Phoeus, was very hardly brought to consent unto it: Menedorus murmured extreamly, and I must needs confesse I did what I could to oppose it. But the people being all for Aristonice, submit we must unto the waves, wind, and fortune. All this while Aristonice was calm, and had such a strong confidence in the goddess whom she adored, that she doubted not the fulfilling of her promises.

Now Madam were we in a strange condition since we went we know not whither, and without any design but as the wind did waft us: Yet were we in much more deplorable condition; for the gods doubtless to punish our unbelief, did raise a most hideous tempest: For Madam, the Wind seemed to blow from all Coasts, and the waves were so high that they dashed over all the ships. Moreover, darkness, thunder, lightning, rayn mingling with waves and winds did all make such a horrid noise, that the roaring of the Sea could not be distinguished: Now did every one think to perish, and repented of their trusting too much unto hazard. But as for Aristonice in the worst of the Tempest, when the whole Fleet was ready to be dispersed, and she her selfe at the point of perishing, she kept still in the same tranquility and confidence.

As for the Prince of Phoeus, he seemed resolute and constant, but it was only out of his great heart which feared not death, and not out of any hopes to escape. As for Menedorus, though he did not apprehend the danger in respect of himself, yet he was not so resolute as the Prince of Phoeus; for his feares of the Princess Onesicrite did fill him so full of compassion, and he was so grieved to see her in danger, that if throwing himself into the Sea would have calmed the tempest, he would willingly have been the victime to appease incensed Neptune. But amidst all these murmures, Aristonice with her ordinary tranquility did speak with the same freedom of spirit, as if the Seas were all serenity and calmnesse. Poor men that you are (said she unto the murmuring Mariners) though you do not believe my words, yet believe that the same Gods which raised, can calm this tempest, and perhaps make it serve to bring you unto a Port: Leave the Rudder to their providence, and be guided by them since they are wiser then you. The truth is Madam, after we had been weather-beaten three whole dayes, our Masts broken, and our Sails shattered, upon a sudden the winds ceased, the waves abated, the Rain diminished, the Heavens cleered, and the Sun shined: so as in an instant passing from an extream roughness into a calm smoothness, hope began to cheer up our hearts: Yet I must tell you, our hopes were but weak; for our ship was in a very bad condition, and our whole Fleet was extreamly dispersed, two ships were not together, and doubtless the happier for us; for had not the winds separated them one from another, they had infallibly fallen foule upon each other and enter-shaked. As soon as all was calm, Aristonice getting upon the Deck, kneeled before the Image of Diana, and in behalf of the whole Fleet thanked that Goddess for preserving them: After which, rising up, she was the first that discovered Land. Then speaking with authority as if inspired by the gods; Courage (said she unto the Prince of Phoeus who was next her) for I see the place where Diana will have a new Altar, and where she will find us a most safe Sanctuary. As soon as she had sayd so, the Prince of Phoeus spied some rocks which seemed to confine the Sea; so as not knowing whether that Land was Friend or Enemy, they steered thither. Since all the Fleet strived to rally together, and endeavoured to repayr every ship which the Tempest had shattered. It was long before we came there, for Page 101 the Storm had so weather-beaten them, that they were almost out of hopes to get unto the Shore, it was so far off: but the Marriners being very industrious, and life being very sweet, every one was both laborious and full of invention, so as we came neer enough to discern a most pleasant Country.

Then we discovered very neer us, three little Islands almost at an equal distance from each other, and made a Regular Triangle: where there was a Port able only to receive fifteen or twenty Ships; the Prince of Phoeus made towards these Isles, which were separated from the Continent about thirty Furlongs, that he might there reassemble all the Fleet: and from thence send to know what Country it was which they saw and seemed so pleasant at such a distance: Since his Pilot had not lost his Rudder, though he had neither Say-yard nor Mast he caused him to Row by strength, and leaving all the rest of the Ships a good way behind he arrived at these Isles, the Sea being as calm as any Lake. When he was so neer to discern that they had no Trees, he saw come out betwixt these Isles a great Painted and Gilded Bark, whose Sayls were Sky-colour, as well as all the Cordage, which had upon the Poop a most stately Tent, under which were many Ladies and some men talking to them. But as the sight of the Bark rejoiced all that were in the Prince of Phoeus his Ship, so this shattered bottom moved those that were in this Bark unto compassion: but their compassion was mixed with som wonder; for since they espied at that time a great Fleet behind our Ship, we perceived that in lieu of coming to us, they sent out a little Boat to know who we were. This Encounter being both full of wonder and delight unto us considering the state wherein we were, and the need we had of help, the Princess Onesicrite, and all of any quality in the Ship got upon the Deck, and began to look at the Bark with as much Curiosity as they looked at us. But when this little Boat was come up to us, we made such signs of Peace unto them as we use upon our Seas, not knowing whether or no they understood us, we perceived that the Habit of those three men in it, was altogether unknown unto us. Aristonice herself, who thought she had seen men of all Nations in the World at the Temple of Ephesus, she confessed, that she could not imagine of what Country they should be: However, though their Habits were something barbarous, yet there was something of handsomness in them, as you may judge by those who came with me. But, Madam, the worst at first was, that when they spoke unto us we did not understand them; so as not thinking that men whom we understood not, could understand us, we began to express our misfortune by signs. But one of the three hearing us talk to one another, we much rejoiced to hear him leave that Language which he used at first, and ask us in Greek of what Country we were? whither we were going, and what Fleet that was behind us? Madam, I cannot easily express our joyes; let it suffice I tell you, that it was so great a wonder that we were almost ravished out of our wits: for though it was only the part of the Phoecean Prince to answer, yet almost every one upon the Deck did answer something; Aristonice sayd that Diana conducted them unto their Country: Onesicrite, that war had driven them from their Country; the Prince of Phoeus sayd, that fear of servitude had chased them away: Menedorus, that Tempest had cast them upon their Coasts, and I think that I sayd, the Gods did never give them such an excellent Subject to exercise all their Virtues, saying also something which might intimate unto them the quality of the Phoecean Prince, of Onesicrite, of Menedorus, and of Aristonice. But, Madam, all these confused Answers being made, the Prince of Phoeus asked what Country that was? and who was in that stately Bark? The man of whom he enquired being of a witty spirit, told him in short, that the people which did inhabit it were called the Segoregians: that their Country was bounded on one side by another people called the Salian Gaules, on another by the Tectosages, who inhabit along the Rapid River called the Rhosne, on another side by a Country called the Celtique Gaules, and also on another side by the Sea towards Africa in the South. He told him afterwards, that the King of the Segoregians was called Senan: That he was a Widdower, that he was come to recreate himself some dayes at a Castle which was very neer that shore, and that the Princess his Daughter called Cleonisbe, having a desire to take the Ayre upon the Sea, was in that Bark, and had sent him to know all things concerning them. The Prince of Phoeus hearing this, desired him to obtain leave of the Princess that he might see her, and beseech her to obtain of the King her Father, a Harbour for so many distressed people, conjuring the man to be their Interpreter: Page 102 No no, Sir, (replied the man) I need not explain your Language unto the Princess Cleonisbe: For though she live in a Clime farr from where the Arts and Sciences do Reign, yet I assure you she speaks Greek that might become Athens. However, since I dare not permit you to go unto her without her orders, give me leave to render her an accompt of what she desires to know: The Prince of Phoeus consenting unto it, he went back unto the Princess Cleonisbe.

On the other side, our Fleet perceiving our stay, came to us before the Cockboat returned. But Madam, be pleased to know, that this man who spoke unto us was not born amongst the Segoregians; but on the contrary was a famous Graecian, who had heretofore undergone the law of Ostracism, and by fortune was driven upon this happy Country where he stayed: so as giving an accompt unto the Princess Cleonisbe of all he heard from the Prince of Phoeus, he told her, as we afterwards knew, that if he were the same he sayd himself to be, he was one of the most valiant men in the world, adding a thousand commendums of his person: so as this Graecian Officer, whose name was Hipomenes, speaking very advantageous of the Phoecean Prince unto Cleonisbe, as he did of her unto him, I assure you they did esteem, before they knew each other.

In the mean time the Princess Onesicrite, knowing she was to appear before a person of such quality commanded her Women to order her weather-beaten Curles a little better, which the impetuosity of the winds had dishevel'd. At last Madam, Hipomenes having received orders from Cleonisbe, we did not only see him, but the Barque also came towards us: Yet the Prince of Phoeus durst not advance before he had received the answer of Hipomenes. But as soon as he understood that the Princess Cleonisbe was coming to take him into her Barque with the Princess Onesicrite, Aristonice, and all of any quality in his ship, he commanded to row in all hast toward her Barque, ordering that all the Fleet should vail Bonnet and waite untill he had received Orders from the Princess unto whom he was going: And to express a great reverence of her, he went in the boat of Hipomenes that he might the sooner wait upon her, and shew his confidence, so the Cock-boat went from our Ship unto the Barque which was coming towards us.

But I beseech you Madam, fancy a little what kind of object it was unto him to see this gilded Barque with a magnificent Tent, and waving Flags, in comparison with his Sea-shattered ship, weather-beaten with Tempest, all torn except the Poop, on which stood the Image of Diana. 'Tis true, his Deck was adorned with three admirable persons, who by their beauty and garb were able to please any beholder. Indeed, Aristonice by the majesty of her aspect; Onesicrite by her rare beauty; and Menedorus by the handsomeness of his person were able to strike admiration into any: But Madam, to let them alone a little, I must speak of Cleonisbe, and tell you that she was all our wonder; so as when we came first unto her Barque, we were not able to judge of her excellencies. Since she was all Curiosity to see those whom she was to save, she advanced a Pace out of her Tent before the rest of the Ladies with her, and we easily discerned which was she before she was named unto us. Fancy Madam, a great person, whose high and noble stature was so majestic, as one should conceive Penthesilea to be: but Fancy withall, that though she had the stature of that fair and young Amazon who dyed by the hand of Achilles, yet she had not her fierceness. But on the contrary, she had so much sweetness, and so many Charms in her Aspect, though her mind was high, as it might well be said, that as one could not love her without feare, so one could not feare her without love: Since never any had so many charms, so much modesty, nor more beauty: Yet Madam, do not fancy Cleonisbe's complexion to be of the dashing whitenesse, which often hides many a fault, or at least lessens them. On the contrary her Complexion was black; but such a black so uniform and lustrous, as was the perfectest beauty in the world: As for her haire, it was of that colour which suits well with all Complexions; neither so hard as the blackest hue, nor nor so yellow as some, but the lovely curling brown which sets off the beauty of her that owns it.

Moreover, Cleonisbe hath the most pleasing uniformity in her face that is imaginable: It cannot be said her face is ovall, or that it is round; but such a just proportion of parts as both those kind of faces can give unto an exact beauty. Her mouth was the handsomest that ever eye beheld; for it was not only well made, and her lips Page 103 were not only that lovely Carnation which animates beauty, but it had an unexpressible Charm, which would persuade you, though you looked only upon that part, that she must of necessity be eloquent, and that she had abundance of wit, there being such a kind of little Dimples at the corners of her mouth, and such a kind of sprightly smiling and melancholy together, which alwayes appeared, and forced every one to believe what she said.

But, Madam, now I have made an imperfect description of Cleonisbe's Stature, Mine, Complexion, Hair, Face, and Mouth; how shall I describe her Eyes? yet since I am engaged to describe them as well as I can, I must tell you, that they are black, great, sparkling and sweet, indeed they are so sprightly quick, so wonderous modest, and so sweetly passionate, that they inspire love in the very hearts of all Beholders: Moreover, they are not such Eyes as use to a certain tumultuous stirring in them, as will not suffer one to judge of them because they are continually changing Objects. But on the contrary, though they be very quick and lively, and though she have most penetrating looks with them, yet are they all sweetness and tranquility: Whatsoever she looks upon, she looks upon it applicatively, and without abandoning her extream modesty which is inseparable from all her Actions, she never casts her Eyes off those who speak unto her, and by consequence doth suffer one, to look and admire those million of Charms which are in them: for indeed there appears in them a miscellany of Wit, Spirit, Love, Languishing, Modesty, Passion, Vivacity, Virtue, Goodness, Mirth, Melancholy, Beauty, and Charms. So that, Madam, if you joyne such Eyes as I have described, unto all the rest of her Superlative Excellencies which I have related, unto such a buxom Plumpness as usually is in youth, you may easily believe that people who had three daies of tempest together, seen the Image of death about them, were pleasingly ravished to see the admired Cleonisbe on the Deck of her Bark: I can not think that those of the Isle of Cyprus, who saw Venus in that Magnificent Shell which was both her Cradle and her Ship, did more admire her, then we Cleonisbe. She was that day dressed after the African mode: to wit, her hair half loose, part wherof was brayed with Ribbons of lively Colours behind her head: her Gown which was of Carnation and white was of a very pleasing Fashion and Gallant, which without hiding the Comeliness of her stature was very Majesticall: The Claspes of this Gown was Locketts of Diamonds, all before, and likewise about her shoulders: Her Sleeves were half turned up, and shewed the hair hands and armes of the wearer, as well as her Neck about which was a rich Carcanet of Diamonds covered with a thin Tiffany. To add something more of Gallantry unto this little Maritime Triumph: Round about the Tent in which Cleonisbe was, were set green boughs whose Odor reached us before we came unto the Bark; there might be seen a thousand branches of Orange Trees full of Flowres, mingled with branches of Myrrh, Jessemine, and such as making a Canopy over Cleonisbe's head did perfume the Ayre. This miscellany of Leaves, of Flowers, of Diamonds, and other rich Ornaments, did make a most admirable and pleasing Object.

In the mean time; though we were very attentive in beholding Cleonisbe, yet we observed that there was many handsome Ladies with her, and among the men there was one who seemed to be of high quality, both by his port and by his habit; and also by the Carriage of Cleonisbe towards him. I beseech you, Madam, pardon me for being so tedious in relating how Cleonisbe appeared unto me the first time I saw her: I will now acquaint you with Passages in the Bark of Cleonisbe, and tell you that the Cock-boat going before us, as soon as it came neerer enough for the Prince of Phoeus to see and be seen, he saluted her with all possible Reverence: After which Hipomenes carrying him into the Bark, he carried him unto this Princess, who received him with much Civility. You see here, Madam (said he unto her in Greek) an unfortunate Prince, who gives you hearty thanks for keeping all the people of a great City from perishing: For I am most confident that it is your presence which calmed the incensed Waves, and caused the storms to cease which would have ruined us. And, Madam, after my thanks for saving the lives of so many miserable Souls and innocent Persons, I beseech you out of your goodness preserve them, by obtaining from the King your Father, an entrance into his Ports for our weather-beaten Ships, that he would be pleased to lend an Eare unto the cause of our Exile unto a relation of our miseries, that he would afford us some comfort in our extremities, and fulfill the promises Page 104 of a great goddess. Sir, replied Cleonisbe, I am so glad to find an occasion of helping the miserable, especially such unfortunates as your selfe, that I have much ado to say, I am sorry for your diasters, since they give me a fit occasion of doing you a good office, and of letting you know, that our Nation is not so barbarous as it is believed to be.

In the mean time, since I understand by Hipomenes that there are Ladies in your Ship, I beseech you let us go and take them into my Barque, since a place wherein they were like to have perished cannot be pleasing unto them: And when we have taken them in, you may send orders unto your Fleet to shelter themselves amongst these Islands, untill I have presented you unto the King my Father, and obtained your desires from him; for let me tell you Sir once more, that I do hold it so glorious to do all the good that one is able, as I am confident, that I shall be more joyed in protecting you, then my Protection can be profitable to you.

Oh Madam (replied the Prince of Phoeus, and looked upon her with admiration) is it possible to find such a person as your selfe in the remotest parts of the Earth? Can fame be so injurious as not to make you known unto Greece, and maugre the huge Sea which separates, make you adored? Those who taught me the Grecian Language, replied she, and smiled, did also teach me, that Credite is not alway to be given unto the flatteries of your Nation, and therefore waving your Commendations, I will heare no more of them from a man who questionless is most knowing in all things, since he is of that Country, where the ignorance that reigns in ours, is banished.

After this, Cleonisbe seeing the Prince of Phoeus his ship was neerer, she commanded her Barque to meet, and entreated that man of quality who was with her, whose name was Bomilcar to go and receive the Princess Onesicrite, and Aristonice, and to bring them to her. So as Bomilcar, obeying her with much joy, he was also at this time very hasty in his obedience, and went to present his hand to Onesicrite: But since that Princess would have Aristonice go first, out of her reverence to the Goddess whom she served, Bomilcar did lead her: so as Menedorus did help his adored Princess out of the Ship, and so they went unto the Princess Cleonisbe, who was talking with the Prince of Phoeus: Aristonice at her going out of the ship did safely lay up the statue of Diana, and committed the care of it unto some trusty men: And the Prince of Phoeus sent orders that the Father of Menedorus should command the fleet in his absence. It is not an easie matter madam, to relate the reciprocal admirations of Cleonisbe, Onesicrite, & Aristonice: Nor can I verbatim relate the speeches of these excellent persons: therefore I beseech you Madam dispence with me, and imagine them. For my part, I was so surprized to see Cleonisbe, and so astonished to hear her speak, that I could not chuse but think, she had been either at Athens, or Corinth, or Delphos, or Thebes. I perceived also, that her politeness had communicated it selfe unto almost all about her, and that most of the Ladies with her had nothing of barbarism in them. Bomilcar also had the Aire of an ingenuous man, and of a great soul, so as being all wonder, I admired and looked, and looked and admired, and said nothing till we came unto the shoar.

In the mean time, I observed one amongst the Ladies, whose name was Glacidia, whom Cleonisbe preferred before all the rest, and addressed her talke unto her when she commended the beauty of Onesicrite, or when she talked of Aristonice, and I perceived also that the Lady was of no mean merit. And I had also time enough to observe the agitation which was in the Prince of Phoeus his heart; and to observe that, Bomilcar perceived it as well as I did: I heard him say unto Glacidia in a low voice and smile, that considering how this stranger doth gaze upon Cleonisbe; it is to be feared that after he hath escaped the Tempest, he will be ship-wracked in the Port. If such a misfortune fall upon him (replied Glacidia, and smiled as well as Bomilcar) I suppose the conformity of your fortune will move you to contract a friendship with him. Oh Glacidia, replied he, you know very well that sympathy in such miseries as these, do never make the sufferers to love one another. Thus Madam, I understood that Bomilcar was a lover of Cleonisbe, but I could not then discover whether he was well or ill treated; because Glacidia taking notice that I might understand them because they spoke Greek, she turned towards me, and desired me to tell her in short the condition of our fortunes.

Page 105 In the mean time, the nearer we came to the shore, the more pleasant the Country seemed, for amongst a thousand severall Trees, whereof the Countrey is full, one might see upon the top hand great sterile Rocks, which made the fertility of other places seem the greater. There was also on the same hand, a mountain whose bottom was full of stately Pines; and upon the top which was very steep, stood a Tower of an irregular structure, which as ancient as it was, yet was it a great ornament unto that side of the Country.

On the other hand, the Country was very plain, yet mingled with little hills, valleys, Rocks, Meadows, Fountains, Rivers, and a hundred pleasant inequalities of different Situations, which made the houses built there very delightfull. Moreover, one might see abundance of Olive trees Pomgranet trees, Mircles, Lawrells: and all their Gardens full of Oranges, Gessimines, and a thousand other delightfull varieties; I do not think any Country more pleasant, or where the Sun produceth more sweet Spring-times, longer Summers, richer Autumns, or shorter Winters. The heavens are always clear, the fruits are always good, their Seas are full of fish; and the hunters do find such abundance of Game, that be one of what quality or humour one will, there is enough to give full satisfaction.

But to return again into the Barque, out of which I wandered to make this description: Give me leave to tell you Madam, that as soon as the Barque was in the Port, we saw many Cabins of Fishers along the shoar side, and many houses dispersed about the Country, whose prospect was limited by far-off mountains, on the tops of which might snow be seen, though it seldom or never falls in the place where we landed. The Princess Cleonisbe having many Coaches waiting for her by the water-side, she desired the Ladies with her to go into some of them, and to make room for us, that we might go some thirty furlongs unto a Castle where she left the King.

But as soon as we were all landed, we heard upon a sudden a great noise of horns winded by men which were hunting, and we saw a great crew of Hunters, which though something barbarous, yet was pleasant, and something of magnificence: All the Dogs had great Collers of silver studded with gold: The Footmen had every one a kind of shell, which they call trumpets, and which they use in stead of horns, which made a noise as shrill as the Tritons before Neptune. The Hors-men had Bowes, Arrows, and Javelins; and for their habits, they were mixed with such variety of lively colours, as could not choose but much take the eye. Every one then turning towards the place from whence these Hunters came, we saw one who seemed to be the master of all the rest, and who leaving the multitude which followed him, he came strait towards the Princess Cleonisbe, who told the Prince of Phoeus that he who was coming towards them was the Prince Carimantes her Brother. She had no sooner said so, but the Prince alighted from his horse and came to her, and we saw him to be extremely handsome, and not above four and twenty years of age. When he was near enough to discern those who were with Cleonisbe, he was surprized, especially when he discovered the great Fleet Yet he was not long in his wonder; for the Princess Cleonisbe presenting unto him this brave, but unhappy company, who had put themselves under her protection: as happy as your Chase can be (said she unto him and smiled) I am sure mine upon the Sea is more, and you have not enjoyed more pleasure all the day, then doubtless you will have, in helping me to negotiate unto the King in behalf of these excellent persons which you see here, and whom I beseech you to protect. Onesicrite being as faire as any eye ever saw, she had so attracted the eyes and mind of the Prince Carimantes, as he hardly knew what Cleonisbe did say unto him. 'Tis true, he did as much as if he had heard her, for he was so full of civilities unto Onesicrite, the Prince of Phoeceus, Aristonice, and unto Menedorus, that they had reason to be very well satisfied.

However, since that place was not fit for any long discourse, Carimantes carried Onesicrite unto Cleonisbies Coach, telling the Prince of Phoeceus, Menedorus, and my selfe, that we should go on hors-back with him; for having at all huntings many spare horses, there was as many as we stood in need of: so that as soon as the Prince of Phoeceus had waited upon Cleonisbe unto the Coach where Onesicrite already was, and that Bomilcar had waited upon Aristonice; and that the Coaches began to goe, they all took horse and followed: The Prince of Phoeceus all the way did talke with Carimantes, and acquainted him with the desolation of his Country, the fortune of their Page 106 Armes, the greatnesse of their Conquests, the resolution of the Phoecean Inhabitants; the command of the Goddess which is adored at Ephesus; the storm we endured, and the meeting with the Princess Cleonisbe, who understood the same things from Onesicrite more particularly then she had them from Hipomenes. Though the way was not very long, yet I observed Bomilcar to have much spirit: A spirit so full of activity, as one might see by his physiognomy that he was possessed with more then one violent passion. He asked me a hundred indifferent Questions, & enquired very narrowly concerning the Phoecean Prince: Also I asked Hipomenes all that my curiosity did prompt me unto, hoping that since he was a Grecian, I might have all good Offices from him: and amongst the rest, I asked and desired him to tell me who Bomilcar was? Sir, said he unto me, he is a man so considerable in this Court, that he is looked upon as the man who only put an end unto the Warr between the Carthaginians and the Segoregians: For being a very potent man in his own Country, it was by his negotiation doubtless, that those two Enemy-Nations are at this time in peace. I beseech you, said I unto him, is not Bomilcar originally of this Country? No, replied he, the proud Carthage is the place from whence his Father had his being.

After this, passing from one discourse unto another, I understood that the King of the Segoregians had no other children but Carimantes, and Cleonisbe; and I understood also that I was not mistaken, when I believed Glacidia was much in favour with Cleonisbe; for he told me, that she did very much esteem and love her; adding, that she very well deserved this happiness, because she made use of Cleonisbes favour onely to do good offices unto all well qualified men. At the last Madam, we came unto the Castle where the King was, which was one of the most Princely seats which ever I saw, a seate which had a hundred delicate Rivelets and pleasant Medows about it, and a Prospect of so vast an extent towards the Sea, that ones eyes could finde no other limits but their own weakness, which would not permit them to discern beyond the confines which Nature had prescribed unto them: In coming to it we saw a great Walke set on both sides with Lawrells, above eight hundred paces long. We passed through a long ascent rayled and ballistred, planted in order with thousands of Orange Trees, intermixed with Pomgranets and Cittrons, which pleasing more then one sence at once, did perfume the Aire in which we breathed. We saw also in the midst of a Garden an admirable spring of water which Nature had cast into an excellent figure, and which did rise in a murmuring noise, and fall again into a little River in a Meadow behind this Garden. We observed also in coming to this Castle, that all the walls of the Court were covered with Mirtle; and that there was a rare border of odoriferous hearbs behind the Castle, where one might see Arbors of Lawrell, Fountaines and Rivers in most admirable method. But our greatest wonder was, the magnificence within this stately house, and particularly in the Kings Chamber: Truly Madam, though it was not adorned either with Pictures, or hung with Sydonian Tapistry or Purple; yet what we saw was much more rich and glorious then any that ever I saw: For Madam I beseech you imagine this Chamber to be the height of the house, and one of the most ravishing objects that ever any eye beheld. The walls and roof were enamelled with a kind of irregular Arabian work all of mother of pearl and Corall: The bow of Heaven had not more splendand colours then the reflection from the mother of Pearl: and being mingled with Corall of all colours that nature ever produced in the Ligustique Sea which is not far off, it made the most beautifull object in the world. For some being white, some black, some flame-colour, some Carnation, some Rose-colour, this Miscellany is impossible to be described: And therefore not to insist long upon it, give me leave to tell you Madam, how the King of Segoregians received us.

Cleonisbe being of no less excellency of judgment then spirit, she sent before to acquaint the King with her adventure, as soon as she landed, to the end he might not be surprized: when we came into the Hall of the Castle, Carimantes presented his hand unto Onesicrite, who now could not let Aristonice go before her, so that Bomilcar did lead her. As for the Prince of Phoeceus, he presented his hand unto Cleonisbe, who most obligingly told him, that since the Prince her Brother would present Onesicrite unto the King, she would do him that good office to present him. As for Menedorus, he gave his hand unto Glacidia. Since the King did understand the Grecian Language as well as Carimantes and Cleonisbe, he was most sensibly moved at what Page 107 the Prince of Phoeceus said unto him; after that the Princess his Daughter had presented him: for though his Speech was but short, yet he told him all our misfortunes, and in few words did so explain them as the King might most easily understand and remember them, he made choice of such apt words to express our miseries as the longest and most Eloquent Oration in the world, could not work more tenderness in the hearts of Auditors. To be short, Sir (said the Prince of Phoeceus unto the King at the end of his Speech) you see heere a company of miserable men, whom fear of servitude hath forced to forsake their Country, who have not one foot of ground to tread upon unless you give it them, or unless they usurp it; a weather beaten people, loaded with sorrows, who have nothing but our liberties and hopes of your favor: nor could wee ever hope unless the Princess Cleonisbe had promised to be our Patroness and Mediator to you, and also obtained the same favour for us from the Prince Carimantes. Thus, Sir, upon you depends our Destiny, since if you do not permit us entrance into your Ports for our Fleet, we have nothing else to do but dye patiently. As the King was ready to answer, Aristonice began to speak: Sir, said she unto him, give me leave to tell you in all due reverence, that this Tempest which hath cast us upon your Coasts, hath given you an ample occasion to shew your Virtue in receiving us: It was a great Goddess who did conduct us hither; who desiring to have a Temple erected unto her Glory in your Country, and to be known amongst your people, hath commanded me to do what I have done.

Take heed, Sir, of incensing her by rejecting those who are unfortunate, who as miserable as they are have in their Ships inestimable Treasures, since they have there a great number of Virtuons men, men full of wisdom and knowledge, excellent Artists in all things, who have all the Arts and Sciences in their Ships, which they can impart and communicate unto your people: if you will be pleased only to allow them some Corner of your Country, to build a Temple in, and to enjoy that liberty which hath cost them their Country. Once more, I advise you to beware how you refuse those Favours which the Gods do offer you, and know that the Goddess whom I adore does promise you by me, to make your Country so famous over all the World, if you receive us favourably, that it shall excell all other parts of the World. Aristonice spoke this with so good a grace and so much authority, that all the Company were much moved, and especially the King: And he answered the Prince of Phoeceus and Aristonice with all imaginable sorrow, and presently consented that their Fleet should enter into his Ports, upon condition that there should be but a certain number of armed men in every Ship: And as for giving them a place to inhabit, he told them, that he would assemble the Sarronides and confer with them.

In the mean time, he would permit them to hope for a favourable answer. Since, Madam, this word Sarronides may perhaps be a stranger to you: I think it requisite to tell you that the Sarronides amongst the Gaules in generall, are very like unto the Magi in Persia, with this difference that the Magi meddle only in matters of Religion, and the Sarronides in civill matters and particular differences. This sort of Philosophers, Priests, and Magistrates altogether were first instituted by the third King of the Gaules, named Sarron, who would after his own name have them called Sarroinides: yet there were some part of the Gaules where they were called Drauides; because in the Raigin of one of their Kings, called Drui, he would have them called so. They also are divided into severall orders, and into severall names, for those who do officiate in Sacrifices, are called Vaces: Those who study the knowledge of naturall things, are named Eubages, and those who are appointed to sing the Heroick Actions of virtuous men, are called the Bardes. As for those who bear the name of Sarironides, or Druides, since they are the most knowing of all, they are called as I said before, unto the Councel of Kings to render Justice, to teach the people, and particularly to instruct the youth. 'Tis true, that among the Segonigians all these severall names are not used, as they are amongst the Celtique Gaules the Belgique Gaules, and amongst the Allobroges which are other Gaules: But the name of Sarronides only amongst this people, doth comprehend them all.

The King then having referred this business unto his Councel which was composed of these Sarronides: The Princess Cleonisbe seemed to be well satisfied therewith, assuring Onesicrite that those men who taught humanity unto others, would advise the King her Father as she should desire, promising her to sollicite them in the business. Page 108 Carimantes for his part did promise the same: Afterwards the King talking one after another with the Prince of Phoeceus, Aristonice, Onesicrite, and Menedorus he was so extremely well satisfied with them, that he could not chuse but give them great Commendations. Moreover Madam, we were so happy in pleasing all the Court, as I may well say, never strangers were so little strangers as we were there: for we found such earnestness to do us good Offices, that there is great reason to believe it was the act of the Gods to dispose all hearts unto our good reception.

In the mean time, the King thinking these storm-shattered people to be in need of rest, he commanded that the Princess Onesicrite should be carried unto a fair Chamber next Cleonisbies; and that all the rest of the Ladies with her should be lodged as conveniently as might be, as well as the Prince of Phoeceus and Menedorus: Commanding afterwards that all the Fleet should come into the Port which was to little to contain them all: You would wonder, Madam, if I should tell you how carefull Cleonisbe and Carimantes was, to see the King obeyed: for it is hardly credible, that persons of their Quality should be so officious unto strangers whom they knew not; Indeed they gave such express Commands unto all the Kings Officers to wait respectively and magnificently upon these persons, as it was apparent their Merits and Misfortunes did much move them unto Compassion. Glacidia for her part was so full of obliging Acts both towards Onesicrite and Aristonice, and all the rest of their Company as I saw Hipomenes had good cause to tell me, that she deserved the favour of Cleonisbe: for she was so full of all goodness & spirit both, that she purchased much esteem from the Prince of Phoeceus. One passage hapned that night, which since made it evident that the Gods resolved that the Prince should in a short time get much love, much esteem, and much friendship, amongst all these persons who knew him so little, yet in a little time after loved him so much. For, Madam, be pleased to know that as soon as the Prince of Phoeceus knew, Cleonisbe was gon unto her Chamber, he went thither to present his first visit and was accompanied with Menedorus: Whilst Carimantes also went to see Onesicrite, the first time accompanied with Bomilcar. For my part, I follow'd the Prince of Phoeceus, and was a witness of his long discourse with Cleonisbe: In going thither, I acquainted him how Glacidia was Cleonisbes Favourite, and from that time he was very carefull to speak such things of her as might be pleasing after much other discourse, wherein he did very much commend her, and said, that he had observed her to be a person of much spirit and goodness. Oh Sir, said she unto him, do not judge so soon of Glacidia; for I do assure you, that in so short a time you cannot judge of her without much Injustice: since it is not possible, be as ingenious as you can be, that you should know all her excellent Qualities. I assure you, Madam, replied the Prince of Phoeceus, I am confident she hath all she can have, since you love her so well. That reason is not very convincing (replied Cleonisbe very modestly) but to let you see that though I live amongst a people whom the Graecians called barbarous, yet that know who are of merit, I must describe Glacidia unto you; I shall not speak of her Person since you know it already, nor shall I tell you, that I do commend her most for her beauty, though as you see, she is fair, pleasing, and of a <◇> stature: nor shall I acquaint you with the graces of her wit, nor the inexhaustible treasure of it, because I will hereafter hear her Elogy from your own mouth: Neither will I tell you how she has a thousand Excellencies which she never vaunts of, and which out of her modesty she hides: but let me tell you that her Birth is very Noble, and that never any was more solidly generous, nor more truly good: The Quality which I must love in Glacidia is, that she is capable of a most tender and constant friendship, and that never any woman living had a Soul less byassed and interested then hers. Though her Fortunes have met with many Rubs, yet she armed herself with such an invincible patience, as merits the Commendations of all the wise.

In the mean time, her own perplexities did never cause any perplexities in any o[ther]; for she knew so well how to closet up her sorrows in her own heart, that they never appeared either in her eyes, her actions, nor her words: but on the contrary she is continually of such an even temper, as that she seems to take delight in every diver[sion], even when her heart doth throb the most. Moreover the vertue of Glacidia is neither severe nor salvage: and though she seem to be the most serious person in the world, yet none is more knowing in all matters of gallantry then her selfe: But the quality which I most applaud in her is, her justnesse even to her greatest Enemies; For Page 109 she will commend them when any occasion is given, with as much earnest sincerity, as if they had never disoblighd her.

Furthermore, I must acquaint you Sir, that if ever you become one of her Friends, you may be sure that none dare give you halfe commendations in her presence; for she is so sensible and zealous in behalf of them she loves, as she thinks they are never enough applauded: She cannot endure any Raillery upon her Friends: and I assure you, there is not any one in the world has a greater number of them then she: For since Fortune had carryed her into the Court of the King of Celtes, where she continued a long time, and that she hath been since in many severall places, I can assure you, she got friends in all of the best sort: And beleive me, replied the Prince of Pho[ceus], her merits never got her any whom she esteems more then your self: 'Tis true, replied Cleonisbe, that is her error; but I am confident that if her quality were above mine, as mine is above hers, she would love me as she doth. Grandure would never change her, but she would be as just to me as I am to her. She is so reserved (addded she) that if I had not used a little violence upon her, I should not have got her unto this recreation; for she affects home better then the tumults of a Court, which she cannot endure but for my sake. You represent Glacidia so advantageously Ma[dam], replied the Prince of Phoceus, that I must needs think her loved by all the world: And so she is of all that know her, replied she, but yet I assure you she is not prodigall of her friendship, though she be ungratefull unto none; for she is very full of ac[knowledgments], and hates ingratitude as much as marriage, unto which she has a strange aversion. Since you do love her Ma[dam], replied the Prince of Phoceus, shee has need of a gratefull soule, if she will acquit her self of such an obligation: But Ma[dam], I beseech you give me leave to beg a pardon in behalf of all Grecians, for the wrong they have done unto your Nation in calling them barbarous, because for ought I see they are barbarous themselves in saying it, especially if they saw you. No no, replied Cleonisbe, do not unjustly accuse them, for I must confesse we are so, and I must for my own glory confess it; since if I doe merit any commendations, it is only because being born in a Countrey from where all knowledge is banished, yet I have some glimpses and inclination unto all excellencies. But for you who are of that Countrey where all minds are cultivated with care, where ignorance is a crime, where Politeness is generall, and where their discourse is neither grosse, nor stupid, nor rude, how is it possible you can accustom your selfe unto a Court, wherein are so few sociable persons? You see (added she and smiled) that in a short time you have purchased a great share in my good opinion; since one while I tell you that you shall not find us so barbarous as we are believed, and since now I confess that we are more then is believed. Oh Ma[dam], sayd the Prince of Phoceus, those who can speak as you do, cannot be barbarous; I am sure all Greece would confess it, if they had the honour to see how you excell them in all things. As the Prince of Phoceus was saying so, Carimantes entred with Onesicrite, who would not stay untill the morning without a visit unto this Princess in her Chamber: And Glacidia entring with her, chance did so contrive it, that she did sit next the Prince of Phoceus, who fell insensibly to talk with her in a low voyce, whilst Cleo[nisbe] talked with Onesicrite, and he told her that Cleonisbe had made such an admirable description of her, as he could not think her Glasse could more perfectly represent her face, then she had the beauty of her soule and mind: I make no question re[pl]yed Glacidia, but the Princess can make an excellent description; but I have great reason to doubt whether that Picture which you say she made, do resemble me; for as those are not the best Painters who make pieces like, so I think without offence unto the Princess, that she hath so striven to make Art correct Nature, that she hath done mine not well. But for my part Sir, who have no greater skill in that excellent art then to imitate what I see, I could draw her picture better then she mine. To know that, replied the Prince of Phoceus, you must let me see it; for I think, that I am already so well acquainted with Cleonisbe, that I am able to judg justly.

Doubtlesse you know her beauty, replied Glacidia, and some part of her mind: But Sir, it is impossible you should know the height of that merit which is in that ex[cellent] Princess; and therefore that she may be esteemed by so excellent a man as your selfe, I will do her so much right as to acquaint you with such things of her as you cannot know without the expences of a long experience: It's not enough replied the Page 110 Prince of Phoceus, to tell me what she is, but I beseech you let me know how she came to be what I see she is? Oh Sir, replied Glacidia, you must ask that of the Gods, and they will tell you, that Cleonisbe is a most singular person. Chance hath sometimes brought into this Court, men that are well qualified from all parts of the world; and since the Peace which Bomilcar hath made with the Carthaginians, there hath been many men of that famous Town amongst us. But yet for all that, since the naturall Genius of our Nation is Warr and hunting, I do assure you that Cleonisbe doth me[r]it the glory of that Politenesse which is in her, since the glimpses only of her mind have enlightned all the Court: believe it Sir, you will never see any whom she cannot imitate: and on the contrary, you will find, that those who have any sparks of goodness, have them only out of their designs of resembling or pleasing her. The truth is Sir, she is obliged only unto her selfe for what she is, and by prodigy has more divinity then ever was taught her, and all the vertues were born with her. When I say all the vertues, I say it without any diminution, for I am confident she has them all without exception. I cannot express my delight to heare you speak this of her, replied the Prince of Phoceus; for I do protest, lovely Glacidia, I am already so much devoted unto the glory of that Princess as I should exceedingly grieve to discover any fault in her: I assure you, replied she, you shall never grieve at that, for I am most confident you will never find any. The truth is, Cleonisbe is generous in the highest degree of generosity: She loves glory above her selfe: She is pittifull, even so farr as to disturb her own tranquility to procure it in others: She is all goodness, all tenderness and sweetness, and yet her great soule is most herique and courageous. Moreover, she speaks with as much judgment as wit, and with as much eloquence as judgment; her very tone and accent doth express part of her goodness; for she hath such a kind of feeling and passionate sound in her words, as makes it evident her heart is neither fierce nor proud.

Furthermore, though amity be a quality which is seldom found in persons of her birth and condition, yet it is not so with Cleonisbe; for she does so closely love those whom she thinks worthy of that honour, as I must needs commend her for it above all things in the world: The truth is, she is none of those who thinks their quality may dispence with the true laws of friendship, and that equality ought always to be in the minds of such as love truly: But on the contrary: Cleonisbe thinks her self obliged to love as much as any other loves her: she permits one to chide her if she faile in any point of true friendship: And she knows so well how to put a difference between the King of the Segoregians daughter, and Cleonisbe, that one cannot sufficiently admire her. Moreover, though the temper of this Princess be something inclinable unto me[lancholy], yet no person upon Earth had a sweeter Jocundry of mind then, she, nor who better pleased those unto whom she was freely pleased to communicate her selfe; and she knew so well how to turn any thing which she saw or heard in a witty and pleasant manner, as I do not think any in the world could be more knowing merry then she.

Again, she is liberral after so noble a manner, and knew how to make her choise with so good a grace, that her gifts never moved any to murmur, but such as were unjust or envious. As Glacidia said so, Bomilcar who was next her, and partly o[ver]-heard her, because her zeale made her louder then she intended, he came and told her in her eare, for heavens sake Glacidia (sayd he unto her) let time make known unto Cleonisbe, a man who I fear knows her too well already. This saying of Bomilcar causing Glacidia to laugh, he was moved to grumble a little: But as she was turning again towards the Prince of Phoceus, Cleonisbe began to talk unto her, so as their discourse was for that night interrupted, and presently after, every one returned unto their Chambers. But Hipomenes & I did not part so soon; for since by speaking Greek, we came to be acquainted, and to know that his Father and mine had been old friends, we found many occasions of discourse. But since I knew how much it concerned us to know the state of that Court wherein we were, especially considering we hoped for a Sanctuary in it, I carryed him unto the Chamber of the Phoccean Prince, who being very importunate with him to know things, he satisfied his curiosity. You come hither Sir (sayd he unto him) most opportunely to see this Court in its greatest glory that ever it can be, and also to see it in the greatest disorder, if the Gods do not give order unto things; for Sir, you must know that the Segoregians have a custome Page 111 which is peculiar unto themselves; which is, that the men do never make choise of those they are to marry; but it is the women, who make choise of their Husbands: and by the Laws of the Country a Father is never to force his Daughter. The same Laws do also require, that the Daughters of their Kings should have the same liberty which others have, and that when they have accomplished the age of eighteen years, they are to make choise of their Husbands, provided they be of Quality proportiona[ble] unto their own: Insomuch as since it is not above two moneths before Cleonisbe be at her age fit to make her Choise, all the Grantees in the Kingdome, and also of our Neighbors which can pretend unto that honour, are here at this present, amongst which Cleonisbe must make one happy, and all the rest miserable. For, to be open to you, Bomilcar who has a most extream ambitious soul, is extremely in Love with her: A Prince of this Country named Bretomartes is the like: and another Prince amongst the Celtique Gauls no lesse then he, whose name was Galathes, so as in all likelihood these three Rivals will divide the Court. In the mean time, we are all Feasts and Di[ver]sions in expectation of this grand Feast, which must be so sad unto many.

Whilst Hipomenes was thus talking, the Prince of Phoceus did hearken with as much attention as if he had been already interested in the choise which Cleonisbe was to make. I beseech you, sayd he unto him, is it not guessed whom the Princess will make choise of? No Sir, replied Hipomenes, for she has thus long lived in such a way as makes it believed that she cannot choose any to her satisfaction; but on the con[tra]ry seems to be very melancholy since she sees the time of her election draw nigh: Yet certain it is, that since she is much obliged unto Bomilcar, it is probable she will make him her Choise: For the truth is, he hath behaved himself most gloriously both by Land and Sea, in the service of the King her Father. It was by his only meanes that the Peace was made between the Carthaginians and us: His Father was also the cause of another Peace, which gave name unto the Princess Cleonisbe; for having con[cl]uded the Peace by his wisdom, it chanced so that the Segoregian Queen being brought to bed that day of the Princess, the King to confirm the alliance between these two Nations, did give her two names, to wit, the one of her Country, which was Giptis, and the other of Carthage, which was Cleonisbe. But since the last of these was more agreeable then the first, she would always be called by it, so as the Carthalginians are still more obliged by it. Bomilcar was much joyed that the Princess would bear a name of his Country: But as for her Sir, I do not think she loves any thing but glory; and though she has the free liberty of her Choise in her selfe, yet she will choose none but whom the King would have her. And it is visible that Bomilcar, Bri[tomartes], and Galathes, do as much Court the King and Carimantes, as they do Cleo[nisbe]: Also they are very obsequious to please Glacidia; but to speak the very truth, all their endeavours that way are to no purpose, for she fancied none of their Coun[cells]. Since there are abundance of people about the King, replied the Prince of Pho[ceus], I doubt you cannot hint unto me which was Britomartes, and which was Gala[th]es. The first of these replied Hipomenes, is a great black man, and handsom, who has a surly and prod Garb, who stood behind the King when you talked with him: And Galathes was he who had a gold chain fixed to the pomell of his sword, which was a lion of the same mettle, who is of a middle stature, whose hair is faire, the aire of his Countenance very sweet, and his Garb noble. If these two Rivals of Bomilcar replied the Prince of Phoceus, have minds sutable unto their bodies, and hearts as high as their Garbs, I conceive they have all three great cause both to hope and to feare: Certainly replied Hipomenes, they are all three persons of great minds and courage, though they do not resemble each other.

Britomartes is a man of courage, honesty, and wit, but there is a mixture of Gaulish roughness in him which does not please. As for Galathes, doubtlesse he has a great heart, but subtle withall, and I believe that Gaule is able to over-reach a Grecian, he is pleasing civill and full of flattery: and though his aspect doth promise all the sincerity which is attributed unto his Nation; yet certainly he is one that doth least discover his thoughts. But as for Bomilcar Sir, it may be sayd, that if some of his ambition were taken away, there would be no fault left in him, for he was as va[ll]iant as any could be; He is generous, and a most zealous friend; he is liberral and ci[vil]; he is most exact in performance of all his promises, striving to be above his pro[m]ise. He is a man of great wit, his frequency in the world, his travells and his naturall Page_112 Genius made him able to speak admirably well. But yet for all that, the activity of his temper being joyned unto two most violent passions, did make him perpetually restless, so as he was not able to stay long in any place, unless with Cleonisbe or Glacidia, whom he esteemed very much: Your character of Bomilcar replied the Prince of Phoeus, makes me think him fit to be preferred before the other: Yet I am sure, replied Hipomenes, that he is in great feare not to be chosen. After this, since it was very late, we left the Prince of Phoeus, yet he would not go to bed untill he knew that our Fleet would not depart from the Isles untill the morning, and then they came into the Harbour a little after the Sun was up.

In the mean while, since the beauty of Onesicrite had most sensibly touched the heart of Carimantes; and since for her sake he was zealous in the protection of this Phocensian Collony which had forsaken their Country, he no sooner knew that Clelonisbe was awake, but he went unto her Chamber, to desire her, that since she was in favour with the chief of the Sarronides, she would go unto him before the King had consulted with him, and know of him whether these strangers were to be received or no, and to perswade him to let them inhabite in the Land.

Since Clelonisbe had observed that the beauty of Onesicrite had extraordinarily pleased Carimantes, she looked upon him and smiled: methinks, sayd she unto him, that in lieu of bidding me go to the chief of the Sarronides, and negotiate for an entertainment of these, you had better have bid me negotiate for a stay of that faire one only, whom you gazed upon yesterday with so much admiration. Indeed Sister replied he, I must ingenuously confesse, that the greatest part of my compassion upon those miserable strangers doth proceed from the admiration I had of Onesicrite, whose beauty I confess hath surprized and charmed me. But you may well think (added he) that I am not desperately in love with her in so short a time, or at least I think so: yet I must confesse unto you, that I do already love her so much, that I cannot endure a person of her quality and beauty, should after a tempestuous storm at Sea be reduced unto such extremity at Land, as not to know where to inhabite. And therefore since my admiration doth beget so much pity in me as that I cannot rest I conjure you to do as I desire: And I do protest unto you, I am so desirous to effectuate this design, that I wish with all my heart you were as compassionate of the Phocean Prince and his misfortunes, as I am of Clelonisbe and hers: As for matter of compassion (replied Clelonisbe, and smiled again) I assure you that I am as inclinable to it as you; but I would have it of another nature then yours, which is caused rather by the greatness of Onesicrites beauty, then by the greatness of her misfortunes. However, I beseech you believe, that I have so much pity as willingly to consent unto your desires: And in my opinion, it would be advantageous unto the King, that men so civilized as these whom the Sea has cast upon us, should qualifie the rudeness of this maritime People which inhabite along this Coast.

Carimantes being of a hot composition, and full of impatience, he told the Princess his Sister that Time was not to be delayed, and therefore something must be done immediately; adding that the King must not know that she had seen him whom they intended to employ in the business: So that upon a serious examination of the business, they resolved that Clelonisbe should send for Glacidia, and desire her to go unto this chief of the Sarronides, who dwelt one part of the yeare at that Tower which was built upon that Mountain which I told you we saw upon the right hand as we came from the Isles unto the Port. But because Carimantes would have Onesicrite and the Prince of Phoeus know what they did for them; he contrived it so by the means of Hipomenes, that I should go with Glacidia to be a witness of what she sayd: so that after she had received her instructions from the mouth of the Princess, I went along with her in her Coach without any other company but one woman and two footmen, and came to the foot of that Mountain which as I told you was full of Pine trees. When we came there we must go on foot, for the Mountain was so rocky and uneven, that a Coach could not passe: But to avoyd the inconveniency of this rugged way, we found horses to carry us a foot-way out of the wood and better halfe of the mountain, whose top was so steep the horses had much ado to climbe it: so that Glacidia alighting from the Horses, we went the rest of the way on foot; which was not so difficult as one would imagine it, by reason of a pair of stayrs in a Rock which makes the rise more easie, there being at severall distances little houses sustayned by Page_113 pillars, wherein those who climb the Rock may rest themselves in a shade. Thus going by this odd kind of way, I helped Glacidia to climbe; who talked to me so pleasantly, that I climbed this mountain, and never looked back, though it be a naturall action in all that climb, to look down upon a place from whence they came: so as since we never rested untill we came unto the last of these little houses, which was not above twenty Paces from the Tower, it was only there where I enjoyed the most pleasant prospect in the world.

The truth is Madam, I do not think that a sweeter object was ever seen then from the height of this mountain: For imagine you saw a most admirable Port in which was a most prodigious number of Ships; and to render the Prospect more beautifull, imagine a vast number of Cabins, which seem a long and large City wherein Fishers inhabite along the Sea side: Beyond which is a most pleasant Country; On the other hand are the three Isles whereof I spake, which please the eye exceedingly. A little more on the left hand, one may behold barren Rocks, and a County so wild and salvage, as if one were in a Desart a hundred thousand Furlongs distant from any habitation, but turning on the other side, one may behold all opposite objects: A Countrey as fertile as the other is sterile, and as pleasant as the other is wild. One may behold Gardens full of Oranges, Meadows, Hills, Valleys, and all that can make a countrey delightfull: beyond which, might mountains be discovered afar off, which seemed to be so piled one upon another, and in such fantastical figures, that they much pleased the eye, and did limit the prospect that way. And look but towards the Sea, and it is very delightfull, because it is continually full of Fisher-boats.

I beseech you Madam, pardon my tedious description of this pleasant Mountaine, where I stayed for Glacidia; and to repaire my fault, I shall not trouble you with any thing I saw in the Tower which served for the habitation of him unto whom we went, whom we found ready to go unto the King, who had sent for him.

This grave Sarronide, whose wise and serious looks had a mixture both of grandure and pleasingnesse in them, did receive Glacidia with all possible civility, and sufficiently testified by his expressions that he much esteemed her. But after the first Compliments were over, and Glacidia had presented me unto this sage Sarronide; after she had in few words declared our misfortunes, and had told him the reason why Clelonisbe had sent her unto him, she joyned her perswasions unto her prayers, and used such Rhetorical arguments, that though his soule had been of the most flinty composition in the world, she would have melted him into pity of so many miserable people. Do not think (said he unto her, after she had spoken her mind) that all your words were needfull to perswade me unto what the Princess desires: For I do professe unto you, that as soon as ever you began to speak, I was resolved to do what you desire, but I must confesse I took so much delight in hearing you, that I could not find a heart to impose silence: and indeed I was glad to receive instructions from you, that I might the better know what arguments to use unto the King, and perswade him unto what you desire: Oh Father, replied Glacidia (for so out of reverence she termed him) do you not feare to puffe one up into a vanity of conceit by speaking thus? You Sir I say, whose words are so infinitely? No, replied he, never feare it, for I am so well acquainted with the solidity of your vertue, that I feare no such weakness in you. However, you may assure the Princess that I am so infinitely joyed to receive such commands from her, as I can obey with much delight: Tell her further, that I am abundantly satisfied to see her so sensible of the miseries of poor unfortunate people, for humility and compassion are Qualities so hard to be found in persons of her Rank, as I cannot enough admire and honour her for it. And therefore Daughter (added he) I advise you contribute all your endeavours unto the cherishing of such a noble and laudable disposition in her, omit no occasion of commending her for it or any vertuous quality: and also be sure you blame her boldly and home, when you discover any obduracy or inhumanity in her: The truth is, you cannot do her better service, then to infuse pity into her soule: I know very well, that Clelonisbe needs none of these precepts; yet I am such a professed Enemy unto all such as are not sensible neither of publique nor private misfortunes, that I do every day tell my selfe as much as I desire you tell Clelonisbe, lest I should insensibly become not compassionate enough. And therefore (said he, and turned towards me) do not think I would have Glacidia exhort Clelonisbe unto any goodness because she wants it; but know Page_114 that I do it only, because I am perswaded that Princes & Princesses can never have too much of vertue and goodness. For to be just unto Clelonisbe, I beleive she has all the virtues in a high degree; and that her compassion extends it selfe so far, that she never knew any unfortunate person whom she did not pity and help also, if she could. After this, Glacidia confirming what he sayd, I added what I conceived might be advantageous unto the Prince of Phoeus, the Princess Onesicrite, Aristonice, Sfurius, Menedorus, and all the Fleet in generall. Thus Madam, our business being well dispatched, we returned unto the Castle to give an account of your voyage unto the Princess Clelonisbe, who sent immediately unto Carimantes to tell him that the chief of the Sarronides was pliant unto his desires, appointing me to acquaint the Prince of Phoeus, and the Princess Onesicrite what she had done for them.

In the mean time the progress of our business was not so suddenly resolved upon: For the King being desirous to assemble many Sarronides to consult upon such an important business, it could not be concluded untill the expiration of eight dayes: not but that he had already conferred with that old wise Counsellour with whom Glacidia had spoken, yet he would not absolutely determine any thing before he had assembled the Councell, with whom he used to resolve upon matters of great consequence. In the interim, he treated us exceedingly well, and received all the persons of any Quality which were in our ships, when the Prince of Phoeus presented them unto him, especially Sfurius: In so much, Madam, as therefore being an infinite number of persons in our Fleet, all the Fishers Cabins were full of Greeks, who being very desirous to be entertained in so good a Country, did so flatter up their Landlords, and recompence them so liberally for every thing they took, that the People did much forward the King in his Resolutions, and to say that he must let us live in their Countrey, which we should make much better then it was: For our ships being much better built then theirs, our Arms handsomer and better wrought; they sayd that we should better them in their Arts, and teach them the use of Olives, whereof that Countrey was full, and which they yet used only as an ornament: so that in eight dayes all the people were so desirous to have us dwell in their Countrey, that they sayd aloud, If they would not permit them, they would put fire unto their Ships, and hinder them from going away. But the thing which most prompted them unto this resolution, was a report that there was a great Goddess who assured them they should be favourably received, and that on the contrary, if they did not receive us, they should be involved into all manner of misfortunes.

In the mean time, this Castle of the Kings being neer a great Town, all our persons of any quality were conveniently lodged: And Madam, whereas it is the custome of all strangers to conform themselves unto the habit of that Country where they are, it was not so with us: but on the contrary, in three days the whole Court was got into the Grecian mode: For there being in our ships men of all professions, there needed no more time to satisfie the desires of the Prince Carimantes and the Princess Clelonisbe, to leave the habit of their own Country and take ours, which indeed did become them much better then their owne. However, during the eight days which the King took to give a definitive answer, the Court was full of Pleasures and Diversions: In all which Aristonice had no share; for she with her two Companions employed all the time in prayers unto the Gods to move the Kings heart; so as having caused the image of Diana which she brought from Ephesus to be put in her Chamber, she was continually at her Devotion whilst we were all at our Pleasures.

'Tis true, the Prince of Phoeus and Menedorus, did not relish their Pleasure with a full gust; for the first of these felt love to grow in his heart; and the second began to be jealous to see how earnest Carimantes was to please the Princess Onesicrite. Bomilcar also, perceiving that the Prince of Phoeus looked upon Clelonisbe, like a man who was in love with her, had some restless disposition to wish that the King would not permit us to live in the Land. Yet he was so generous as not to wish our ruine, for I do beleive he was fearfull to incur the displeasure of Carimantes and Clelonisbe, if he had negotiated any such thing.

On the other side, Carimantes having discovered that Menedorus was in love with Onesicrite, and also observed that she did cast a favourable eye upon him, was vexed to the heart, that he could not retaine the person which pleased him, unlesse he retained the person also which displeased him: But in conclusion, seeing he could not Page_115 lose the one, but he must lose the other also, he chose rather to endure the sight of Menedorus, then to lose the sight of Onesicrite. As for Clelonisbe, she took abundance of delight in the conversation of the Phocean Prince, and in the company of so many pleasing persons who were with Onesicrite, and thought her self infinitely happy to see in her Fathers Court so many men so qualified, as she fancied all compleat men ought to be.

As for Britomartes and Galathes, they thought upon nothing but how to be chosen by Cleonisbe, when the hoped for time was come; for though the last of these perceived as well as Bomilcar that the beauty of Cleonisbe had reach'd the Prince of Phoeus his heart, yet he never feared a weather beaten Prince whom a tempest had cast into the Court, could ever prejudice him: Thus he knew that he had a Rival, and was never troubled at it: And I assure you Madam, that Bomilcar and Galathes were not so much perplexed to discover that the Prince of Phoeus was in love with Cleonisbe, as the Prince of Phoeus was at his being in love with that Princess; for he was extremely restless when he heard all the Sarronides were come, and that the next morning would be the fatal time of the Kings positive resolution, whether they should be entertained or excluded the Country: When he first heard this news, he was with Cleonisbe, whom he courted very assiduously during all these eight dayes; and he was then with her without any other company but Glacidia, who acquainted the Princess with the coming of the Sarronides; and I understood from that discreet Lady how the Prince of Phoeus hearing that he was to receive his doom the next day did blush exceedingly; Also I understood from her, how extremely his heart was perplexed when he considered, that perhaps to morrow he should be forever banished from his adored Princess, in whose sight he took such infinite delight. This thought did not only beget a disorder in his heart, but it forced him to discover some part of his thoughts. It is to morrow, Madam, said he unto her, that must make me either happy or miserable, when I shall either have a Country which is dearer to me than my own, or shall be a vagabond, and a fugitive: But more than that, I must have the happiness to see you all the days of my life, or the misery to lose the sight of you forever. And truly Madam, if the last of these be my fate, I shall complain against the compassion which you have had of so many miserable people; and shall be sorry that the Port unto which you brought us, was not a Rock to split our whole Fleet, and so disable us for a departure from that Country, where something is to be seen, which doubtless cannot be seen in any other place of the world: Do not think Madam (said he unto her) that it is the purity of your Ayr, your Sun, your Oranges, your Pomgranats, your Lawrels, your Myrtles are such from which I should be sorry to be banished: No Madam, these are nothing, but it is from the divine Cleonisbe, who cannot be found in any other place of the world; It is she only that my soul cannot depart from, without a sea of sorrows. I am very sensibly obliged unto you Sir, replied Cleonisbe, for preferring me before so many excellencies which beautifie our Country: and for that the obligations which you think you have unto me for affording you some assistance, should move you unto so much friendship to me: I assure you I accept of your esteem very kindly, and wish with abundance of Passion, that the King my Father would do as I would, were I in his place, and which truly I believe he will. Truly Madam, replied Glacidia, you need not doubt it; for I believe your mediation and the Prince Carimantes will so work, that there will be full satisfaction unto the Prince of Phoeus. I pray unto the Gods it may, replied he, yet I cannot choose but feare it, and shall be in a restless impatience untill I know the Kings resolution, assuring you Madam (said he unto Cleonisbe) that I never desired any thing in my life with so much zeale as I do, to continue in a Country which is so dear unto me. Oh Sir, replied Cleonisbe, your expressions are above belief; for I am confident, that if a ship should at this very hour arrive from your own Country, which should bring you news that your Conquerors are conquered, that your Country is out of servitude, and that you might safely return unto Phoeus, you would return thither with joy, and leave us very willingly. Oh Madam (said he) I cannot be so generous as you imagine mee; the love of my Country is not so much in my heart as you believe; Yet it is both natural and just to love ones own Country best, replied Glacidia; and to tell you truly, it is to be thought that a Prince who seeks for liberty by such a dangerous way as this you take, does prefer his Country before all things else whatsoever. Page 116 The truth is, replied he, that when I came from Phoeus, I had such thoughts as I ought to have, and such as you think I have; but it is also more true (if there be any difference in truth) that I am now a Phocencean or an Asian Greek, but all my thoughts run upon your Oranges and Myrtle trees.

If any of us Gauls (replied Cleonisbe, and smiled) should chance to be driven by fortune either into Asia or Greece, I am sure our Civility and Complacence would not be so great as yours but we should prefer our own Country before all the world. However, added she, I perceive we love so well to be flattered, that though we know all obliging expressions are not positively true, yet we give them a willing hearing: and certainly there are many truths which are nothing so pleasing as this obliging untruth which you now tell me. If what I speak Madam be not a truth, replied the Prince of Phoeus, then there is no truth in the world. Since none are brought to unspeak those Prayes which they give in speaking unto the person whom they praise, replied she, I will not press you any further to confirm this pleasing untruth by adding another, or that you should unspeak it: And therefore I will believe, that since you have left none in Phoeus, and since all your friends have followed your fortune, you look upon the place where you see them as your own Country, where ever it be. I must confes Madam, replied he, that if all the persons who were here; or if you please in the Isle of Cyprus, which is the most pleasant in the world, I should not then speak as I do: Glacidia knowing very well, that Cleonisbe would be very glad that this talk were broken off, because she did not love to be commended to her face, begun to alvert it handsomly. Methinks, said she, that what the Princess hath said deserves much consideration, and that her distinction deserves some inquisition. For truly, I would gladly know whether this affection which every one has unto his own Country, be caused by those who inhabit in it; or whether it be the Land, the Sunne, the Aire, the Sea, the Rivers, and the Towns which so ties them unto it: and whether it be the living Country (if I may call it so) or the inanimate Country which moves this great tendernes to it? I know very well (added she, and addressed her self unto Cleonisbe) that to speak in generall, these two things are joyned together; but since it appears by the example of the Phoccean Prince, that Fortune hath separated them, since all the Inhabitants of Phoeus are here, and the Town of Phoeus where it was, I would gladly know whether if he found an habitation so good and convenient as it was, he would desire to return into his native Country; for if so Madam, then it must be concluded, it is not only his Kindred and Friends which makes him love his Country, but it is as well the place it self where he was born, as they.

For my part (replied Cleonisbe) I am perswaded that there is a genius, a natural instinct which draws us to affect the places of our Nativity, as well as the persons which inhabite there: And that our Aire, our Sun, our Sea, and our Land are more really our Country, then our Kindred, Friends, and fellow-Citizens: For truly, our Kindred die, our friends do often faile; our fellow-Citizens are often wicked men, and sometimes our Persecutors: But the other things which I named before, they never change for us, and we ought never to change for them. So I conclude, that though to speak of a Country in generall is meant, an assembly of People who live in the same Land, and under the same Laws; yet the most indissolvable part of a Country is the circumstance of place, and not of persons, because the one may change and be dissolved by strange accidents, but the other can never alter; for the same Sun which gives Rubies to your Pomgranets, and guilds your Oranges, the very same Sun shines upon them, and will eternally.

Your arguments Madam, replied the Prince of Phoeus, are very good, and full of wit, yet my experience tells me it is not so alwayes: For I do protest that if I could obtaine liberty to dwell here, I should never lament the losse of my Country, nor that stately Town I quitted, or any thing else which makes such a Country as this unalterable.

For my part, said Glacidia, I am not of your mind; for there is such a sympathy betwixt my Country and my selfe, that I would defend it in every thing, thinking if I should live any where else, I should never live at rest; not that I could easier part with my Friends then from our Oranges: but my meaning is, that the Princess hath great reason to say, that we are tyed unto places as well as Persons; and that a native Country is to be preferred before any other though more pleasant. I should be extremely Page 117 ashamed, replied the Prince of Phoeus, to entertaine thoughts opposite to those of a Princess so wise in all things, and unto a person so judicious as Glacidia; yet I am so far from being ashamed of an opinion which is good, that methinks I merit some honour for making my selfe a way so extraordinary, and for not being culpable of such a kind of love unto ones Countrey, as to be tyed unto Rocks and Forrests.

As the Prince of Phoeus said so, Bomilcar entred, unto whom the Princess did put the same Question, not telling him her opinion, nor Glacidias, nor that of the Phoccean Prince; so as he studying how to answer so as might concur with his thoughts of the Princess Cleonisbe: For my part Madam, said he unto her; I am perswaded that one does naturally love the Land where one was born, and that the Aire Suits best with their Constitutions, and I believe also, that the sympathy is so strong, that nothing can quash it, unlesse some violent passion, as ambition, or love. Then according to your rule (replied the Prince of Phoeus faintly) one cannot find any happiness in a strange Country, unlesse some reason of ambition or love do break those bonds which tie them unto their Country. I am so confidently perswaded of it Sir, replied Bomilcar, that whensoever I see any stranger forget his Country, and not to grieve for being out of it, I always conclude him to have one of those two passions in his heart. Bomilcar had no sooner said so, but Cleonisbe blushed, and the Prince of Phoeus observed her; so as seeing the change in her face, he was much joyed at it, imagining that she applied the words of Bomilcar unto her selfe: so in lieu of contradicting him, he extremely approved of what he said; Yet it was in such a facetious way, as one would really have thought that he had no secret design in concurring so easily unto a thing which he might so easily have opposed. So that Madam, Bomilcar unawares was the first who caused Cleonisbe to suspect that her heart had some sparks of love for the Prince of Phoeus: And the first also who gave his new Rival an occasion to make her guesse at his Passion who was the causer of it.

However, after he was retired unto his Chamber, he began to think that Bomilcar had good reason to say nothing was so fit to make one forget his Country then to fall into love in a strange Country: his apprehensions of it was so strong, that he could not sleep, yet his reason did muster up all its forces to oppose this growing passion, but it was grown too strong already to be overcome. What a fondnesse is it (said he unto himself, as he told me afterwards) to be so desirous of dwelling in a place where I find so dangerous a person as Cleonisbe? were it not more wisdom to depart from it as soon as ever I could, and by ship-wrack to quench those flames which scorch me, then hopelesly to expose my selfe unto all the torments of Love? Is not Cleonisbe within these two moneths to make her choise of him whom she pleaseth to make so happy; and can I be so far out of my wits as to think she can choose me? me I say, a despicable exile who has neither Countrey, nor a house to dwell in; who never did her any service, nor can scarcely be admitted to dwell with her. What then should I do, living in a Country where I must sadly see her I love, enjoyed either by Bomilcar or Britomartes, or by Galathes? and yet not dare to murmur at it? For what right have I to oppose their Pretensions? No no, I have none, and therefore if I be wise, I will depart from a place where I can never be happy, and save the King of Segorelgians a labour of consulting with the Sarronides: But dost thou think of departing, wretched man that thou art, added he, when as thy heart tells thee thou art inseparably tyed unto the divine Cleonisbe? Why, whilst thou thinkst thou hast some sovereignty over thy soule, thy desires revolt, thy will mutinies, and thy heart prompts all thy thoughts unto rebellion. Thus Madam, did the Prince of Phoeus strive to resist the inevitable power of Cleonisbes charms: But as I told you, his Passion was grown too strong to be quelled. But on the contrary, it did the more increase by the resistance of his Reason, and he waited untill the next morning in a restlesse impatience, which would not permit him to take any rest: Carimantes for his part was no lesse impatient then he, did as zealously wish that Onesicrite might stay there, as the Prince of Phoeus wished for himself.

On the other side, Menedorus wished themselves were banished: Bomilcar would not have been sorry if they were, and Galathes would have been glad of it. Cleonisbe would have been angry at it as well as Glacidia: and Britomartes alone was indifferent in the businesse. Furthermore, though Galathes did not much feare that Page 118 the Prince of Phoeus could hurt him, though he were his Rival, yet he went to sollicite one of the Sarronides, who was to be of the Kings Council, and who was much his friend, purposely to oblige him in opposition to the Phoccean Prince, suggesting all the reason which might move the King not to receive so many strangers into his Country: so as some soliciting for our stay, and others endeavouring to oppose it, I assure you, opinions were never more divided then amongst all those illustrious persons.

In the meane time, the hour of the Councils Assembly being come, Aristonice with her Companions went to speak with all the Sarronides one after another: But in lieu of soliciting them as men who had much power to help or hinder the stay of the Fleet which she demanded; she boldly told them, that it was not in their power to hinder the King from entertaining so many illustrious unfortunate persons, whom the Goddess she adored had sent unto them for their glory, and for the happiness of their Country; and that she came now only to acquaint them, that the first favour she would ask, as soon as the King had received them, should be to give her a place where she might build a Temple unto the honour of Diana. Aristonice spoke this with such a confidence, and so much majesty, that they looked upon her with more respect then before: and since their custom was never to make any great Sacrifice but under Oakes, the proposition of Aristonice did perplex them, fearing to displease the Gods whom they adored, by establishing a new Religion in their Country. But in conclusion, not knowing themselves what opinion they were of, they went unto the King in the Council-chamber, where the Council was to be held, upon which the destiny of so many men depended: And there was such a multitude of all sorts in the Castle, that there was not one corner which was not full of Phocensians and others. But to strengthen our Cause, all the Fishers which did inhabit along that Coast where we landed, hearing that this was the morning on which we were either to be received or rejected, they flocked in great troops into the base Court of the Castle, and demanded to speak with the King, saying aloud that he must receive us, and that they would never let men who could instruct them in so many profitable things go out of their Country.

But the Officers of the Guard having desired them to stay unto the end of the Council, this croud of Grecians and Segoregians mingled together, which made such a hurly burly, were all quiet in expectation of the Kings resolution. We understood since by one of the Sarronides, that the King after he had proposed the business unto them, did expresse unto the Assembly, that he should be exceeding glad (if the good of the State would permit it) to assist so many miserable people, and give sanctuary unto so many illustrious persons as were amongst us; yet adding, that he preferred the good of his people before his own inclinations: & that if they thought it dangerous to receive us, he would endeavour to deny his own desires, and reject us. At the first, opinions were divided: But since the chiefe of the Sarronides was for us, and being a man of a sound judgment and wit, he brought all to concur with him, except him whom Galathes had solicited. But he, since he had the pretence of the publique good to favour the designs of his friend, he made use of it with abundance of zeale against us; and if the chief of the Sarronides had not been as resolute as he was obstinate, we had all been banished. For my part Sir, sayd he unto the King, I know very well that not to consider the miseries of those who desire Sanctuary from you, and to deny their desires doth seem to be a peece of cruelty: But I know also, that considering the dangerous consequences which the favour they aske might bring with it if consensualented unto, there is great reason to deny them: For it is not one particular which demands receipt of you; but it is a huge People, who by their multitudes may become terrible to you, and also by the abundance of good qualities which are attributed unto them; for the more wit and spirit these Greeks have, the more they are to be feared, it not being expedient that your Subjects who are faithfull in their simplicity should become more knowing by the conversation of strangers, lest they should grow mutinous. Do you not see already Sir how these Fishers who use themselves only to their Lines and Nets, begin to meddle in matters of State, and will have you entertayn these strangers, who begin already to have a share in your authority? Moreover these strangers are Rich, they are a warlike People; abundance hath made them luxurious and voluptuous: and it is to be feared, that those who they say can teach all the Page 119 Arts unto your Subjects, will communicate the vices of their Country unto them also: Ignorance and Poverty Sir are good properties to make Subjects obedient: and therefore I conceive that those People who can take from your Subjects these two Properties which makes a Sovereign so absolute, ought not to be received without great and serious consideration.

Moreover, the new Religion of these strangers will either subvert your own, or at least raise abundance of scruples and errors in the minds of your People. And I know not Sir whether they will shake your Throne it selfe: so that in my opinion, to satisfie the rights of hospitality without any danger to your Kingdom, the best expedient were to permit these Graecians to repayr their Fleet, to give them all things necessary for a long voyage, and to let them go and seek a Sanctuary somewhere else; but not to let them inhabit here. This friend unto Galathes was so vehement, that some of those whom the Prince Sarronide had brought unto his opinion, began to waver, and return unto their first thoughts. But this wise and good old man, seeing their minds began to stagger, did answer all the reasons which this friend unto Galathes had delivered. I am not ignorant Sir (sayd he unto the King) that to consider the business in hand with a byassed interest, there is some shew of doubt in it: but I am sure to consider the true grounds of the businesse, and not to be deluded by appearances, there is all the reason in the world to be of my opinion. For Sir, the most ancient of all Lawes, and that which ought certainly to be most inviolable, is the law of Hospitality: and I am not afraid to say, that upon some occasions a King may be more culpable in using Strangers ill, then in using his own Subjects ill.

Moreover, this whole multitude which is used as an argument to hinder your Majesty from being pittifull, is an argument to oblige you the more unto it, since it is more glorious to relieve many then a few.

But to answer positively unto the objection of Feares which this multitude of persons may cause, I only answer thus, that in comparison of the multitudinous number of your Subjects, these strangers are so few and weak, as there is no reason of any fears in the world: Also being of a Country so far distant from yours, and a Country wherein they have no power, they never dare attempt any thing against you, since they cannot hope for any relief from any part; and since it is a most easie matter for you to suppress, whensoever they shall incense you. Furthermore, since all these Grecians have their whole Families in your Land, it may very well be sayd, that you have most sure hostages of their fidelity; so as you may with much lesse danger receive this numerous multitude, then if they were fewer, and had not with them such persons as are most deare unto them, and unable to beare Arms.

Again, I do admire any one of wisdom should say, that the more wit these Grecians have, the more they are to be feared: and that Poverty and Ignorance are two necessary Qualities to make faithfull Subjects. For truly Sir, my opinion is so contrary unto that, as I dare undertake to maintain unto your Majesty, that the greatest care of a Prince ought to be to make his People rich, and to teach them their duty to their King. The truth is, as ignorance will sometimes keep them under, so it will after make them mutiny without a cause: It will make People wilfull without reason: It will fit them for tumults and seditions; it will not let them understand their own interests: It will ruine themselves in ruining the State: and for want of knowledge they will subvert Kingdoms, fall off from their duty to their Sovereigns, and also from their duty to the Gods: So as the link of society being once broken between so many persons whom reason should reunite, it must of necessity follow, there will be an universall confusion which is equally prejudiciall both unto Princes and Subjects. Believe it Sir, the more wit and ingenuity these Greeks have, the sooner you ought to receive them, since though they produce no other benefit unto your People, but to communicate their wit and ingenuity unto them, it is a great benefit since they will teach them to know their duty. Also by teaching your Subjects so many admirable Arts, wherein they are knowing, they will banish idleness out of the Country, which is the most abundant cause of Revolts. And as to that objection concerning the Fishermen, how they should begin already to meddle in matters of State, I must answer, that this beginning of rebellion, is an argument, one should not give a brutish people any cause to know their own strength; so therefore, though only in this consideration I must conclude it requisite to receive the Phocensians, least by incensing the Segoregians, Page 120 they should come to know what they can do before they know what they ought to do, which is one of the most dangerous divisions that can be amongst a people.

Again, as for the vices which are feared to grow out of the abundance of riches; Truly me-thinks their fears go too far, in fearing lest the greatest good of all goods should sow evill in an age or two, and it would be much injustice to reject men who are eminent in a thousand virtues, only because they feare lest the Riches they bring with them should produce some one vice which sometimes does follow them, but are not alwayes Concomitants: also I can answer, that as Riches and abundance have their vices, so poverty and want have theirs also. As the one makes men voluptuous, the other also makes men steal and kill those that are richer then themselves. Now Sir, as to the business of Religion (added this sage Sarronide) I must tell your Majesty, that though I have as much zeale unto my owne as any hath, yet I do believe that humankind is to be found in all Religions in the world; and it were great cruelty to make so many miserable, only because their Religion is different from ours: On the contrary, if we will be indeed zealous in our Religion, we should strive to convert a People who know not the manner of our worship, and to perswade them that our Sacrifices are more perfect then theirs: Thus this argument of Religion which is used to hinder so many illustrious unfortunate People from having a Sanctuary amongst us, is a strong reason why we should grant it unto them.

Also according to the universall opinion of all the Sarronides, it is not fit for men to judg of things which exceed their understandings. but it is their duty to believe, that since the Gods do suffer men in some places to offer unto them innocent victims, and in other places to sacrifice men: In other places they bring nothing unto their Altars but Flowers, Fruits, and Incense: In some places they build Temples unto them; and in other places they are forbidden to build them, and commanded to sacrifice in woods and hills: And thus it is the pleasure of the Gods to be adored in a hundred severall manners. For upon a true examination of the matter, and it being agreed on all sides, that every People do believe that the Gods whom they adore are the makers and masters of Heaven and Earth, it must of necessity be concluded that every People do adore one and the same God under different names, and in different manners: And as there is but one Sunne in the whole world for all People, so also there is but one powerfull Divinity which is to be adored over all the earth. So Sir, it is to be feared that you anger the Gods, if your Majesty should deny a Sanctuary unto men who gave so many testimonies of Piety, since they came amongst us: so as whether you consider their miseries, their virtues, the good of your People, or the glory of your Majesty, I find it most requisite to entertain these miserable men, and to receive them as a happinesse which the Gods have sent unto us.

As soon as this wise Sarronide had ended his Oration, the King did approve of it exceeding well, and there was no further contest about the businesse: so that the Council being ended, the King caused the Prince of Phoeus, Sforius, Menedorus, and eight or ten others the most considerable in their Fleet to be brought in, and told them that he gave them leave to dwell in the Land: and to inhabit in the same place where they landed; this Prince conceiving it most safe for himselfe to let them live together, and not to disperse themselves into his Dominions, because they would not so easily perswade them unto the Religion of their Country.

To tell you Madam how joyed the Prince of Phoeus was, and all the Phocensians except Menedorus, is more then I am able to do. Nor am I able to describe the joyes of Carimantes, Cleonisbe, Glacidia, and all the Gallants of the Court, except Bomilcar and Galathes. But as their satisfaction was great, so that of the Fishermen was greater: And they expressed it by such shouts of joy, as did let the King know that the chief of the Sarronides had prudently advised him. But amongst all that rejoiced at the resolution of the King, Aristonice was in the highest degree, conceiving her selfe very instrumentall in the glory of that Goddess who had so happily guided us. But Madam, not to be over-tedious in particularizing so many useless things unto you, give me leave to tell you, that the next morning the King himself shewed unto the Prince of Phoeus the extent of that ground, and the place where he would permit us to build And to begin the foundation of this Town with an action of piety, Aristonice with her own hand did not only measure out the place where she would erect Page 121 a Temple unto Diana which was neer the Sea side, but also the very place where the Image of that Goddess should stand. As for the Prince of Phoeus, since he ever held Minerva in great veneration having been long at Athens, he set out a place for a Temple to be built to that Goddess: After which the great multitude of workmen amongst us, beginning to work by the directions of the Phoean Prince, one might see that done in a few dayes which one could not believe feasible in many moneths. The truth is Madam, the Graecians did work so very hard, the Segoregians did help them so willingly, and all with so much alacrity and speed, that in one moneth and a halfe we had built two Temples, and a great Town. That which did much facilitate, the Country, which though very fertile was yet so stony, that all our work was to heap so many stones together as we stood in need of. Moreover, since the winds do often use to beat against that mountaine where I told you the chief of the Sarronides did use to inhabit one part of the year; so it chanced that a little while before wee came into that Country, the violence of the winds had so beaten down abundance of wood at the foot of this mountain, and wafted the Trees to the shoare, that we had nothing more to do but to work them up. You may easily imagine, Madam, that this Town was not so stately built as Babylon or Ecbatan: but yet there was not one Greek who had not a handsom and convenient lodging: There was three publique Market-places in this new built Town, which was much more long then large; because having enclosed all the Fishers Cabins within our Circle, we were confined unto that narrowness. There was also good fountaines and an admirable Port; and though its scituation was upon a hanging ground, and consequently a little inconvenient, because the streets were uneven, yet it was very pleasant: though the Graecian Architecture was not set out in its full ornament; for since our Aimes were only for Lodgings; it may be said that they were Cabins regularly built rather then houses; yet they were very convenient and handsome, and seemed Palaces unto Exiles. But Madam, it was a wonder to see how the Greek did strive to get the Segoregian language, and how earnest the Segoregians were to get the Greek, for they did suddenly so perfectly understand each other, that I do not think there is at this time one of the Kings Subjects who does not understand Greek, nor one Graecian who does not understand the Language of that Country where they now inhabite.

As for Aristonice, she cloystered up her selfe within the verge of that Temple which she built as soon as ever it was finished: and not meddling with any thing but her devotion, shee lived in a wonderfull restraint.

In the mean time, since the Prince of Phoeus knew very well that it was not enough to build a Town, unlesse it were governed by good & politique Laws, he began to settle the order of them: and to avoid all envie amongst those who had acknowledged him for their head, he appointed a great number unto the transaction of publique affayres, naming the number of sixe hundred who had determinative voyces in Councell: But for the dispatch of urgent affayres he constituted a number of fifteen without assembling a generall Councell; and of this fifteen there was three with whom he advised in matters of secrecie according to occasions. Thus Madam, this Councel consisting of sixe hundred, out of which sixe hundred was named fifteen, and out of fifteen three, and out of three, one, all which made up but one Authority, was the government of this new Town, whose modell I desire to describe, before I proceed with the love of the Phoecean Prince.

Methinks (sayd Mandana and interrupted him) you have forgot one thing which deserves some curiosity, which is, to tell us whether this Towne was called the new Phoeus, or whether they gave it the name of the Country.

Your question Madam (replied Thrytemes) is more worthy of Curiosity then you imagine, since there hapned a very odd passage about it. For Madam, it was never in the power of the Phoecean Prince to call this Town Diana's Town, as he intended, but was forced to yeeld unto a multitude, who had got a custome of calling it Mar|scilles, having no other reason for it, unlesse the forming that name out of two Greek words corruptively put together, for the one halfe of that name in the Aeolion language signifies Fisher, and the other halfe in the pure Greek signifies to tie: But Madam, to interpret the addresse of the thing a little better unto you, be pleased to know that when our Fleet came to this Port, a great multitude of Fishers were got together to see us land: so as the Marriners of every ship casting out their Cables, Page 122 and knowing them to be Fishers, because they had Lines and Nets in their hands, they prayed these Fishers to tie their Cables unto some stakes which were upon the shore, that they might serve in lieu of an Anchor: so as the two words which they pronounced at landing, that is to say, Fisher, and tie, which in our Language signifie Mar|scilles a little corrupted, they would by all meanes have called the name of the Town thereafter. However Madam, custome was stronger then Reason, and the People more powerfull then the Prince; since being Founder of the Town, he was not able to give it the name he desired; but must permit these two Greek words which had no reasonable signification; be the name of a Town, the government whereof was constituted wholly by reason and Prudence. However Madam, I must return from whence I digressed, and acquaint you with the loves of the Phoecean Prince of Carimantes, of Bomilcar, of Menedorus, of Britomartes, and of Galathes, from the time the King permitted us to stay in the Country: And Madam, I must tell you, that the love of the Phoecean Prince to Cleonisbe, and that of Carimantes to Onesicrite, did extremely increase; for then looking upon the Persons whom they loved as those whom they should see and adore as long as they lived, their Passions were the more inflamed: But this did kindle abundance of jealousy in the heart of Bomilcar, of Galathes, and of Menedorus.

Furthermore, the esteem which the Princess Cleonisbe had already of the Phoecean Prince, did abundantly increase by acquaintance and the friendship which this Prince had with Glacidia, became so great in a few dayes, that she did not value Bomilcar who was most in her favour, at a higher rate, then she did him.

In the mean while, the Segoregian King being returned unto the Metropolis of his Kingdom, which was not above halfe a dayes journey from the place where we landed, he would by all means have the Prince of Phoeus, after he had given all requisite orders for the building his new Town to accompany him, with Menedorus, my selfe, and many others, Sforius staying behind as an overseer of the works.

'Tis true, since the distance was not far, the Prince of Phoeus went thither very oft; but he always made such hast, and chose his hours so conveniently, that not a day passed but he saw Cleonisbe, with whom was Onesicrite, betwixt whom was already an intimate love: Most of the Phocensian Ladies did also follow her, so as this Court did flourish as much as any Court in the world. As for the Prince of Phoeus, he was pleasing unto the King, and universally unto all that saw him, as nothing but his merits were talked of, and he became so familiar with the Princess Cleonisbe, that Bomilcar who had been acquainted with her all his life, was not more: 'Tis true, Glacidia did much contribute unto it; for indeed she was a great admirer of the Phoecean Prince, and being a zealous commender of her friends, she continually talked of him to Cleonisbe. Yet she did not commend him only unto her; for she had e|ver a most charitable desire to unite all her friends as much as she could, and to make them love one another, as well as she did; therefore she spake often of the Prince of Phoeus unto Bomilcar, to the end that begetting an esteem of each other, a friendship might grow betwixt them. But Madam, her good intentions did but halfe hit; for though they had all imaginable esteem of each other outwardly, yet there was an implacable antipathy in their hearts: And I do not think that ever since love and ambition did make any Rivals, there was ever two who mote tated each other, yet li|ved so well together as the Prince of Phoeus and Bomilcar: Doublesse the virtue of Cleonisbe, and the prudence of Glacidia did much contribute to the keeping of Peace and Civility between these two Enemies: But most certainly, if they had not both been most excellently accomplished men, they had not agreed so well. However, as soon as we came to the place where the King did ordinarily reside, we found nothing but feasting and pleasures: and since strangers have any where that priviledg to be shewed all the diversions of the Country, it was unto Onesicrite and the Prince of Phoeus, that the King, Carimantes, and Cleonisbe did shew all the delights of the Court: Yet Madam you must not imagine their Feasts to be so magnificent as those in the Asian Courts, nor in the principall Towns of Greece; but for all that, though they smelt something of the rusticity of their first institution, yet were they handsom and delightful: And the admirable spirit of the Princess Cleonisbe did add much unto their lustre, though in themselves they were but meanly magnificent: For truly their greatest feasts were those of Bulls, of Shepherds, of Fishers, and another which Page 123 had most of gallantry in it, which they called the feast of Flowers, or the triumph of the Sun: The greatest beauty of the first of these feasts, was to see four or five hundred Bulls of a prodigious bignesse, whose horns were painted and gilded who had upon their backs cloaths embroydered with a thousand severall colours, and about their necks garlands of flowers: So as these fierce animals going two by two, and their naturall fierceness being moved by a kind of shrill harmony which those who drive them do make, they make a show so stately, that they move much delight, in passing under the Kings Palace, where all the Court are that day. After which, out of a superstition of the Country, they are carryed round about the Town, where the People do offer them little bundles of fresh grasse; conceiting that if they eate them, they shall have a plentifull harvest, and if they refuse, then not. But this Feast does not end thus; for as soon as these Bulls have gone the round, they choose out twelve of the fairest and strongest of them, and bring them unto a place before the Kings Palace where they are baited. As for the feast of Fishers, indeed it is very delightfull, as that of the Shepherds; for since they are persons of Quality who make them both, there are a thousand pleasant passages to be seen.

But Madam, I will not trouble you with a description of them: But as for the triumph of the Sun, I beseech you give me leave to be a little longer in the description of it, because it was this Feast which gave all those whose histories I relate some light to know the thoughts which they had in their hearts. Since we were there at that time of the yeare when they were wont to celebrate this Feast, wee were all the discourse of all the Ladies in the Country: every one wishing that it might be the Prin|cesse Cleonisbe, who should receive all their honours: For Madam, be pleased to know that since the Sun shines clearer in that Country then any where else, because it is seldom or never obscured by any Clouds, and since there are more flowers there, then in any other place of the world, the Inhabitants do believe it their duty to render hol|image unto that bright Planet: so that every year they engrave upon certain little shells the names of all the Beauties in the Court, and put them confusedly together into a great Basin inlayed with mother of pearl: After which the King puts his hand into the Basin and draws out one; and the Lady whose name is engraved upon that shell which the King doth draw, is she who is destined to represent the Sun, and to receive all the honours which are done unto that glorious Planet which she repre|sents.

The day of this Ceremony being come, chance seconding the wishes of all the As|sembly, the name of Cleonisbe was found upon the shell which the King drew, so as it was the office of this Princess to receive all the honour of the Feast which was to be celebrated eight dayes after, as hereafter I shall tell you: Imagine then Madam, that all the great streets in a great Town were all decked up with Garlands of flowers, from the very tops of houses to the bottom, and all the ground strewd with variety of the same flowers, certainly you would conceit this to be a most pleasant object; yet I am most confident you cannot imagine it halfe so beautifull as it was: However, it being as I tell you, all the Ladies who were not Actors in this Ceremony, stood in the windows which were round about the place where it was to be celebrated, in the midst of which was erected a Throne, over which was a great Canopie, sup|ported by foure pillars, decked with flowers, and wreathed with Mirtle: But the most delectable object of all was, that in the midst of this Canopie was the face of the Sun most admirably represented unto every beholder. For my part Madam, I must inge|nuously confesse, that all I saw this day was so new unto me, and did so exceedingly delight me, as I never in all my life found a more excellent diversion.

But the hour of beginning the Ceremony being come, I saw the gates of the Palace which joyned unto that place to open, and a little Chariot in which was Onesicrite, appeared, who representing Aurora which is always the Usher of the Sun, had gar|m|ents sutable unto what she represented. Her Chariot and Horses were painted with Aurora colour, resembling the Sun a little before it appear in our Horizon: so as Onesicrite both young and faire, she really appeared more fresh then Aurora it selfe which she represented, especially in the eyes of Carimantes and Menedorus, who were both of them more in love with her, and more jealous of each other: But after this Chariot had gone round the place, and vanished out of sight, the Chariot of Cleonisbe which represented the Sun, appeared with so much luster, as I assure you Page 124 this Princess dazed the eyes of all the Assembly. And though the brown beauty of Cleonisbe do not seem very fit for the resemblance of the Sun, yet dark coloured haire did produce the same effect that day, as that dusky Azure doth which is about the Sun, when the Heavens are most serene and cleer, and when that splendent Plan|et is in its greatest lustre; for certainly her haire gave a great lustre unto her. Her Chariot was inlayd with mother of Pearl, and streaks of gold, and done with such art by some Grecian Artists that were employed, as this Chariot by reason of the seve|rrall reflection from the mother of Pearl and some Topazes which were set in severall places, was no lesse glorious then the Sun it selfe: As for Cleonisbe, she was adorned with so many Jewels, that her lustre could hardly be looked upon: And to resemble the Sun which she represented, she wore a sun of Diamonds upon her head: In one hand she held a vessell of mother of Pearl full of flowers, as being the chiefe work of that glorious Star: In the other hand she held the reins of the Horses, whose fineness made worthy to draw the Chariot of the Sun. Cleonisbe being then in such state as I have told you, and the day being as faire and glorious as was possible, that place was an Epitome of the whole world; and she carryed her selfe with such ap|plause, that the Aire echoed with a million of acclamations.

As for the Prince of Phoeus, he was so charmed with the sight, that if he had not already been in Love, he would now. But after Cleonisbe had gone round the place, she left her Chariot at the foot of the Throne which was prepared for her, upon which she ascended by the help of four men of quality who stood at the bottom of the stairs: The dresses of these four men who represented the four seasons of the yeare were very rich. The first was Bomilcar, the second Britomartes, the third Galathes, and the fourth the Prince of Phoeus: Thus Cleonisbe when she was upon her throne, she saw at her feet four slaves, whom Chance had brought together, and whom love had wounded with one and the same Arrow. But perhaps Madam, you will aske me why the four seasons of the year was represented by men: To which I answer that since there was not one Beauty who would represent Winter, Custom brought it in, that this Feast was represent by four men. However, Cleonisbe was no sooner upon her Throne of flowers, but the great Gates of the Palace being opened, there ap|peared thirty persons, every one in a severall little Chariot, which came gently one after another to render homage unto Cleonisbe.

But Madam, that you may the better understand the nature of this homage, be pleased to know, that every one of these faire persons represented a severall flower which they made choise of according unto their fancies: so as these Ladies to signifie the flowers which they represented, had a Crown composed of them on their heads, and another in their hands, their Chariots being trimmed up with the same flowers.

And to compleat the gallantry of this invention, their habits were of the same co|lours with the flowers which they represented, and every one had a banuer on which was a device sutable: Every banner had a flower printed, and some inscriptions un|der it: So that Madam, since the season in which they did celebrate this feast, all sorts of flowers did grow at once in that Country, I am confident a more delightfull sight could not be seen. For I assure you Madam, these thirty Chariots painted, gilded, and trimmed with flowers, did make a most admirable show; and these thirty faire ones, whose Dresses were both gallant and rich, and all crowned with flowers, were beyond all imagination, admirable.

The first which came out of the Palace to render homage unto Cleonisbe, was crowned with Orange flowers, the second Roses, the third Jessimine, the fourth Olives, the fifth with Violets, the sixth with Pomgranets, the seventh with Lillies, the eighth with the ninth with Flower-de-luces, and so with others: so that this lovely Miscellany of flowrie Crowns worn by these Beauties, did make a show beyond all imagination delightfull. As soon as these Chariots came unto the Throne of the Sun, those Ladies which were to represent the flower, wherewith they were crowned, they prepared themselves to render homage: And presenting the Crown which they held in their hands unto one of those men who stood at the foot of the Throne, offered unto the Sun only such flowers as the season which they represented, did produce. So, since there are Orange flowers in Winter, it was Britomartes who offered the Crown, because he represented that season. It was the Prince of Phoeus who offered Roses, because he represented the Spring: It was Galathes who offered Page 125 the Crown of Olives, because he represented Summer: And it was Bomilcar who offered because he represented Autum: For as I have already told you Majdam, there is one season in that Country, in which they have all manner of flowers together.

In the mean time, as these Ladies passed before Cleonisbies Throne, they saluted her, and tendred unto her their Crowns; and they were heaped one upon another with so much Art, That when the last of these Ladies had offered her Garland, there was such a Trophy of Garlands raised unto the glory of Cleonisbe, all whose flags were set in such order, as the mottoes might easily be read. But whilst all these little Chariots passed before the Princess Cleonisbe, and those within them were doing homage unto her, Musique composed of severall Instruments imposed silence upon the People, who made no disorder, because the place was ray'd round about, and hindered them. Nor did the heat of the Sun offend; for this Ceremony was not begun, untill it was declining, and moreover the Palace and houses were so high, as they cast a shadow over all the place; and there chanced contrary to the custome of that Country to be some little Clouds that day, which made a shadow, and one would have sayd that this bright Planet to honour the Feast, had resigned its lustre unto Cleonisbe.

In the mean while, according as these Chariots passed by, they ranged themselves next the Chariot of Cleonisbe, unto which she went as soon as she had received the last homage of flowers. The four Seasons causing to be carryed before her that Trophy of Garlands which were offered unto her: After which these four Seasons did follow her every one in a stately Chariot, entring with her into the Palace Court: so as One sicrite going first in representing the Aurora, the four Seasons followed the Sun, and the thirty flowers the four Seasons.

After which Cleonisbe went to offer this Trophy of Garlands at a Church which was at the furthest part of the Town, and then returned to the Palace where a Banquet was prepared sutable to the Feast, for it was only of fruits, for the custome was for it to be of no other: Yet was it very admirably set out both with rare and excellent fruits, in great abundance and variety, and in most exquisite order. The banquet being ended, they went unto another place, where I saw the finest show that can be imagined; for indeed Madam, all this glorious Troop followed by all the Court, entered into a great Hall, whose sight surprized me beyond my expressions.

Suppose Madam, this Hall to have all its walls of flowers, and the roof supported with pillars of flowers so composed as if they were marble; and from the roof a thousand Garlands and Crowns did hang, composed of Orange flowers and Jessemine: Thus Madam was the place adorned where the Ball was afterwards to be kept; and it was late before the Assembly broke up; for since all the devices which belonged unto these Crowns did furnish out with much discourse upon them, all the men did strive according to their inclinations to applaud those which best pleased them: And amongst the rest that of Glacidia, who represented the Amaranthes, extremely taking the Prince of Phoeus, he did highly commend her unto Cleonisbe, and told her that Glacidia had good reason to make choise of that flower which she represented, since she had given such evident demonstration of the constancy in her affection.

I hope (sayd Mandana, and interrupted him) that there was none of those thirty Ladies which represented thirty severall Flowers, and had thirty severall Devices, which you esteemed so little, as to forget what they were.

Pardon me Madam I beseech you, replied Thymetes, If I should have received the honour to have seen you presently after this Feast, I should have repeated them all; but now at this time I can only remember two of them, and I think Glacidia represented the Amaranthes, with this motto, I never Change.

For since this Flower hath that priviledg never to lose its beauty nor fade, Glacidia made choise of it to express the lastingness of her love to Cleonisbe, and the constancy of her heart. Then there was another Lady of Quality, whose name was Amathilde, who chose that day a Crown of Roses: She was very young and faire, and had such a Page 126 concept of her own beauty as she would often say she would not desire to live but till twenty years of age, upon condition she were the fairest in the world: maintayning very peremptorily, that she had much rather dye young, then live long, since she could not live long and be faire. so as suiting her Device unto her humour, and the flower which she represented, it was this, My Reign is short, but beautifull.

Now Madam, I beseech you excuse me for the rest; for the Truth is, I am forced to confesse unto my shame, that my memory failes me, though I am sure they were all as full of pleasant wit as these I have named. But to return from whence I digressed, give me leave to tell you Madam, that the Prince of Phoeus beginning to commend Glacidia unto Cleonisbe: Truly Madam, sayd he unto her, Glacidia is very happy in being loved by one who knows so well how to proportion her love according to the merits of every one: But I must tell you also, that those who are conscious of their own mirth, are very unhappy; for to live without hopes of your esteem, is a most unexpressible torment. Those who are not worthy of my esteem (replied Cleonisbe; and smiled) do value it so little, as it's likely the deprivation of it never troubles them: and therefore you employ your compassion very ill, if you pity such as are no sufferers, and such perhaps as you know not. I assure you Madam, replied he, I know one who has most strange apprehensions and fears of not obtaining this glorious esteem whereof I speak: Then they must needs have an ill opinion either of me, or of themselves, replied Cleonisbe: I cannot tell Madam, replied the Prince of Phoeus, whether or no they have a bad opinion of themselves, but I am sure they have a very good one of you. As Cleonisbe was ready to reply, Bomilcar according to the liberty of the Ball, did take her out to dance, which did much vexe the Prince of Phoeus; yet it was not long before he had his revenge in the same nature; for after Clonisbe had danced, and Bomilcar had talked a while with her, he took out Cleonisbe to dance from Bomilcar, as Bomilcar took her from him.

In the mean while, Galathes and Britomartes who had also their Pretensions, did both of them easily observe with what an Ayre Bomilcar and the Prince of Phoeus behaved themselves in the business, so as equally to hinder both, they both applied themselves unto the Princess, and would not leave her; so as all the rest of that day none of all the four could speak unto her in private. Though the Prince of Phoeus was an absolute Master of himselfe when he pleased, unlesse since he was in Love, yet he spake but very little, fearing least he should speak too much, and more then he would have either his Mistress or his Rivals to know. But as for Bomilcar, his tongue wasfreer, and he uttered many things, which gave Cleonisbe to understand that he was jealous of the Phoean Prince, though he gave no such language as could anger either her or him: As for Britomartes, who was of a more sincere spirit, and never glossed over any hidden meaning, he set no watch over his words. But as for Galathes, the Prince of Phoeus did easily perceive that he understood Bomilcar as well as him, and that his Passion was not unknown unto him.

On the other side, Menedorus, he was not without his ingenuities; for the Prince Carimantes having thought Aurora that day to be fairer then the Sun it selfe, he was continually with Onesicrite, and talked with her with much delight, whilst Menedorus durst not disturb them. Onesicrite, who observed the disorder of Menedorus, had a desire to break of this discourse; but it was not fit she should be uncivill unto the Son of a King, who had given them a being in his Country; so as she being disordered as well as Menedorus, Carimantes perceived that her spirit was distempered in her discourse, and did guess the reason. Yet he had no mind that Onesicrite should perceive he knew the cause of that perplexity which appeared in her eyes and mind, whether she would or no; but on the contrary, desiring to put it off upon some other cause. I perceive Madam, sayd he unto her, that our Feasts and Diversions do not please you so well as those of your own Country: and I see their simplicity is not witty and gallant enough for your sublime fancy: And Madam, the truth is, Page 127 you have great reason to complayn against the Lot which is used at this Feast; for indeed it was fit you should have had the place of Cleonisbe. Oh Sir, replyd Onesicrite, you do me the greatest wrong in the world, if you think I am not infinitely well pleased with every thing I see here; and you are extremely unjust to say that I should have the Princess Cleonisbes place: you would be much more equitable if you would say I did not merit that which I had: For really, Aurora is a thing so glorious, as it may well be sayd. I had abundance of vanity in me, in daring to represent it: For my part, replied Carimantes, I dare confidently affirm, that if Aurora be as glorious as your selfe, she deserves as many sacrifices as the Sun. Nor do I think (sayd he and smiled) that you would not speak as you do, but because you do not often see Aurora. 'Tis very true, replied Onesicrite, I do see the Sun oftner then I do Aurora, and am fitter to judg of the nights beauty then it. Oh fie Majdam, replyd Carimantes, cease to be so unjust: And believe as I do, that you are absolutely the fairest person in the world: And believe, I beseech you withall, that there is no man upon Earth does more admire and adore you then I do. I would I could perswade my selfe of what you speak Sir, replied she: But when I cast my eyes upon so many superlative Beauties as here are, and remember what my Glasse shews unto me every day, it is impossible any such pleasing flatteries should adde any Joyes unto me: So Sir, since I am forced not to believe you, I am extremely sorry that I cannot be what you say I am: Oh Madam (sayd Carimantes and interrupted her) if you have never any greater cause of sorrow, then at finding your self not lovely enough, you will be ever the happiest person alive: I wish to the gods you could as well know those who love and adore you, as you may know the Charms which force them unto it: Carimantes pronounced these words with so much vehemence, as it was easie for Onesicrite to perceive that he was Love-sick.

But since she would return him no answer, and since Amathilde after shee had danced, did come and mingle discourse with them: but Menedorus was in such an Iguish of mind, as it was evident he found no great joy in the Feast.

In the mean while, Cleonisbe having about her the Prince of Phoeus, Bomilcar, Galathes, and Britomartes, she did so plainly perceive the secret thoughts of their hearts, as that she was much disquieted at them: She observed also, that though there was a great aversion between all these foure Rivals, yet the feud was much more violent between the Prince of Phoeus and Bomilcar, then betwix any of the rest, though she yet observed, that they did infinitely esteem of each other.

Moreover Glacidia, whom she called unto he, did know all this as well as she did. Thus this feast of Flowers did much encrease the Loves and Jealousies of all these Rivals, and made all their thoughts known unto Cleonisbe. But since it grew late, all this faire company broke up, every one carrying with them severall thoughts.

Moreover Madam, as it is the common course of the world to see a miscellany of Joys and sorrows succeeding each other, News was brought the next morning that the Salique Gaules which bordered upon the Segoregiens, and had taken Arms under the pretence of a War with the Tectosages, had now made an eruption into their Frontiers, and had possessed themselves of a very considerable Castle: Insomuch as the King having no Armie in readiness, was a little surprized at the news. Yet since the Gaules are all even born Souldiers, there needed no more but to assemble so many men together, and to have a well-composed Army. Furthermore, the Prince of Phoeus desiring to embrace so fit an occasion of testifying his Zeale and Courage here, did offer the King all the Graecians in his new built Town; telling him it was but just, that those men who had their beings from him, should expose their lives in his service: And indeed, the King having great hopes in our succours, because we were better armed then his Subjects or his Enemies, did accept of the offer from the Prince of Phoeus, at which neither Bomilcar, Galathes, nor Britomartes was veiry glad.

In the mean time, since the time of Cleonisbes choise of a Husband did draw nigh, they could not believe that the Prince of Phoeus was or could be in any capacity of being chosen, nor that the Princess her selfe durst choose him, though she had a mind unto it. For the truth is Madam, though the Law do give her the freedom of her choise, yet commonly they never choose any but by appointment.

Page 128 But not to insist too long upon this, let me tell you Madam, that the Prince of Phoeus had such a desire to serve the Segeregian King, as he left in Marseilles, only old men, women and children, forcing all the rest of what profession or quality soever they were, to take up Arms and follow him, though their new Town was not yet quite finished.

Furthermore, the King, Carimantes, Bomilcar, Galathes and Britomartes mulsterring all the men they could, the Army was very considerable: But since we were better experienced in military Arts then any of them, except Bomilcar, the Prince of Phoeus got great reputation in the first Councell of Warre, wherein also Sforius and Menedorus did worthily acquit themselves.

But Madam, because I will not be too tedious in particularizing a Warr which lasted not above fifteen dayes; give me leave to tell you, that the Army marched towards the Enemy: That the King regained the Castle which the Enemy had taken: that he repulsed them; & entering into their Country, he forced them to beg conditions of Peace which themselves had broken: For the naturall Genius of that Nation is, to be soon appeased and soon incensed: and those who ground great hopes in their divisions, do often find themselves mistaken. However Madam, give me leave to tell you, that the Prince of Phoeus did miracles, such as got him the reputation of one of the most valiant men in the world. Bomilcar also carried himselfe so excellently as the Prince of Phoeus did much esteem him; but this esteem was so farr from lessening the aversion which was between them, that it did the more encrease it: Britomartes also and Galathes did signalize themselves: Carimantes and Menedorus did fight like men that would have Fame speak loud of them unto Onesicrite: And I assure you Madam all the Princes returned back unto Cleonisbe with abundance of glory; And she her selfe did gallantly tell them when they returned, that though Lawrells were very plentiful in her Country, yet she did not think there were enough to make so many Crowns as they deserved. However, maugre the aversion which was between the Prince of Phoeus and Bomilcar they spoke very worthily of each other, and did equall Justice unto both their vertues. But as for Galathes, whose thoughts were different from theirs, and thought it not fit even to commend a Rival, he spoke not one good word of them, but turned them all into Commendments of the Prince Carimantes.

As for Britomartes, he was more sincere, and spoke of things according to his knowledg: Also believing that he should be the man who should be chosen, because he was of that Country; As his hopes were more, so his jealousy was lesse: But that which was the greatest advantage unto the Prince of Phoeus, was, that the King did really think himselfe indebted for the happy successe of this War, not only unto his peculiar valour, but also unto the valour of his Troops: And the very truth is, every one of them had such an earnest desire to testifie their acknowledgment unto the King who had given them a harbour, that they did things beyond all imagination; And he spoke so advantageously of them unto Cleonisbe, as she thought her selfe obliged to look kindly upon the Prince of Phoeus, and tell him of it: But since never man living was in a higher degree modest, which is an infallible mark of heroicke valour, he reverently rejected those applaude which she gave him, and gave her others in such a passionate way, that she repented she ever began to commend him, though she did not repent of her esteeming him, but on the contrary did esteem him much more. But Madam, give mee leave to tell you in the first place; that since our return to the Court, there grew so great a league of amity betwixt the Prince of Phoeus and Glacidia, and between Glacidia and Bomilcar, that it may very well be sayd that Cleonisbe did not love her better then these two Rivals did; and that she loved Cleonisbe no better then she loved them: One might also say, that Fate had a design to have it so, for a hundred severall chances hapned which did so oblige them all unto it, as they could not deny their friendship without ingratitude. By this Madam you may imagine that unlesse she had been a woman of extraordinary prudence, she could never have long continued a friend unto two men who were both Rivals, Enemies, and of ambitious spirits, who wished both of them for the same things, and who thought they could never be happy but by the ruine of one another: yet Glacidia did carry her selfe so exceeding well between them as she never had the least quarrell with either of them: And the truth is, shee was so Page 129 exactly faithfull both unto them and unto Cleonisbe; that though she knew very well what the Princess thought of the Phoean Prince, of Bomilcar: and though she knew what those two Rivals thought of each other, and also knew the passions of their soules, she never told any thing but what might contribute unto their safety, satisfaction, and glory; carrying her selfe so exactly even, that she never gave any of them any cause to suspect she had any thoughts which she concealed: And I assure you, that but for her, there had been some fatall Quarrels between two men in whom both love & hatred was so high. But they were both of them so respective of her, that when they met with one another at her house, they were as civile unto each other as if they had been very good friends, yet had they much ado to be all of one mind: but the Prince of Phoeus was so much master of himselfe when he pleased, that he would by no means quarrell publicly. I remember one day above the rest, I had an opportunity to observe this Antipathy between these two Rivals: For Madam, be pleased to know, that Glacidia being one so ill that she kept her Chamber, much good company came to visit her; and amongst the rest Amathilde of whom I spoke before, shee was there most of the afternoon. I know Madam, you have not forgot how I described her to be both young and faire, and that it was she who was crowned with Roses upon the Feast day. And that she had such a great conceipt of beauty, as that she thought one not fit to live after the losse of it, and consequently that one should not wish to live long, unlesse one had a particular priviledg to be both old and faire. But before I relate the discourse which did evidence the aversion which caused such jealousy and love in the hearts of these two Rivals, it is requisite that I make a more particular description of Amathilde unto you: and that I tell you, she did not only thinke none ought to live longer then they were faire; but also she was in the humour of those who because they are not above sixteen or seventeen years of age themselves, doe thinke four or five and twenty to be old age: and who are so blinded with their owne youth, that they speak of those who are five or sixe years elder then themselves, as if they were people of another generation; that such can have no shares in beauty, and that they can pretend no farther unto it, then to say they have been fair. However; Amathilde was extremely lovely, and few of the greatest beauties did excell her youth.

Now Madam, I must tell you, that Amathilde coming to visit Glacidia, as I entred, I was a witness of this discourse which I am to relate. Shee was no sooner entred, but Bomilcar entred also, and being exceeding tender of Glacidia's health, he asked very earnestly how she did: But Amathilde not giving Glacidia so much leasure as to answer, told Bomilcar that since the sickness of Glacidia had not altered her complexion, certainly she was not very sick, and consequently not much to be pittied: For my part (sayd she in her frolique humour) I always measure my compassion according to the alteration which I find in the faces of my friends when they are sick: and therefore since Glacidia has no yellowness nor paleness in her Complexion; her eyes not shrunk, nor her looks melancholy: and since she has no symptoms of a languishing sickness, let us endeavour rather to divert her then to pity her; for my opinion is, a little pain which does not take away ones beauty, nor ones plumpness, is not to be over-much condeoled. Yet there are some payns, replied I, which are short and violent; and which though no great danger in them, yet deserve some compassion, because they are painfull. However it be (sayd she) what I sayd is my opinion: When one hath as much to lose as you have, replied Bomilcar, certainly they must needs feare such sicknesses, as in one night may blast more Lillies and Roses in a complexion, then a whole Spring can bloom. For my part (sayd Glacidia, and interrupted them) I thinke there needs no more to cure Amathilde of the love she has unto her own beauty; but to wish her only eight dayes of such a sickness as has no name unto it, which without any great paine or griefe will by degrees make one leane, or become yellow or green, and make ones eyes shrink in their heads; their lips look pale, and cause such a sudden alteration, as the fairest would quickly become ugly. Oh Glacidia (cryed she out in a pretty fury) you put me into a most terrible fright, and methinks you have given me this disease by wishing it, and I do already perceive something which makes me change colour. Amathilde at this saying did rise up, and looked upon her selfe in a glass to see if what she sayd was true, though it was only to set her hood in a little better order: After which, sitting downe in her place again; Page 130 Thanks be to the Gods (sayd she unto Glacidia) your wish has not yet taken any effect, nor I hope ever will: but to prevent any more such wishes, know cruel Glacidia, that if ever such a misfortune fall upon me as you wish, I shall thinke I only receive it from you; for since I never had any sickness but once, I thinke my constitution so sound and healthy as I cannot believe any one under poysoning can hurt me: But I beseech you, replied I, did that sickness which you had work any terrible alteration in you? No, replied Amathilde, and laughed, but on the contrary it did me the greatest good in the world; for since I was then a little of too high a colour, it brought me to such a right complexion, that the alteration was to my advantage. This is a great happiness, sayd Bomilcar, that one should grow fairer by sickness. Yet this soundnesse of Constitution, replied Glacidia, which makes her so faire at seventeen, will one day make her ugly, since it will make her live everlastingly. Oh fie Glacidia, replied Amathilde, you are the most cruell person in the world to presage such misfortune unto mee: why (said I and wondered) do you call it a misfortune to live long? As she was ready to reply, the Prince of Phoeus entred, and presently after Britomartes and Galathes. But since the contest between Glacidia and Amathilde was too pleasant to end so soon; and since Glacidia was desirous of some jolly discourse, to prevent her four Rivals from a more serious, she began it again: and looking upon those who newly entred, she told them the cause of the Contest, and the complaint which Amathilde made against her, for presaging that she should live long. If I could live long, and not after replied she, but continue always as if I were eighteen, I should be contented: but to imagine what I shall be when I am old, it is beyond my patience to endure. However, replied Glacidia, I will tell you plainly that you shall never be fairer then you are, and every yeare you live will detract something from your cheeks.

For my part, sayd the Prince of Phoeus, I thinke it abundance of prudence in any one to prepare themselves for such a mischance, and to look for it: He had no sooner said so, but Bomilcar, though he was of the same opinion, yet he opposed it, as if his design were only to take Amathildes part, though indeed it was only to be against the Prince of Phoeus: And Galathes and Britomartes out of resentments of jealousy and love, did not strive so much for a reason of what they sayd, as to be contrary unto the rest. Thus the Prince of Phoeus was sure to be against the opinion of Bomilcar, of Britomartes, and of Galathes: Bomilcar on the contrary was sure to contradict the Prince of Phoeus, Galathes, and Britomartes: Galathes he employed all his wit to thwart Bomilcar, Britomartes, and the Phoean Prince: And Britomartes he would be sure not to concur in opinion with the Prince of Phoeus, with Galathes, nor with Bomilcar.

Thus though it may seem there could be but two opposite opinions upon one thing, yet here there were foure so different, that it may be sayd they were all opposite unto each other, so as for a while this conversation was the oddest that ever was; for no sooner had one of these Rivals given a reason for his opinion, but all the other three did earnestly contradict it: and they did so thwart one another with their severall Reasons, that the dispute was so intangled as they scarce understood each other: In so much as Glacidia, Amathilde, and my selfe could not choose but laugh at them, and they themselves perceiving it as well as wee, could not choose but laugh also: However, to reduce them unto some order in their disputations, Glacidia commanded silence, and told them, that in her intentions of correcting of Amathilde, there needed not so many men talk to her at once: and that it was sufficient if after she her selfe had accused her, and received her defence, they should then speak what they thought good: But I beseech you, said Amathilde, and interrupted them, what can you accuse me of? I can accuse you of an error replied Glacidia, in thinking one ought not to live above five or sixe years: For in your opinion one begins but to live at fifteen, and one must die when beauty begins to fade.

The truth is answered she, that the age which is spent in toys cannot be called haply, no more then that age when youth and beauty begins to faile: But I beseech you, replied Glacidia, let us examine your maximes a little better, and consider I conjure you, how little you have lived happily hitherto, and how little time you have to live; for truly according to your Tenents, your life did but begin at fifteen, and I know you have not lived in full satisfaction; for I remember you, you did not thinke your Page 131 selfe fat enough, and feared you should not be full enough: But now you are grown unto an admirable stature, and it is as pumpt and fresh as the lusty Grape, is it not true, you are in feare of being either too fat or too leane? But though you did not, yet since you thinke five and twenty to be old, certainly your youth will be quickly gone; for if you should deduct from the time you have lived, and from the time, at which your beauty will decay, those days and nights in which you slept ill, those days in which you wore some Gowns which were not well made, those dayes on which you were not advantageously dressed: Those on which you saw no body: those on which you saw only such as did not please you, it will upon this be found, that your life is so short, as can scarcely be sayd you have lived one year. Though I should grant all this, replied Amathilde, yet I should not alter my opinion; for since the very best time of ones life will not afford an absolute happiness, I cannot consent that old age is a thing desirable: For my part, I must ingeniously tell you my mind, that though I never had much beauty, yet I do not wish to live longer then I may be put in the Catalogue of those who have some: For when I concept that my Glasse which shews me some symptomes of youth in my face, will shew also some wrinkles of age if I should live so long, Death seems desirable to me: And I do profess unto you, that when I think upon the difference there is between a Mayd of sixteen and a Wife of sixty, I had rather dye at twenty then live to fifty. I have already told you, replied Glacidia, that the same health which makes you now so faire, will make you live a whole age, and therefore you must prepare your selfe to be neither faire nor young. If ever such fatal misery fall upon me (replied she) I will break all my Glasses in a thousand pieces; I will shun the world as much as it will shun me: and I believe I will never look you in the face again for feare I should see my selfe in your eyes; for really my imagination abhors so strange a Metamorphosis: I have much ado to endure so many Mothers and Aunts, who go in company with their Daughters and Nieces; and do you think I should ever endure it in my selfe? If such an alteration should come upon a sudden (replied Glacidia and laughed at what Almathilde said) I should confesse it were to be wondered at: and if you should go now this night to bed young and faire as you are, and rise the next morning old and ugly, I should then permit you to break some of your Glasses: But Amathilde it will not be so; but when you come unto the first point of your decline, every minute will gradatim steale something from you: so as since the alteration comes undiscernably upon you, and since you see your selfe every day, the change will be insensible: Oh Glacidia, replied she, this can never come to passe; and I had much rather dye young, then it should: What pleasure is it possible I should find in an age, wherein all I doe now, is ridiculous then; when I must change my manner of life; when all the world is weary of me; when I must alter all my cloaths, when colours is not allowable. No no Glacidia, I am not able to endure it; for I must tonfess I cannot change my way of living, and forsake my pleasures: And if you will have me open my heart unto you, I must very ingeniously tell you, that if I should live long, I should not only be ugly, but also ridiculous; for I am confident I should be perswaded to dance at sixty, though I danced by my selfe, and I should wear Jewels and colours untill the hour of my death. The truth is, I should do the very same things I do at this day; for I know no other thing that can divert me.

Really Amathilde (said Glacidia and laughed) you are the strangest woman in the world to speak thus: Yet let me tell you to put you out of all thoughts of dan[cing at sixty; that as the diversions of your infancy are not such now unto you, so those things will not divert you hereafter, which please you now: your pleasures will change with your face, and both with yeares: And when all your beauty is gone, you will think it sweet to live: For my particular, I know that though I live to be extream old, yet I shall wish to be older, though I shall find no other pleasures but to see the Roses blow, and smell the Orange and Jestimine Flow[ers]. Moreover, since age is such a bug-bear to you, do not bestow it so soon upon others: Consider that some women are fairer at five and twenty then at fifteen: Leave your invectives against age I conjure you; for commonly when four or five of young persons are together; you talk as if you would uever be above seventeen; yet at the very same time when you are censuring this Lady to be ugly, and that Lady old* you are drawing towards the same ages your selves. I beseech you replied Amathilde, Page 132 do me the honour to teach me how I must live: you must enjoy your beauty and your youth, replied Glacidia, as two things which you must infallibly lose: And you must bring your selves to such a passe, as to be still amiable when they are lost. I will freely give you leave to enjoy your youth and beauty with all variety of delights, but yet so as it may be without pride, and so as you may part from them without despair: I consent you should gust all the advantages of youth and beauty, with a full swinge; but I would not have you jeer at others who are not so faire as your selues; for cer[tainly it is the greatest folly, and the most unjust thing in the world, to scoffe at what you may be your selves. For if I were to prescribe Laws unto such as delight them[selves in railary, I would make this inviolable, neuer to mock at such things as we may be our selves upbraided with: To play upon such as are stupid and ignorant, there is no danger of any retort, and the like of a hundred examples; But to mock at any woman, because she is not faire or young, is to mock at what you must certainly be your selves; this is a thing I abhor, that such as are neither young nor fair, and yet behave themselves as if they were. When one arrives at the twi-light of Beauty, at the medium between youth and age, when one may choose whether they will pass for young or old, according to their humours, I would then have them incline more unto reservedness, then unto jollity; yet notwithstanding I would not have them despair, nor passe from extremity of mirth unto extremity of melancholy: I would have such renounce all such things which may be handsome when they were younger: I would have them still be handsome, but without all affectation: I allow them all good company: I would not have them strive more to get Lovers, then to keep Friends. I give them the free liberty of walking; that they should have eyes for all excellent objects, and eares for musique when decency and occasion present themselves. So Amathilde depriving you only of a few gaudy Ribbons, and some Lovers, which most of them very likely are perfidious, me-thinks you need not despair though I do fore[tell that you should live long. When I hearken unto you replied Amathilde, I am almost perswaded you are in the right; but when I hearken unto my self, I can scarcely believe it: And I am so confident, that as soon as I am out of your sight, I shall hearken unto my own dictates, as I am in the greatest feare in the world, you should take it ill that I do not follow your advice.

Amathilde spoke this so pleasantly, that Glacidia and all the company laughed: But as the Prince of Phoeus, Bomilcar, Galathes, and Britomartes were about to give their opinions of this pleasant Contest, an old Aunt of Glacidia's entered, who was so very much marked with all the grim wrinkles of age in her face, as is imaginable: In so much, as though two very young and fair Ladies followed her; yet Amathilde not being able to endure such a ghastly object, she prepared to go away; but first she came to Glacidia, and asked her in a low voyce, will you yet maintaine that old age is desirable? Yes (replied Glacidia, as shee told us afterwards) and I will maintain also that you will desire it, when you are a little older: Say you so (said she, and laughed aloud) then I will to morrow become what you say I shall be after[wards].

After this, Amathilde, Galathes, and Britomartes went out, and the Princess Cleonisbe coming in a little after, this old Lady, who put Amathilde in such a fright, went out also: so as there remained only the Prince of Phoeus, Bomilcar, and my selfe.

As soon as Cleonisbe was set down, Glacidia related unto her the dispute betwixt Amathilde and her: And she had no sooner related it unto her, but she asked the Prince of Phoeus what opinion he was of? And when he answered that he concurr[ed with Glacidia, she turned towards Bomilcar, and asked his opinion? Truly Madam, replied he, I saw so many against Amathilde, that I took her part, not consider[ing whether it was reasonable or no. Such a generous motive, replied she, deserves a pardon for maintaining so bad a cause: Yet I must confesse (added the Princess) that I do not love such generosity as consists only in protecting imbecility against reason. Doubtless I would not have weak people oppressed; but I am so great a lover of reason, as I cannot endure they should be protected against it; And in such disputes as these, I would have one speak against ones dearest friends, if their opinions be contra[r]y unto it, and side with their greatest Enemies when they are in the right. The last of these is a task a little too difficult; and I think it Madam a much more easier matter to side with my Friends though they be in the wrong, then not to thwart my Enemies, though they be in the right.

Page 133 Truly (replied the Prince of Phoeus) I should be very hardly perswaded to goe against the rules of right and reason in either: But I must confess, I should much reljoyce sometimes, when one I love not, takes an ill side. Though there be some kind of injustice in that, replied Cleonisbe, yet you are more reasonable then Bomilcar: At the least Madam, replied Bomilcar, he is much more happy, since you think him more reasonable then my selfe: Doubtless I am, replied the Prince of Phoeus, since I do entertain any thought which the Princess approves on; She I say, who has such a delicate, just, and discerning a judgment in all things. The thing which I most admire at (said Glacidia and inerrupted them, is) that Bomilcar should defend that to day which I know he hates in his heart the most of any man living: and I am most confident, he would never have taken Amathildes part, but only because he is of their opinion, who thinks all discourse not worth a straw, when all jump in one opinion: I assure you replied he, I cannot say that to be the cause which moved me to it: Bomilcar spoke this with such an Ayre, as the reason why he would not confesse the cause which moved him to take an ill side, was evident unto Glacidia; who thinking it expedient to turn the discourse, she asked Cleonisbe if she saw Onesicrite that day? And passing from one discourse to another, I told her how I saw that morn[ing a branch of Corall of a huge bigness, and of an admirable hue. Cleonisbe then asked me where I saw it? I told her it was in the hands of one who intended to present it unto her upon that day which was designed for her to make her choice of a Husband; for it is the custome, that as soon as the choise is made, all persons of any quality do offer unto the Princess some rich and magnificent presents.

As soon as ever I had said so, there appeared in the cheeks of Cleonisbe as fresh a colour as the colour which I saw: The Prince of Phoeus and Bomilcar observing it, did easily imagine that the reason of her blush was, because that day on which depend[ed her good or bad fortune was so neer, and she never remembered it. But Bomilcar, since his hopes were above his fears, he was not so much perplexed at it as the Prince of Phoeus, who I say seeing no foundation for any hopes, could not think upon that day of rejoicing without extream sorrow. But Bomilcar being of a hasty temper, and his imagination flattering his reason, he would needs talk of that Feast un[t]o Cleonisbe: For since he believed that she could not speak any thing in advantage of the Phoean Prince, it pleased his fancy to be talking before his Rivall of a Ceremony which would put him out of all hopes: And therefore arming himselfe with a confident boldness; Truly Madam, sayd he unto Cleonisbe, I do not think there was ever such a cruell feast as this which is now drawing nigh; for there will be abundance of illustrious and brave men assembled, with certainty that only one of them must be happy, and all the rest miserable. 'Tis very true, replied the Prince of Phoeus, this Feast will be very sad unto such as pretend unto the Choise, and sad also unto such as not pretending unto that honour, are only so bold as to wish it: However, I believe (sayd Cleonisbe) that this Feast will be more sad unto her who is to choose, then unto them who are not chosen. Oh Madam (cried out Bomilcar) then certainly the reason is because she finds none worthy of her choise, for otherwise the matter were easily determined. I assure you replied she, there is a difficulty in every choise: The Princess hath much reason to say so, replied Glacidia and laughed; for I assure you that I in my choise only of flowers, cannot tell sometimes which to fixe upon: And my hand and mind doth waver when I cull either Roses, Oranges, or Violets: And you may well imagine, that in matters of great importance the Princess hath great reason to be as much perplexed in her choise as those whom shee doth not choose: This is so full of truth replied Cleonisbe, that if the Lawes of this State would permit me, I would solemnly disclaim from this Custome, and would much rather submit unto the King my Father, then have the liberty of choise. Then Madam, your reason is (replied Bomilcar very sadly) because you find none worthy of your choise: However the Laws will have you choose, and it is very likely that your judgment hath already chosen him whom your mouth would upon the day of Ceremony pronounce to be your Choise.

Though I am not obliged to reveale such a secret unto you replied she, yet I will assure you, that my Choise is yet to make: And if I must choose one, it shall be him whom the Gods shall please to inspire into my mind, when I am in the Temple. The Princess spoke this after such a manner, as equally perswaded both the Prince of Phoeus Page 134 and Bomilcar, that she spoke as she thought; so as the first of these was abundantly joyed, and the second extreamly grieved. For since the Prince of Phoeus was never in any hopes of being chosen, he found some sweetness in thinking that others had no greater hopes then himselfe: But as for Bomilcar, since he conceited himself to have some right to be elected, and verily hoped for it, he was in a strange despair to find the Princess yet unresolved whom she should choose, his sorrows augmented his hatred of the Phoean Prince, because he saw him in possibility of being elected as well as himself. But since such tumultuous thoughts as these are great disturbers of the mind, he scarcely talked any more that day: But the Prince of Phoeus talked more then he did before, and spoke such things as did discover the thoughts of his heart, though he spoke nothing but what would admit of another interpretation.

But in conclusion, Cleonisbe being ready to go away, these two Rivals waited upon her to her Coach. After which, the Prince of Phoeus went to the King, and Bomilcar returned to Glacidia, from whom I departed immediately after: But since I had the honour to be much in the lovely Ladies favour, and it being in some sort necessary that I should know all the passages amongst these persons. I understood from her since, that as soon as Bomilcar was at liberty to talke in private with her, he began thus; I beseech you dear Glacidia, said he unto her, if ever you intend to oblige me, of two things do one of them for me: Doubtlesse Sir, replied she, I have a most strong inclination to do you any service, therefore I beseech you tell me presentl[y what are these two things of which you give me the choise? Either to contrive it so answered he, that the Prince of Phoeus may be no longer my Rivall, or else that he be no longer your friend; for the truth is, I cannot endure he should either love Cleonisbe, or you. Suppose the Prince of Phoeus (replied Glacidia, and smiled) should desire me to contrive it so, that either Bomilear should not love the Princess, or that I should not be his friend, what answer would you have me return? I would have you answer him replied he, contrary to what I would have you answer me.

Fie Bomilcar, replied she, in this you are not just: But since I will not be unjust after your example, I will give you the very same answer I would give the Prince of Phoeus, if he should propound the same unto me, Know then Sir, that as I will never cease being a friend unto you, though you be an Enemy unto the Prince of Pho|ceus: So I will ever cease being his friend, though he be not yours. And as relating unto your passions, as I will neither hinder nor help you, so I will only exhort you both to vanquish your passions. As for Cleonisbe, I will advise her unto nothing; but let her follow the dictates of her own reason, which is much beyond my own.

Thus Bomilcar, I shall be your friend without prejudice to the Prince of Phoeus, and shall also be his without prejudice to you. Though your friendship unto him replied he, can do me no other harm, but that I shall often see him with you, and be civil to him, yet I shall have great cause to grudge at it: But Sir, replied Glacidia, though you do see him, yet he sees you also, and if he do love the Princess as you think doth, the sight of you troubles him, as the sight of him doth you: And since he carries himself civilly to you, be not you lesse rationally then he is: For if you give me any just cause to think that he is more complaisant towards me then you are, then perhaps retaliating friendship for friendship, I shall be more for the Prince of Phoeus then I am for Bomilcar. Oh cruell Glacidia (said he unto her) I had rather endure the sight of my Enemy, then endanger to see you more his friend then mine: As long as you carry your self as you ought Sir, replied she, I shall continue the same I am: but if you think to oblige me unto any injustice, you will but deceive your self, for as I told you before, if the Prince of Phoeus should affront you, I would take your part: and if you affront him, I will take his: I know he esteems you as you esteem him: I know also that he loves me as you do: And I know further, that he who first falls out, shall lose me, and I will become a friend unto his Rival.

Oh Glacidia, replied Bomilcar, were you my Mistress, you could not lay a more tyrannicall injunction upon me: You may better say Sir (replied she, and smiled) that were I the wisest of the Sorronides, I could not speak more justly then I do; for the very truth is, you have no just cause in the Earth to hate the Prince of Phoeus, he hath not raised either quarrell or faction in the Court; he hath seen the Princess, and he cannot choose but thinke her amiable: what hurt in all this? Also, whether he love her or not love, still the choice is in her: and questionlesse she will make her Page_135 choise, without considering whether you love her, or he love her: And since Reason only is her rule, I can assure you, that though the Law allow her the choise, yet if her inclination do not concur with reason, certainly she will reject it. Thus your good or bad fortune depends meerly upon the Princess, and not at all upon the Prince of Pho|ceus: Live therefore civilly with him, as he will live with you; and make me not to be|come partiall between two whom I infinitely esteem, and am much obliged unto: And be confident that I will not speak any thing either in his favour nor yours, unless you provoke me. Oh Glacidia (sayd he) you are too wise to be a friend unto a Lover, who is ready to run out of his very wits; for I perceive by Cleonisbe, that she knows not yet whom she shall make choise of: And yet methinks she should; or since I have done her a thousand services, and adored her with all reverent devotion; methinks I deserve to be preferred before either Britomartes or Galathes, or the Prince of Phoeus, who is only an unfortunate Exile.

If the Prince of Phoeus, replied she, should tell me that you were only an unfortunate Carthaginian, I should blame him for giving such invective terms, as I blame you for upbraiding a great Prince with that terme of Exile: an Exile yet whose cause is glorious, since he left his Country only to preserve his liberty.

Furthermore, let me tell you, that I know not whether the Princess hath yet fixt upon any or no: but though I did know it, I profess unto you I would never tell it: For I am resolved to be faithfull not only unto the Princess, but unto you, and unto the Prince of Phoeus, all who are my deare friends, but also unto my very Enemies: Therefore Bomilcar believe that I will neither tell Cleonisbe not the Prince of Phoeus any thing wherewith you shall entrust me, so I will not tell you any thing they are pleased to entrust me withall: Let it suffice I promise you, never to do you any prejudice, but will do you all the Offices that the Lawes of a prudent and generous friendship can oblige me unto: But to the end you may not deceive your selfe, let me tell you that I will promise the Prince of Phoeus, the very same I promise you, if occasions offer themselves: And to testifie that I am very sincere, I tell you again, that I will not busie my selfe on any side between the Princess Cleo|nisbe and the Prince of Phoeus, nor between the Princess and you, unless I be provoked: But since I hope I shall never be put unto any such necessity, you may expect from me all the serviceable offices in my power, provided they trespass not upon the friendship which is between the Princess and me, and the Prince of Phoeus: Once more let me tell you Glacidia (said Bomilcar to her) you are so very wise that you make me despayr; for by offering me all, you offer me nothing: For since you will do nothing in prejudice of my most feared Rival, you cannot do me any good office at all: And yet methinks replied she, that you have two others who are as much to be feared; for if you consider how Britomartes is of the same Country, and Galathes a great Neighbour, you will find them considerable: 'Tis very true (sayd he) but since you cannot prejudice them, unless you do a good office unto the Prince of Phoeus as well as my selfe, I cannot tell whether I should desire it.

I should never make an end Madam, if I should repeat the whole discourse between Bomilcar and Glacidia, but at last he left her, and had as great an esteem of her vertue, as love to Cleonisbe. In the mean time, since the Prince of Phoeus was extremely desirous to know whether or no the Princess was yet unresolved of her choise, he went betimes the next morning unto Glacidia, and found her alone. And being no less angry to find Bomilcar with her, then Bomilcar was to meet him, he told her it was the greatest cruelty in the world unto him, that hitherto he could never see her he esteemed most, unless he saw the man he loved least. But Madam since I have not Glacidia's Art, to dresse the same matter in different termes, and like her, put the grace of novelty upon it, I shall omit a great part of what she sayd unto the Prince of Pho|ceus, because it was almost the same she sayd unto Bomilcar.

But Madam, let me tell you, how this Prince not being able to containe the fullness of his heart, did the same day unload it unto Glacidia. You shall see (sayd he unto her after much other talk) that I am as confident of your sincerity as of your generosity, since though you have told me that you are as friendly unto my Rival as my selfe, yet I will disclose the very secret of my heart unto you: I am infinitely obliged unto you Sir for your confidence in me, replied she, and I look upon it as Page_136 an evident testimony of your esteem: Also I wish with all my heart I could cure you of this tormenting passion, since I can do you no other service. Oh Glacidia (replied the Prince of Phoeus) do not wish the cure; for I had much rather be sick of that disease which torments me, then enjoy the health you wish me.

Furthermore, in some sort to imitate your generosity, I will not move you to prejudice Bomilcar, though it be the thing which most of any thing I desire, next the enjoyment of Cleonisbe: But as between two friends who are equally loved, one is obliged in generosity to have a greater care of him who is unfortunate, then of him who is not: I beseech you let your compassion be upon my misery, and oblige you to put some difference between Bomilcar and me his Enemy: Pity me at least, because I deserve it more then he doth: For truly he is allowed to be in the happy Catalogue of those who may pretend unto her choise, he hath done a thousand services both unto the King and Cleonisbe: You have spoken a thousand times in your life in his advantage unto the Princess: he hath seen her many years together, and is known unto her: the King loves him, and a thousand motives gives him hope of happiness and choise: But as for me Glacidia, I am a poor miserable wretch that can hope for nothing: I love, but perhaps it is unknown, at least but imperfectly: I love, and dare not pretend unto any love again, nor unto any choise: I love, with the misery to know, that even common prudence will not Permit me to be chosen; yet notwithstanding there is something in my heart, which is neither vanity nor pride, that often hints unto me, I ought not to yeeld unto Cleonisbe, neither unto Bomilcar, nor Britomartes, or Galathes: so as changing my thoughts, I have some glimpses of hope: and though I cannot hope for full happiness, yet sometimes I think it not absolutely impossible. 'Tis true I am an Exile, but I am so with a great people who are obedient unto me: And I can boast of an estate, which as small as it is, may extend its limits further then the power of Bomilcar can: Since I have many ships, men enough to man them, and Riches sufficient to maintain a long War, and carve out some important Conquest.

Indeed Glacidia, my birth is equall unto Bomilcars, my heart is as noble as his, and the passion of my soule, not a jot inferior. But for all this, all my feeble hopes do vanish so soon as I am often ready to despair: And therefore I conjure you Glacidia, as a cordiall to my comfort, tell me whether you thinke the Princess spoke sincerely yesterday, when she sayd that her choise was yet to make? For if she did, it is a comfort beyond my expression, though I know no reasonable ground for any hopes to be built upon it. Since I am very sincere, replied Glacidia, and since flattery of friends, are but meer delusions, I must ingeniously tell you, that I wish with abundance of Zeal, you were able to quench these flames which thus torment you; for though I find you most worthy of the Princess, yet I have some cause to feare, that though Cleonisbe should have the same thoughts of you; and in her hearr prefer you before either Bomilcar, Britomartes, and Glacidia, yet she dare not choose you, lest it should incite some trouble in the State.

After this Sir, aske me no more; for since I must not reveale the secrets of Cleonisbe, and since if Bomilcar should aske me more, I would be silent: I ought to be so unto you, since I am put upon a crosse conjuncture which will not permit me to serve you, unlesse I disserve him; nor serve him, without disservice unto you: And to tell you sincerely, I am not able to give you any particular satisfaction, though the consideration of Bomilcar would allow me, because I never thought it my duty to dive too deep into the secrets of Cleonisbes heart. And therefore consult with your own reason without me, since I am not able to give you any faithfull councill, unlesse I should be perfidious unto the Princess and Bomilcar. Oh Glacidia (replied the Prince of Phoeus) if I should be my own Councillor, I should run into strange inconveniences: You are so prudent Sir, replied she, that you need not feare your selfe: I am so far under the commanding power of Love, replied he, that you may expect nothing of reason from me: I should talk boldly of my Love unto her who is the causer of it: I should expresse my odium unto Bomilcar, conspire against Galathes, and oppose Britomartes with as much fury as he himselfe is capable of. The truth is, Glacidia, I should attempt any thing, rather then yeeld unto the enjoyment of Cleonisbe. Since I am not at free liberty to tell you all I think (replied she) I finde my selfe at a great puzzle: but yet without giving you any cause to suspect Page_137 me a favourer of Bomilcar unto your prejudice, I will advise you once more consult seriously with your selfe before you offer to act your tumultuous resolutions, whose Consequences may prejudice you more then you can imagine: However, remember I beseech you to carry your selfe so faire towards Bomilcar, that I may preserve the same neutrality between you, which I intend to do, lest if you force me to his side, you should weaken your own. But Madam, Glacidia did not only know all the secrets of the Prince of Phoeus and Bomilcars hearts, but she knew Cleonisbes also. And going to her one evening when no company was with her, for privacy sake she took her into her Closet, where seeming to be very melancholy, Glacidia asked her the reason: I do assure you, replied she, I cannot directly tell you; for I have such a miscellany of severall thoughts which displease me, as I cannot tell unto which to attribute my melancholy: Yet truly I think the greatest cause of it is, because I shall shortly be put unto the necessity of making a Choise, which has more difficulty in it then is imagined. But Madam, replied Glacidia, I thought your mind had been before this sufficiently prepared for it, and that you would not make choise of any but whom the King appoints.

That hath hitherto been my resolution, replied she, but truly I begin to grow weary of it, because I feare he will not advise me to my satisfaction: Then Madam (answered Glacidia) since the Law gives you the liberty of your owne choise; Choose him whom your own Reason dictates unto you, and never referre it unto the King. Oh Glacidia, replied she, the question is to know whether it be my reason which bids me to have such a strange aversion unto Bomilcar. Glacidia surprized at this speech, was a while silent before she would speak, purposely to consider how she might neither prejudice Bomilcar nor the Prince of Phoeus: and in order to that, she endeavoured to know from whence this aversion unto Bomilcar might proceed, intending that if she preferred either Britomartes or Galathes, to prejudice them as much as she could, because she did not think them worthy of Cleonisbes choise, and because she might well do it without offence unto either of her two friends. I do confess Madam, sayd she unto her, that I have always observed you never had any great inclination unto Bomilcar, though I never thought your aversion so strong: But Madam, I beseech you (added she) is it not Galathes or Britomartes that pleaseth you better then he doth, and consequently are causes of your aversion to him? No replied Cleonisbe and blushed, I assure you neither of them are prejudiciall unto Bomilcar; however Glacidia (pursued she) you are a little beholding unto me, for forcing my self to conceale from you the naturall antipathy which is betwixt me and him; for truly had he not been one of your friends, I should long since have imparted my thoughts unto you; yet I know very well, that my thoughts are injurious; nor am I so ignorant as not to know him to be a very brave compleat man, nor am I so blind as not to see that he loves me. But for all that, there is something in my heart, which will not let me relish his merits, which forbids him entrance into it; and which makes mee have such thoughts of him, as may rather be phrased hatred then aversion. Yet I know very well that all reason bids me choose him: and in all probability the King will order me to prefer him before all others: Judg therefore Glacidia, whether my soule can sit satisfied, and see such a sad day drawing upon me: Sad I will say, since Bomilcar is odious unto me, and especially of late so abominable that I can hardly endure him. And truly it may be said (added she and blusht) that he himself contributeth something unto my horrid aversion: For I beseech you consider a little how unjustly he is still thwarting the Phoecean Prince, unto whom both the King, the Prince my Brother, and my selfe are so civill and respective: I took not so much notice Madam, replied Glacidia, as either to approve or disallow of what Bomilcar did against the Prince of Phoeceus: And all I am able to say for him is, that certainly he does not deserve the misfortune of your odium. But I pray Glacidia, sayd Cleonisbe, doe not you know the reason why Bomilcar and the Phoecean Prince do thus clash? for truly being both of them your Friends, methinks you should know the very bottom of their hearts: Believe it Madam, replied she, I have done as much as is possible to make them friends, but cannot; and the hatred that is betwixt them (if I be not much mistaken) has a higher cause then I can tell you; and I do not think Madam, but you are best able to divine it: Yes Glacidia, I can do so (replied she, and blusht againe) and it is a reason why I am so much incensed against Bomilcar: For the very truth is, Page 138 I do abhor his bold impudence in being jealous of the Phoecean Prince. And though that Prince have all requisite qualities to cause it, yet he ought not in relation to the self. And therefore Bomilcar may be assured, that unless my Father do positively command me to choose him, I shall never do it.

However (pursued she and sighing) if so it chance, that to my grief the King will needs have me choose him, I beseech you my dear Glacidia help out my reason, and use such arguments as may induce me to obey him. Since you may very well believe Madam, replied Glacidia, that I would not speak in advantage of Bomilcar, but onely because he is my friend, therefore I declare that I will never speak in his behalf.

Oh my Glacidia (replied Cleonisbe angrily) do not forsake me now, I conjure you, in a business which is of the greatest concernment of all my life; for let me tell you once more, my reason stands in great need of your assistance. Madam, replied Glacidia, I would gladly know why you speak so? For truly (pursued she purposely to discover her reall mind) if you have such a strong aversion to Bomilcar, why do you not desire the King to give you the choise of Galathes, or Britomartes? Oh Glacidia (replied she hastily) I do not value them at so high a rate, as my disobedience to the King: It should never be they, but doubtlesse it should be the..... At these words Cleonisbe blusht, and was silent, not being able to get out with her thought; but having spoken enough to make Glacidia understand her, she was extreamly ashamed, though she usually imparted her most secret thoughts unto her: but at last, being resolved to open her very heart, she confessed that if she might follow her own inclination, she would prefer the Prince of Phoeceus before either Bomilcar, Britomartes, or Galathes, and confessed that she had as great a disposition to love him, as to hate Bomilcar. Judg now, my dear Glacidia (said she unto her) whether I had not good reason to say I stood in need of your Reason to support my own: And therefore I conjure you to do two things continually, untill the sad day of this fatal Ceremony be past: The one, to lessen my aversion unto Bomilcar; the other to lessen my affection unto the Prince of Phoeceus. Though it was never yet in my power to disobey the least of your commands Madam, replied Glacidia, yet I beseech you to excuse me in this: For truly Madam, I have so fully determined to keep my self a Newtler between these two whom I equally honour, as I am fully resolved neither to hurt nor help either of them in a business wherein I cannot oblige the one, but I must dis-oblige the other: and therefore I beseech you take it not ill if I disobey you; for which choise soever you make between the Prince of Phoeceus and Bomilcar, you cannot choose amiss. Had I discovered a disposition to prefer Britomartes or Galathes before either of them, I should have opposed it with all my power; but since I do not, I have no more to say: if you overcome your aversion to Bomilcar, you will be just unto his merit and his love: And if you follow your inclination to the Prince of Phoeceus, you are but just unto his vertue and his passion.

Thus Madam, which soever you do, you will do well: and which soever you do, I shall have cause both of joy and sorrow; and since by making one happy, you make the other miserable: I shall rejoyce with him you choose, and grieve with him you reject: and therefore I beseech you do me so much honour as not to move me any further to contribute any thing unto the misery of him whom you shall doom unto such a cruel punishment. But Glacidia, replied Cleonisbe, by thinking not to contribute unto it you do extreamly; for if you do not put me in mind, that if I disobey the King, and favour an exiled Prince, then I shall dishonour my self, and perhaps bring a War upon the Kingdom: Bomilcar will never be chosen: Let it even be as you please Madam without any intermeddling, replied Glacidia; for truly Madam, I neither can, nor ought to meddle; and if I durst say it, you would not have me obey you. I do almost confess it Glacidia, replied Cleonisbe and sighed; for if you should desire me to lessen my aversion unto Bomilcar, I feare you would encrease it. But truly I must confess I know not well what I would have, though I am most certain I would have nothing done against my own glory: But however my dear Glacidia (added she) since I have trusted you with my aversion unto Bomilcar, and my inclination unto the Prince of Phoeceus, be sure you let neither of them have the least glimpses of my thoughts, for if you should, there is so much injustice in my hatred of Bomilcar, and so much weakness in my affection to the Phoecean Prince, as I should be eternally ashamed.

Page 139 You may well conceive Madam, that Glacidia was ready to make this promise unto Cleonisbe; and you may also believe she would perform it.

In the mean time, Carimantes being of a fiery nature, and having a flaming passion in his heart, he resolved upon a course which much tormented Menedorus, and grieved Onesicrite: For perceiving that this Princess entertained so favourable thoughts of Menedorus, he acquainted Sfurius with it, and desired him to oblige his son unto a quitting of Onesicrite: hinting unto him, that since he had given him a being in his Country, it was the least of favours he could do for him: adding withall, that he would be so great a friend unto him, as he should have good cause to be well satisfied with his acknowledgments. Sfurius being always of a humour to prefer the publique good before any particular, though he approved of his sons affection unto Onesicrite; yet he promised, his sonne should pretend no further unto that Princess. Assuring Carimantes, that though Menedorus would, yet he should not be able to disobey: And in pursuance of this promise, Carimantes was no sooner gone, but he sent for his sonne. At first he went about to perswade him by arguments drawn from reason: That having a Rivall unto whom he was so much obliged: and a Rivall who would ere long be in power to ruine him, if provoked, it were wisdom to submit, since it were neither prudent nor just to expose so many innocent persons unto the fury of a Prince for the satisfaction of his love: adding further, that since it concerned the interest of their Towne in generall, he ought to sacrifice all his private pleasures for its safety, and the rather, because he was not in any power to disobey. As strong as all these reasons were, yet they could not prevail with Menedorus: So as then joyning his authority unto his reasons and perswasions, hee absolutely commanded him to think no more upon Onesicrite, telling him that though he would, yet he could not disobey him. You may well imagine Madam, that Menedorus was extremely startled, yet his love would not give leave to submit; but seemed so resolute, that Sfurius grew angry, and gave him harsh language, insomuch as perhaps he had been forced to yeeld, had he not been tampered withall by Galathes. For Madam, be pleased to know, that this Prince according to his close way, had plotted with severall Greeks, and held private intelligence with a friend to Menedorus: so that fearing extremely lest Carimantes should be well treated by Onesicrite, and consequently induced to favour the Prince of Phoeceus, he sent unto Menedorus, and bad him stand firm to his principles: assuring him that the King would never allow of Carimantes his passion, and consequently he needed not to feare, since he should have him for his Patron. Thus Madam, Menedorus in spite of all his Fathers reasons and menaces, did not change his mind.

In the mean time, Sfurius assured Carimantes that he would keep Menedorus from being any obstacle unto his design, desiring him only to have a little patience, and give him some dayes to work so great a cure: And indeed Sfurius applied a most sad remedy unto Menedorus, for he went unto the Prince of Phoeceus, and told him what Carimantes said unto him, conjuring him to use his utmost authority to dissuade Onesicrite from Menedorus. For truly Sir, sayd he unto him, as glorious as your alliance would be, I would never advise you unto it, since I should then expose you and all the Graecians here unto the violence of an amorous Prince. Therefore, Sir, since the gods would have him to be our Patron, by the meanes of his affection unto the Princess your sister, I conjure you to be as zealous in hindering the Princess your sister, as I shall be in opposing Menedorus my son.

The Prince of Phoeceus hearing this, was much joyed to see it was in his power, and that he might have the honour of favouring the designs of Carimantes, and to crosse those of Menedorus: Conceiving that since this Prince did thinke Onesicrite was worthy of him, Cleonisbe might also thinke him not unworthy of her: Therefore he gave Sfurius a very civill answer, protesting that though he had a great mind unto his alliance rather then unto Carimantes; yet since he was so generous as to prefer the publique good before the satisfaction of his sonne, he were not worthy of his friendship, if he were lesse generous then he: and if he did not deprive himselfe of a happinesse which he desired, rather then hazzard the ruine of their new Commonwealth. So that after this, they consulted together upon the best expedients, and resolved to work first by all sweetnesse upon Onesicrite. In order to that Aristonice must be employed, who was much in her books, and it was resolved they Page 140 should move Onesicrite unto a little journey out of Masseilles, without letting her know for what she went: and accordingly the Prince of Phoeceus did carry the matter so handsomly, as she consented unto his wishes: but to the end the business might take better effect, the Prince of Phoeceus doing me the honour to trust me with all the secrets of his life, and to acquaint me with the state of things, he sent me the night before to prepare Aristonice: so as when Onesicrite came to her, Aristonice carryed it so handsomely, as that Princess never imagined the Prince of Phoeceus to have any hand in the Councell which she gave her. At the first meeting, nothing passed but Complements of welcome, and expressions of mutuall amity. Afterwards Aristonice, whose discourse did always ayme at the bettering of others, began to tell very obligingly, that since she had received from heaven so great a Talent of beauty, and so many admirable parts, she was extreamly afraid considering her age, lest she any wayes abuse those excellent graces which the gods had given her: And truly Daughter (sayd she, for so she called her) it is not enough to appeare all vertue, and abstaine from the commission of horrid crimes, which persons well born seldome are guilty of: but one must do all the good one can, and above all things not to profane those gifts which they receive from heaven: and therefore Daughter, since you have received such extraordinary beauty from the gods, it is your duty to be extream carefull not to abuse so great a favour: For truly the beauty of Helen was fatall unto all Asia, and all succeeding ages will impute the burning of Troy unto the lovely fire of her eyes: Therefore be sure you remember always, that the Gods did not bestow so much beauty upon you, but with intentions you should employ it well, not in doing harm, when therefore your beauty gives you a power over any one. Remember to consider whether any unfortunate persons had any need of his credit, over whom you have got that power, to the end that drawing a good from the weakness of another, you may merit a reward from heaven: For example, I heare that the Prince Carimantes does highly esteem you; you must be sure to make use of him as a Patron to all those Graecians whom he hath already so generously protected.

Onesicrite hearing Aristonice say so, began to blush, and blushed so much with such disorder in her eyes, that she discovered her heart in an instant. Onesicrite being of a very sweet disposition, and a little timorous, though she had spirit enough, the discourse of Aristonice came so home to her heart, that she resolved to put her whole confidence in her, and asked her how she should carry her selfe to be rid of Carimantes his love without incensing him, or moving him to attempt any thing against Menedorus: So after she had apologized for her weakness, she related the affection which Menedorus bore unto her, she confessed the inclination she had unto him; afterwards told her how Carimantes seemed to profess a Love unto her, and what Sfurius had said to his sonne: adding withall, whatsoever she thought might move Aristonice to give her counsell not to disingage her selfe from the affection of Menedorus, and to shake off Carimantes. But she was much surprized, when Aristonice after a plausible hearing returned her answer: I render thanks unto the Gods who brought you hither (sayd she unto her) for since it appears they love you very dearly, I would not for a world you should abuse their favours: I will not blame you for your compliance with the affection of Menedorus; for since it appears to proceed from vertue, I will not condemn it, though in reason it had been much better you had received his heart without giving your own. But since both your Parents and his did approve of your affections unto each other, I have no more to say against it: But Daughter, things now have changed faces; for since Sforius would not have you marry Menedorus, and since the Prince Carimantes would marry you, it is most expedient you cast off the first, and entertain the second: Why Mother, cryed Onesicrite, do you think the gods would ever pardon me, if I should change my thoughts of Menedorus? Do you think Daughter replied Aristonice, that the gods would ever pardon you if you should be a cause of Ruine unto this vast multitude of People which they by their providence have brought hither? Could you ever answer it, if Carimantes should set our Town on fire, which he permitted us to build.

No no Onesicrite, deceive not your self: and though I cannot speak any pleasing truths unto you at this time, yet I had rather displease, then betray you. Know Daughter, that the Prime duty hath an influence over all the rest: and since there is none more powerfull then that which ties us unto our Country, no other can ever Page 141 dispence with you from it. The truth is, we are born for it before any thing else whatsoever: You were a Graecian before Menedorus was your Lover; and consequently you can make him no promise in prejudice of your Country; and though you should, it is not tot to be kept. Let me tell you, the destiny of Marseilles is wholly in your hands: you may preserve it, or you may ruine it. If you adhere unto the affection of Menedorus, you destroy it; If you entertain the offers of Carimantes, you save it: Thus since the safety of so many innocent persons depends wholly upon you, you were in a most high degree sinful, if you do not surmount your self: and Menedorus is most unworthy of you, if he be not so generous as to prefer the publique good before his private satisfaction: You have power my dear Daughter to do what you please, yet you are in a Country wherein you have no right but what the Prince whom you shall treat ill doth give you; for you know that without him the King had never received us: Moreover no Ship can saile out of our Port without the permittance of the Phoecean Prince, or Sforius: do you think they will ever permit your departure, and incense a Prince who ere long shall be King, and make you a Queen? and though they should winke at your departure, or that you should steal away, in to what place of the world could you go? Phoeceus is full of Persians, and we have no other Land or Countrey but Marseilles which you would ruine: Should a person of your age, vertue and quality wander from Coast to Coast, and from Sea to Sea, without any other reason but because she is in Love? Do you no better remember the terrour of incensed Seas, out of which the Goddess whom I adore did bring us to a Port? will you again expose your selfe into those dangers, and be upbraided with so much weakness as not to strive against a passion which to speak truly has no other force in it but what ones self doth give unto it? But that the interests of the party loved may oblige you: Consider Daughter, seriously consider, unto what danger you expose Menedorus, if you should suffer him to continue a Rival unto Carimantes. First, he will passe in the opinion of the world for an imprudent man, next with the Prince for an ungrateful person: But though the quality of a faithfull Lover be very considerable, yet that ought not to let you expose his life, as doubtless you would if you do not break off with him, nor oblige him to leave behaving himself as your Lover. For Carimantes is young, and of a hasty temper: Moreover he is the sonne of a King, one unto whom you are much obliged, and so is not Menedorus: Take heed therefore Onesicrite, take heed for your Lovers sake, though you will not for the Graecians: It's better it cost you some tears, then him his life, or your reputation: and therefore Daughter, since the interest of your Country, your own glory; the life of him you love and all is at stake, strive with your selfe, and generously resolve absolutely to unloose your self from the affection of Menedorus: But Daughter, never think to untie the knots which fetter you by degrees, for they are of such a nature, as they must be broken upon a sudden, and with violence; for otherwise in thinking to unty them gently, they will the more intangle, and be made indissolvable. Fixe therefore Daughter upon a resolution worthy of your self. I conjure you to it for your Country sake, for your glories sake, and for Menedorus his sake, and to use a more prevalent argument for the sake of that goddess whom I serve, who since she was never in love, would doubtlesse most severely punish you if you should ruine all this multitude of people whom she hath saved, only because you loved Menedorus.

All the while that Aristonice spoke, Onesicrite looked down and sighed continually, so as she made it apparent that her heart was extremely perplexed: but at last, being forced to answer, her tears was a prologue to her words: and do what she could it was impossible to retain them. But the wonder was, that this symptome of imbecility which she was not able to keep from the sight of Aristonice, was the reason of her force to surmount it; for she was so extremely ashamed, that desiring to repayr her weakness by an act of courage, after she had dried up her tears, and stood a while silent, she promised Aristonice she would use her best endeavours to follow her counsell: Yet I do not promise (added she) to overcome my selfe; but I promise to strive, which is more then ever I thought I could do. But Mother, I beseech you (added she) is there no Medium between these two extremes! Can I not reject the affection of Menedorus without entertaining that of Carimantes? Receive me I beseech you into the number of your Companions: And by that means let me not give the unfortunate Menedorus any cause to suspect me of ambition, or inconstancy.

Page 142 Oh Daughter (sayd Aristonice and smiled) Virgins consecrated unto Diana never ought to fear making their Lovers jealous, and her Nymphs entertain no hunters for their Gallants. But to be more serious, if you have a mind to destroy that Temple which I am building, you need only to shut your self in it: And therefore for a remedy unto that disease which hath no other then what I propound, sacrifice your passion for your Country; your own Country affords a thousand examples of brave men, who have sacrificed their lives for theirs, yet I impose no such rigid task upon you; but on the contrary, I advise you live, and live happily. Oh Mother replied she, I do not think that to be possible: However, though you advise me to break those cords with violence which tie me unto Menedorus, yet I beseech you let me unloose them more gently, and give me some days to do it.

Aristonice seeing she had obtained more then she hoped for, consented unto her demand, and gave her many wise instructions to confirm her in her resolution.

But Madam, Onesicrite returning to the Court, Menedorus much wondered to see her so melancholy; and more, when upon the first occasion of talking with her in private, she conjured him to obey his Fathers commands. Then did he express himself in all the terms that the most violent passion could devise, he assured her that the King would never consent she should marry Carimantes, and therefore it would be in vain for her to be perfidious: Afterwards he fell into all his Prayers and Complaints to move her unto a constancy of mind: so as Onesicrite finding her heart to melt, and her resolutions to stagger, she parted from him without any power either to break off or to renew affection: and for some certain days things rested thus.

In the mean time, since the ceremony of Cleonisbes choise drew very near, the Court began to swell into a tumultuous multitude: And these foure Pretenders were so solicitous in their designs and hopes of being chosen, that nothing else was talked of, and these Pretenders were perpetually either with the King, or Carimantes, or Cleonisbe, or with Glacidia. As for Britomartes, he was the least busie; for being of a lofty mind, and of that Country, he believed that certainly he should be preferred before the rest. As for Galathes, he neither trusted unto his merits, nor quality, nor any thing else, but solicited the King, and plotted the ruine of his Rivals. To that end he alledged, that Bomilcar being originally a Carthaginian, he would not be acceptable to the People: That Britomartes being already very powerfull in his own Country, he would be too potent by that Alliance: And as for the Prince of Phoeceus, it was not probable he would permit the Princess to marry a poor man who had no being but what he gave him.

On the other side, he Courted Carimantes with all possible submissions; he addressed himself unto Cleonisbe with all complacency and reverent respects, and solicited Glacidia by a thousand expressions of friendship.

In the mean time he held intelligence with Menedorus, and suborned some Segoregians to murmure against the Graecians, to the end the King, Carimantes and Cleonisbe might cast a lesse favourable eye upon the Prince of Phoeceus. As for Bomilcar, he never had any plots against Galathes or Britomartes, but had a vigilant eye upon the Prince of Phoeceus, who for his part employed his whole mind in prejudice of Bomilcar. All of them were extremely obsequious unto Cleonisbe and Glacidia, and for two days before this Ceremony, but for the prudence of that wise Lady, they had all faln very foul upon one another. I beseech you (sayd the Prince of Phoeceus one day unto Glacidia) if I be so unfortunate as to be any cause that the Princess should have any advantageous thoughts of Bomilcar, let him not know them untill the very last: defer this satisfaction untill the very last fatal minute of the Ceremony, so as the sudden surprize of so great a happiness, may make him dye of joy, as well as I of sorrow: For the truth is Glacidia, if Bomilcar be chosen, and does not dye with joy, he does not love her as he ought.

On the other side, Bomilcar out of the like apprehension made another request unto Glacidia, for he was most zealous with her, that if she knew the Prince of Phoeceus had no hopes of any Choise, that she declare it to him as soon as ever she could, imagining the greatest delight in the world, to make him soon sensible of his misfortune. But Glacidia being immoveable, shee constantly denied both her friends, as oft as they solicited her against each other, keeping her self close unto her resolution, either in speaking unto them, or unto Cleonisbe.

Page 143 In the mean time it was the happy fortune of the Phoecean Prince to be in the Pallace garden, as the Princess was in the Evening walking without any other company but her own women, and he addressed himself unto her with all imaginable devotion, and presenting his hand unto her, he carryed her into a long walk of Orange trees, at the end of which was seats of Grass: so as it being that season of the year when their Oranges were most in flower, and the ground all strewed with them, a fitter place to rest in could not be imagined: In which they being set down, their discourse began with things much different from those they ended with. For Madam, they began with their choise of odoriferous flowers, Cleonisbe examining in what rank should be placed the smell of Violets, of Roses, of Pinks, of Jassemine, and of Oranges, under which they were shaded. But after a very pleasant discourse of so delicate a subject, the Princess sayd that the only fault of Perfumes was, that custom made them lose their vertue, and by possessing them, one does not possess them: and so if one will enjoy any pleasure, they must deprive themselves of it for a certain time, since otherwise others enjoy it, and not they themselves: and truly this rule is almost generall, for after one is accustomed unto fetters, they are not heavy; slaves are not sensible of their Chains; Pleasures cease to be pleasures by a long habit, and so the same of sorrows. This rule Madam, which you think so generall, replied the Prince of Phoeceus, hath yet his exceptions: For truly Madam, I know a miserable man who suffers in such a manner, that though his miseries cannot encrease, yet he is still more sensible of them, and habit as powerfull as it is, doth not diminish his grief; but on the contrary, the more he suffers, the less is he accustomed to his sufferings, and is so extremely impatient, that he not only complains, but he murmurs and repines also. Patience (replied Clonsisbe faintly) is yet a remedy which is more provoked by murmuring, then it is eased by complaints. Yet truly Madam, replied he, I am perswaded that there is much ease in Complaints, and sighs from a grieved heart do carry with them some of that sorrow which lies heavy upon it: but when those sighs are stilled, and sorrows sit silently within, believe it Madam there is no such deplorable condition: The truth is, it cannot continue long, for one must of necessity eyther complayn or dye. Methinks the choise of these two (replied Cleonisbe and smiled) is very easie. Since you conceive it so Madam (replied the Prince of Phoeceus) I hope you will not be offended, if now, seeing me put to a necessity eyther of dying or complaying, I make choise of the last: And I conjure you to give me leave not only to complain unto you, but of you, and of my self; for truly Madam, you have brought me into the most pittifull condition in the world. I did not think Sir, replied Cleonisbe, and blushed, that I had given any cause of complaint unto any, much lesse unto you: But since it seems I am mistaken, I must tell you in generall that I never had any intention to hurt you: but I beseech you, expect no further satisfaction from me then this I have given you; for in the humour I am, I fear nothing more then too many explanations: Heavens preserve me Madam, replied he, from being too offensive: No Madam, all I desire is, you would be pleased to hear me, and not be angry. If you should tell me any thing, replied she, which will cause it, I conceive it better both for you and me, that <◇> did not hear you. Oh Madam (cryed he) I must needs tell you in what a miserable condition I shall be upon that day of Ceremony, when you shall make him happy whom you shall think worthy of your choise: For my part, I am sure that I cannot in any reason pretend unto it: Yet I am able to protest that I love you more then all your adorers. Your language does so much surprize me, replied Cleonisbe, that I know not how to answer it; for truly I thought you had known me better. I know you Madam, replied he, for the fairest and most excellent Princess of the world.

But since it doth extremely concern me that you know mee to be the most miserable man alive, I must let you know how much I have suffered, since the first minute I ever saw you: Alas Madam, you do not know the greatness of my Passion: and Perhaps looking upon me as a miserable exile, you think it unworthy of your selfe to put so much as in any doubt, whether I shall be chosen. To testifie I much esteem you, answered Cleonisbe, I will not scrupulously insist upon strict rule which would have wholly reject all that can be called Love: and therefore will argue with you upon a businessse which much concerns my happinesse, but I thinke not yours. And the rather, because the lawes do permit me the choise, and allow me to speak Page 144 of it with out any offence unto decency, I shall therefore ingeniously tell you, that you have merit enough to pretend unto this choise: But Sir, though the Law doe give me the liberty of choise, yet I doe not think so well of my self, as to trust un|to my selfe in a businessse of this nature: so as I indeed choose in appearance, but the King in effect, since I only doe what he pleaseth. So as if it were true that you loved me, and that I were not displeased at it, yet all your complaints would do me no good, since I will not so much as please my own selfe: And to testifie that I have much confidence in your vertue, I will confesse unto you, that amongst all those who at this ceremony will pretend unto my choise, there are three orders of them in my mind: some are meerly indifferent unto me: some I hate: and perhaps there will be one whom I would not hate, if it were permitted me to love him.

However, being perswaded that perhaps the King will appoint me to choose one of those I hate, and since I know hee will not appoint mee to choose him whom I would, if I did follow my owne inclination, I am resolved to humour him with a blind obedience: so Sir, it is upon him my good or bad fate depends, and therefore never make any vaine complaints; for since I will not seek my owne satisfaction, it is not probable I should yours.

Whilst Cleonisbe was talking, the Prince of Phoceus looked her full in the eyes, to see if he could find in them which of these orders he was: and his mind was so extreemly discomposed, that almost in one minute, he thought himselfe in the rank of indifferency, in the ranke of the hated, and in the happy rank of him that was loved. But Madam (said he unto her) will you not be pleased to let me know in which of these orders I am? I cannot well tell (replyed she, and rose up) whether you be in any of the three. At least Madam, honour me so farre (added he) as to assure me that I am not in the number of those who are hated: doubtlesse you are not, answered shee, but perhaps you will, if you put me once more to the necessity of hearing more of this discourse. The Prince of Phoceus had a great mind to have retained her a little longer, but he could not; for shee calling one of her women to mend something about the dresse upon her head, would not give any further occasion of discoursing upon his passion: So as he being resolved to talke of nothing else, and not daring to disobey, he was silent, and waited upon her unto her chamber, where presently after so much company came, that he could not possibly talke alone with her.

In the mean while, great preparations were made for this Feast: And though only one of these Princes were to be chosen, yet they were all as rich in their habits and elquipage, as if they were all sure of this election. And all the Ladies set their inventions upon the rack for the newest dresse and fashion: And Amathilda amongst the rest was as choise of that colour which would best become her as Cleonisbe was whether shee should submit unto the Kings mind, or follow her own according to the permittance of the law. It was all in vaine for her to aske the advice of Glacidia, for shee was unalterable. So that her owne reason only striving against her hatred of Bomilcar, and against her inclination unto the Prince of Phoceus, shee was not without her many inquietudes.

But the Eve of this great feast being come, the apprehension of these foure Riuals were so high, that one would have thought they had lost their wits and reasons. They were no sooner in one place, but they were at another. They met with one another at a hundred turns: And the hatred which was between Bomilcar and the Phoccean Prince did begin to flame, and was ready to flame out.

As for Cleonisbe, she was so sad as would have moved pity: yet endure it shee must that night, in which all the court was with her. Yet this multitude was one way advantageous to her for a while, for none of her foure Rivals could talke in private with her. But this lasted not long; for the Prince Carimantes coming in, after a quarter of an hours discourse, he went out againe, and carryed the Prince of Phoceus with him: And the company changing places, Bomilcar got next Cleonisbe, without eyther Britomartes or Galathes; for the last of these was gone unto Menedorus, to plot some design with him, and the first went unto the King, both of them going out with Carimantes: Then Bomilcar taking this opportunity, he used it so well, that he ingaged Cleonisbe against her mind to let him talk low unto her. I beseech you Madam (said he unto her, as afterwards shee told Glacidia) Page 145 deny me not the favour which I shall ask: and do me the honour to tell me, whether I may hope you will be pleased to make a bad choice to morrow, as to the merit of the person, but a just one, as to the greatnesse of his passion, who is so bold as to aske whether he may hope to be chosen. I once told you replyed she, that I would choos none but him whom it should please the gods to inspire into my thoughts: and I tell you it againe, and I assure you, it is more of them then me that you ought to aske what you seeme to desire, since truly I know neither your destiny, nor my own. Is it possible Madam, replyed he, that you should not know whom you intend to make happy? If so, alas I may be sure you will make me miserable: For after so many services which I have done you, and so many testimonies of my love which I have given you, if you intended to do me justice, you would not speak thus unto me: However Madam, me thinks that if you were resolved upon my ruine you should do me so much favour as to tell me, to the end, that preventing your choise, by my death, I might save my selfe so much sorrow as to see my Rivall happy, and keep you from being taxed with inhumanitie: Methinks Madam, neither Britomartes nor Glacidies have so much right to pretend unto your affection as I have: I have adored you before they ever thought of you: and as for the Prince of Phoceus, he hath had the honour to know you so very lately, and is so much obliged unto you, that he were exceedingly unjust, if he should offer to think you should do more for him, then for me. However it be, sayd Cleonisbe, and interrupted him, you shall know to morrow about this time, and so shall I, whether I be just or no. As Bomilcar was ready to reply, the King came in and prevented him; yet he was very glad to be so interrupted, because he hoped that he was come to speak unto Cleonisbe in his behalfe: so that with-drawing out of his respect, the King began to talk with Cleonisbe in a low voyce: In the interim Bomilcar addressed himself unto Glacidia, and to conjure her, that she would not still continue in the same mind she was, in relation to the business betwixt the Prince of Phoceus and him. Since I never use to alter my opinion out of humour, replyed she, I cannot do as you would have me, since the very same reasons which induce me to be neither for you nor for him, nor against him, nor against you, do continue still, and are as good to day as yesterday: And therefore do not take it ill if I alter not, since to change is a thing I seldome use, unless some convincing reason tell me that my ground is unjust. Though the Prince of Phoceus replyed Bomilcar, hath done me no other hurt, but hindering you from being my mediator unto Cleonisbe, yet I can never hate him enough for it; for had he never come hither, you had been a great promoter of my desires: I do confess it replyed she. But I must tell you also, that if you had not been a Rivall unto the Prince of Phoceus, I would have done him all the good offices I was able unto Cleonisbe.

Oh Glacidia, replyed he, you have done him too much in doing me none: I assure you Sir, replyed she, I have done him no more, then I have done for you. However it be, said he, I am forced to tell you, that if I be not chosen, I do not think I shall be able to keep within those limits you prescribe me, so as methinks you should wish my happinesse, lest if I be not I should be forced to take some violent course. To prevent it, replyed Glacidia, let me advise you this day to prepare your selfe to be miserable to morrow, to the end that your soule not being surprized, may not be shaken.

Oh Glacidia sayd he, I am in extream feare: you know what I must be: No sayd she, but I advise you, as I would my self, if the Case were mine, and as I would advise the Prince of Phoceus, if he should speak as you doe: As she sayd so, the Prince of Phoceus entered, who seeing the King talking with Cleonisbe, and Bomilcar with Glacidia, went to his Rivall, that he might receive so much satisfaction as to interrupt him, and keep him from perswading Glacidia to any which might prejudice him.

As for Bomilcar, he was vexed, & in such fear of incensing Glacidia, that he thought it better to retire, and leave his Rivall alone with her, then to stay with him. But he was no sooner gone, then the Prince of Phoceus began to conjure Glacidia not to be faithfull to him: And at least, though you will not favour me, yet do not hinder me: And if I can obtaine any more from you, let the Princess if it be possible rather choose Britomartes or Galathes, then Bomilcar, that so if I be not happy, he may fare no better then my selfe.

Page 146 Since your request is unjust, replyed she, I must deny it, and on the contrary declare, that I will do all I can to perswade the Princess that there are none but you and Bomilcar who are worthy of her choise, to the end that if she choose not you, she may choose him; and if not him, she may choose you; Thus being officious un|to you both, I will prejudice both your Rivals: and certainly I should do veltjry well in it, since I conceive it to be advantageous unto Cleonisbe. As Glacidia pronounced these words, the King left Cleonisbe, and me-thought as if he had spoken something which displeased her, for there appeared more melancholy in her eyes then before: And certainly I was not deceived; for after the King was gone, Glacidia understood that his visit had displeased Cleonisbe.

In the mean while, the Prince of Phoceus who was returned unto the Princess in hopes to find an opportunity of privacy with her, was forced to retire without speaking one word unto her; for considering the ill aspect of Cleonisbe, he thought best to follow the King. But as soon as all the company was gone out of the Chamber, she called Glacidia unto her, and told her how the King with many aggravations had shewed her reasons why he preferred Bomilcar before all the rest of the Pretenders, and had absolutely commanded her to choose him.

As soon as Cleonisbe had imparted this unto Glacidia, one knockt at the door and sayd that the Prince Carimantes desired to see her: and as Glacidia went out of the Closet, Carimantes entered, where as soon as he was settled, he began to speak unto her. You have had so much company (sayd he unto the Princess) that I thought it not fit to speak unto you of a business whereupon depends your happiness as well as mine: but now you are alone, I conjure you to tell me whom you intend to make your choise? Since the King, replyed she, hath not left me the liberty of my choise, but that I must follow his desires against my own inclination, Bomilcar must be preferred. Oh sister sayd the Prince Carimantes, since the King hath no lawfull power absolutely to command you: and since without infringement of the Law, he can only intreat you, I conjure you with all the earnestness of my heart, to choose the Prince of Phoceus, and not Bomilcar. Cleonisbe hearing this, was so surprized that she blusht; but since she was not sorry to hear the Prince her Brother to speak so, and would have been glad to have him perswade her unto it by some convincing reasons and arguments, she seemed to resist him: she told him then that truly the Prince of Phoceus was a Prince of great merits; but since it was not the pleasure of the King to choose him, she thought it her duty to submit. She had no sooner sayd so, but Carimantes told her that it was fitter for her to submit unto the Laws, then to make her choise by obedience: That he thought that her choise of a Graecian to be better then a Carthahinian; that the cause of the Prince of Phoceus his exile, was glorious; that he had more Subjects, then Bomilcar had Vassals; and that his merits did excell him every way. And above all other considerations, dear Sister sayd he, the Prince of Phoceus is Brother unto the Princess Onesicrite, unto whom he hath promised to be my mediator, and hath put me in hopes to exclude Menedorus from her heart: Oh Sir, sayd she, I am afraid that all your arguments which you think so full of reason, would not appear so unto you, but because you are interested; for I beseech you, what reasons should I give unto the King for not submitting to his commands? You may tell him (replyed Carimantes) that I advised you: That answer might produce a dangerous consequence replyed she; and I had rather (sayd she and blushed) make him believe that I love the Prince of Phoceus, then to make him suspect any defects of duty in you. But truly (said she, and sighed) the Kings words unto me will not give me leave to hearken unto you; for as he did aggravate the matter unto me, if I did not make choise of him, I should cause him to break off the Peace which he made for us with the Carthaginians, and so renew a War: Also he told me, I should ruine my Country, if I did not follow his advice. Oh sister, replyed this violent Prince, I must tell you, there is less danger in a Forraign War then in a Civill: and as the King told you, that you should cause a War with the Carthaginians, if you did not choose Bomilcar.

So I must tell you, that if you do not choose the Prince of Phoceus, you will cause War in your own Country; for I shall the very next day quit the Court, and fortifie Marseilles, and with a body both of Greeks and Segoregians, shall carve out Justice unto the Prince of Phoceus by giving you a legall, voluntary, and not a forced choise; Page 147 for I am not so blind, but I can see, that you esteeme the Prince of Phoceus enough to choose him, if the King did not hinder you, and do hate Bomilcar so much, that you would never choose him, if you had the freedome of your own inclination: And therefore Sister satisfie your self and me, since you may very well do it without any offence unto the Law of the Land. I know very well Sir, replyed she, that I may, but I know not whether I ought, and therefore I conjure you to attempt no such violent courses as I perceive you fancy: But to let you see, that the reason why I will not make you any such promise as you desire, is, because I conceive honour will not permit me. I will ingeniously confess, that if I did follow the motions of my own heart, I should prefer the virtue of the Prince of Phoceus before any: And this I do confess, Sir, to the end you may know, that since I value not my own interest, you ought not to think it strange, if I do not sacrifice my honour for your satisfaction: And the rather, because I am confident that though the Prince of Phoeus be not chosen, yet he will not faile to be your mediator unto Onesicrite, since he is obliged unto it, for his own sake, and for hers as well as for yours.

But Sister, replied Carimantes, if you had loved Bomilcar, what could you do more for him? I assure you Sir, replied she, that my thoughts of him are very farr from deserving the name of Love. But Sir, since I am a lover of glory above all things, I beseech you let me take the advice of my pillow, and consider both of the Kings reasons and yours. But first tell me, said he, whether you have made him any positive promise to obey his desires? I had not so much power, replied she; but since my answer was only by a respective and humble silence, I believe he thought that I would obey him. If you do obey him, replied Carimantes; you force me to become a Rebel, and to do all that the passion of the Phoecean Prince shall desire me, to the end he may favour mine. Therefore Sister, since by obeying the Law, you will prevent a dangerous Warr; you will do justice unto a Prince who adores you; you will contribute unto my happiness, and keep your self from being miserable, obey it rather then the King. After this Carimantes being gone, Cleonisbe called for Glacidia, unto whom she imparted all her Brother had said: and that she might not be ignorant of any causes of her inquietude, she told her further, how two of great quality in the Country had told her, that if she did not make choise of Britomartes (who was only of all the Pretenders, that Country man) all the Nobility of the Kingdome would take his part; adding, that Hipomenes did advertise him how Galathes had plotted some great design with Menedorus in case he were not chosen: So as, said she unto Glacidia, which way soever I look, I find my self in the most pittifull condition in the world: For truly if I obey the King, I shall choose Bomilcar whom I hate, I shall not choose the Prince of Phoeus whom I love. I shall incense the Prince my Brother, I shall disoblige all the Nobility; disobliging Britomartes: Also I do expose my self unto the violence and subtlety of Galathes, who is the craftiest man alive. But there cannot be the least thought of choosing either Britomartes or Galathes; for though my naturall aversion be stronger against Bomilcar then against them, yet I know, that if I must be unjust unto Bomilcar, it must be in favour of the Phoecean Prince: For by choosing one of them, I should equally incense the King and the Prince my Brother, yet they are both of them much to be feared; for the one may raise a party in the State, and the other being very powerfull with the King of the Celtes, may cause a vexatious War. On the other side, if I should do as the Prince my Brother would have me, and perhaps as my self would as much as he, I should more incense Britomartes and Galathes, then if I should choose Bomilcar. But the great Consideration of all is, that I shall incense the King, and I doubt dishonour my selfe by it: And after all this Glacidia (added Cleonisbe) can you be so inhumane as to deny me your Counsell in so perplexing a conjuncture? No Madam, replied she, and since you command me, I will take so much liberty as to tell you, that to ridd your self of half your trouble, you must never think either of Galathes or Britomartes: but without any fears either of the Celtes or Segoregians, never trouble your mind with any thing but your choise either of Bomilcar or the Prince of Phoeus.

Alas Glacidia, sayd Cleonisbe, by leaving me in doubt of that choise, you leave me in doubt of all. Truly Madam, replied she, this is all I either can or ought to do: For being fully perswaded you cannot choose amiss between them two which I Page 148 named, I thought I might well say what I did, but ought not to say any more, since I cannot prejudice either Bomilcar or the Prince of Phoeus: Therefore Madam, it is your self only who must examine the reasons both of the King and the Prince Carimantes, and to do what you shall find most expedient. If I should hearken unto reason, replied she, I should choose Bomilcar; and if I should honour the motions of my own heart, I should choose the Phoecean Prince. But for all this (added she and sighed) since I cannot think my reason will be strong enough to overcome this powerful inclination which prompts me to choose the Prince of Phoeus; and since I do not think this inclination, as powerfull as it is, can overcome my Reason, I could find in my heart a disposition, neither to choose Bomilcar nor the Prince of Phoeus, nor Britomartes, nor Galathes, but to name the first man of Quality that I shall see in the Temple: So that incensing all at once, both the King, the Prince Carimantes, the Prince of Phoeus, Bomilcar, Galathes, and Britomartes, they may overwhelm me with reproaches, and make me dye with sorrow and shame, before I go out of the Temple. Cleonisbe did pronounce these words with such agony of spirit, that they made Glacidia extreamly sad; yet she kept her selfe close unto her resolved limits, and did as much as ever she could to calm the heart of Cleonisbe, without byassing her self more on Bomilcars side, then of the Prince of Phoeus, or favouring the Prince of Phoeus more then Bomilcar. Yet was she put to a Dilemma after this; for after Cleonisbe had seriously pondered upon it, and had silent stood a while, she turned suddenly towards Glacidia: 'Tis done, said she, I am resolved upon it, and resolved to overcome two most violent passions at once, I meane hatred and its contrary Passion: But that I may be the better able to do it, you must encourage my weakness by your Commendations, and tell me I have done well in choosing Bomilcar, and should do ill if I should choose the Prince of Phoeus: Under your favour Madam, replied Glacidia, I will neither commend nor blame you in this businesse, but shall tell you as heretofore I have done that you cannot choose ill between the Prince of Phoeus and Bomilcar; yet since you can be just unto the one, without being unjust unto the other, you cannot too well consider upon a matter of such importance.

Since you leave me to my own sense, replied Cleonisbe: not to deceive my selfe, I will take the most difficult part, and by consequence the most glorious: I know very well, that I ought not to build too much upon the counsell of the Prince my Brother; for since the interest of his own passion makes him speak, I ought to suspect all he saith, and rather believe the King then him.

Moreover since my heart hath been so weak as to engage it self more then I would, tis fit I punish it for its unjust hatred unto Bomilcar, that I deprive it of what it loves, and submit unto what it hates. These Glacidia are my thoughts now, and I know not whether you will find me in the same mind to morrow, However, though you have denyed me your Counsell, yet I pray you do not also deny me your Prayers unto the Gods, that they will be pleased to give me so much force as to execute what I now resolve upon. After this and a hundred tender expressions, Glacidia left her, and went home, being exceedingly perplexed to see her selfe driven unto such a cruell necessity, as the next day to grieve with the Prince of Phoeus, for the same thing which obliged her to rejoyce with Bomilcar, for she saw Cleonisbe was fully resolved to choose him. Yet she did not think it expedient to speak of it: and indeed she said not a syllable of it either unto Bomilcar or the Prince of Phoeus, who came both unto her. But on the contrary, was so firme to her resolutions, and did compose her countenance so well, that their designs of getting the knowledg of their Destinies from her, were frustrated; for they knowing that she had been late with Cleonisbe, they hoped to get some light out of her; but being mistaken in their hopes, each of them departed. Bomilcar went to the King, and the Prince of Phoeus unto Carimantes.

As for Britamartes, he had abundance of men of quality with him, to follow him unto the Temple: Galathes was as busie in hindering others from being chosen, as he was to be chosen himself. Also Carimantes and Menedorus transacting according to their interests, it might very well be said they were all extreamly busie: yet Cleonisbe was most to be lamented, and the condition wherein shee was, was so very pittifull, that a worse cannot be imagined: For truly it being permitted her to go into her chamber untill Page 149 the time of going to the Temple, she received a hundred severall messages either from the King, or from Carimantes, or from the Prince of Phoeus, or from his three Rivals. Yet she had so sad an aspect, as it was easie to see her heart was in extream sorrow, and the Prince of Phoeus as well as Bomilcar did observe it. For accompanying the Prince Carimantes, who went to see her a little before she went to the Temple, unto which the King was to lead her, they came to Glacidia in their turns, and expounded her sadnesse according to their owne resentments. Alas Glacidia (said the Prince of Phoeus unto her) what a strange melancholy do I discover in the eyes of the Princess? have I not abundance of reason to feare, if I love her, that I shall be unfortunate, if she should choose me, since their is such a strange repugnancy in her rather then wish a happinesse which hath caused such a sad melancholy in her?

On the other side, Bomilcar reasoning after the same manner of mode hee used, and drawing a good presage from this weaknesse, he told Glacidia, that knowing the Prince of Phoeus was more in Cleonisbes favour then he was, that he could not chuse but be very glad to see so much melancholy in the countenance of the Princess, because it argued that the choise which shee was to make did not fully please her, and therefore he had reason to hope, that since the Prince of Phoeus was not likely to be chosen, he himself was: But Madam, a chance hapned a little after, which made it apparent that they reasoned more according to their feares, or according to their desires and hopes, then according unto right reason: For as the Prince Carimantes went out, and the Prince of Phoeus and Bomilcar following him, the last of these observed that Cleonisbe blushed as she looked upon his Rival; and immediately after the Prince of Phoeus observed that she changed colour as shee looked upon Bomilcar. So as one of them apprehending fear, and the other hope, one and the same thing caused two very different effects in their hearts. For Bomilcar thought she blushed as she looked upon the Prince of Phoeus, only because she should not choose him: And the Prince of Phoeus thought she blushed as she looked upon Bomilcar, because being to choose him, a spark of modesty broke out that colour in her cheeks: so neither the one or other knowing the true reason of her changing colour, both of them did conclude upon false conjectures, for the Princess afterwards confessed unto Glacidia, that when she blushed as she looked upon Bomilcar, it was only out of a resentment of hatred mixed with anger, to see her self forced to choose him. And when she changed colour in seeing the Prince of Phoeus, it was out of shame, at the injustice she was going to do unto her Love, and the violence she was to offer unto her naturall inclination.

In the mean time, according to the custome, Carimantes followed by these foure Rivals, and all the men of quality in the Court, went unto the Temple, where all the Sarronides of the Kingdom were present that day. I shall not trouble you Madam, with any description of that crowd of people in the streets and in the Temple, nor mention the magnificence of the foure Rivals, nor of Cleonisbes dresse, nor of all the rest of the Ladies, for it would but abuse your patience. Give me leave onlly to tell you, that the Prince of Phoeus and Bomilcar were the two, whose habits were most admired, and of them two, the Prince of Phoeus had the advantage: As for Cleonisbe, as melancholy as she was, yet she appeared admirably fair: and next the Princess, Amathilde was the most glistering in her dresse, and was the superlative both in beauty and youth: And she knew it so well, that she told Glacidia in raillery, remembering their dispute, that upon condition she were sure to be six years older then she was that day, she would most willingly resign her life, and never aske more in this world.

But in conclusion Madam, the Princess being ready, the King came to take her, and leading her into a Chariot of Triumph wherein they two did fit alone, they went unto the Temple, and all the Ladies followed in other Chariots. Since order is much observed in that Country in all these Feasts, as soon as the King and the Princess Cleonisbe were set in the midst of the Temple upon a Throne, all the Ladies did sit round about on scaffolds where they might have best sight; and on the right and left hand of the Throne stood all the men of quality, amongst which were the four Rivals: As for the Prince Carimantes, he sat upon a scaffold with Onesicrite, placing himself so that Cleonisbe might see him, and that he might make signs unto Page 150 her, and shew unto her, that his happiness depended upon her choise, as well as her own. But Madam, I had forgot to tell you, that at the entrance into the Temple, a knot of Jewels which tyed a scarf of Tiffany about Cleonisbes neck being broke, Glacidia who was next her, advanced to reach them up unto her, whilst the King was hearkning unto what the Prince of the Sarronides did say, who was come to receive him at the Gate of the Temple: so as whilst Glacidia was doing her this piece of service, Cleonisbe spake low unto her: There is yet time enough to give me Counsell, my deare Glacidia, sayd she unto her, but within this quarter of an hour it will be too late: And if I do not repent of the resolution which I have taken, I shall prefer him whom I hate, before him whom I love: You have not then changed the resolution of yesterday (replied Glacidia, and spake as low as she could) No (answered Cleonisbe and sighed) but I have so much ado to remain firm, that I dare hardly bragg of conquering my selfe, since at this very minute I have a combat with my selfe, and strive with more force then I am able to express. As the Princess sayd so, the knot of Diamonds being fastned, and the King beginning to walk, Glacidia could not answer, but went up to the Scaffold of Onesicrite, where she might see Cleonisbe, the Prince of Phoeus, and Bomilcar; for the two other Rivals were on the opposite side to that where Glacidia was. She saw Britomartes and Galathes also, but it was only their faces; yet interesting her self only in Bomilcar and the Prince of Phoeus, she cared not for observing the rest, nor cared what they thought: But at last Madam, as soon as the King and the Princess his Daughter were set upon the throne in the midst of the Temple, the Prince of the Sarronides began to read the Law, which required that this choise should be made, and gave an absolute free liberty of choise unto the person who was to choose, provided that there was no disproportion in the quality of that party which was chosen. After which, Musique, half Graecian, half Gaule, did make the roof of the Temple to Echo, whilst all the Sarronides were praying unto the gods to inspire the Princess with such a choise as might be haply for her self and the State. But Madam, whilst the Prayers were making, what different Devotions were in the heart of Cleonisbe, of the four Pretenders, of Carimantes, of Menedorus, and of Glacidia? But amongst the rest, what may one imagine to be the apprehensions of the Phoecean Prince, and of Bomilcar? For my part, who can only guess by seeing them, I profess I pitied them; for sometimes they would look upon the Princess as if they begged her favour: sometimes again they would look upon her with some sparks of fury in their eyes, and sometimes they would cast a most extreme melancholy look upon Glacidia.

In the mean while, Cleonisbe suffered as much as they; for being at the very point of pronouncing sentence, and condemning her self, to passe all her life with a man whom she could not choose but hate, and to part for ever from a Prince whom she could not chuse but love, she was sensible of more then ever she could express unto Glacidia, though she employed the most apt and significant words in the world for it. At first her reason would act with her heart as a Rebel which it had tamed: but this Rebel having broken those chains which her reason had put upon it, the Warre which she thought ended, did but begin, and begun more violently then before. So as whilst they were praying unto the Gods to inspire her, she was in so great a combustion of spirits, that she knew not what to aske them: She had not sooner entertained a thought of that prayer which she framed in her resolution of choosing Bomilcar, but she perceived her self unresolved whether she should choose him or no. However, she had not so much power as to pray that the gods would give her so much boldness as to prefer the Prince of Phoeceus: and as she afterwards told Glacidia she had not power to pray that they would inspire her according to their own wills. But at last, her piety being stronger, she forced her heart to submit unto their conduct, and prayed zealously that she might make such a choice, as might more conduce unto her glory then unto her satisfaction. But the more she prayed, the less quiet was in her soule, and more ravelled in her resolutions of choosing. Moreover, her naturall aversness to Bomilcar, and her affection to the Prince of Phoeceus, assuming fresh forces to torment her, there was a new hot combate in her mind.

Furthermore, the menaces of civil and foreign Warre which the King and Carimantes had by their talk made known unto her, filled her imagination with such sad consequences, that they raised a most terrible combustion in her heart.

Page 151 Again, her fears to incense the King, or to force Carimantes unto some violent course, did extremely perplex her, but the sight of the Phoecean Prince went nearest her heart: And truly Madam, there appeared such lively sorrow in the face of the Prince, that it being easie for Cleonisbe to conclude there was as much love in her heart, as melancholy in his eyes, she was fuller of irresolution and despair then ever. So as when the Prince of the Sarronides had made a learned discourse upon the importance of that choice which Cleonisbe was to make, she knew not in the earth what she would, or what she would not have.

In the mean time, according to the custome, the King gave a Ring of an inestimable value unto the Princess his Daughter, who after she had taken it, descended from the Throne, and was to put it into the hands of the Prince of the Sarronides; who after he had received it from her, began to speak with such authority, as if she had not been Daughter unto that King unto whom he was a Subject. After I have received this Ring which is here in my hand (said he unto her) it is your part Madam to name unto me the man whom you think worthy of your choice, to the end I may give it unto him: But first, remember that this choice ought to be free, it ought to be reasonable, and it ought to be worthy of your selfe. In order unto these, consult only with your own reason, and let neither feare or any humane respect whatsoever move you to infringe the Law, which requires that you should be equitable in your choice. Be pleased Madam, then to tell me whom you think worthy of your choice: At these words, according to the custome; the Princess would have named him whom she would choose, and would have said Bomilcar. But her tongue having no power to pronounce so much as the first syllable of that name, though she did strive to do it, in lieu of answering, she stood silent: and presently growing pale, then blushing immediately after, her soule was in such a maze, as she knew not whom she saw, or where she was: Insomuch as not being able to be mistress of her selfe, nor calm so great a storm in so short a time, she layd her hand upon her eyes, she seemed to be so sick and weak, that she was not able to finish the Ceremony: Insomuch as the Prince of the Sarronides being a man of an admirable spirit, and knowing that certainly this accident proceeded from the irresolution of her soul, he went unto her, and said that it were expedient to adjourn the Ceremony untill another time: And then Cleonisbe accepting of that motion, did gladly consent it should be so. You may easily imagine Madam, what a rumour this made in the Church, and what amazement it caused in the minds of the four Rivals.

When the Prince Carimantes saw how the case stood, he came from his scaffold, and going straight unto Cleonisbe, he began to talk with her in a low voyce: Oh Sister said he unto her, I beseech you defer not your happiness and mine, one word is quickly pronounced Perhaps too quickly for you this day (replied she and sighed) and therefore its better to defer it untill another time.

In the mean while, these four Rivals knew not what to think, yet Bomilcar concluded that he had reason to grieve that he was not chosen. And the Prince of Phoeceus had so much comfort as to think, that since Cleonisbe had not pronounced Bomilcar, it was almost a certain sign she did not love him, for he knew the King would have her choose him. As for Britomartes and Galathes, since their hopes were more in their factions then any thing else, they were not so angry as Bomilcar that Cleonisbes choice was deferred. But whilst they were every one reasoning with themselves, the Princess did carry her self as one who was sick, and was carryed back unto the Palace, where she was so extremely ashamed, that she could not vanquish her selfe as from a feigned sickness, she fell sick in earnest. To tell you Madam all the expressions of this Princess when she was alone with Glacidia, is a task not easie: Well cruell woman, said this sick Princess, did I not tell you I stood in need of your reason to strengthen mine? now you see what a shame I have brought upon my self: I would have named Bomilcar, but my heart turned Rebel, and would not suffer me to pronounce him: and I was in such a condition, that if I had not stopped my mouth, I had named his Rival in lieu of him. But Glacidia, make me so ashamed of my weakness, that I may repent; for I must confess it to be so very great, that maugre all my shame, I am in some sort glad that I am yet free, and that I did not name Bomilcar; for if I had overcome my self, my victory had already cost me more tears, then my defeat hath sighs. However, I beseech you chide me for being so little Mistress of my Page 152 own heart: If I should take so much liberty as to chide you for any thing Madam, replied she, it should be for commanding me to condemn any of your actions; for truly Madam, I think it to be just that you should choose the Prince of Phoeceus. I think it just you should choose Bomilcar, and I think it just you should hardly resolve which to choose. Thus finding reason in all you do, I cannot condemn you Madam: All I am able to do, is to pity her who cannot choose, as well as those who cannot be chosen. However, the Princess was not in a condition to renew the Ceremony, for a fever of above twelve days did seize upon her, during which time she would not see either the Prince of Phoeceus or Bomilcar, or Britomartes, or Galathes: Yet since she could not choose but admit of Carimantes to see her, the Prince of Phoeceus had a powerful mediator unto her. Yet Bomilcar did more prejudice himself, then Carimantes could serve the Prince of Phoeceus: For thinking he had some injustice done him if he were not chosen he, did not only complain against the Princess, but against the King also, imagining that he had not solicited Cleonisbe enough in his behalfe.

Now, Galathes fearing Bomilcar more then he did the Prince of Phoeceus, he carried it so, that the Princess knew how Bomilcar complained against her, and let the King also know what he said against him. As for Britomartes, he went another way to worke; for he spake aloud, that if Justice were not done him, he would unite all his friends, and the friends of all his Rivals who were no happier then himselfe, to molest the happiness of him that should be chosen: so as there was none but the Prince of Phoeceus, which did not openly complain though his soule was as sad as any of the rest: But when he was alone with Glacidia, what did he not say to scruce the thoughts of Cleonisbe out of her, which she had upon that day of solemnity; which at the beginning had all appearances of a jollity, but at the end was all melancholy. It seems also, it was a day designed by fate to be universally sad, for three extraordinary accidents did fall out upon it: and amongst the rest, nothing was more talked of, then that the faire and young Amathilde should that day fall sick, and of a sickness so strange and terrible, that all Physicians said, that though she her self escaped, yet her beauty could not: Yet they did not at first tell her as much, but on the contrary, knowing her humour, they assured her that she would recover her beauty with her health.

In the mean time, the violence of Bomilcar having displeased the King, the Prince Carimantes closed with that opportunity, and went unto him one morning without acquainting Cleonisbe: and the King lending him a willing eare, with much boldness and eloquence, he hinted unto him that he should not suffer Cleonisbe to marry a man who was so insolent as to pretend unto that honour as a due unto him, insomuch as the King did agree Bomilcar was too blame: After this, driving the nail to the head, he intimated many inconveniences which were to be feared, if he suffered her to marry eyther Britomartes or Galathes; and that much lesse danger would ensue, if he preferred the Prince of Phoeceus before any of the rest: At first, Carimantes found some repugnancy in the Kings mind, not but that he had a high esteem of the Phoecean Prince, and loved him extremely: but being an exile from his Country, this stuck much in his mind. Yet Carimantes would not be repulsed for but he pressed the matter so home, that he obliged the King to think well of him: so as going to carry this welcome news unto the Prince of Phoeceus, he made him extremely joyed, and obtained from him a confirmation of his promise, to oblige Onesicrite to receive the honour he did her very favourably.

The truth is Madam, the Prince Carimantes being joyned, nothing could oppose them, and their power was stronger then Bomilcars, Britomartes, and Galathes all together. I shall not insist Madam upon a relation of this important Negotiation; but only tell you that whilst this feaver which the Princess had, was the pretence of seeing no body; Carimantes carryed the Prince of Phoeceus unto her, and made her confess unto him that she was glad the King would permit her to do Justice unto his merit. It is not an easie matter Madam, to relate his raptures of joy: and yet it was greater, when he understood that Carimantes had negotiated so well with the King, that he gave his consent they should be happy, and likewise did permit the Prince his sonne to marry Onesicrite. However these things were carryed so closely, that they made no noise in the Court: For since the meetings of the King, and the Prince of Phoeceus, of Cleonisbe and Carimantes, were alwayes with much caution, Page 153 nothing was divulged. Moreover, Aristonice writing almost every day unto Onesicrite, to exhort her unto the publique good before her own private satisfaction, she resolved to sacrifice her passion unto the good of her Country, and did so affirmatively promise it unto this illustrious Virgin of Diana, as there was no cause of any doubt but that she would overcome her self. So that when the Prince of Phoeceus was advertised by Aristonice how the case stood, and wished his Sister to break off with Menedorus, since Sfurius would not let her marry him, and when afterwards he desired her to receive the affection of the Prince Carimantes, she told him that she would obey him: Tis true, she told him so with a sigh, yet it was after such a manner, as one might see she intended to keep her promise: And indeed, from that day forward, she desired Menedorus to withdraw his affection from her, giving all her reasons which might induce him to hearken unto her desires.

But though she gave him as sweet language as is imaginable, yet he was so full of sorrow and anger that he could not dissemble his resentments, but accused her of inconstancy and ambition. Also he did menace both the Prince Carimantes and the Prince of Phoeceus so highly, that Onesicrite, as sweet a temper as hers was, she began to be angry against him for giving such irreverent language. Insomuch as smothering all that tenderness of heart which she had towards Menedorus, she absolutely charged him never to see her again: so as this incensed Lover beginning his obedience by leaving her, he went to Galathes, and imparted all his sorrows unto him, as Galathes did the like to him again.

In the mean time, since Cleonisbe began to recover, the King and the Prince Carimantes resolved, that to hinder any commotion in the State, Cleonisbe should temper the spirits of these three Rivals which were to be rejected, and to tell them handsomely her intentions before the day of solemnity, to the end they should not be surprized, and be absent.

The Princess was hardly perswaded unto this; but the King absolutely commanding her, she resolved to be obedient, and indeed she was so: For the Feaver having quite left her, and they permitted to see her, these three unfortunate Lovers came to present their Complements of joy for her recovery: So that she taking this opportunity, did declare their dooms unto them one after another. But though she employed all her wit and eloquence to make them receive it patiently, yet all would not do.

As for Britomartes, he being high and proud, told her in a high manner (after she had desired him to pretend no longer unto her choice for severall reasons) that she was unjust unto his quality and vertue. For as she told him, to qualifie his mind that it was not but that she esteemed him very much, he interrupted her. Since it is so Madam (said he unto her) it is enough to authorize all my attempts; for since you do not think me unworthy of you, I must tell you, that I do not think I shall do any thing against those respects I owe you; when I shall do all, I am able to possess in honour, which you confess I may enjoy without injustice: And so Madam, I shall endeavour all wayes possible to keep you from an ill choice. Thus Madam, did Britomartes receive his sentence. As for Galathes, since he had the art of dissimulation, he seemed to receive all that Cleonisbe said with all humble respect, and with a thousand signs of love, not one of any anger, he only told her, that he would do all he was able to obey her, but yet feared that he could not. Afterwards Bomilcar being come to Cleonisbe, whose mind was incensed against him, by the complaints he had made against her and the King her Father, she would not pronounce his doom with any words of sweetness: But on the contrary, she spoke so sharply, that she was out of all patience. Fie Madam (said he unto her, after she had absolutely charged him not to pretend unto her choice) Can you remember my most violent and constant passion, and treat me thus? 'Tis true (pursued he) I complained both against you and the King: But Madam, how could I do lesse, seeing the injustice which was done me? Might it not well be said, that my passion was not worthy of you, if my resentments had been lesse violent, or had been more wise in my anger? For the very truth is, what have I not done to deserve you? and in how great hopes hath the King put me, to be preferred before all my Rivals.

Moreover Madam, can you think I am able to endure that an exile Prince should take a happiness from me which I have purchased by a million of services? And because Page 154 he hath been weather-beaten, and found safety under the shelter of your favour, therefore it must be I who must suffer shipwrack? Think upon it Madam, consider it seriously, and do not force me to despair. Cleonisbe then thinking her selfe too blame for incensing a man who had some reason to complaine, though he was much to be blamed for complaining so violently after the Ceremony, she resolved to accord a misfortune which might happen, and perswade him more mildly to receive his misfortune. To testifie unto you (said she unto him) that you have no reason to accuse the Prince of Phoeus for your being no better in my thoughts, I will open my very heart unto you, and confess my whole weakness and injustice. I will tell you then, that since I am not a very stupid, I know very well your worth: I know your originall is great, and that your Ancestors have been illustrious Citizens of Carthage, and also Kings of Numidia: Moreouer I know you to be a man of much spirit, and courage, and generosity: Also I know how I am obliged unto you by a thousand services you have done me: But I know also, and I must tell it, that there hath ever been such a kind of conceipt in my heart as I am not able to expresse, and which would never allow you to love me. Yet notwithstanding this naturall antipathy which I have in vaine striven against, I was resolved to choose you, and had named you upon the day of solemnity, if my heart could have submitted unto my reason, and my tongue have pronounced the word Bomilcar.

How sad a fate soever it be (replied he and fighed) to be hated: yet I think my selfe in some sort obliged to hear you say, that you did not choose me because you hated me, rather then because you loved the Prince of Phoeus: And I wish unto the Gods Madam (said he, lifting up his eyes to heaven) that you hated me half as much more, so you could love him halfe lesse: For truly Madam, I am sure that if he were no happier then my selfe, I should not be so unhappy as I am. Yet Madam, as hated as I am, since you would have chosen me, why did you not? or why will you not? I will not, replied she, because I conceive that I should wrong you, and very ill requite the affection you have unto me if I should inseparably tie you and your fortunes unto one who can never love you: so that without charging either the King, or the Prince of Phoeus, or my selfe of any injustice, attribute it unto a sovereign power, against which nothing can resist, and which causeth that I cannot be Master of my own destiny. You have a friend, added she, who can witness that I he not, and who can assure you that I have done all I can for you against my selfe: how Madam, replied he, did Glacidia know that you have hated me? I did conceale it long from her, replied she, but I must confesse at last I told her I could not love you, and I asked her pardon, lest she should hate me for it. Then Madam, replied he, I have no more to say, unlesse this, that as you cannot chuse but continue your hate, so I begg that I may have leave to continue loving you.

After these words Bomilcar rose up, and went away so sad and angry, as no mortall man could be more. As soon as he was gone, the Prince of Phoeus came in, and finding her alone, he began to discourse of his passion with abundance of delight; for since it was approved of both by the King and Carimantes, Cleonisbe did freely permit him. So that passing insensibly from one thing to another, the Princess did let him know that Glacidia did know what advantageous thoughts she ever had of him, and told him what discourse she had with her concerning Bomilcar. Then both these two friends of Glacidia did in one day make severall and different Complaints against her: For Bomilcar complained extreemly that she never told him how the Princess hated him: and the Prince of Phoeus murmured very much, that she should so long conceale from him the affection of Cleonisbe: But this wise and discreet person did so well satisfie them, that it was not fit for her to do otherwise then she did, as they ceased all Complaints, and held her in high admiration: For truly said she unto Bomilcar, as much hated as you were, you were very near your desired happiness: And as much loved as you were (said she unto the Prince of Phoeus) you were very near to be discarded for ever: So as desiring neither to hurt nor help you, I would never impart such things as you could not know, without drawing some advantage one upon another, which I neither would, nor ought to doe.

But Madam, not to insist any longer upon things of triviall consequence, it was resolved that the first day on which the Princess was able to stirre abroad, the solemnity Page 155 should be accomplished. The worst was, it could not be done in private, because the Law required that the doors of the Temple should be open that day, unto all men of quality in the Kingdom, either strangers or others: and it was much feared lest some tumult should arise. Yet all possible order was taken to prevent it; for besides the pretenders unto Cleonisbe, the dispaire of Menedorus was much feared. Yet since the custome was, that the marriage should be solemnized within fifteen dayes after the first Ceremony, there was hopes all might be passed over without any disorder: and that if any of these Lovers would make any attempts, it would be in this intervall. But there was a mistake; for the imperious humour of Britomartes looking at the shame which would reflect upon him if he were not chosen, did endeavour to discover who it was whom Cleonisbe intended to choose, to the end he might send him a challenge. But being not well informed, and because in common prudence, she should rather choose Bomilcar then either of his two Rivals, he believed Bomilcar to be the man who hindered him from his happiness: So as without more delay, he sought for an occasion of meeting with him, and found it. But Madam, the strangest passage was, at the very same time that Britomartes intended to fight with Bomilcar, Bomilcar intended to fight with the Prince of Phoeus. 'Tis true, he concealed his design, and Glacidia, as foreseeing as she was, did not suspect it: But Britomartes and Bomilcar meeting in a place where none were but themselves: Since doubtless you are not ignorant (said Britomartes unto him) what just pretences I have unto the Princess, so I must tell you I am not ignorant of yours: But since I believe neither you nor I do know which of us shall be chosen, I come to make such a proposition unto you, as honour will not permit you to deny me; If so as you say, answered Bomilcar, you may assure your self I shall most willingly embrace it. Then promise me (replied Britomartes) that if the Princess choose you, you will fight with me the next morning, and I will promise you that if I be chosen I will fight with you if you please. I promise it, replied Bomilcar; but Britomartes (said he) in promising this I promise nothing, for neither you nor I shall be chosen: Oh that it would please the Gods you were put unto the necessity of seeing me with a sword in my hand. Bomilcar spoke this with such an aire as perswaded Britomartes that his heart and his tongue went together: And the proud Gaule having got a promise of fighting with Bomilcar, in case it was his fate to be happy, resolved upon a revenge on him that should be so, who ere it was, and went to tell the same unto Galathes and the Prince of Phoeus. Thus he challenged his three Rivals all in one day.

But Madam, the day of Solemnity being come, Cleonisbe was not so unresolved as she was before; and her owne inclination being authorized by the King and Carimantes, she pronounced the name of the Phoecean Prince aloud, when the Prince of the Sarronides asked her whom she thought worthy of her choice, so as this sage Sarronide causing him to draw nigh, and having given this ring unto him which he received from Cleonisbe, this Prince accepted of it with all reverence, and returned a Complement sutable unto his spirit and affection: After which, the King approved of this choice, and the Temple did ring with shouts of joy. But at last, the Musique causing the tumultuous noise to cease, they thanked the gods for so good a choice.

In the mean while, Bomilcar, Galathes, and Britomartes retired without any shares in these publique joyes, each of them ruminating upon them severall designs. As for the Prince of Phoeus, his Joyes were so high, that he valued not the Combate which he was to have with Britomartes, and appeared as pleasant all that day as it was possible for any man to be. In the mean time, Glacidia according to her resolutions, grieved for Bomilcar, and rejoyced for the Prince of Phoeus, but it was not in any way of dissimulation, for she was really glad, and really sad: And both her generosity and sincerity was such, that she confessed unto Bomilcar though she was extreemly sorry that he was miserable, yet she was extreemly glad that the Prince of Phoeus was happy. Also she told the Prince of Phoeus, that though she was well satisfied with his good fortune, yet shee could not chuse but be much troubled to see Bomilcar miserable: and she did so well divide her heart between these two friends, that she did not any iniustice unto either of them.

Page 156 Since honour and love are most inconsistent together in one heart, the Prince of Phoeus would not stay untill Britomartes should hint him unto the performance of his promise; for he sent him a Letter which intimated that he was ready to keep his word. And the next morning they fought, where the Prince of Phoeus disarmed Britomartes, though he was one of the strongest and most valiant men in the world. But as he returned from this fight, he met Bomilcar in a great solitary place, who knowing how squares went, came unto him. Since I will not constrain you to give me satisfaction (said he unto him) as you have done Britomartes, untill you be recovered of your weariness which conquering so brave an Enemy hath caused, I will not at this time desire you to draw your sword: But since you are a gallant man, I do conceive you will be ready to morrow about this time to give me this satisfaction.

The Prince of Phoeus seeing a fit occasion to shew his secret hatred of Bomilcar, without any offence either unto Cleonisbe or Glacidia, since he did assault him the first. he answered him in such a manner as did let him see he did not love him. To testifie unto you (said he unto him) that my victory hath not put me to a necessity of any resting to vanquish you, we will without more delay end all differences betwixt us.

In saying so, the Prince of Phoeus drew his sword, and Bomilcar his: For since they had with them only one Page a peece, and were in a place of privacy, it was easie for them to satisfie both their hatred and their love. And certainly Madam, they began to fight with so much fury, that if the gods had not sent Hipomenes and my selfe in the very nick of time to part them, their Combate had been fatall unto both. For from the place where wee first discovered them untill we came up to them, I perceived they fought as if they had resolutions either to vanquish or dye: Do what we could, they were both wounded when we came unto them: 'Tis true, the Prince of Phoeus was lesse hurt then Bomilcar; for he had only a slight hurt in his left hand, but Bomilcar very considerably on his right side.

In the mean time, Hipomenes and my selfe were extreemly surprized; for we hearing that Britomartes had challenged him, you may imagine we wondered to see him in hand with Bomilcar: Also you may imagine Madam that these two Combates made a great noise in the Court, and added much unto the glory of the Phoecean Prince. The truth is, there fell out severall accidents that day, which made all discourse sadd: For Madam, be pleased to know that Britomartes who had a proud soule, was so grieved at the losse of his Mistress, and to be vanquished by his Rivall, that he would needs kill himself with the same sword which his enemy had restored unto him: and if his friends had not kept vigilant eyes upon him all the while he was in his raptures of fury, he had not lived two hours after his defeat.

Again, there was in Marseilles an old man, who having passed all his life for one that was wise would needs throw himself down a Precipie to deliver himself from his sorrows, that he could not dye in the place where he was born.

Again, Amathilde being much recovered, did call for a Glass; and finding that she was never like to be faire again, she fell into such horrid despair, that feigning some had taught her a medicine for her face, wherein was an ingredient of dangerous poyson, she caused one of her women to bring it unto her; and in lieu of putting it to the use she said she would, she poysoned her self. But she only knowing the vertue of this ingredient, but not the quantity to kill one, she took not so much as did execute her intentions: And so, the thing being discovered, they gave her remedy and Antidotes against her will. You may well conceive Madam, that three such accidents as these chancing in one day, did seem very strange: But the greatest disaster of all was, and to shew there was some malignant constellation which did shew its influence by inspiring violent thoughts; there was a man of Liguria, and of good quality, who intending to dwell amongst the Segoregians, had ordered all his goods to come by Sea: but his misfortune was, the ship which was to bring them, perished, yet we understood that he took his loss very patiently and constantly for a whole year, but now would needs throw himself into the Sea.

Thus Madam, these four accidents chancing from different causes, and hapning in one day, caused all the Sarronides to assemble, and the Councell of six hundred also: For since the spirits of the People were much disposed to applaud the courages Page 157 of such as had recourse unto death to deliver themselves from any misfortune, it was feared that this would produce very ill consequences: and if some order were not taken, these examples might be followed by other unfortunate People.

As for the Sarronides, their advice was, that to prevent the like disasters, the glory of the Action must be taken away, and to set some mark of ignominious imbecillity upon it. But the Councell of six hundred which assembled by the permission of the Phoecean Prince, they argued after another manner, and said, that since the action might either be base or generous, according to the severall motives which caused it, so they must not be condemned all in general: and to prevent the frequency, it was not requisite absolutely to forbid it: So that not to deprive men of that liberty of dying which the Gods hath left unto them, and to prevent also that they shall not slightly throw away their lives, it were expedient a Law were made, by which every person who would come unto Assembly and propound the causes which moves them to dye, they should be received, and may boldly demand poison of the Judges, which shall be granted or denied according as they shall think fit: Concluding, that since it is not just a man should be a Judge and party in his owne cause, so he ought not to judge and dispose of his own life as he would.

In conclusion Madam, this Law was established, and two men of the Assembly were chosen to keep poison in a golden Cup, to be given unto them whom they thought fit to receive this last remedy. You may imagine Madam, that these accidents and this new Law did furnish all tongues with talke enough: but I assure you, the Prince of Phoeceus was more like to dye with joy then poison: He had the satisfaction also to understand that Glacidia was much incensed against Bomilcar for fighting for she told him, that if he were less miserable then he was, she would withdraw her friendship from him, adding with much generosity, that she was a Petitioner unto the Prince of Phoeceus, that he would give her leave to pardon Bomilcar the injury he had offered in assaulting him: But to make the satisfaction of the Phoecean Prince more full, Cleonisbe would go unto Marseilles to see Aristonice, with intentions to stay there some days; the King thinking it convenient she should remain there untill the Nuptials, to the end Bomilcar and the Prince of Phoeceus might not be together in one place. Also the Prince Carimantes was very glad that Onesicrite was to be so near Aristonice, because she would confirm her in her new resolution.

But that the presence of Menedorus might not prejudice the design, Sforius commanded him to stay with the King, so as this journey was all pleasure. Yet the heart of Onesicrite was full of sorrow; for she had much ado to entertain the affection of Carimantes, and forget Menedorus: and I am confident there are few persons who have done things more difficult for the good of their Countreys, then Onesicrite did for hers. However she set as good a face upon it as she could; lest the Prince Carimantes should perceive the troubles of her mind, and indeed she went unto Marseilles with some shew of joy in her countenance. You may well imagine Madam, that the Prince of Phoeceus would entertain Cleonisbe with all imaginable honours: And that Aristonice also was full of acknowledgments unto the Princess for the honour she did her.

Since Glacidia was one amongst the rest in this Voyage, she did much contribute unto the pleasure of it: And for three dayes together. I assure you there was not one in all this illustrious company except Onesicrite, who did not think every minute to be very well spent: And though we had severall informations, that Bomilcar and Galathes were plotting some great design, and that the first was almost cured of his wound: Yet since the Prince of Phoeceus was to marry Cleonisbe as soon as all things were in readiness for the solemnity, we did not feare that any thing could hinder his happiness.

As we were thus without any Cares but how to find out fresh pleasures for every day, it was told the Princess Cleonisbe, that there was a Lady which had sent unto the Councell of six hundred, to aske of them the poison according to the new established Law. This adventure being extraordinary enough to move curiosity, since it was never heard of before, that there should be Judges to arbitrate upon the life and death of such as would not live, Cleonisbe was very desirous to be at this sad Ceremony: Page 158 'Tis true, that it was with an intention worthy of her generosity; for her design was, to see if she who desired death had any such misfortune which she could help, to the end she might infuse desires of life into her. Onesicrite was likewise of the same Curiosity; and as for Glacidia, she most of all desirous to know what reasons could move any to renounce life, so as she was very earnest with both these Princesses to be present when this Lady demanded poison of the six hundred.

So as Cleonisbe making their desires known unto the Prince of Phoeceus, he found out an expedient for it; for since a place was to be built purposely for this Councell, it was so contrived, that the Prince of Phoeceus could look into it out of his Chamber: so as this being the place resolved upon for the Princess, the Prince Carimantes, and those of their Retinue, it was concluded that the Councell of six hundred should the next morning assemble to heare the reasons of the Lady, and to put in practice this Law which themselves had made. But we were much surprized to heare that there were two more who demanded audience for the like business: So as all Curiosities be redoubled, they expected the hour of this sad Ceremony with much impatience.

I shall not trouble you Madam with any description of the order which this Assembly held, but only tell you, that after the Judges had taken their places; after the Prince of Phoeceus, as chief of the Councell had taken his place; and after the Prince Carimantes, Cleonisbe, Onesicrite, Glacidia, some other Ladies and my self were in the Chamber, where we could see and heare all passages. We saw a Page of a handsome presence enter, and who by his handsome deportment before the Assembly, seemed to be something above his condition; Our greatest surprize was to see, that he held the picture of a Lady in his hand: But though this Picture was drawn at large, since it was not turned directly towards us, we saw it but by halves, and yet we knew it to be a very faire one; For since the youngest men of this Councell did sit next the Page who held it, we perceived by their actions that they admired the beauty of this Picture. But after this handsome Page had obtained leave to speak, he made it known unto the Councell, that the faire person whose picture they saw, having the misfortune to lose that excellent beauty which they admired in her picture, which was in her person much above all representations; she had sent by him to beseech them they would be pleased to grant her the poison, as the only remedy which she could imagine to comfort her after her loss: And sirs, to testify unto you, that if this remedy be fit to be granted unto any, it is unto the person who sent me, I need only to tell you sirs, that though she desires death more then ever any desired life, yet she could not find a heart to come her selfe and demand it; for she cannot do it, unless she shew her selfe in the same condition wherein she is, which would be a greater torment to her then you can imagine.

Sirs, she hath commanded me to tell you, that since she hath lost all she loved, and all which she thinks could render her amiable, you cannot without injustice deny her the only remedy for such misfortunes. She hath further commanded me to let you know, that it is inhumanity to let her live, because since she will neither see nor be seen, and can neither quit her solitude nor stay in it, it were incredible torment to force life upon her: And if your authority do not release her, she will suffer more then ever any did; For indeed sirs, whensoever she looks upon her picture, she swims in tears: and if she look in a Glass, she is madd, and is not Mistress of her self: It is you Sirs, who must judge of the life and death of this person, who demands the poison.

But before you pronounce sentence, and after I have obeyed her whose slave I am, I beseech you give me leave to tell you, that I should never have done this for her, unless she had promised me my liberty in recompence of this service, for I was her slave. But to the end this service I have done her may not prove fatally sad unto her, I dare be so bold as to tell you, that not being what I appear to be; but having been brought up in another condition then this into which War hath brought me, I can assure you that she who here desires to dye, because she hath lost her beauty, hath so many beauties in her mind, that she deserves you should deny what she asks, and what I aske for her, to the end I may enjoy the greatest of all goods which is my liberty, and to testify hereafter, that she may be loved and not be faire.

Page 159 As this generous slave did say so, he turned the picture, so as we plainly knew it to be the portraiture of Amathilde, and consequently intertesting our selves the more in the judgment which was to be given, we expected with much impatience, the opinion of the Judges. But after the examination of the businesse they told this slave that when the gods doe take away from men those goods which they were sure to lose: This is no lawfull cause to desire death; For as soon as they began to live, they ought to expect the losse of them: yet to have some regard unto the great affection which Amathilde had unto her beauty; they ordained, that if after the space of six yeares, shee came unto the Councell of six hundred, and declared unto them, that in all that time she received no consolation for the losse of her beauty, they would then grant what they now deny. This sentence was thought so just, both by him that was to receive it and those who heard it, that they did as much commend the Councell of six hundred, as they blamed the dispaire of Amathilde.

After this Madam, we saw enter an old man, who I told you desired to die, because he could not live out of his own Countrey: but he entred with so much gravity, that never man had an aspect of lesse dispaire then he: Also he spoke with so much eloquence and force against banishment, and had such excellent expressions of love to his country, that he even melted the hearts of his hearers: But being very old, the weakness of his voyce forced silence upon him. Yet the Judges not blinded by his eloquence, told him, that the reasons which would move them to grant poison, was, when an unfortunate man, whose miseries had lasted long, and could not meet with any cure.

But his age was such, as he might well thinke the remedy which he demanded was very nigh unto him: and therefore it was not fit for them to alter the decree of the gods. Thus sending him away after good exhortations to overcome himselfe, wee saw appeare the Ligurian man of quality, who as I told you having lost all his goods about a yeare since, would now die: But Madam, I never in my life saw a man with a more melancholy look then he, yet he had a good presence with him, and as melancholy as his physiognomie seemed, yet hee had a sprightly kind of a looke.

As soon as he came unto the place where he was to speak, and after he had done reverence to the Judges sirs (said he unto them) though I am to speak unto men of most deepe Judgments, yet I have need to mention all my reasons which invite me unto a desire of death: For Sirs, since you must be poore, before you can know what povertie is, the greatest of all evils: and since I both hope and know this misery will never befall you, I must beseech you to let me describe my misfortune: Do not thinke Sir, that I ranke in the number of my reasons which moove mee to die, those of a covetous or a voluptuous man grown poore: For truly it is not abundance of riches which I regret, nor all the pleasures which follow them: I know how to live in a Cottage as well as a pallace: I can easily perswade my selfe, that the fewer Domestickes I have, the fewer enemies I have. I can live well enough without a full spread Table: I can find out good diversions which will cost me nothing: the murmure of a River, or the chanting of Birds, please me as well as all those which are at so deare a rate: But Sirs, that I can easily live without all those, yet alas I can live with friends, and yet I have lost them all, since I am brought unto that low condition as makes them thinke they can expect no profitable turnes from me: I once thought that I had more then ever any had: but now I find by wofull experience that none ever had fewer then my selfe: I am now quite another man unto them, since fortune hath forsaken me: as pleasing as I was wont to be unto them, I am now but an impertinent fellow, and troubles them: and now I perceive so well that they never loved me but only my fortunes, as I cannot chuse but hate in them a thought so base as to cease loving vertue, because it is growne poore: and to testify unto you Sirs, that it is merely the losse of my friends which makes me desperate, or to say better that it is merely their baseness which drives me into a fury against my selfe, you may only be pleased to consider that I have lived a year after all my losses: yet I was as poore the very first day after my losses as I am now: but because I was still in hopes to be rich in the greatest riches of Page 160 all riches, my freinds, therefore I constantly sustained my misfortune. But now after a whole yeares sad experience, finding that unfortunate men can never have any freinds, and that I am not able to live without them, therefore Sirs, I conjure you to grant me leave to die: And I conjure you unto it with the more earnestness, because it concernes all civill society, and my owne glory that I live no longer. For truly Sirs, I apprehend such horror against those who have forsaken me, because I am not rich, that I am become a hater of all men in generall, and begin to be unjust unto others, as others are unto me.

As soone as this generous unfortunate man had done speaking, Cleonisbe being much touched with his discourse, sent to desire the Assembly not to pronounce sentence, untill shee had let them know somthing what she thought. So the Councell appointing sixe of themselves to go and receive Cleonisbes pleasure, that Prin|cesse told them, how shee held him who spoke to be so brave a man, as to make him happy, and to oblige him unto a desire of life. Shee offered to give him more goods then he had lost, and to comfort him for the losse of his falshe earted freinds which forsook him, shee offered to become his freind, and a freind that would be more generous then they. You may easily judge Madam, how much this great act of Cleonisbes did move admiration in all the Assembly: and how the Prince of Phoeus who was chiefe extolled her. So as in lieu of giving sentence, they made Elogies unto the vertue of this Princesse. And yet they did pronounce one, and told this generous Ligurian, that if the Princesse Cleonisbe had not found a re|medie unto his misery, greater then the misery it self, they would have granted the poyson which he demanded, since they were constrained to confesse, that po|verty without freinds, is the greatest misery in the world.

But since the amity of the Princesse was a recompence a thousand times above his losses, they ordained that he should live to serve her, since he could not desire death without ingratitude. The man who was at first disposed to leave life, could hardly leave his thoughts of death: But having a generous soule, he was extreemly moved at the generositie of Cleonisbe: and he acknowledged, that since there was one such person in the the world as she, it was not just to leave it: So as being carried where shee was, he gave her thanks for the honour she had done him. But Ma|dam (added he) to justifie my designe of dying, I will accept but half of that you are pleased to offer: And receiving upon my humble and thankfull knee, the ho|nour of your good will, I will refuse that abundance of riches which you offer me, which perhaps will serve mee to no other use, but to get new freinds as unworthy as my first: so as Madam, esteeming my selfe very rich in your freindship, leave me in such a condition, as I may shew that I merit it, by making it appeare, that vertue can surmount poverty, and patiently endure it, provided it be not waited upon with scorn which commonly attends upon it: I shall not tell you Madam, how Cleonisbe answered, for I should wrong her in changing some of her words: But let me onely tell you, that she would have him accept of both her offers: and indeed shee kept her word: and by the meanes of the King, the Prince her brother, and the Prince of Phoeus, gave him much more then he lost; Also gi|ving it unto him with her owne hands, though shee had much adoe to make him take it.

But Madam, to return from whence I digressed, and to relate all that passed in the Councell of sixe hundred, be pleased to know, that after this Ligurian had done his complement unto Cleonisbe, we saw appeare in the Assembly a man whose person we knew not, who presenting Letters unto the chiefe or the Councell, and beseeched him that they might be read aloud, for they were the reasons of a mi|serable Lover who demanded the poyson. Then one of the Assembly opening the Letters, began to read them: And if I were able to repeat what I heard, doubt|lesse you would say, that he who wrote that Letter, deserved that death which he demanded: For I am confident, never was sorrow set out in more sa| colours, nor described with more moving aggravations. And Cleonisbe, Onesicrite, and Carimantes were extream attentive at the reading of it: I shall onely tell you Ma|dam, that this sad Lover began the recital of his misery, with an Elogie of the beauty and merit of the person he loved. Afterwards he said, that he had loved Page 161 her from her Cradle, adding that he had the happinesse not to be hated: After this, he aggravated all the proofs of that love which he bore unto her, and did make it so well appeare that he had great hopes of being loved, and of being lo|ved constantly, that the minds of all his Auditors were disposed to blame her, if she became perfidious.

Thus Madam, having prepared the hearts of his Judges, he shewed, that without giving her the least cause of complaint, some thoughts of inconstancy or ambition had moved this person to cast him off, and to overwhelm him with misery, she favoured a Rivall unto whom he was extreemly obliged: So as ho|nour not suffering him to seek revenge, and Love not giving him leave to live, he asked leave to dye. And he asks it the rather, because he finds such tumultuous thoughts in his heart, that rather then let his Rivall enjoy his Mistress, he shall undertake such a business as will cause the death of an infinite number of innocent persons which he shall engage in his interests.

Indeed he made it appeare he was capable of any undertaking with love, ambition, and jealousy could inspire into him: And he intimated by some ambi|guous words, that his death would prevent very great misfortunes, and deli|ver him from great torments, so as he had all the reason in the world to desire death, and they to grant it. And indeed the major part of the Judges did say, that since the death of this unfortunate Lover would be advantageous both unto him and others, they could not find out a fitter example to shew, that the Law which they had made was not useless, and so they ought not to deny death unto a man who by dying would save the lives of many others.

Sfurius for his particular was one of the forwardest to grant poyson nnto him who demanded it, and pressed it on: But upon this condition, that this desperate Lover should the same hour present himselfe before the Assembly; for the Law required a sight of him who was to dye, that they might know whether his rea|son was free, and whether he knew what he asked. Then the man who spoke, telling the Judges that he would immediately carry their answer unto the party who would dye. The cup of gold which held the poyson was brought in: and it was no sooner set upon the Table, but we saw Menedorus enter, who boldly presenting himselfe before the Judges, told them that it was he who demanded poyson, thinking with admirable resolution for the Justice which they had done him.

I leave you to judge Madam, how Carimantes was surprized at the sight of his Rivall: How Sfurius was astonished that he should doom poyson to his sonne: and how Onesicrite was amazed to see her Lover desire to dye for her. Also I leave it unto your imagination Madam, how great the tumult was amongst the Assembly who were not ignorant of Menedorus his love unto Onesicrite: But give me leave to tell you one very remarkable thing; Sfurius who was a high lo|ver of his Country, after he had appeased the first motion which nature caused in his heart, he was so angry to see that Menedorus could not surmount himselfe, that he surmounted his paternall tenderness, and told the Assembly that his sonne did not only deserve the poyson as an unfortunate man, but as a Delinquent, since he would not sacrifice his particular satisfaction unto the good of the pub|lique interest, and therefore he desired that the sentence which could not be re|voked, might be speedily executed.

Whilst Sfurius was speaking, Menedorus turning his head towards Onesicrite, he saw her eyes swim in tears: and presently after, she not being able to endure the excess of her sorrows, she leaned towards Glacidia, who stood behind her, and swoounded in her arms: so as whilst all means was using to bring her unto her selfe again, Carimantes seeing her in that condition, he knew not what to think or do. The sorrows of Onesicrite did so plainly let him see, that she loved Menedorus, and not himselfe, that his reason told him he ought not to love her any longer: And the dispayr of his Rivall did so convince him of the greatness of his passion, that he was perswaded it was injustice to oppose him. But on the other side, his love checking his reason, it would not give him the liberty to fol|low it. Furthermore, the Prince of Phoeus, though he was very much vexed at Page 162 the violent resolution of Menedorus, yet he durst not make shew of all his pitty, for feare of incensing Carimantes.

In the mean time, Menedorus seeing the Cup which contained the remedy a|gainst his torment, he went towards the Table on which it stood to finish his doom, but one of his Judges told him that it was not yet time: And for his particu|lar, he conceived that it was not fit the poyson should be granted unto him, but that the Judgment which had been pronounced was null and voyd: For sayd she, since it appears by the sorrows of the Princess Onesicrite, that you are more then indifferent unto her, you are not so happy as to have any recourse unto death; and so much the less, because you informed the Assembly that you were not lo|ved, whereas it seems you know not the true state of your fortune: and so ha|ving pronounced a sentence upon a false ground, the sentence it selfe must conse|quently be false, and fall.

This opiniou being liked by all the As|sembly, every one adhered to it except Sfurius, who could not bely the generosity of his soule. As for Menedorus, he extreemly opposed that pitty in the Judges, and should have opposed it more, if the Prince Carimantes had nor sent to tell him, that he had found out a more no|ble way to terminate his pain: so as all the Assembly believing that the Prince had overcome himselfe, they put Menedorus into the custody of some friends, they carried Onesicrite unto her Chamber, where Carimantes followed her, and all the Assembly broke up.

As soon as Onesicrite opened her eyes, and began to speak, she desired Cari|mantes, not knowing to whom she spoke, that they would give her the poyson as well as Menedorus: So as this Prince not being able to endure this object, he went out of her chamber; and not imparting the violent design which he had in his mind, he sent secretly to tell Menedorus, that to testifie he had right to dispute with him for the possession of Onesicrite, he engaged his word to fight with him, if he could not surmount himselfe; and indeed Madam, without any more delay, it was resolved that in the morning they should fight by the Sea side.

But Carimantes being very generous, and knowing that if Menedorus should kill him, he could not be in any safety, he caused a Boat to be neere the place where they were to fight, to the end that if it should so happen, he might save himselfe by it. Without any long circumstances of what passed between Cari|mantes and Menedorus before the fight, I will only tell you Madam, that the last of these stealing from those who kept him, did come unto the place where Carimantes wayted for him; That they fought, that Carimantes was slightly wounded in his left arme, and that Menedorus was disarmed. So as this un|fortunate Lover taking the Boate which was prepared for him, in case he were Conquerour, did use it to carry him from Marseilles after he was conquered.

But the Sea growing turbulent whilst they fought: and as he would needs em|barque in such despair as would not suffer him to consult with the winds, nor hearken unto the counsell of the Pilot, who would have dissuaded him from de|parting: The waves were so rough, and the winds so furious, that they dashed this Barque against the point of a Rock on the left hand of Marseilles, and broke it all to pieces, so as the unfortunate Menedorus was drowned almost in the very Port, into which the waves brought his body, and as if the Gods had a desire to force Onesicrite to water it with her teares, they permitted the Corp; of this un|fortunate Lover to be cast by the Sea, just under the window of that Princess, who saw it with her owne eyes, and resented his death with inconceivable sorrow.

In the mean time, Onesicrite having as I told you before, a sweet and easie soule, she could not resist Aristonice, who knew so well how to perswade her, that it did not consist with her glory to alter that resolution which she had taken, that she resolved to smother part of her melancholy, and to be rul|d by those who had most right to advise her, provided they would not force her to marry Cari|mantes over-hastily.

On the other side, Carimantes making a thousand excuses unto Sfurius, for being the cause of his sonnes death, Sfurius answered him accoding to his won|ted Page 163 generosity: After which they returned to the King, in thoughts that the marriage of the Phoecean Prince with Cleonisbe should with all speed be celebrated. But Madam, at our return we understood that the state of things were not so disposed: For be pleased to know that Galathes whom Menedorus had made ac|quainted with many Graecians, had suborned some to them to tell the Segoregians, that the Prince of Phoeus was not the same he gave himselfe out to be: so as this falshood passing from mouth to mouth, it made so great a noise al|mongst the People, that nothing else was talked of: For Galathes having sub|orned the Segoregians as well as Phocensians, there went an hundred severall tales concerning the quality of the Phoecean Prince. And since the Law which permitted Cleonisbe to choose her Husband, was conditionall, that she should choose a man whose Quality was sutable to her own: The case was such, that if the Prince of Phoeus was not the same he sayd himselfe to be, then the choice of the Princess was null: And to make it, Galathes had caused this lye to be di|vulged amongst the People: And Madam, he had done it with so much art, that those whom he employed in the business, were never suspected to have any hand in the imposture. And to the end none should thinke him to be the Author, he would not be the first that should forbid the banes between Cleonisbe and that Prince; not doubting but Bomilcar and Britomartes would take hold of that oc|casion which he had given to deferri it, he hoping all the while to find an oppor|tunity of carrying away Cleonisbe, as afterwards we came to understand.

And indeed Madam, Britomartes and Bomilcar hearing of these great reports, did say, that for their parts they did believe the Prince of Phoeus to be the same he said he was; but since it was made a doubt by a great People, they could not suffer that the Princesse should marry him. The testimonies which all the friends of the Phoean Prince did give, were all in vaine, and likewise what all the men in Marseilles did say: For the people of that Countrey being of a mutinous inclination, and since many were suborned to raise sedition, they took up Armes, and sided with Britomartes, Bomilcar, and Galathes.

Neither the King, nor Carimantes, who were fully perswaded of the Prince of Phoeus his quality, were not able to act accoding unto their inclinations: and the lesse able, because at the same time the friends of Menedorus had caused a commotion in Marseilles, upbraiding Sfurius with his cruelty to his sonne; accusing also the Prince of Phoeus for consenting unto the marriage of Carimantes with Onesicrite. Meane while Glacidia endeavoured to perswade Bomilcar that it was in vaine for him to hinder the Marriage of Cleonisbe, since he might assure himselfe she would never love him. But he answered her, that since he could receive no other consolation, but in the ruine of his Rivall, she must pardon him if he did it; maintaining that he might very well do it, without giving him any cause of complaint, since he did no more then what Britomartes and Gallathes did also.

In the mean time, as great a care was taken in observing these Rivals as well as the Prince of Phoeus, Bomilcar and he fought the second time, and were both wounded; but with this difference, that when they parted them, the Prince of Phoeus who was closed with his Enemy, was the uppermost. But Madam, this Combate more and more incensing the people, things grew to a great height. For Galathes being exceeding subtle and witty, had insinuated into the minds of many Segoregians, that our Town was much to be feared: and that if we made the Countrey better, it would be only for our selves: and that after they had received us as their friends, we would become their Tyrants, and they our slaves. But disorder and confusion being in every place, it was advised to appease the People to talke of a Negotiation, knowing it to be much better then to stop their first fury. So they asked this incensed people, and the three Rivals who were their heads, what proofs they required to testifie the condition of the Phoean Prince.

But they found themselves much gravelled for an answer; for since there remayned none in Phoeus, it was in vaine to send thither: But after they had well thought upon it, they agreed that the Conquerour of Phoeus should decide the businesse; and that if the illustrious Cyrus would say unto those they Page 164 would send unto him, that Peranius was of the Familie of the Phoean Princes, and that it was he who commanded the Fleet in departing from that Towne, which his Armies had conquered, then they would yeild up their Pretentions, and agree that Cleonisbes choise was lawfull. Though this Proposition might seem strange unto the Prince of Phoeus, since his destiny must depend upon the testimony of a Prince, unto whom he had not the honour to be known, and who might hold him for his Enemy, yet he did not refuse it: For since he knew that the Prince Thrasibalus did know, and that his action had been extraordinar[y], and might be judged worthy to be related unto his invincible Conquerour, he believed that the illustrious Cyrus would be so generous as to give a sincere testimony in his favour: And so Madam, it was agreed, that I should come unto Cyrus; That the King should send me with a person of Quality, and that the three Rivals should also send a person of Credance, to heare what the Conquerour of Asia would say unto my demands.

But before we came away, they made all their parties interested to swear solemnly to agree unto what we should report: That they should not trouble the publique Peace; and that during our voyage, they should attempt nothing against one another. After all this, they prepared us a ship; and the King, the three Rivals, and the Prince of Phoeus having made choise of those they would send unto the illustrious Cyrus, we made our selves ready for departure: And yet we did not depart, untill we understood that the slave who demanded poyson for Amathilde, and who had been taken in the Warres by the Father of the faire Lady, was known to be a man of great Quality amongst the Tectosages: And moreover, that he had declared unto Amathilde, he had been in love with her ever since he knew her: and that though she had lost her beauty, yet she had not lost his love; adding, that if she would receive him favourably, she was yet amiable enough to make him happy. So as Madam, since Amathilde had not a desire to dye after the losse of her beauty, but only because she thought it impossible any could love her in the state she was, she changed her mind when she saw she was deceived: Also she resolved to live, and love him who loved her, when she thought she was not able to love her self.

After this Madam, we departed; and with orders from the Prince of Phoeus to bring the Prince his Father unto Marseilles if we could: so Madam, since the illustrious Cyrus hath himselfe done as much as I could desire, I found my selfe in a condition able to confound all the Rivals of the Phoean Prince, and to make him happy: also to contribute unto the happinesse of Carimantes; for the mutinous people would not per mit him to marry Onesicrite, unlesse she were sutable to his Quality. So Madam, if the Prince Menesteus at your perswasions will please to go whether I shall conduct him by orders from the Phoean Prince, I have no more to wish.

Thrymetes having ended his Narration, he left Cyrus and Mandana exceedingly satisfied; and they promised him to forget nothing which might conduce unto the felicity of the Phoean Prince: and indeed the next day he spoke unto the two Segoregians who came with Thrymetes in a manner most advantageous for that Prince, and answered them with exceeding civility. Also he gave an authentique Declaration of his Quality, and mixed it with so many Commendations of his valour and vertue, that a more advantageous Elogie could not be made of him.

But as he was ready to send Chrysantes unto Menesteus to move him to quit the Toomb wherein he dwelt, this sad and solitary Prince came to thanke him and Mandana for the honour they had done him, and to give thanks unto Cyrus for the justice he had done unto the Prince his sonne. But use what arguments and perswasions they could to remove him unto Marseilles, he would not hearken unto them, but they were constrained to let him return unto his mournfull Tomb againe: so Thrymetes and the two Segoregians which were with him, resolved to return as soon as Cyrus was departed.

In the mean time, the Princess Mandana, after she had given thanks unto Eulocrates, she continued on her journey with the greatest disposition in the world to divert her selfe, and so she did most pleasantly for many dayes. It seemed as if every Page 165 day did produce fresh joyes: and when she considered that she was going further from the King of Assyria, and drew neerer the King her Father, who would entertaine Cyrus as her deliverer, she thought she could not give her heart enough unto the enjoyment of pleasures, after shee had suffered so many miseries.

Also she came unto the frontiers of Cappadocia towards Cicilie, without the least disaster in her voyage, and she had the satisfaction to see Cyrus doe an act worthy of his great soule. There came in the evening a Post from Babylon, which brought newes that there had been a great commotion in that Town, and that in the Tumult the people had plundered the Vessels of the Temple of Ierusalem, which were brought thither when the Assyrians tooke it: And that if the Hebrew people who were Captives in Babylon this seventy yeares, had not opposed them, they had been Masters of it. This Post told Cyrus afterwards, that the Governour of Babylon being afraid lest the like should happen againe, and that he was not able to keep the Towne, he resolved to send unto him all those precious Vessels which had been possessed by Solomon: And that the captiue people not being able to endure that they should prophane those things which had been consecrated unto sacred uses in their sacrifices, did follow those who drove the Camels which carryed all these riches. This Post adding, that falling sick by the way, he could come no sooner; and that hee believed those of whom he spake would be here in the morning.

And indeed the Sun no sooner began to appeare, but Cyrus, who was always up very early to give out all necessary orders, especially for the march of his Troops, did understand those whom he expected were come: Thus there might be seen that great captive people who had been conquered by the King of Assyrias Grandfather, do now make their addresses unto him who is the conqueror of that Prince unto whom they were slaves. But in coming unto Cyrus, two of the Camels rushing one against another, did overturn their Loads, and made it appear how precious their loads were, insomuch as Cyrus commanded them to shew all the rest: For since he did not find Mandana in Babylon when hee tooke it, he never thought of looking upon all this rich booty. So the Officers obeying his commands, they let him see the most magnificent object in the world: For he saw threescore great vessels of gold of an inestimable price: A thousand vessels of silver of a wonderfull bignesse: abundance of costly Instruments used in their Sacrifices, whose garnishing were both rich and rare: Foure hundred other vessels of silver of a lesser size, and a thousand other vessels of the same mettall of a lesse size then they. So that seeing altogether five thousand vessels of precious mettall and excellent forme, this sight was the goodliest object in the world.. Yet Cyrus was not a whit dazed with the lustre of all these riches, but looked upon them as he ought. Then the chiefe amongst this Hebrew people, who followed those who carryed these Ornaments of the most famous Temple in the world, presenting himselfe unto Cyrus, he hearkned unto him with a very willing eare; so as this generous Captive seeing that Cyrus lent him a favourable eare, he began to speak unto him with much boldnesse and zeale. He aggravated unto him the grandure of the god of his Fathers, the wisdome of one of their Kings, and the vertue of others. He described unto him the magnificence of the Temple in Ierusalem before it was destroyed: He represented unto him the enormous sacriledge of those who pulled it downe: he described the miseries of their captivity: He asked of him, as of the most generous Prince in the world, liberty for his Nation, and leave to rebuild their Temple. Also that these Vessels which were consecrated unto the only god of the whole Universe might not be prophaned by other uses. This Prince of the Hebrews did speak with so much zeale, that Cyrus being most sensibly moved by his language, did grant him his Demands, and much more; for he assigned a very considerable summe of money to rebuild the Temple of Ierusalem: So as this Prince of the Hebrews divulging amongst the multitude the greatnesse of the favour granted to them, upon a sudden they gave such shouts of joy as waked Mandana from her sleep.

Page 166 But Cyrus, to rejoyce fully in his great act of Charity, desired this Princess she would be pleased to stay a day longer in that place, to see this multitude of captive People whom he had delivered, passe by; and accordingly, Mandana being in a Belconie, and Cyrus with her, accompanied with all the Princesses, they saw passe above forty thousand persons of all sorts, who from rank to ranke did by their gestures render millions of thanks unto Cyrus for the liberty which he had given them: so that joyning this vast number of People, their Horses, their Camels, and all their other Beasts which carried their baggage, and the Children of the People delivered, they took up a vast extent of ground: so that it must of necessity be concluded, that a Prince who was so great as was able to give away so much riches, and grant liberty unto so many captives, must needs be the greatest Prince in the world: and so much the rather, because the good which he did, he alwayes did it with joy and alacrity: And truly he was so sensibly pleased, that he had an occasion of breaking so many chains at one blow, and comforting so many sad souls, that finding a subject out of which to frame a Complement unto Mandana, he asked her pardon for the satisfaction which this adventure did afford him: For Madam, said he unto her, as you have been the cause of all my sorrows, so you only are the cause of my loyes: and as it is a fayling in my duty, soalso an offence unto my love, to be capable of any other Joyes then that of seeing you, and seeing you at liberty.

The end of the second Booke.

Book. III.

The Heroick joy which the Illustrious Cyrus had, in restoring liberty unto so many captives; was not the onely one which he had: For a messenger, being come from the Prince Sesostris, and the Princesse Timareta; he was exceedingly joyed to hear by him, that Amasis had very well received them, and consented unto their marriage, which was celebrated with magnificence worthy of the Aegyptian king, in the stately City of Memphis. The onely cause of the Egyptians coming was to thank Cyrus for the felicity which Sesostris and Timareta enjoyed: And in the name of Amasis, to offer him all the forces in his Kingdome, if he pleased to command them out. But since Cyrus did not think he should need to give any more Battles, he did not accept of the offer: But assured the messenger that he did much participate in the joyes and happinesse of the Princesse Timareta, and the Prince Sesostris. And to testifie that the news he brought him of their marriage was most welcome unto him; he rewarded him with a most rich Present at parting. Tis true, Cyrus was not the onely one, who was joyed at the happinesse of Sesostris: for all those that knew him in the Army, shared with him, especially the Egyptians which he had left. But as the news of this Princes happinesse was very welcome unto all them that ever saw him, or which ever heard speak of him; so the reports which were published of the augmentation of the Assyrians kings sicknesse, did not produce the like effects in the mindes of those who knew him: but many varied in their resentments of it: For many men deploring the misfortune of so great a Prince, did pity him: others were joyed: and Anaxaris was sorry though he hated him. But the predominate passion of his heart swaying him more then all other considerations, he could not chuse but feare the death of a hated Rival, because he might have disturbed the felicity of a Rival loved. However, the noise of the King of Assyria's sickness was so great, that none doubted the truth of it: and the lesse, because Cyrus (unto whom those he had left with the Prince had given him an account) himself said that he was very ill, and gave cause to think, that the first news we heard would be of his death: yet he spoke it with so much reservedness, that every one wondered at his moderation, in not rejoicing at the losse of such Page 2 an enemy as he. As for Mandana, her soul was so high and generous, as she was not capable of any joy at the death of a Prince who was not able to hurt her: and indeed, her disposition was more unto pity then any joy. Yet it was such a compassion as did not disturb the diversions of the voyage, which had all the pleasures and delights of a tranquill Court. For as the dayes journeys were ordered, none were more weary at night, then if they had been onely out to take the air. Also the great abundance of rarely accomplished men, which the familiarity of the journey had united, did make such a delectable miscellany of men, of all sorts of conditions, humours, and Nations, that one must needs be very stupid, or melancholy, if they were weary in a place where there were so many pleasing persons, who for most part, had no other designe but to divert: yet those whom love had damped must be alwayes excepted. For truly, the Prince Intaphernes, had the Princesse of Bithynia alwayes in his minde: Artana was angry to be so long from the Princesse Palmis: Mazares had much ado to accusse himself to be onely the friend of Mandana, and not her lover. Myrsiles was not a little troubled that he could make no progresse in the minde of Doralisa: And Andramites despaired to see there was no likelihood of ever bending her heart. As for Aglatidas, he was too much in love with Amestris, not to be impatient of seeing her, and he fretted at the longnesse of the voyage, though he drew neerer unto her every day. Thus every lover in the Army had their discontents. But as they were all careful to hide their frettings, so they did contribute much to the pleasure of conversation, especially at nights, when all the company assembled in Mandana's chamber. Anaxaris also, as unquiet as he was, he was still striving to master his minde, lest he should shew his unquietudes: for his designe being to please Mandana, hee thought it not fit that the melancholy of his soul should appear in his face, so as hee concealed it so handsomely, and arrived so perfectly unto that end he aimed at, that there were few men in the world whom Mandana esteemed more then Anaxaris: Also she gave him a thousand obliging testimonies of it; either in speaking a thousand good things of him unto Cyrus; or in assuring him she would oblige the king her father, to acknowledge the services he had done her, or in her way of carriage towards him. For indeed she commanded him with such mild, sweet, and civil authority, that her Commands were more obliging then the prayers of many others. But as Anaxaris had a great care of insinuating himself into the love of Mandana, so he had a great care to make himself both loved and feared of all those under his command. And the truth is, he was both so loved and feared, as there were very few things which he was not able to make them do. In the mean time, this Illustrious Troop, still advancing, Cyrus and Mandana came one evening unto a little Town situated upon the banks of that great and famous River Halys: which hath its original and source amongst the Armenian mountains: and after it hath twined it self through many severall Countreys it divides Cappadocia from Paphlagonia, in this place, not being distant from the Euxine sea above three hundred furlongs. Since the journey had been something long, and since Mandana found some delight to think she was in Cappadocia, where all the people received her with unexpressible joyes, and continuall acclamations, she intended to rest there a day; whereof Martesia was very glad, because she remembered her self of an Aunt which commonly dwelt at Themiscyra, who had a very noble house within forty furlongs of it: Remembering moreover, that she was ever used to dwell there about that season: so sending presently to enquire, to the end she might finde her at home, she asked Mandana leave to make a visit in the morning, since she did not travell; so as in this hope she passed away the evening in a very merry disposition. Since Feraulus was the man who took upon him to enquire whether her Aunt was home, he made such hast, that as soone as Martesia waked in the morning, she knew that her Aunt was where she thought her; and had much good company with her. Martesia no sooner knew this welcome news, but rising in all hast shee went unto Mandana, and beseeched her to let her go this visit. The Princesse at first, could not remember who this Cosin of Martesia's was; But calling to mind presently after, that she was sister unto her whom Artucas married, who delivered up a Port of Sinope to Cyrus, when he came thither to release her, but did release onely the King of Assyria; Then she told Martesia very obligingly, that not to deprive her of that pleasure, nor to deprive her self of that satisfaction which she hoped to receive in seeing her, since she was so neer, she would send her upon a complement unto her Aunt, and send her own Coach for her, that she might oblige her to come and see her. Martesia not daring to refuse such an obliging Proposition, thanked Mandana for the favour, and would be careful to send and acquaint her kinswoman, who was called Amaldea: but the Princesse would needs send one of her own servants; and so she did. Then Martesia went out to write a letter unto Amaldea, by him that was to go for her, which done, she returned again unto Mandana's chamber, where Doralisa, and Pherenice were. Martesia (said the Princesse unto her, as soon as shee entred) I know not whether my memory fail me, but I think that when we were at Themiscyra, your Aunt who is one of the most accomplished persons in the world had a friend with her, who in my mind was one of the most insupportable women that ere I saw, though she was one of the most vertuous, in point of gallantry. 'Tis very true Madam, replied she, and I never in all my life knew any unto whom I had a greater aversion then unto her you mention. But how was it possible, said Doralisa, that such a one should be the friend of Amaldea? for in my mind, it is very extraordinary that any person of merit, should have a friend who is not of the same mould. It cannot be said, (replied Mandana) but that she of whom I speak hath many good qualities: since she had been very fair, and was so still when I went from Themiscyra: Moreover, she is very vertuous, and hath wit and spirit enough, but withall, if Martesia would describe her unto us, I am confident, you would agree that she is not very amiable. Ah Madam, said Martesia, you speak too favourably of a person who deserves not the attribute of vertuous, since her vertues do so ill become her: And truly (said she, turning towards Doralisa) since the Princesse is pleased I should describe this friend of Amaldeas, whose name is Isalonide: be pleased to imagine her as she hath described her, that is, fair and vertuous, and also full of wit and spirit: but a spirit so full of foolish pride, that I know not how I should describe it unto you. Indeed, because she knows she hath the vertue of modesty, she thinks she needs not the vertue of humility: and because she cannot be upbraided with any lightnesse, or gallantry, therefore she thinks she hath a peculiar privilege, to be peevish, fantastick, cholerick, and imperious: and indeed, she thinks that because shee hath one vertue, she may be permitted to have all the vices: And for my part, were I her husband, I had rather she were a little too gallant, and had a little of all those vertues she wants, then to have but one vertue, and have a little of all the ill habitudes that one can have. For my particular, replied Doralisa, I think nothing can be more unreasonable, then for a woman to value what she ought to be, at as high a rate, as if she were so: Isalonide doth so value her self, replied Martesia, and as there are some insolent fools, who think that valour is enough to make up a compleat man; so Isalonide thinks, that because she is not a light housewife, she is the most vertuous woman of the age. In the mean time, the result of this fine opinion is, that she makes her husband even mad with her fantastick humours: she disorders the whole family by her severity and pride: she sharply checks all her kindred that are young: she censures all the women in the Town where she lives: she scorns all that come neer her; she gives a hundred unjust judgements; she puts no difference between a little too much Gallantry, and a great crime: and she condemns all that she sees, and sees not, thinking that she her self onely can brag of being vertuous. And indeed she is of such a presumptuous spirit, that she is most intolerable. The truth is, replied Mandana, that this vanity hath a very ill foundation, since if it be at all excusable, it must bee when one hath some good quality which one is not obliged to have: and it is not enough to be proud, because one hath some one vertue without which one should bee infamous. For example; If a woman who hath beauty, wit, and vertue, do take so much pains as to cultivate those excellencies which nature gave her: And do get some extraordinary knowledge in the Arts and Sciences, which she knows how to use with all the discretion fitting for her Sex, doubtlesse she hath good reason to pretend unto more commendations then another: Moreover I must agree, that those vertues which Isalonide hath not, may in some sort be a just cause of boasting unto those who enjoy them: But to draw a vanity out of vertue, is a thing so shamefull unto all the sex in generall, that I am ashamed to think of it: For truly it may be thought, that this kind of vertue out of which Isalonide draws a vanity, is essentiall unto all women. So in my opinion, the pride of Isalonide is very ill grounded; and I am perswaded that a man who looks for commendations, because he never poisoned, or assassinated any one, hath as good a reason for it as she hath, who makes her glory to consist onely in that she is not too much addicted unto Gallantry. Doubtlesse she does not know, replied Doralisa, that not to be vitious, is not enough to make one vertuous; and that there is a great intervall between Avarice and Liberality: The same may be said of all the vertues and all the vices, replied Mandana, betwixt which this intervall may be found, in which if any one rest, they neither merit blame nor commendations. For my part, replied Doralisa, and smiled, I am willing to think that Isalonide does not merit the Attribute of that vertue whereof she boasts: for if she be so peevish, so angry, so scornfull, and so proud as you describe her, I cannot beleieve she hath many Adorers. For my part, replied Martesia, I think you are in the right; at least I know that none are more insufferable to me then such women, as have souls so base as to content themselves with one vertue, and yet are so proud as to scorn all those vertues which they want: And the worse is her example of this insolent and savage vertue, does not good at all unto any young persons; but on the contrary, all the apprehensions of such secure and arrogant women, does incense their spirits, and makes them so afraid of their resemblance, as that often-times they will not resemble those who are good. However it be, replied Mandana, we shall know by Amaldea whether Isalonide be still of the same humour: and whether a young sister she hath, be of the same. If she be, replied Martesia, I must confesse, I could not know it by her Physiognomy: for I assure you Madam, this young sister, whose name is Clerelisa, had such a look with her eyes, as moved me to think she had a very gallant inclination; though it be true, that Isalonide has such an observant eye over her, as she cannot follow her own inclination. If this Person, replied Doralisa, be as pleasing as her name is, she is more amiable then her sister: Since I never had any experience of her, replied Martesia, I onely know she has a promising and gallant Air with her, that she is fair, and that she hath much spirit: yet I cannot say she is amiable. But in exchange (added Mandana) you may assure her that she has a brother named Belemis, who is as well perswaded of his own valour, as his sister is of her vertue: or at least they accuse him (me thinks) for making too much of his bravery. The truth Madam is, replied Martesia, that Belemis who is a man qualified well enough, hath a little too much affected to appear what he is, and that they have rightly accused him for making all the crabbed faces of a souldier: For indeed, his walk is too warlike, his action is too haughty; and when he comes into any company, he has the Air of a man that was ready to give battle, rather then for a conversation of Gallantry: his clothes also, has alwayes something unlike peace: and his tone is so shrill, as one would think his intreaties were commands, military commands: all he does, and all he sayes, would perswade one that he affects to be reputed brave: yet certainly all this is his naturall way. If so, replied Doralisa, then he hath great cause to chide Nature: for I assure you, such men in times of peace are no lesse ridiculous, then such women as are of Isalonide's humour. After Doralisa had said so, Mandana, being drest, she prepared to go unto the Temple with Cyrus, and all those of this Court Errant, if I may phrase it so. But since the sacrifice continued very long, when Mandana returned to her lodging she found Martesia's Aunt, already come, and found with her the most pleasing company in the world: For indeed, she had with her ten or twelve handsome women, and as many men of exceeding good quality: so that Mandana being pleasantly surprized at this good company, she received them with all possible Civility, and the better because they were all known unto her, for they were all of Themiscyra. Cyrus for his particular was exceedingly satisfied, that all this good company should come so fitly to make the day more delightsome unto Mandana. And all those who were with him were very glad to see so many Ladies in a place so unlikely to meet with any so amiable. As for Martesia, she was so glad to see so many of her acquaintance, that her joyes sparkled in her eyes: But she was extremely over-joyed to see with her Aunt the daughter of Artucas, whose name was Erenice, with whom she had a particular friendship at Sinope, when she lodged with her Uncle, whiles Artamenes was prisoner. She was no sooner at liberty to talke with her, whilest Amaldea was talking with Mandana, but she remembered that she was present when those four Lovers which pretended each of them to be the most unfortunate Lover in the world, were judged by her in the presence of Cyrus: Alas my dear Erenice, said she unto her, what strange accidents have hapned since that day I was so busie in examining whether Indifferency, Death, absence, or Jealousie was the most Rigorous: and how much time would it take up, if I should examine which hath more perplexed me, absence from you, or my fears you should forget me. But whilest Martesia was talking thus, and whilest Erenice was answering with as much ingenuity and tendernes, Mandana did with admiration look upon a person whom she saw amongst the Ladies: for though they were all very handsome, yet there was no comparison betwixt her and the rest. And indeed, this Lady, whose name was Telamire, had such rare and extraordinary charms in her beauty, that they will hardly admit of a description. For since shee was neither great, nor little; pale, nor red; black, nor fair; but held a just and even proportion betwixt all these, as one would say, Nature did distinguish her from all others, to the end there might not be confusion in the severall Orders of Beauties, which sometimes breeds contests between the black, and between the fair Beauties. Moreover, Telamire was not onely Fair, but of an admirable behaviour; and had an Air which was not at all proud, yet majesticall. Again, since Telamire was neither black nor fair, her Aspect was neither melancholy nor merry, but had such a mixt mixture of both as made her discreetly pleasant. But as Telamire did charme the eyes of all the company: so likewise there was a man with her that did attract their eyes as much as she: since certainly his behaviour was as good as she was fair: His Physiognomy spoke him to be a man of much spirit. And hee heard unto what was spoke, with such an Aire, as it was easie to perceive that he understood things aright. But that which rendred him most considerable unto Man[da]na, was his being sonne unto Amaldea, and Martesia's Cousin: for since he was not at Themiscyra when she was there, she knew him not. She remembered very well that Amaldea had a sonne whose name was Artaxander, but she knew not it was him she saw. And she did not sooner know it, but she made him a most obliging Complement, and he answered her in a most Elegant stile. So that discourses beginning by degrees, between so much excellent company, time passed away so pleasingly, that Mandana thought it not a minuit since she returned from the Temple, when she was advertised that it was dinner time. So that Cyrus carried all the men with him, and Mandana retained all the Ladies to dine with her: but she declared unto them, that it was not for a dinner she retained them, but they should not return home that night. But to answer the Civility of the Princesse, Amaldea told her, shee would do more then that, because she was resolved to wait upon her two dayes journey farther. Thus all this good company being together, the time passed away with much delight: one chance fell out which caused that Mandana could not depart so soon as she intended, because in the night time, that great River on which this little Town did stand did so overflow, that the Countrey all about was water: and for twelve hours together it rained so fast, that it was one cause of the Rivers rising, though the main reason of it was, the falling of waters from the Armenian Mountains, which running into this River, did cause it to swell above its ordinary Banks, and over-flow the Plains. However, Mandana must crosse it before she could continue her journey, and therefore of necessity she must stay untill the waters were asswaged: and also this good Company must needs stay with her, because Amaldeas house was on the other side of the River. And though there was a bridge, and this bridge not broken, yet there was no getting within twelve furlongs of it, so as all this good Company staying together, there designe was onely to passe the time without wearinesse unto Mandana, who for her part did contribute all her endeavours to divert the Company. But Martesia (said she one morning unto her) how came all these Ladies to assemble together at your Aunts? I assure you Madam, (replied she) I do not know: but since they came hither, I have done nothing else but talk of you, and satisfie their curiosities concerning your adventures: And though fame had partly told them, yet it told them false, and I was glad to let them know the truth. But now I have told them all they desire to know, I must move them in their turnes, to tell me all I desire to know: for all I know yet is, that there is a notable adventure between this Beauty you see here, whose name is Telamire, and Artaxander: and that it seems love makes haply and unhappy every where. Telamire, replied Mandana, is very likely to produce those two different effects, for I never in my life saw any that pleased me more: And therefore Martesia informe your self a little better of her fortune, and let me know it. I shall be very glad to obey you Madam, replied she, since I have such an inclination Page 6 my self: and indeed that Evening Erenice being with Martesia, without any company but Doralisa, she obeyed Mandana's commands. Dear Cousin, (said she unto her) since I have related the Adventures of our Princesse, and of the Illustrious Cyrus, I hope you will not be silent in your own, and those of your acquaintance. When I have told you, replied she, that after your departure from Sinope, my father sent me unto Themiscyra, to Amaldea: and that I was often sorry never to hear from you, doubtlesse I have told you the most important passages of my life. Tell me at least, replied Martesia, how it comes to passe that so many amiable Persons, who heretofore had no society together, should now make a journey together. To satisfie your knowledge in this (replied she) it is requisite I relate the whole lives of Artaxander and Telamire. Though Artaxander be my Cousin as he is yours (replied Martesia) yet fortune hath so often parted us that we hardly know each other. But since he seemes to be a very well accomplished man, I should be very glad to know him from you. Therefore my dear Erenice, I beseech you acquaint me with his life, and let Doralisa have her share in the diversion. The adventures of persons unto whom others have no relation, replied Erenice, are so farre from diverting them, that I conceive it best to stay untill you and I be alone; for though what I shall tell you have something that is extraordinary in it, yet as I said before, those who have no interest in the fortune of them whose History is related cannot take any delight in hearing it. I am so much interested in the happinesse of Artaxander and Telamire, replied Doralisa, that I should be extremely glad to hear their Adventures. For the truth is, it is impossible to see them, and not desire their happinesse. And to testifie unto you, that they are not indifferent to me, I assure you, that I wish with all my heart, if Artaxander have any Rivals, that they may be ill treated; and if Telamire love any, that it may be Artaxander. But perhaps you have some secrets to impart unto Martesia, which you would not have me to know, and therefore it is better to leave you at liberty. Oh Doralisa, (said Erenice, and would not let her go) I beseech you do not offer to go away: for I am perswaded, if I should deprive Martesia of your sight, mine would not give her any satisfaction. Moreover, as sweet as she seems to be, I assure you she is one of the most revenging persons in the world: and to prove it, I remember, that having one day the misfortune to take her out of very good Company, she was never at rest untill she was revenged, by putting me upon the company of one of the most wearisome persons that ever was; and therefore I beseech you doe not go away. Then satisfie me, replied Martesia, since I am so revengefull, for I declare unto you, that if you will not relate unto me the whole life of Artaxander and Telamire, I shall relate unto Doralisa all I know of yours. And you know I am not ignorant, that you have made more miserable then one, since we were acquainted. Since that relation (replied Erenice and blusht) would have lesse diversion in it, then that which I should relate, though you speak much lesse then I, yet I had rather obey then resist you. Then do obey, replied Martesia, but that the word obey may be rightly placed, obey Doralisa, and addresse your speech unto her: For she being a stranger at Themiscyra, you must explain many things unto her, which you would not unto me. After this, Doralisa answered something, and Erenice replied: But at last, Martesia having imposed silence upon them both, and given order that nothing should disturb them, Erenice began her Relation in these Termes.

THE HISTORY OF ARTAXANDER AND TELAMIRE.

Since those whose lives I am to relate are scarcely known unto you, 'Tis requisite I begin my Relation with their Elogie, that so engaging you unto their interests, by some resentments of esteem, you may with more attention hearken unto what I say. But since the merits of these two Persons are high enough to have got that esteem already, I have reason to fear that I cannot commend them enough. However, I must tell you, that Telamire is one of the most charming Persons in the Universe unto such as particularly know her: and though she be most amiable unto all in generall, yet she is infinitely more unto such as have any intimacy with her. And it may be said, that she is as much above her self, when she is with her intimate friends, as she is above many others, when she is in a generall conversation: Also she is so universally known, that when any one sees a dull person in Themiscyra, they use to say, send him to Telamire, for she hath as much as the other hath little. Moreover Telamire is exceedingly sweet and generous; and her beauty is certainly the least good quality she hath. As for Artaxander, It is enough I tell you, that Martesia can boldly acknowledge in her Cousins behalf, that he hath all those excellent qualities which are requisite to make up a most perfectly accomplish man. After this, I must tell you, that Telamire is a Lady of Quality; whose father was called Algastus: and her mother was a most vertuous woman, who tenderly loved Amaldea the mother of Artaxander, under the governance of whom he hath ever been, because his father died when he was but in his Cradle. And the better to let you understand what I must tell you in the sequell of my discourse; Be pleased to know, that Algastus never had more then one daughter, which was Telamire: and that from her very infancy, her mother, whose name was Cleossonte, did alwayes tell Amaldea, that she would marry her daughter unto the young Artaxander her sonne, who was then about five or six yeers elder then Telamire, who at that time was not above twelve. But though this designe was known unto very few, and though Algastus himself knew it not, yet it was not so secretly carried, but the young Telamire knew something of the businesse, by the women which waited upon her: so as from that time, she disposed her heart to be obedient unto Cleossonte. And I cannot tell, whether one should not attribute some part of Telamires merits unto the innocent designe which she had in her infancy, to be ere long in a condition of meriting Artaxanders esteem. The truth is, I cannot think one could be more amiable being an insant, then Telamire was: for her person was not onely exceeding handsome, but she had one of the best Complexions in the world, and struck all her masters into admiration: either he who taught her to dance, or him Page 8 who taught her the Assyrian Language, which she spoke excellently well. And most certainly none could dance better then she did at that time, nor speak a strange Language more politely. Moreover her stature was already so well proportioned, and her Physiognomy so composed, that all men of any ingenuity, who came unto Cleossonte, did not treat her as a child any longer, though yet she was one, but on the contrary, extolled her as a compleat woman, and talked to her as if she were eighteen yeers of age: Also she answered them so ingeniously, and with such sparks of wit and spirit in her countenance, as one would think, that if she was not very forward to talk, it was onely because she knew, that she was but twelve yeers of age; and that decency would not allow her yet to shew all her wit, though she shewed enough to make them admire her: So as having all the graces of Infancy, without any of the Toyes, I assure you, she was then infinitely amiable and charming. I tell you this, (amiable Doralisa) to let you know the first ground of Telamires and Artaxanders affection: 'Tis true, it could not well be called affection at that time: For since Amaldea sent Artaxander to travell as soon as he was seventeen yeers of age, and since his travell was long, he scarcely remembered that ever he heard his mother say, she desired he should marry Telamire: and Telamire her self though she remembered the intention of Cleossonte, yet she thought it would never come to passe: for you must know, that this vertuous Person died when Telamire was but fourteen yeers of age: so as being under the governance of her father, who set a wise and vertuous woman over her, she thought upon nothing but better accomplishing her self without any thoughts of Artaxander, considering that Cleossontes designe being grounded upon her friendship to Amaldea, it would now fall, since she was dead: And since Algastus her father was so far from any thoughts of marrying her, that his mind was all upon another wife: for since he was very rich, he did not despair to find one, though he was old, and though he would have one that was young, fair, and of good quality: Amaldea also for her part, she never thought more upon this marriage: for she knew that Algastus never thought of marrying his daughter; and since she saw him in a possibility of having other children by another wife, she thought the match not so advantageous as in Cleossontes dayes: so this businesse was laid aside, as if it had never been thought upon. In the interim, time passing on, and Artaxander being improved as much by his Travells, as Telamire grew fair in his absence: he returned to Themiscyra: But since he had never been in a place, where they said that heretofore did dwell the second Queen of the Amazons, called Orithea, at that time when she reigned in Cappadocia, therefore he had a great Curiosity to go and see it: and indeed it was one of the goodliest places in the world; and so Famous, that it was a kinde of shame for a man of any spirit, not to have been there, and to be ignorant of what was there to be seen. In the mean time, as chance would have it, you must know, that Artaxander found in that place a company of Themiscyrian Ladies, who came thither upon the same occasion he did; to wit, onely out of Curiosity: Amongst the rest, there was a Lady, whose name was Corelisa, who was very pleasant, and so is still, though since she hath much been vexed. This Corelisa had neither father nor mother living, and therefore dwelt with a brother, named Belemis; having no mind to dwell with a sister which she had, who was called Isalonide, because she was one of the most imperious persons in the world.

To spare you the labour of describing her, (said Martesia and interrupted her) I must tell you that I have acquainted Doralisa what she is, to wit, foolishly proud that she cannot be accused of too much Gallantry. Nor is it necessary that you tell us what Belemis is, since I have told her he might well represent the God of war. But as for Corelisa you would do me a pleasure in telling me of what humour she is at this present.

Corelisa, replied Erenice, is opposite unto Isalonide in many things, and resembles her in onely one. For the truth is, her inclination is unto Gallantry. But though she seem to be very Civil, and when she pleaseth is Complaisant enough, so her Complaisance may serve her own interests; yet she is as imperious in her Gallantry, as her sister is in her way. Moreover, she is as full of revenge as one can be <◇> for she will attempt any thing to satisfie that humour, being none of those who say that they ought never to be revenged upon themselves: for she is of such an humour that she had rather do her self harm, then not hurt them she hates: However, since Clorelisa Page 9 is fair and witty: and since her imperious humour never appears unto those who jarre not with her, it is very hard to look upon her and not love her: so that Artaxander meeting her at this Town, in which are the ruins of Orithias Castle, he was as civil to her as any well qualified man ought to be unto a Beauty: and a Beauty who being but a child when he went from Themiscyra, had now all the graces of novelty: Also he applied himself more to talk unto her then unto all the rest of her Company. But as these kind of meetings do often cause others, so after they had viewed all that was to be seen at the Castle of this great Queen of the Amazons, they designed to go unto another place, where it was said that Hercules and Theseus arrived, when they defeat[ed] those valiant warriars: and where might be seen the place where those two sisters of that Queen, the one named Hippolite, and the other Menalippe, were taken prisoners by those two Heroes: So that Artaxander, and Clorelisa being many dayes together, and using much familiarity and talk, there grew betwixt them a kind of league, which I know not what to call. For I understood since from Artaxander, that his heart was never really touched with any love, and that the affection he had unto Clorelisa was only in his mind: and truly (said he unto me, one day when I pressed him to tell me his thoughts of her) to testifie that my heart is free. I love Clorelisa, because I would love her, and I love her without any distemper. But for all that (amiable Doralisa) Artaxander during this journey was as full of his Gallantry as his wit could furnish out. If he talked unto her of Hippolite with whom Theseus fell in love, after he took her prisoner, it was to let her understand that he should have had the same distance, if Hippolite had resembled her: And if he talked to her of Hercules, when they shewed him how he overcame the Amazons; it was also to tell her, that she was more valiant then ever they, since she could get victories, and make prisoners without any Armes. To be short, though Artaxander did only esteeme Clorelisa, yet he carried the matter as if he were in love with her: Insomuch as Clorelisa, who had opinion good enough of her self, beleeveth that he thought as he said, and looked upon him as her slave. So as returning unto Themiscyra, with the glory of her Conquest, there was none who at her return did not think her much embellisht; so well did her joyes become her beauty. But (amiable Doralisa) before I tell you how Artaxander was esteemed at Themiscyra: I must tell you that our Town being much divided into Factions, there was a Family which was enemy unto that of Artaxander, whose eldest sonne, named Tysimenes, was of the same age with him: so as chance so ordering it, that his Parents sent him unto the same places where Artaxander was, So it happened, that both of them being young; both well born, and never had any jarres one with another; meeting both in a strange Countrey: engaging themselves in the same businesse; in the same pleasures, and being farre from those who bore all the hatred, they came at length to love one another; and fortune sent them many occasions wherein they had need of each other, and accordingly they were serviceable unto each other with equall Generosity. Insomuch as these two reconciled enemies did promise an inviolable affection, and went unto the warres together against Polycrates. I shall not insist, how they signalized themselves: but shall tell you, that since this warre, Artaxander was called home by Almedea, and so Tysimenes and he parted: But at parting, they agreed, that they would not publish their Reconciliation untill they met at Themiscyra: for since the father of Tysimenes was violent and fantasti[c]all, he feared lest it should incense him, and lessen the exhibition for his subsistence. Thus this friendship being as mysterious as love, it was as violent and tender. In the mean time, this Reconciliation made no noise in the Court, and at the return of Artaxander, the talk was that he fell in love with Clorelisa, at the Castle of Orithia: but not a word that he was become the friend of Tysimenes during his travells. Then, to return unto the joyes which Clorelisa had, to think she had subdued the heart of Artaxander, I must tell you, she talked of nothing else: 'Tis true, this joy was a little qualified by the sharpe reprehensions of Isalonide, for going that voyage: for though she went with the permission of her brother, and with excellent Company, yet she must needs make a strange hurley-burley about it: upbraiding her, that there was a hundred famous Temples in Cappadocia, unto which she never had any Curiosity to see: and yet upon a businesse of Gallantry, she must go to a place where nothing was remarkable, unlesse an old story of Amazons: However, Clorelisa being accustomed unto her severity, she cheered up her self presently against her sisters anger; And Page 10 since Telamire was not well and kept her chamber, she went to visit her: for there being a great amity between them, and being equall in quality and age, they used to see each other very often: Also Clorelisa, in the mind she was, had a mind to seek out new acquaintance, to the end she might have occasions of relating her voyage, and talk of Artaxander. There was also another reason which moved Clorelisa to see Telamire very oft: for you must know, that Belermis her brother was much in love with her, and pressed her every day, to knit acquaintance with her, to the end shee might be able to do him a good office. After that she had quieted Isalonide, she went unto Telamire, not knowing that the mother of this Lady had a designe to marry her unto Artaxander, for there had been no reports of it out of the Family. So that after the first Complements, and Clorelisa had told Telamire, that her sicknesse had not altered her: and that Telamire also had told Clorelisa, that the Sunne had not burned her, Clorelisa asked her the news of the Town, and Telamire asked her concerning her voyage. So that having a way so easie to humour her own inclination, she made her an exact relation of it, aggravating with extreme delight, her meeting with Artaxander. Since I have not stirred out of my Chamber of late, (said Telamire unto her) I knew not that Artaxander was returned: but I beseech you, did you find him handsome enough to render your voyage the more delightful. I assure you, replied Clorelisa, I found him to be so excellently accomplished, as I do not think any one in Themiscyra. When one is in an humour to divert ones self, (replied Telamire) one shall be pleased at any thing, and those who are but meanly accomplished, will please sometimes better, then those who are more, can when that humour is off. No, no, Telamire, (replied Clorelisa) the esteem I have of Artaxander, is not grounded upon my pleasant humour, but upon his own merits, which are such, as to justify the judgement which I have given of him, I will bring him to you: and I will take upon me to chuse his acquaintance, and his friends for him: for as you know, he parted from Themiscyra very young, he is now almost a stranger in his own Countrey. Certainly, replied Telamire, Artaxander hath found you to be as fair, as he finds you to be accomplished, since in so short a time, he esteems you so much as to let you chuse his friends and acquaintance for him. However it be, replied she, have not you an ill opinion of Artaxander, because I confesse unto you, that he hath a good one of me: For the truth is, your compleatest men are capable of an error once in their lives; and it may be that I am the same of Artaxander. Oh Clorelisa, replied Telamire, I shall rather beleve the error is in Artaxander then in you, since I am well acquainted with your merits, but with his, not enough to answer for him. That you may judge justly, replied Clorelisa, I will bring him unto you to morrow: for (added she and smiled) since it is I who brings him unto you, I must not stay till you be perfectly well, lest I should expose this friend whom I esteem so much, unto a great danger, if you should see him, when you are perfectly recovered. Since he hath seen you already, replied Telamire, you have no reason to fear any in Themiscyra, since certainly there are none so taking as your self: you are disposed to flatter me, replied Clorelisa, but all the sweet language you can give me this day, will not blot out the wrong you have done me, in telling me I do not know compleat men, since you suppose I am mistaken: But to punish you, if the fancy take me, I will tell Artaxander that you can not beleve what I say of him. Oh, Clorelisa (cried out Telamire) take heed what you do, for if you should do so, I should never pardon you as long as I lived. As Clorelisa was ready to answer, there came in some Ladies, who caused the discourse to change, and moved her to go away, for they were such as did not please her fancy. In the mean time, since Artaxander had a particular intimacy with her, and with all the Ladies with whom shee was in their voyage, he saw them every day, and came acquainted with Belermis: so that it was an easie matter for Clorelisa to keep her word with Telamire. But since her designe was to be very carefull in keeping that conquest which she thought she had made, she told Artaxander, when she carried him unto Telamire, that she was carrying him unto a Mistress of her brothers. But I beleve she told him so, to the end that he looking upon her, as a Person who was already engaged unto another, he might have no thoughts of her, in case the Charmes of Telamire should move his heart more then her own. But that he might not bee surprized at the beauty of Telamire, she extolled her to the skie, knowing well, that it was a good way to lessen the admiration which any great Beauty may cause at the first sight. At Page 11 least I do imagine that this was her aim, and my reason is, because when she spoke of Telamires beauty unto other men, she was nothing earnest in her Elogies. However it was, they came unto this fair sick One, who doubtlesse deserved that Epethite; for since it was my chance to see her that day, I never saw her look better in her health. 'Tis true, her disease was not great, and she was handsomely drest; also in such a negligent and taking manner, that it was impossible to look upon her, and not to love, at least, like her. Also Clorelisa, who since the return of Artaxander, had much more care of her self then ordinary, was also handsomely drest that day: but for all that, the negligent and free Garbe of Telamire exceeded her; and she appear'd a thousand times more fair then Clorelisa, though Clorelisa was also exceeding well. Since I had a great share in Telamires friendship, she sent unto me that morning, to passe away the afternoon with her: and indeed I came so timely, that I was with her, before Clorelisa: but I was no sooner set down, then she asked me, upon what termes I was with Artaxander? for, said she, as we may sometimes have friends who are not Cousins, so also we may have Cousins who are not friends. All I can can tell you, replied she, is, that Artaxander is certainly an excellent well qualified man, enough both to be my Cousin and my friend: But since it is not long since his return; and since his return he hath been continually with Clorelisa, or with those Ladies with whom she was at the Castle of Orithia, I know not yet, whether he hold me as his friend, or will look upon me only as his Cousin. As soon as I had said so, Artaxander leading Clorelisa, entred: so that Clorelisa presenting him unto Telamire, she received him with much civility, and he saluted her with much respect. I observed, that at the first he was surprized at the sight of Telamire, and maugre the Elogies of Clorelisa, he did not imagine her half so fair as he sound her. But since Clorelisa did doubtlesse observe him as well as I, she blusht for envy, and the more, for casting her eyes upon a great Glasse, which was opposite to her, wherein she saw Telamire, and her self also, and maugre the good opinion which she had of her own beauty, she knew that Artaxander had good reason to think Telamire fairer then her self: at least there appeared unto me, such a kind of fretting in her countenance, as moved me to make that interpretation. Also I observed, that after she had seen her self in the Glasse with Telamire, shee changed places, saying, that the heat of the day had made her eyes look ill: but doubtlesse the reason why she changed places was, because Artaxander should not see them both at once, as he might before, and so he might not so easily discern the difference between Telamire and her. And indeed, as soon as she was removed, and stood where she desired the vexing feature in her face, me thought, did vanish: And desiring her excellent wit might repair her disadvantage of beauty, she began to break out unto a hundred witty and pleasing fancies. But though Telamire did not reply with the same earnestnesse that Clorelisa spoke, yet she replied so pertinently, and in such an ingenious manner, as made it apparent her wit was as excellent as her beauty. At first, the discourse was of Clorelisa's voyage, afterwards of her unexpected meeting with Artaxander, and of the friendship she had with him. For my part, said I, I am perswaded that one may another in six dayes enough to esteeme and love them, and more then those who know after another manner can in six moneths: for when they know them by a third person, who prepares the mind with high Elogies, their imaginations are so preposse'd with Ideas of their own, that when they come to see, they will not finde their fancies and Ideas answered. Doubtlesse it often happens as you say, (replied Artaxander) but not always: And for example, I only need to tell you, that though Clorelisa told me, Telamire was one of the fairest persons in the world, and though I fancied an Idea of all I could think admirable, yet I must confesse unto you, that if I could let you see my fancy, you should see I had drawn but a very bad picture of her. That which we use to call a bad Picture, replied Telamire, is one, which resembles not the Person for whom it was made: a Picture which flatters, is as bad a Picture, as that which makes ugly; and so I think I may with out any vanity, say of yours: because perhaps, you found the Idea which you fancied of me, much fairer then I am. Oh Telamire, said Clorelisa, I am not of your opinion in this, for I can never agree, that a Picture which flatters, is a bad Picture, since Telamire (replied Artaxander) never had hers which did flatter, because it is impossible to be made fairer then her self. I do not wonder she should not know the difference: but I wonder said he and reprehended himself, seeing he extolled Telamire so much, and Clorelisa Page 12 so little) that you Clorelisa should know it, since certainly there can be no picture taken from you, which does not injure you very much: I pray Artaxander (said she, and both laughed and blusht) do not undertake too many things at once: Either co <...> nd Telamire, and not me; or else commend me, and not her, for this divided Elogy doth never oblige any: But not to puzzle you in making a choice, which perhaps would not be advantageous unto me, It is better, that since you have told what you think of Telamire, Telamire also tell what she thinks of you, and whether the Idea which she fancied, be better then what she findes: for to tell you truly, I spoke as well of you unto her yesterday, as I did of her unto you: But I beleve she will not admire you so much as you do her, because since she hath not so good an opinion of me as you have, she did not give so much credit unto my words when I commended you, as you did when I commended her. Fie Clorelisa, (said Telamire) you are the most cruell woman in the world. Since I speak nothing (replied she) but what I m <...> ced before, me thinks you should not be surprized at

it. Telamire then fearing that Artaxander should believe she had spoke some strange thing concerning him, began to relate the whole discourse which she had with Clorelisa the day before: Confessing ingenuously, that she did not believe him to be so compleat a man, as Clorelisa had represented him. Yet I hope (added she) that you will be so reasonable, as not to be offended at what I thought of you, before I knew you: and that you will be satisfied with the justice I render now I do know you better. Certainly I shall not be offended Madam, replied Artaxander, at any thoughts you had of me before you knew me; but I am afraid I shall have some cause to be sorry for your thoughts of me after you know me. Oh heavens (said Clorelisa, not giving Telamire time to answer) that she could so farre mistake her self; then should I be the best pleased in the world, if I could upbraid her with want of judgement in compleat men. But I am afraid that I shall never have that satisfaction; and that on the contrary, you will become so much her friend, that I shall become yours lesse: and truly I shall not take it well, if she should be more yours than mine. Provided that Artaxander be no more my friend then he is yours, replied Telamire and smiled, what will it concern you, if I be more his then you are? What will it concern me? (replied Clorelisa) ah Telamire, it will extremely concern me; for I am sure you can never be Artaxanders friend more then I am, unlesse he be more yours, then mine. But amiable Clorelisa (said Artaxander, and smiled as well as they) since you have done me the favour to accept of the Commission which I gave you, to chuse my friends for me, and since you have brought me hither, I hope you had no designe that I should become the enemy of Telamire. No replied she, but I had no intention you should be so much in her favour, as that I should be out, and yet I am the most mistaken in the world, if this come not to passe. Though Clorelisa spoke this in laughter, yet I assure you she feared it in earnest. But after this visit had lasted a long while, she went away: But went away, not knowing what to think upon the matter: since Artaxander was so charmed with the beauty of Telamire, that his memory stood in need of all its helps, to remember whether he had not commended her too highly in speaking unto Clorelisa. Yet since he had much a do to talk of any thing else, because his imagination was wholly taken up with her, he talked lesse then usuall all that day- which Clorelisa observed well enough, as she told me afterwards, to her grief. But that which vexed her more the next day was, that she understood by me of the Ladies whom Artaxander saw with her the first time he ever met her, that he had so extolled the beauty of Telamire, as she never heard a higher commendation in all her life. So as considering that he hardly spake unto her, she conjectured, that his thoughts were wholly upon Telamire, and not upon her. Yet since she had a good opinion of her self, and she never had any slave who brake her chains, she could not believe that Artaxander could break those fetters which she had (as she thought) laid upon him. So as not seeming to be troubled at it, she lived with him as she begun, to wit, in much friendship. But a little while after, understanding that Artaxander had been severall times with Telamire and never told her, she was in a strange fume, for then she thought that he loved Telamire better then her. Yet to excuse her credulity, I must say, that Artaxander being insensible, engaged to complement with her, as if he were in love, he knew not how to make a Retreat. So as, though his heart was full of violent passion unto Telamire, yet he talked unto Clorelisa as he used: and the rather, because he Page 13 did really intend to stifle that growing affection which he had unto Telamire, and to lock up his heart both against the one and the other; Conceiting the simple Gallantry without any ingredient of love was much more pleasing and agreeable then a violent passion could be. Thus he continued to talke unto Clorelisa, as those who use to talke of love, but never mean it. 'Tis true, he continued not long at ease: In the mean time Clorelisa, whose heart was really engaged, defcating upon the state wherein she was considered which way she might prevent Artaxander from seeing Telamire, or at least from contracting any friendship with her. At first, she thought it expedient to fall out with Telamire, and oblige Artaxander to the like, in taking her part; but considering upon a sudden, that perhaps she was not able to win him unto such a thing, shee feared, that if shee should see her no more, yet hee would, and so shee should not be able to interrupt their conversation by her presence: so as resentment of jealousy- causing her to take up a contrary designe, she resolved to make a shew of most tender friendship unto Telamire, and to see her so oft, that Artaxander should never see her, without her: and to puzzle him the more, she obliged Belermis her brother, to discover unto Artaxander, the love he bore unto Telamire, and to desire his assistance, telling him, that he knew Telamire did infinitely esteem him, and that he was the fittest man he could chuse for a Confident: And indeed Belermis used all his endeavours to get the friendship of Artaxander: and following the advise of Clorelisa, he trusted him with the very secrets of his heart, and discovered his passion unto him, conjuring him to assist him as farre as he could. You may imagine, that Artaxander was put to great puzzle. For it was not likely he should tell him that he was his Rivall, considering how his case stood with his sister; and it was also impossible to do for him, as he desired. However Belermis desiring this favour from him in a blunt souldierlike way, which was naturall unto him, he hardly knew what to say unto him; yet Artaxander having an excellent wit, he excused himself as well as he could. Sir, said he unto him, I am much obliged unto you for the Confidence you are pleased to put in me: But Belermis, if you will give me leave to speak freely what I think, I must ingenuously confesse unto you, that I am the worst Agent upon earth in any such matters; and the onely reason why I will never undertake to serve my friends in any such wayes of Love, is, because I am fully perswaded that I should do them more hurt then good: and that in such cases as these one ought to employ none but themselves, for truly, a friend in such cases, doth often more harm then a Rivall. And indeed, can you imagine that if Telamire should know that you impart all shee tells you unto me, and all that you tell her, she will not be rigorous towards you? No, no Belermis, deceive not your self: but be assured a mistresse will ever be severe, if she know that her Lover hath any Confident, for she will trust her Lover with many more secrets then she will his friend: Therefore all I can promise you is to speak of you unto Telamire, according to my own Repentments, when any occasion offers it self; for otherwise I should prejudice you more then you imagine. Since Belermis had not the least suspicion that Artaxander was his Rivall: but on the contrary, thought him to be in love with Clorelisa, he onely desired him at the least to give him his best advice. And since Artaxander had no pretence to refuse that, he consented unto it, and the rather, because it was some sweetness unto him, to hear all the complaints which he made of Telamire. And this sweetness he often tasted, for since there was scarce a day on which he did not receive some new Piece of cruelty from that fair One, he was continually condoling with Artaxander. On the otherside, Clorelisa according to her designe, was so full of complaisance unto Telamire, and was so very officiously serviceable, that Telamire did really believe she loved her very tenderly: And she had one advantage by seeing her every day: for since Telamire had the reputation of extraordinary vertue, the severe Isalonide could find no fault with her sister. And indeed, she was so very frequently with her, that she was almost no where else. You may well think, that it was cruell torment unto Artaxander, to bee continually talking unto one whom he loved not, and not to be able to talk unto her whom he did love. In the mean time, he was extremely perplexed to cease the telling Clorelisa that he loved her, and to begin the telling Telamire that he adored her: Moreover, the confidence of Belermis became very troublesome unto him. and he grew at last so deep in love, and so vexed, that all were intollerable to him. And indeed, his passion became so strong in a few days, that he much cared not what Clorelisa, or Belermis Page 14 should think, though they did know he loved Telamire: But the great trouble of his spirits was to let the fair Telamire know what thoughts he had of her. Since Clorelisa and Belermis were continually with Telamire, it was a very hard matter for him to find her alone: and he was a long time in hops of Clorelisa's being sick, that she might keep her Chamber, and when that occasion did offer itself, he was as much troubled to find Telamire with her: for Clorelisa's eyes were no sooner open in the morning, but the jealousies of her soul, moved her to send unto Telamire, and to entreat her, she would be pleased to have some pity upon her in her sickness, and to see her as soon as she had dined, for if she did not, it would be a great addition of inquietude in her sicknesses So that Telamire thinking that Clorelisa loved her very dearly, she went betimes unto her; and forcing her inclination, which did not naturally love Clorelisa, she answered her seeming friendship by a thousand expressions of her service and care; and particularly in her diligence and assiduity in this her sickness. Thus for the first dayes of her sickness, it was impossible for Artaxander to find her any where but with Clorelisa: And by reason of Algastus the father of Telamire, he would not offer to make any visits, at such times as decency did not permit. But at last, hitting his time in the nick, he came one morning into Telamire's Chamber, as she was looking her self in a glasse, and putting on her hood to go unto Clorelisa: And since she was already very familiar with him, she continued putting it on after she had saluted him, supposing that he would go with her to see Clorelisa, and making the proposition very civilly unto him. Did I not know (said she unto him) that Clorelisa was your friend before I was yours, and that you cannot take it ill I should pay what I owe unto her merits, in lieu of putting on my hood, I would take it off, and regularly receive your visit. But since I do imagine you would have us go together to comfort this fair sick Person, I am as free with you as Clorelisa her self would be. I should think my self very unhappy, Madam (said he unto her) if you should think I would crosse any of your intentions: But Madam, (said he cunningly unto her, to hinder her from going so soon) As I was coming hither, I sent to know how she did, and I understood she was not awake, and therefore if you will not disturb her, you will not go so soon. But if you please Madam, I will send one of my men to wait untill she be awake, and then bring us word: for in my opinion it is better staying here then in her outer Chamber. Telamire believing this, sent one of her women, to bid one of Artaxander's servants go unto Clorelisa: But Artaxander seeming as if he had some other business with him, went hastily to Telamire's chamber-door, and commanded the man to be two hours before he returned; and if any of Telamire's servants came to know whether Clorelisa were awake, not to let him speak unto any of the house, but to tell him, that she was not. This order being given, Artaxander returned to Telamire, who caused a stool to be set for him, and she began to talk of Clorelisa, thinking no discourse could be more pleasing to him: for she could not imagine that Clorelisa should love him, unlesse he had loved her. In the mean time, though his designe was to discover his Passion unto her, yet it was long before he durst tell her his thoughts. But since he could not so well hide his inquietudes, but Telamire observed him, she imagined that the reason was because he was troubled at Clorelisa: But Artaxander, (said she unto him) me thinks you are very melancholy, is not the reason of it because you fear Clorelisa should be sick this morning? No Madam, (said he unto her transported by his passion) but it is, because Artaxander is much worse to day, then he was yesterday: and I believe will every day be worse and worse. If Artaxander be sick (replied she and laughed) Appearances are very fallacious: so they are, replied he, and to give you an example, Does not all in Themiscyra believe that I am in love with Clorelisa? yet it is most certainly true that I am not: And if I were no more in love with an admirable Lady, whom I dare not name, then I am with her, I should be much more happy then I am. Telamire hearing Artaxander speak so, she began to suspect the truth: and to stop his mouth from any more of that discourse, she turned the talk upon some thing else. No, no, Artaxander, (said she unto him) never take so much pains to deceive me, for I am more complaisant unto my friends then you imagine me, and as soon as I perceive they have a designe to make me believe a thing, I seem as if I were perswaded of it: and so I will tell you, if you please, that I do believe you love not Clorelisa, but that you love some other: yet for your own tranquillity, I should be sorry it were so, for Page 15 I am confident you will have much ado to perswade that other, to believe that you do not love Clorelisa: However, I pray give me leave to send one of my servants, and know whether she be yet awake, for I believe that he whom you sent, is as fast asleep as she is: And she sent one accordingly. But the prudence of Artaxander foreseeing the impatience of Telamire, the man whom he sent to Clorelisa's, meeting the other and asking him whither he went, and being answered to see whether Clorelisa were awake, he told him that he could save him that labour, for he was newly come from thence, and one of her women said, she was not yet awake: so as Telamire's servant without any further enquiry, returned to tell Telamire, that Clorelisa was still asleep. It is very strange, (said Telamire, and looked upon Artaxander) for I have heard her say, she seldome sleeps, but dreams; and I am confident that at this very hour, she is with me, though I am so with her. If so Madam, replied Artaxander, then she is with one, who may if she please, plainly perceive whether I love Clorelisa or no: I have already told you, replied Telamire, that I am so complaisant, as to believe, or at least, seem to believe, whatsoever my friends would have me. Then Madam, believe that I do not love Clorelisa, nor ever did: and if I had boldnesse enough, I would Conjure you to believe also, that I am extremely in love with the fairest Lady in the world, a Lady over whom you have more power then I wish you had. As Telamire was ready to answer, a servant of Clorelisa's entred, who said, That his Mistris extremely wondering she came not to see her, had sent him to know how she did, and what the reason was which debarred her from that satisfaction. Telamire surprized at this, did look upon Artaxander, who without any amazement told the servant, that it was himself, who kept Telamire from Clorelisa. because one of her men told him she was not awake. That which made Telamire most to wonder, was that she had sent a servant of her own, and this servant being not in the house, she conceived that it was onely some mistake between Clorelisa's servants and hers: So as making her self ready to go presently unto her, she gave her hand unto Artaxander, supposing he would go with her. And to let him see, she made no application of what he had spoken, unto her self. Though I do believe, said she unto him, that you are not in love with Clorelisa, yet I cannot chuse but think you will visit her, since you cannot deny her the advantage of being the first friend you had in Themiscyra: and I will be the more earnest in maintaining her right in that, because I pretend to be in the second place your friend. Oh Madam, (said he) whether I be in love with Clorelisa or no, I am sure she hath not so high a rank in my heart as you have, though she be a person whom I much honour and esteem. Since Telamires house was very nigh unto Clorelisa's, they had not leysure to say any more. And since one of Telamires women might hear them, Artaxander was forced to talk of something else. However, as soon as they were come into Clorelisa's Chamber, she chid Telamire, a thousand times, and that with a strange agitation of heart: for since she saw Artaxander with her, she imagined him to be the cause of her stay: but she was much worse, when Telamire to justify her self did tell her all the passages: yet Artaxander did still affirm very confidently, that they assured him she was asleep: But since the heart of Clorelisa was too much engaged to be deluded, she would needs look into the matter a little neerer; and calling all her women one after another, they all said, that they saw none, either from Artaxander, or Clorelisa. Artaxander then told her, that certainly some of the servants unto Belermis to save themselves the labour of coming to her, had told this lie. But say what he would or could, Clorelisa was not satisfied, and she was fully perswaded, that this was a trick of Artaxanders, and she thought also that Telamire was an accessory unto it: for since she assured her very earnestly that she had sent unto her house, and since all her women on the contrary assured her, that none came from her, she did not only think Artaxander to be in love with Telamire, but she thought as that Telamire held a great correspondency with Artaxander then ever she imagined: so as jealousy having possession in her minde, she was tormented beyond expression: and she who was so earnest in sending for Telamire, knew not now what to say unto her. Since I came in a little after this confused examination of the matter, I could plainly perceive the turbulency of Clorelisa's mind: all I could observe was, the confusion of Artaxander, and the prudence of Telamire. For truly this wise Lady, taking no notice of Artaxanders love, not of Clorelisa's jealousy, did speak unto every thing with a marvellous moderation, Page 16 and tranquillity: and certainly I came in very opportunely to help out with discourse. However, I made her since confesse, that she could not chuse but find some sweetnesses in thinking that though Clorelisa loved Artaxander, yet he did not love her; and that the glory to be preferred before such an amiable Person was some delight unto her. For my part, I was exceedingly delighted with the passages of that day: for besides the pleasure of seeing how Clorelisa and Artaxander were put to a Non-plus, I was extremely taken with seeing Belermis in his fierce Garb, who knowing that Telamire was in his sisters Chamber, came thither to see her. But he came (amiable Doralisa) more like a Conquerour then a Captive: not but that all he said unto her was very civil and respective; yet his Air and Garb did alter the very sence of his words, and made him seem as if he intended to fether her, whose chains he wore. Moreover, since he could not chuse but be talking as much of matters of warre as love, he was so full of his Martiall phrases, as that day I learned as many Military Termes as might serve for the Relation of all sorts of Combats, for he vsed them all in his discourse: so as before 'twas night, I knew what Incampment and Quarters were: I knew what the first, second and third Divisions did mean; I learned all the Postures, to the right hand; to the left hand; as you were, double your Ranks, and Files. And I knew from him that day, at least enough to lose a Battle, if I had commanded an Army. And to be serious with you, he was so full of words peculiar unto War, that all I could do, was to remember them, though as yet I did not know the significations of them: But to compleat my diversion, The severe Isalonide entred, who commonly finding fault with every thing. did not like that Clorelisa should be so dressed, since she was sick; saying openly, That those sicknesses which onely draw company about One, and will let one be dressed better then when they are well, were of a most dan|gerous consequence. For indeed, said she, If one were really sick, they should see none but such as could cure them, or their very intimate friends: and not do as most women now adayes, who are more carefull in consulting with their Glasse, before company come, then with their Physitian: And are more diligent in advertising all their acquaintance that they keep their Chamber then those that can cure them. And to tell you truly, they have a greater desire to have them come who can tell them a thousand tittle tattles, then such as use to cure diseases. But (said I unto her, to do Clorelisa a pleasure) if you did but know how much melancholy doth augment all man|ner of diseases, you would say, that pleasant company may be put in the rank of the most infallible Remedies. If you should ask the advice of my sister (answered she in a most imperious Tone) I am sure she will be of your opinion, and maintain that all manner of simples used in Physick are not comparable to the company of five or sixe such tittle tattles as are glad to hear of any sick Gallant, who are sick onely because they should come and see them. I must confesse unto you (said Clorelisa, and blusht for anger) that I have been such a one as you speak of, but at this time I am so ill, that much Company are very troublesome unto me: Telamire hearing Clorelisa say so, did rise up, and offered to go away: but Clorelisa out of jealousy, as well as friendship, took hold of her and said, that she was neither weary of her nor me. Then it is of me, replied Artaxander: But if so, I beseech you speak unto Telamire to command me away, for since I had the honour to wait upon her hither, I expect that command from her. You may easily judge how Clorelisa resented Artaxanders discourse; yet she could make no answer unto it: for her sister being very glad to see that once in her life she was weary of company, desired Telamire that she would move Artaxan|der to go away: And Belermis also, thinking that Clorelisa was really sick, he went out, and Artaxander also: Yet it was not before Telamire had dispenched with him, from the Civility which he offered. But Clorelisa's spire did so encrease, that her spir|its were so turbulent all the rest of the day, as Telamire and I, did not think it fit to stay any longer: And so we left her with Isalonide, who I do beleewe was trouble|some enough unto her. However, since I went home with Telamire, and could not chuse but talk of Clorelisa, I told her how I feared that Artaxander was in love with her: So as in the confidence she had in my friendship, though I was Artaxanders Cousin, she told me all passages betwixt her self and him: adding, how infinitely sor|ry she should be, if Artaxander should be in love with her, and Clorelisa jealous. For the first of these, replied I, you need not doubt it: and for the last, you may be most certainly sure of it, And indeed, the event made it evident, I was not mistaken, Page 17 for the truth is, Clorelisa was as jealous, as Artaxander was in love with Telamire. There was a hundred triviall passages, which served to augment this passion of jealousy in the heart of Clorelisa; Inasmuch as not being able to live in such uncertainties, she did drive Artaxander to the necessity either of seeing Telamire no more, or of seeing her no more: but he making choise of the last, Clorelisa added unto her jealousy and love, a most terrible desire of revenge. And in order hereunto, she would not cease seeing Telamire, though she hated her as much as she loved Artaxander: for it is the custome of such as are jealous, to hate the lovers who forsake them, almost as much as those for whom they are forsaken. However, to spite Artaxander, she continued her assiduous seeing of Telamire. 'Tis true, Telamire did not think her self at all obliged unto her for her visits, for she understood by many with whom she conversed, that Clorelisa did speak very disadvantageously of her: yet since she was alwayes very wise, she would not make a businesse of it, but contented her self to dissemble it out, as well as the other: And I am perswaded, that her spite against Clorelisa did contribute something unto her allowance of Artaxanders passion, whom she did esteem very highly: In so much, as taking to heart the intention which her late mother had of marrying her unto him, she was perswaded that she might innocently permit him to love her: so as accustoming her self by degrees to let him talk more freely of his love, then formerly she had, they came at last to be so kind, as she permitted him to beleewe that she did not hate him, and so both their parents would consent, that he might hope to be happy. Yet she had much ado to make him such a favourable declaration: for you must know, that Artaxander did not finde so much difficulty in perswading that he loved her, as to make her beleewe that he was never in love with Clorelisa: for she alwayes told him, that if he were inconstant, she would not accept of his affection. Thus Artaxander for a long time did nothing else but protest, that he never loved Clorelisa further then the degree of a friend: and that though she did interpret his thoughts otherwise then she ought, yet he was not to blame. But Artaxander having wit enough, which was also whetted by a most violent passion, he used so many elegant, amorous, and perswasive arguments, that at last (as I told you) he overcame her. In the mean time Artaxander did by degrees desert Belermis, and cease being his Confident. And since he resolved to love Telamire as long as life was in him, he thought it not handsome to delude him. Thus being disobliged, both from the brother, and the sister, he applied himself so wholly to love Telamire, as he could hardly live out of her sight. Yet one thing did most sensibly afflict him; which was, that Amaldea (who knew that Algastus, Telamires father, intended to marry again) did not approve of that which before she so much wished: but since he hoped to perswade Telamire, not to value her consent, he enjoyed many pleasing hours, maugre all the jealousy of Clorelisa: meeting almost every day, with an opportunity of talking with Telamire, and not over-heard by Clorelisa. Things being upon these termes, and Clorelisa foreseeing that unlesse she undermined Artaxander, he would ere long marry Telamire, she took the oddest resolution in the world: for her designe of revenge was so high, that she cared not to sacrifice even her very l|fe unto it: And this was her invention. I already told you, that Algastus though very old, yet had a mind to marry again, and to marry both a young and a fair person, not valuing Riches, so her Quality was good: but since he was very farre on in yeers, he could not meet with such a one as would marry him. Yet in his Quest of such a wife, he employed a sort of such people, whose trade is to make matches: And Clorelisa understanding this, resolved to carry the matter so, that she would marry Algastus; That so being a Mother in law unto her Rivall, shee might banish Artaxander her house, and employ all the favour she had with her husband, to hinder his consent unto Artaxanders marriage. So that meeting wherewith both to satisfie her Revenge, and her Ambition, for Algastus was very rich, she resolved to passe away her life with a man whom she could not possibly love. And when she considered how joyed shee should be to hinder Artaxander both from marrying Telamire, and coming to her house, the crazy age of Algastus was no obstacle to hinder the execution of her designe. And indeed, Clorelisa perceiving how her brother grieved that he could not move the heart of Telamire, she put the whole businesse upon his score, and seemed as if she onely aimed at his happinesse by it: In so much, as making the Proposition unto him, hee gave her a thousand thanks: And as fierce as he was, he seemed unwilling she should Page 18 make her self miserable for his sake. Yet notwithstanding, seeing that if she married Algastus, she would get so much power over him to procure his marriage with Telamire, or at least stave off his Rivall, he resolved to further her designe. Moreover, since Isalonide, was eternally upbraiding Clorelisa with her too much Gallantry, she told her, that to testifie she was able to leave it off when she pleased, and if ever she would marry Algastus, she must wholly alter the manner of her life. But that shee might think there was some possibility in the designe, she told her, that a Person of her acquaintance assured her, that if she managed the mind of Algastus handsomely, and kept the businesse secret, it would produce a happy effect: And she employed all her wit to bring it about. And since she was acquainted with all the women in Themiscyra, which were of her own humour, and who thought as she did, that if one be vertuous, one must be austere in all their actions, she made choise of one, whose age, behaviour, and dresse, did speak to be a Piece of most severe prudence: whose voice was all gravity; whose words were weighed, and whose walk was so compo|sed, as if she counted every step. So that after she had chosen this person to propound Clorelisa unto Algastus; she reasoned upon the matter with her, and they both concluded, that an action of greater vertue could not be, then making up this marriage: since it would be an infallible cure of Clorelisa's Gallantry. So as these two women negotiating together, and engaging the whole Crew of Vertue in Themiscyra to be in the Plot, they proposed the Match unto Algastus, who not using to communicate his designs of marriage unto his daughter, did keep it secret from her, as he had done all the rest: At first he gave no favourable answer unto the motion, because he was afraid that Clorelisa would be too great a Gallant for him. But in conclusion, all these La|dies of a severe Gab, which interressed themselves in this marriage, did so assure him that Clorelisa had quite forsaken the world, and that she would so well conforme her self unto him, that he resolved to see her, at one of those Ladies houses. Not but that he had seen her a hundred times before; but yet he would talk with her, before he concluded any thing: and accordingly this meeting was the next day. You may well imagine, that the mind of Clorelisa was farre from any tranquillity; But for all that, not caring to be revenged upon her self, so she could be revenged upon Artaxander, she saw Algastus, and knew so well how to fit her discourse, that he thought him|self to be in love with her. I say he thought so, (amiable Doralisa) because I make some scruple, whether I can call this doting fancy in the mind of an old man, Love, when he would marry a young and a fair woman: and me thinks that passion and old age are so unsutable, that without any injustice it may rather be called folly: making a doubt, whether it be possible that love should be in their hearts, as they think it is. But to return unto Algastus; whether he thought that he loved Clorelisa, or whether he did really love her, It was a businesse concluded upon in a few dayes: and it was carried so closely, that neither Telamire, nor Artaxander knew of it, untill the Eve before the marriage of Algastus: And they knew it in such an amazing manner, as did much augment their sorrows. For since that Clorelisa would not have married but onely for Revenge, she would undertake to make it known unto Telamire: assuring Algastus, that she was so confident of her friendship, as she did not doubt but she would be very glad of it: and indeed Clorelisa told it unto Telamire, as if she had thought so. But to the end, she might better Gust the sweetnesses of Revenge, she sent unto Telamire in the morning, to tell her, she desired to speak with her after dinner, for she had a businesse of great joy to impart unto her. Though any thing which came from Clorelisa was alwayes held in suspection by Telamire, yet now she imagined that she had something to tell which would please her: so that she expected her at her own Chamber, giving orders that none should enter, no not Artaxander himself. So that Clorelisa being come, with her eyes full of joy, as if it had proceeded from her heart, she gave Telamire abundance of flattering language: After which, affecting a modest kinde of shame, which would not let her speak out: I pro-esse Telamire, said she unto her, I am much more troubled then you can imagine, to tell you a thing which is fit you should know. Then it is not such pleasing businesse as you sent me word, replied Telamire: Pardon me, replied Clorelisa, for I am confident loving me as you do, you will be as much joyed as I am: and I assure you, I am upon a Resolution, which, but for your sake I should never undertake. That I may acknowledge my obligations, replied Telamire, I beseech you let me know what they Page 19 are. I will, (replied Clorelisa) provided I have power so to do. After this, shee told her; That it was true, Algastus had a long time courted her for his wife: but she refusing him, he was upon marriage with another, which was the oddest and most fantastical person in the world, and that this marriage was almost concluded: Also since he always did me the favour, to prefer me before any other, and being resolved to marry my sister, if I did not change my mind, I considered that it would have been the greatest grief in the world unto you, if he had married such a fantastical woman, and on the contrary, the greatest joy, to know he would marry me: So I assure you, I did not so much insist upon obedience unto my Parents, or satisfaction unto my self, as to hinder you from having a mother in law, who would never have been so kind unto you as I do intend to be. Therefore since you were ever to expect a mother in law, I conceived you would be glad that I was she; and I must further tell you, that to morrow my marriage is to be. But let me once more tell you, my Dear Telamire, that it is you onely that makes the marriage, and it is onely for your sake, I do intend to venture upon all those bitters, which are unseparable from that condition. As long as Clorelisa talked, Telamire lookt most attentively upon her, to see by her eyes whether she spake seriously: and finding nothing which might make her suspect the contrary, she grew extremely sad: not that she cared for her fathers marriage, but that Clorelisa should be one whom tomorrow she must obey; this was an unspeakable torment: How|ever, since she was ever very wise, she did what she could to conceal her sorrows, and look joyfully with her eyes: but her hardest task was to keep her tongue from be|traying the thoughts of her heart, when she told Clorelisa, she was very glad of her choise. But her looks were so full of melancholy, that she gave Clorelisa an excellent occasion of Revenge: But she stood upon thorns, untill Artaxander did partake of Telamire's sorrows, and therefore she left her, knowing very well she would impart it unto him, as soon as she was at liberty: And so it was, for Clorelisa was no sooner gone out of Telamire's Chamber, but he entred, and received with a sad heart this un|welcome news. How (cried he out) is Clorelisa to marry Algastus? Yes replied Telamire, and tomorrow must begin her commands upon me; nor can I disobey her without going against the rules of Decency, though she is my most mortal enemy; and though I certainly foresee shee will make mee the most miserable woman in the world. Alas, alas, (cried out Artaxander) I am afraid she will make me as miserable as you: and that you being continually with one who hates me, she will cause you and Algastus both to hate me also. Did Clorelisa hate you, replied Telamire, I should not fear so much as I do. But Artaxander, Clorelisa doth not hate you; and I am most confident, she does not marry my father, but onely to be revenged upon me, because she loves you whether she will or no, and I wish you would deliver me once from this persecution which is coming upon me. I wish to the gods, Madam with all my heart (said he) that I could imagine which way I could deliver you from falling into the power of my enemy, and sister of my Rivall, but I must confesse, I know not how. And yet you easily may (replied Telamire) for I am confident, if you would marry Clorelisa, she would not marry Algastus, though she were in the Church with him, and though she were ready to pronounce that terrible word, which ties as long as one lives. Oh Madam, (cried Artaxander) what a most terrible motion is this? Is it possible you should wish me so much misery? For to tell me you would have me marry Clorelisa, is to tell me you will never marry Artaxander: to assure me you love him not; that you have an ill opinion of him, and that you wish him all imaginable ill, since you wish him to marry one whom you hate, and who hates you: Oh Telamire, Did I understand you right? Is it possible your heart and your tongue should agree? Yes Artaxander, replied she, they do; but I assure you at the same time that I find my self to be in a most lamentable condition; for I do foresee, such dan|gerous consequences of this marriage, that I am in one moment sensible of many yeers torments. I do not onely foresee Clorelisa commanding me, but Isalonide upbraiding me at every turn; and also I see Belermis, looking upon me as a subject rather of his valour then his love: and yet all this without any remedy, but poor uncomfortable complaints: yet I must seem to be all joy, for that very thing which causeth my greatest sorrows: I must obey one who hates me, one whom I hate. You need not Madam unlesse you will, replied Artaxander: and your onely way to prevent it, is, to make me happy. For I am perswaded that a father who marries again, doth lose something Page 20 of that falluall Authority which he hath over his children: and since Algastus looks onely to his own satisfaction, and never thinks of yours, you may very well seek out wayes to accord the tyranny of Clorelisa. No, no, Artaxander, (said she unto him) I cannot do a you propound, since it is more just to obey Clorelisa, then disobey reason. After this, Artaxander used all his winning arguments to move her unto marriage without the consent of Algastus. But still Telamire answered, that she would never do any thing against the Rules of obedience: and that she should be lesse miserable by doing what duty required, then by not doing it. In the mean time, the more she made her vertue appear, the more love and sorrow appeared in his eyes: for when he considered that he was a cause of the affections in Telamires soul, his did infinitely augment. On the other side, Algastus being returned home, after he understood that Clorelisa had acquainted Telamire with his marriage, Artaxander was forced to go away, because Algastus sent for his daughter: Thus these two Lovers parted with extreme sorrow. Yet Telamire was carefull to conceal hers, lest her father should think that some interest of her own moved her to grieve at his marriage. And she constrained her self so well, that he did not perceive the sadnesse of her heart; but on the contrary, beleevd that she was glad (since he would marry again) hee would marry Clorelisa: and he was so fully perswaded of it, that he desired her to have a care the feast for his marriage should be Magnificent, And indeed Telamire so ordered every thing, as if she were the most joyed person in the world at this marriage; at which were present none but the Family of Algastus, and that of Clorelisa. For besides the age of Algastus, which did not require a great assembly, Isalonide would not allow it. As for Artaxander, he sighed away all that day with me, and lamented his misfortune, thinking it to be the greater, because Belermis was to dwell with Algastus: so that though untill then, he was never jealous of him, yet now he began, and feared lest Clorelisa should move Algastus to command Telamire to marry Belermis. But said I unto him, though I do allow you to lament that Telamire should come under the power of Clorelisa, who is both her Rivall, and her enemy, yet I can|not endure you should be jealous of Belermis. You know very well, (added I) that he is more like to make her fear him, then love him; and that Telamire ever had <> strange aversion unto all such men whose Aspects were always as if they were ready to fight. Ah Erenice, (said he unto me) I did not fear that Telamire would ever love Belermis untill now, nor did I ever suspect her Constancy: But now, I must sadly confesse, I am extremely afraid of her vertue. For I am sure that if she hold the opi|nion that she ought not to disobey Algastus, she will marry Belermis for all his gri <...> Martiall looks, though she were sure it would kill her. And who knows (Erenice) whether she will accustome her self unto the sight of Belermis, and disaccustome her self from the sight of me? But whilst Artaxander was lamenting with me the mis|fortunes of Telamire and himself Telamire was in a strange constraint: yet she thought no lesse of Artaxander then he did of her: for she told me the day after, that when she looked upon either Belermis, or Clorelisa, she thought of nothing but him. On the other side, this new married Lady had her angry minuits; and her joyes to see her self in a condition to be revenged upon Artaxander, was not so tranquill as it was the day before: And a friend of hers told me since, that shee confessed shee never looked upon Algastus whom she had married, without a remembrance of Artaxander, not ever remembered Artaxander without unconceivable grief. And she had another addition of sorrow: for Isalonide drawing her aside, did reade her a Lecture of the life she was to live, the most harsh, and severe that ever was: she regulated all her actions one after another: shee did limit her to her ordinary visits, when shee went to see her sick kindred: and indeed never to make any other, unlesse either unto Funeralls and marriages. She told her, that now she was to lay aside all richnesse and superfluity in her dresses: she forbad her to frequent Walks, Balls, Musicks, and every thing else she made choise of those Churches, which shee thought most fit for her to frequent: and she taught her how to compose her countenance, and turn up the whites of her eyes: Yet this severe Lecture was needlesse, for her resentments of revenge induced her to all these rigours, purposely to win upon Algastus, and move him unto what she desired, both against Artaxander, and Telamire: so as she promised Isalonide to follow her counsell; and indeed, did put on such an austere and reserved Garb, th <...> Algastus loved her extremely. Moreover, for the first dayes shee carried it civil|l•Page 21 enough towards Telamire, though she did take upon her the Authority of a Mother in Law: for not seeming to know that there was any particular intimacy 'twixt her and Artaxander, she gave her a hundred Reasons which induced her to desire that she would not see him any more; no, nor suffer him to come into the house where she was: Not that I will take upon me, (said this revenging woman) to re|gulate you in your acquaintances: but you know when one of my age marries such a man as Algastus, one is obliged to live very reservedly; and therefore I beseech you, think it not strange, if I rob you of that diversion, because it would reflect up|on my self. Since what Clorelisa said, had a fair pretence of vertue. Telamire durst not oppose it; though she knew very well that Clorelisa had secret cause for it, where|in vertue had no share. Furthermore, Clorelisa the better to execute her designe, told Algastus in a most crafty manner, that Artaxander, having had heretofore some thoughts of her, she beseeched him to command Telamire to hold no converse with her. For (said she unto him) a small thing may stain the reputation of a woman of my age, and therefore I desire all occasions may be removed. You may well imagine that Algastus did not deny Clorelisa in that which seemed to proceed from a principle of vertue: So as sending for Telamire betimes in the morning, he expressly comman|ded her to see Artaxander no more. You may also imagine, considering my descripti|on of Telamire, that she made no resistance against Algastus: yet for all that she was extremely grieved in her heart. In the mean time, since she thought it expedient that Artaxander should know how the case stood, she made choise of me to make him acquainted with it: And to tell him, that she conjured him to come no more at her, but to wait untill chance gave them an opportunity of meeting which was not a thing very easie, considering the close way Clorelisa observed, and her vigilant eye over her actions. And truly she spoke this with so much sadnesse in her eyes, that if Artaxander had but seen her, he would have comforted himself. But since he recei|ved his misery by the relation of a person who could not comfort him, he resented it with more violence then I am able to expresse. Alas (said he unto me) did the Re|venge of Clorelisa reach so high, as not to marry Algastus, but onely to be revenged upon me, and persecute Telamire? And can Telamire obey her enemy, and banish me, whilst she is continually in sight of Belermis? For ow, he will not stir out of her sight, since he dwells with Algastus. This man who was wont to be perpetually walking from street to street, from Church to Church, and from house to house, to shew his martiall postures to all the Town, will not now stir one foot out of Clorelisa's, or Telamires Chamber: yet for all this Telamire obeyes my enemy, though she hazard my life by it. However, I beseech you, said he unto me, refuse me not the favour to give a letter unto Telamire: for if I be denied all, I shall bee forced unto such courses as will anger Telamire, and cause repemance unto my self. Since I saw the mind of Artaxander was much exasperated, I durst not incense him more by my refusall; so as I was so complaisant as to tell him, That provided his Letter was open, I would let Telamire see it. Thus without more delay he writ a Letter in my Cham|ber, and a very long one, to move her unto some way or other, how he might see her in some other place, since he could not see her at home. Afterwards he was very bitter both against Belermis, and Clorelisa, and hinted upon so many things, that I must confesse, my memory will not serve to repeat them: All I remember of it was, that it was excellently well penned, though writ in much hast. And it did much move the heart of Telamire: but as much as she was grieved, she answered onely in these words, unto the favour which he begged of seeing her.

The friendship and esteem I have of you is enough, not to forbid you finding out some handsome occasion of meeting with me, and I should be very glad if you could find it. But be not offended, if I tell you, that I cannot contribute any thing unto it, since I cannot do it, unlesse I do more then I ought.

Though this answer was not to fully favourable as Artaxander could have wished, it did for a while give him some comfort: but since his passion was most violent, he quickly returned unto his former despair. However, since he was not able to live without the sight of Telamire, he invented all manner of wayes to bring it about: and at last he understood that there was a private solitary Garden, where Clorelisa went Page 22 <1 page duplicate> Page 23 <1 page duplicate> Page 22 often to take the Air, without any company but Belermis, Isalonide, and Telamire: and enquiring perpetually concerning the thing which most took up his mind, he un|derstood that Belermis was gone into the Country for some certain dayes: So as re|solving to go into that place, where he knew Clorelisa and Telamire would be, hee carried one of his friends with him, and desired him, that if they met with Clorelisa, and Telamire, that he would take Clorelisa aside, and talk with her, whilst he talked with the other: For said he, Clorelisa dares not insult over Telamire, before him whom I shall bring with me, nor dare Telamire deny to talk with me. And indeed, without further examination, whether this designe was well or ill grounded, he advertised his friend: he craftily enquired the time when these Ladies used to walk, and he went unto the place where they were, and he came but one half quarter of an hour after them, for he would not be first in the Garden, lest Clorelisa should not enter, if she knew he was there. But, amiable Doralisa, this meeting was in a very pleasant manner. For imagine that when Artaxander and his friend entred into the Garden, Clorelisa and Telamire were at the end of a walk, opposite to the door, coming as they were going towards them: so as all of them having time to consider what they should say at meeting, they were lesse surprized when they met. At first, Clorelisa intended to turn back, but since there was no other Garden dore to go out at but that behind Artaxander, she thought that in vain, therefore never offering to avoid the meeting, she onely thought how to prevent him from speaking unto Telamire. On the other side, Artaxander desired his friend to go straight unto Clorelisa, as himself intended to go straight unto Telamire: but since there is a notable difference between one that acts for the satisfaction of a friend, and one that acts for their own satisfaction: this friend of Artaxanders was not so ready in accosting Clorelisa, as Clorelisa was to accost Artaxander: who as witty and amorous as he was, could not meet with Telamire, before Clorelisa met with him, because she stayed two or three steps behind, speaking something unto one of Clorelisa's women: So though Clorelisa did ex|tremely hate Artaxander, and though it was long since she had spoke unto him, yet she accosted him the first, as I told you before, not being very sorry that she had met with an occasion of speaking her thoughts unto him: so as soon as she was neer enough to be understood. Since there is now no society between us, said she unto him, I should not have thought it any happinesse at all, to meet with an occasion of telling you something which concerns you to know: but since the occasion doth present it self without any Quest of it, I will not let it slip; and in saying so, Clorelisa stepping betwixt Telamire and Artaxander, he could not avoid talking with her, nor could he talk with Telamire. Also he had a conceit, that perhaps Clorelisa would repent of what shee had done, and hoped that by carrying himself civilly unto her, he might obtain liberty of seeing Telamire again. Then Artaxander, after he had saluted Telamire, in a most passionate and respective manner, he began to hearken unto what Clorelisa said unto him, whilst his friend talked with Telamire. But he was much surprized, when he heard Clorelisa talk in such a Tone as she did; after she had cunningly stepped three or four paces farther from Telamire. I do imagine, said she unto him, that it is not necessary to tell you the reason why I accosted you, for your apprehension is quick enough to know, that it was to hinder you from talking unto Telamire. But to save you the labour of seeking any further occasions, let me acquaint you that all your en|deavours will be in vain: For the truth is Artaxander, I did not marry Algastus, to let you marry Telamire. But on the contrary I must declare unto you, that I married him onely to make you miserable. Alas Madam, said he, your Revenge goes much too farre if it reach Telamire, who never wronged you. Since it hath reached so farre as my self, replied she, it shall reach as farre as her: And therefore if you value her tranquillity, never think of seeing her again; for if you do, I professe you will but blow the bellows of my anger against her and you both. And since it is in my power to hurt her, I assure you it shall fall heavy upon her, unlesse you take up a firme resolution absolutely to forget her: or at least to carry your self as if you did. Yet never think that I speak this out of any other interest, but Revenge: for I do protest seriously. I have no other end in it, but to hinder you from being happy. I will not pump for any excuse Madam, said he unto her: I will but onely ask you, why you joyn and confound Telamire with Artaxander? Because, replied she, Artaxander lives more in Telamire, then in himself, and my Revenge will reach him no other Page 23 way but this. Yet notwithstanding (added she with a smile full of tartnesse) to testifie that I will keep some measure in my Revenge, I promise you, that as soon as ever Telamire is married, or that you be married unto some other, I will then give her more liberty, then untill that I will. And in the mean time, let me tell you once more, that you have no such sure way to make: Telamire miserable as to seek out opportunities of speaking with her: And to testifie the truth of my words, this which you have done at this time, shall cost Telamire eight dayes solitude: for let me tell you, I have as much power with Algastus as that comes unto: he will have Telamire obey me; and Telamire dare not disobey me: so as I see my designe of Revenge upon you is prosperous. But Madam, (said he unto her) is it possible you should be capable of such an unjust designe? I know that I have merited some part of your hatred: but I can never think it allowable that you should revenge your self upon Artaxander through Telamire. I cannot tell whether or no it be allowable (replied she) but I am sure it is much delight, to have command over a person whom one loves not: And in the mind I now am in, I protest, I had rather command Telamire, then a Kingdome. But Madam (said he then unto her, being transported with anger) since you think it just to revenge your self upon Artaxander through Telamire, I hope you will not think it unjust, that I should revenge my self of Clorelisa through Belermis. I have such a considerable Hostage in my power, by having Telamire, replied she, that I fear not what you dare do against Belermis. And to remove all thoughts of any attempts against him, I will onely wish you consider what that person is capable to attempt, who could find a heart to marry Algastus onely to hinder you from marrying Telamire: And I am confident, that if you make a serious reflection upon what I say, you will never expose Telamire unto the vengeance of a woman who hath recourse unto such extraordinary wayes of Revenge, and who makes no difficulty to be revenged upon her self, rather then not be revenged upon others. After this Clorelisa left Artaxander, and called Telamire with all the authority of a most insulting step-mother, and with all the fury of a most incensed Rival: not that she used so to do when Artaxander was not present: but she found it so sweet to vex Artaxander, that she could not deny her self that satisfaction. However, Telamire not seeming to take such a rude command in any ill manner, she followed Clorelisa after she had quitted the man who talked with her, and had saluted Artaxander: she was also so wise, as to forbid him by a signe with her hand, and by her looks to accost her, as it seemed by his action he intended: But in recompence of this angry adventure, she shewed him something so sweet and tender in her fair eyes when shee parted from him, that he became more in love with her, and more afflicted. However, since that day, Clorelisa was more hot upon her revenge; and did not onely endeavour to hinder Artaxander from seeing Telamire, but she brake off with all those who had any particular intimacy with him, and obliged Telamire to see him no more, upon such a poor pretence as it is not worth a mention: But the wonder was, that all Clorelisa did out of jealousie, did get her greater credit in the opinion of Algastus, and passed in the world for her vertue. For Isalonide, and all the faction of precise Ladies, who were her friends did so trumpet up the reformation of Clorelisa, that they proposed her as an example unto all youths who were too much addicted unto diversions. In the mean time, Artaxander had no other comfort but to relate all his miseries unto me: and to write unto his new reconciled enemy, called Tysimenes, who became his friend during his travells: But it was an absolute impossibility for him to see Telamire, unlesse sometimes at Church, but then he could not speak unto her, and consequently it was small satisfaction: nor had he so much happinesse as to see any who did see her, because as I told you before, Clorelisa had banished all his friends whatsoever; In so much as he lived the most miserable life in the world. And to make him the more miserable, he could not chuse but quarrell with Belermis, and they fought, with such sad successe, as they were both of them dangerously wounded: and had they not been parted, in all probability it had cost them both their lives. After this, you may easily conceive how sad Telamire was, to hear in what a pitifull condition Artaxander was: however, she must go with Clorelisa unto the chamber of him who was wounded; and seem as if she grieved for the wounds of Belermis, though her grief was onely for the wounds of Artaxander. And this constraint was not onely for a day: for as long as Belermis was ill, he would have her every day to come with Clorelisa, Page 24 who never stirred out of her brothers Chamber: And Clorelisa upbraided her a hundred times a day, accusing her of all her brothers wounds. But all this was nothing in comparison of her griefs a while after: For you must know, that since Artaxander had gained one of Telamires servants, unknown unto her, to acquaint him with all her actions, this servant told him how assiduous Telamire was with Belermis: so as he grieved in such excesse, as his wounds grew worse, and for some dayes, the Physicians despaired of his life. In the mean time, since Belermis mended, Telamire had the grief to see him Recover, who she thought was the death of Artaxander. So that not being able to constrain her self any longer, nor hide her tears, shee feigned her self to be sick, to the end she might not stir out of her Chamber, nor go any more unto Belermis: Yet this invention did not deliver her from that trouble, for since Belermis began to mend, Clorelisa brought him to Telamires Chamber, who having not so much liberty as to lament in the day, did imploy all the night in tears: And, yet her tears did double, for the servant, whom Artaxander had suborned, did bring her a Letter, wherein she found these words:

Madam,

I Cannot deny my self so much satisfaction as to tell you, that the cares you have of reviving Belermis, have killed me: And it is lesse by his hand, then yours, that you have lost the most Passionate, and most Faithfull Lover that ever was:

Artaxander.

This Letter did so touch Telamires heart, that though she did not love to hazard Letters, yet she answered him in these words, if my memory fail not.

Sir,

You have accused me with much injustice: and if you saw into my heart, you would find, that if I could revive any one, it should be Artaxander, and not Belermis: Do not judge of me by appearances, and if it be possible, get into such a condition, as I may chide you for no better knowing Telamire.

Though this Letter did not contain all the tendemesse that was in Telamires heart, because she durst not trust unto the thinnesse of a piece of paper; yet it wrought so great an effect upon the mind of Artaxander, that after it had calmed the turbulency of his soul, the violence of his Fever diminished, and in a few dayes he recovered as well as his Rivall. Yet he was more perplexed then before his Combat, because Clorelisa had a better pretence for keeping a severe eye upon Telamire. Things being upon these termes, Artaxander had a new displeasure. For Clorelisa did put away that servant by whom he received intelligence concerning Telamire. But at the same time, he received much consolation, by a Letter from Tysimenes, which intimating unto him that he was returning unto Themiscyra, desired him to come secretly a dayes journey to meet him, that they might consult together how to make their reconciliation known unto their parents, with least offence unto them. And as soon as Artaxander had received this Letter, he prepared himself to meet his friend, who he found to be much more accomplished then when they parted: and the friendship between them was inviolably confirmed: but in lieu of publishing it, as Tysimenes designed, Artaxander conjured him to the contrary, and to conceal it carefully. But to the end this prayer might not surprize him, or offend him, he acquainted him with his love of Page 25 Telamire, and his misery in not seeing her, no nor seeing any who did see her, because Clorelisa had banished from her house all his friends. So that my Dear Tysimenes, (said he unto him after a full relation of all passages) I am perswaded that if you passe still for my enemy, you may easily insinuate your self into the favour of Clorelisa; and have that liberty of seeing Telamire, which is denied unto all those whom she thinks have any converse with me? so as by this means, I may know how Telamire does, and you may much oblige me, in speaking in my behalf unto her. Since I shall give a greater testimony of my friendship (replied Tysimenes) by concealing it, then by publishing it, I shall accomplish your desires. And accordingly Artaxander and he, resolved to keep very close the affection which they had unto each other, to see whether Clorelisa, who banished all the friends of Artaxander, would admit of a man whom she thought to be his enemy; They also agreed unto the place, where they were to meet each other secretly: And for that purpose, they made choice of a house belonging unto one of Tysimenes friends, which had two doors, opening into two severall streets; agreeing which of these doors either should enter, so as none should ever see them enter together into one place; and for the more security, they never met but in the nights, at the house of this friend unto Tysimenes, for whose fidelity he would undertake. Thus after all things were agreed upon, these two friends parted, and came severall wayes unto Themiscyra, where nothing was known of their Reconciliation: for Artaxander carried but one servant with him, when he went to meet Tysimenes, and of that servants fidelity he was assured. And Tysimenes, had none but strangers unto his servants, for all those he carried out of Cappadocia were all dead, so as those he now had could not reveal the secrets of their Master if they would, since they knew not the Language of the Countrey. Since Tysimenes was of the Prime Quality in all the Town, and was very handsome, his Return was no lesse talked of then that of Artaxanders. And all the Town feared, that some ruffle would fall out between them two, whom all the world thought to be enemies: for being of the same Age, pretending unto the same things, and had good right both of them to dispute in point of merit, there was great reason to fear they would fall foul upon one another. And when they met together in any place, they behaved themselves with such coldnesse unto each other, as was very probable would beget a Quarrell between them. Thus their innocent Im|posture did thrive so well as all the world was deceived by it. But as it did thrive well in generall, so it did thrive better in particular unto Artaxander: for you must know, that since Clorelisa did naturally love company, and hated solitude; shee was very glad she had found one out, who was not a friend: unto Artaxander: and shee fancied some delight in contracting friendship with a man who passed for his enemy, thinking this would spite him to the heart: so as when Tysimenes went upon his first visit, she did not entertain him with such severity and precisenesse as she used since her marriage: But as he was well received by Clorelisa, because she thought him the ene|my of Artaxander, so he was very ill treated by Telamire upon the very same reason: for since it vexed her to see every day those whom she hated, and never those she lo|ved, she could not chuse but be angry at the heart, to see a man so civilly treated, whom shee thought Artaxander hated. She hath confessed since unto him, that shee could not this first time know him to be a man of much spirit, but told him that shee was vexed at him: yet she continued not long in this error; and you shall see how she was undeceived. Since then the Aims of Tysimenes was onely to satisfie his friend, he tempered the spirits of Belermis, and Algastus so well, as they both of them desir'd Clorelisa, to give him leave to see her often. For as almost all old men do love to hear talk of Travell, that they may have a pretence to •al• of their own, Tysimenes so fitted his humour, and hearkned so attentively to what would please him, that he do|l'ted upon him: As for Belermis, Tysimenes talked unto him of Battles and Combats; and so much commended his valour, that he loved him tenderly, so as in three or four visits, he had the freedome of the whole house. Clorelisa having wit enough, shee easily observed how Telamire was vexed to see an enemy of Artaxanders to often: and to vex her the more, she affected to place him alwayes next her. But since he ne|lver saw her unlesse Clorelisa was present, because Telamire shunned him as much as she could, he was at first much puzzled to make it known unto her that he was not the enemy of Artaxander,, but• on the contrary, was the confident of his passion. But at last, she understanding the Assyrian Language, which Clorelisa did not, and which Page 26 Artaxander and himself understood very perfectly: he caused his friend to write a Letter in that Language, directed unto Telamire: so as carrying it about him, he went to Clorelisa, who according to her custome, did place him next Telamire to spite her, and indeed she was not deceived. In the mean time, as those who are witty can turne discourse as they please, Tysimenes that day fell into discourse amongst the Ladies of some excellent pieces of Prose and Verses: And after he had repeated some in their own Language, and promised others, he told Clorelisa that he was extremely sorry that she did not understand the Assyrian Language, for he had one of the most pleasant love-Letters in the world, written in that Language, which he seemed as if he would interpret, but upon a sudden seeming to remember that Telamire understood that Language, he gave her the Letter, and forced her to look upon it, whilst he made a shew as if he would tell the sence of it unto Clorelisa: So that though Telamire had no great cu|riosity to see any thing that came from the hand of Artaxanders enemy, yet she took this Letter, not daring to offer any incivility unto Tysimenes openly: But she was much surprized when she saw it written by the hand of Artaxander: and much more, when she read the words.

ARTAXANDER UNTO TELAMIRE.

Madam,

Give me leave to tell you, that he who gives you this Letter, is not what he seems to be: since he is so farre from being my enemy, that he is the onely Confident of my Passion to you: Look upon him as the dearest of my friends: Tell you him, all you are pleased I should know, as I will, what I desire you should know: For it is onely in favour of my Love that he seemes to hate me, knowing that none but such as do hate me are admitted unto the place where you are: Receive all his services, as from my self; Beleeve all his words, as if I spake them: and if it be possible, tell him some thing that may preserve mee from dying for sorrow I cannot see you. I beg your pardon, for trusting him before I asked your permission, as I would if I could: But since I could not, I had rather he knew I loved you, then not to know whether you loved or hated me, or then you should not know that I love you still, more then I did when I swore most truly, that I loved you more then ever any yet loved

Artaxander.

Whilst Telamire was reading this Letter with a strange agitation of heart, Tysimenes did so court Clorelisa, that she could not observe her: but striving to invent a Letter upon that subject which he said Telamires Letter was, he took up the mind of Clorelisa as much as he could. But since it was impossible hee should ex tempore invent such a piece, as could merit those Commends which he gave unto it, Clorelisa told him, that certainly the excellency of that Letter consisted in the grace of that Language in which it was written; since, as she apprehended, the conceits of it were no more then ordi|nary. Oh Madam, (said he unto her) you have good reason to say so, for I assure you, there is no comparison between what I say, and the letter it self: And beleeve it (said he and took it again, seeing Telamire had read it) there are some passages in this Letter would ravish you with wonder, if I could relate as in it self it is: Also I am confident that Telamire which understands that Language will concurre with me. Page 27 'Tis very true, replied Telamire, this Letter is very rare, and the interpretation which is made of it is very surprizing also. You commend this Letter so highly, replied Clorelisa, that you make me desirous to learn the Language wherein it is written, and Algastus who understands the Language very well, will be a great help unto me: As she said so Algastus came into the Chamber; so that Tysimenes fearing lest she should tell her husband of this Letter, and move him to shew it, he went out very hastily, as if he had remembered some businesse which he had before forgotten. Yet I think he had no such great cause of fear: for since this Letter was said to be a Letter of Love, Clorelisa, in her affected humour of precisenesse, would not have shewed it unto her husband. But a Cousin of hers who understood the Assyrian tongue very well coming in accidentally that day, she sent for Tysimenes, purposely to borrow that Letter of him: for, said she, I cannot beleeve it to be so excellent a Piece as Telamire, and Tysimenes do say it is, considering the Interpretation which they made of it unto me: You may well imagine that Tysimenes would not send her that Letter, but to get out of this Labyrinth, into which he had involved himself, he seemed to look for it, and at last, said he had lost it, affirming unto him whom Clorelisa sent, that certainly he had left it in her Chamber. In the mean while, Telamire was so surprized at this Letter, as she hardly knew whether she should beleeve her own eyes: But the day following, seeing Artaxander in the Church, she knew the Letter was his: for he made some certain signes unto Tysimenes, who did sit next her, which induced her to beleeve she was not deceived. So that no longer shunning occasions of talking with Tysimenes, he quickly found an opportunity to let her know, how Artaxander and himself were reconciled during their travels. And indeed, though Artaxander had seen Telamire a hundred times in private, before he fel out with Clorelisa, yet he never had revealed this secret unto her: for besides that, a lover, when he is alone with his Mistresse, doth seldome or never talk of any thing but his Passion: so likewise, since his friendship with Tysimenes was made a secret onely for the love of Tysimenes, he would not impart it un|to Telamire, though he had opportunity for it. However, after this, the lives of Artaxander and Telamire were much more pleasing; and the wonder was, that the life of Clorelisa was also much more agreeable: for she found such delight, to imagine that she spited Artaxander by seeing Tysimenes, that she made it almost her whole busi|nesse, to contrive new occasions of seeing him. Moreover, though she observed Telamire had no great aversion against discourse with Tysimenes, yet she suspected nothing; but on the contrary, since she thought that Artaxander would be more angry •f shee should marry Tysimenes, then if she should marry Belermis: And since again, she did not much care for having her to be her sister in law, she wished that Tysimenes were in love with her: And she her self, said one day unto him, speaking of her hatred un|to Artaxander, that if she were in his room, she would endeavour to possesse the same place which his enemy said he did in the heart of Telamire. And when he answered, that he honoured Belermis more then to become his Rivall, she said laughing, that Belermis was so much devoted to the warres, that in her opinion, one should do him a great pleasure if they could cure him of his love: Adding afterwards (in a more serious Tone) that she really beleeved Telamire and Belermis would never be happy together: and therefore she could wish with all her heart, that he could love. Telamire, and that Belermis could forget her. On the other side, Artaxander understanding by Tysimenes, all that Telamire did, and almost all she thought, he perceived that she still hated Belermis, and that she did not hate him. Telamire for her part, she was so glad that Artaxander continued constant, though he never spake unto her, nor hardly ever saw her, that she thought upon nothing but him. And indeed, he never visited any but whom she was pleased to permit him; nor ever attempted any thing before Tysimenes had first consulted with her: And this faithfull friend for a long time did so unite the hearts of these two persons, that their own merits could not tie them faster unto each other, then the solicitations of Tysimenes did. For, when he reported the words of Artaxander unto Telamire, he did most emphatically expresse the amorous affections of his heart: and, when he reported the words of Telamire unto Artaxander, he omi|t'ted not one obliging accent. Thus Tysimenes at first, finding his own content in the satisfaction of these two persons, had next, the delight to d•lude Clorelisa, Algastus, and Belermis. Then would the demure Isalonide needs be busie, and break off the frequent visits of Tysimenes unto Clorelisa, telling her it was more dangerous to see one Page 28 gallant often, then to see a thousand, and see them but seldome. But Clorelisa telling her, that Tysimenes was more her husbands guest, then hers, her pure precisenesse was silenced: for indeed Clorelisa had carried the matter so cunningly, that Algastus did verily beleeve, she suffered Tysimenes only out of complaisance unto him. However, this solitary society became more pleasant: because Artaxander under the Umbrage and name of Tysimenes, did give all imaginable diversions unto Telamire: For since Algastus in his youth was a great lover of pleasures, Tysimenes would propound unto him, sometimes, that they might go out and take the Air; some times he would bring Musick unto him, and some times make him a banquet: So as many delicate pieces of Gallantry did passe, under the notion of being presented unto the whole family: though the truth was, it was alwayes Artaxander who was at the charge of the Mu|sick, and Banquets which passed under the name of Tysimenes. Thus did Artaxander every day present Telamire with a thousand diversions, and as many expressions of his love, without giving the least jealousie unto Belermis or Clorelisa. And if it be true, as I have heard say it is, that delusion is one of the delights of this Passion, I am confi|dent they had as much as they could be capable of: since they had the full delight to know that they loved one another, and also to delude Clorelisa and Belermis. 'Tis true, they spake not unto each other: but since they writ, and some times saw one another, this was a mitigation of their grief. Thus Clorelisa, intending revenge upon Artax|ander did most agreeably serve him, and gave him a way to be revenged upon her self, yet did she relish all the sweets of her Revenge with a full gust: For she had the com|mand over her Rivall: she hindred her from speaking unto her Lover: It was in her power to forbid the Banes of their marriage: she thought she kept such a severe eye upon her, as that she could not hold any Intelligence: she thought also, that she began to love the enemy of Artaxander, and that he was ready to die for grief and anger. In the mean time, Telamire being full of modesty, though she had all imaginable ten|demesse towards Artaxander: though she received his letters; and though she answered them; yet she never spake nor writ any thing which might perswade Tysimenes, that she had any violent affection unto Artaxander. And considering how she carried the matter, it might more properly be termed friendship, or acquaintance, then love: as for the secresie of the businesse, she did attribute it more unto the necessity of satisfying the odde humours of Clorelisa, then to the satisfaction of the nature of that affection. Again, as Clorelisa did heartily wish that Tysimenes would marry Telamire, to spite Artaxander; so likewise she Cajoled with Belermis, that she perswaded him Tysimenes solicited for him, when he talked unto Telamire: Thus Tysimenes had opportunity enough to talk with her: Clorelisa also disposed Algastus to give his daughter unto him, if she could obtain his consent: And to bring it about, she made use of all her Authority over Telamire, to dresse her self better then usuall, though she was to see none but Tysimenes: For (said she, as we understood since) Tysimenes sees none but Telamire. Telamire is fair: Tysimenes is young and of a passionate temper, and by consequence it must be concluded, that he loves Telamire: And certainly, Amiable Doralisa, the Arguments of this jealous and Revenging Person were not slight: For insensibly, before ever Tysimenes perceived it, love seized upon his heart, and as changed from hatred, unto amity and friendship with Artaxander; so he changled from Indifference unto esteem, and from esteem unto Love with Telamire. The first mark of it which he had was, that he found a great alteration in himself. For at the beginning of this Negotiation, he was wont to be extremely joyed, when he re|ceived any favourable expression from Telamire, to report unto Artaxander: or any rapture of Passion in Artaxander, to report unto Telamire: but as soon as his heart be|came a little engaged, he found a secret melancholy at the joyes of his friend, when he told him any thing which conduced to his satisfaction. He weakened as much as hee could, the obliging sence of every word, which these two persons spoke. And if Artaxander desired him to tell Telamire, that he was the most sincerely faithfull, and passionate Lover that ever lived: he would seek out for words lesse tender, and signifi|cant; and so lessen and extenuate the life of his expressions. Again, hee took such extreme delight in seeing Telamire, that he could not long doubt of the passion which lay lurking in his soul: yet truly, he oppressed it with incredible Generosity: and he opposed it as much, because he had been the enemy of Artaxander, a because he was now his friend. For truly, (said he to himself, as we understood afterwards) Artax|ander Page 29 as thy friend is obliged to have some compassion upon thy sufferings, as thou art of his; but if he take thee as one that hath been his enemy, he hath cause to suspect thee of baseness, perfiduousnesse, and treachery: for if thou beest his friend, thou oughtst not to be his Rivall: and if thou beest his enemy, thou oughtst not to be his Agent unto his Mistresse. Make then thy choise Tysimenes, (said he,) if thou wilt be Artaxanders enemy, keep it not secret from him; and if thou wilt be his friend, stifle thy Passion, and hide it from him, and Telamire both, if it be possible: But Alas, I perceive thou wilt be neither the one nor the other, and that thou canst neither be friend, nor enemy unto Artaxander: yet one of these thou must be; In|differency is not in thy Choise. To be his Friend and his Rivall both, are two things impossible: To be his enemy, and his Confident, are two qualities incompatible: And to be the Lover of Telmmire, and friend, or enemy of Artaxander, is a condition most deplorable. For if she look upon thee as his friend, it is as a most perfiduous friend: as a man unworthy of her esteem, since he betrayes a trust, which ought to be most inviolable: And if she look upon thee as Artaxanders enemy, 'twill bee onely to hate thee, and to enter into all his Interests against thee: Thou dost but flatter thy self, in hopes that Telamires affection to Artaxander is not violent: for if it be not violent unto him, How can it be unto thee, who can never discover thy Passion to her, unlesse thou dost discover thy Treason unto Artaxander also? Oh most lamentable Destiny! The Person thou lovest must either never know thou lovest her; or if she do, she must know thee to be an Impostor, and a perfiduous Friend. How dost thou think she can ever belevee thy words, since she will convince thee out of the very same words thou usest to discover thy Passion unto her? For what hast thou not said in behalf of Artaxander; of his violent Passion, of his fidelity to her, and of her obligements unto him? Wilt thou go and tell her, that thou didst tell her lies? Wilt thou give thy self the lie? and though thou shouldst be so base, dost thou think Telamire will belevee thee? And though she should belevee, that thou didst dissemble with her in speaking for Artaxander, thou wilt not be one jot the happier, since she hath cause to think, that whosoever will lie for another, will lie for himself. Moreover, consider Tysimenes, consider the hatred that hath been between the house of Artaxander and thine: Remember that thy Ancestours and his, have ever striven which should excell in glory and vertue: And wilt thou give such an advantage unto the Family which hates thee, as to upbraid thee that Artaxander is more vertuous then thy self? Consider Tysimenes, that if thou dost betray thy friend, he will divulge unto all the world, that thou wast reconciled unto him, purposely to be perfiduous and base. Consider that Glory will not suffer thee to give such advantage unto thy enemies: And that Friendship will not endure thou shouldst be a Rivall unto thy Friend, especially a friend who did overcome the old hatred of his heart unto thee. Consider that Love is not a more violent Passion then Hatred: and thou mayest be as well able to cease loving Telamire, as thou wert to cease hating Artaxander. But art thou able to cease loving Telamire? (said he) Oh, if thou bee'st, thou art the most vile man of the whole earth if thou doest not: but yet if it be not in thy power, thou art not culpable. What shall I do then, (said he) love, or not love? Ah doubt|lesse, I shall love, (said this tormented Lover) But if thou wilt be loving, and love with reason, thou must love Artaxander and Telamire both. The task is difficult, and yet thou must do it, at least carry thy self in the secret of thy heart as a lover of Telamire, and publicly as the friend of Artaxander: And so betraying onely thy self, thou onely canst upbraid thy self: And thou wilt preserve the esteem of thy M|stresse, of thy Friend, of thy Rivall, and of thy Enemy, for Telamire and Artaxander are all these four unto thee. These, amiable Doralisa, were the thoughts of Tysimenes, presently after he perceived himself in love with Telamire: for afterwards we knew from himself all his most secret thoughts. However, after he had most seriously pon|dered what resolution to fix upon, he was so generous as to resolve upon death, rather then be perfiduous unto Artaxander: so as I am confident, that never was vertue put upon a more difficult Test, then his: For he knew that Clorelisa did heartily wish his marriage with Telamire, and he knew also that Algastus would joyfully consent unto it. Again, as the state of things stood, there was no probability that Artaxander should ever marry her: so as though he could not see any hopes of happinesse for his friend, yet he resolved to be the most miserable of any man alive. 'Tis true, he could Page 30 not easily bring himself unto this Resolve, but suffered as much torment as ever man endured. He was in a hundred minds, either to absent himself, or else to desire Artax|ander that he would excuse him, from being any longer his Solicitor to Telamire; but when he began to compare the miseries which he endured by his service, unto what she should suffer by absence from the fair Telamire, he found it better for him to be still an Agent between Telamire, and Artaxander, then to deprive himself of her sight, whom he loved and adored. Thus, not ceasing to be the Lover of Telamire, hee continued to be the Confident of Artaxander. But to tell you truly, It was with abun|dant of sorrow; and the more, because Telamire having a high esteem of him, did lesse conceal her reall thoughts from him: so as the more he was in love with her, the more he knew she loved his Rivall. One dayes converse did strangely perplex him: for whilst Isalonide took Clorelisa out, upon some visit or other, which shee was obliged unto: and whilst Belermis was gone to visit a man whom he heard had been fighting, Tysimenes remained alone with Telamire: who falling insensibly to talk of the generall error wherein all Themiscyra was, concerning Artaxander and himself, she aggravated the great danger there was, in judging of things according to appearances. For truly, said she, all the Town takes you to be the enemy of Artaxander: Clorelisa her self thinks it; and so doth Algastus and Belermis: Moreover, they bel|gin to think that Artaxander hath forgotten me, and that I have forgotten him. The world also belevees, that it is vertue onely which is Clorelisa's motive to see no body: Isalonide her self doth not doubt it: yet nothing is more false then their opinions in all these things, though they appear to be most true unto all those who belevee them. Therefore, in my opinion, there is no safety in speaking affirmatively of any thing, but what one knows to be of a most infallible certainty. 'Tis very true, replied Tysimenes, that appearances are very deceitfull: And I am so strongly perswaded of this truth (added he and changed colour) as perhaps, I am able to say, that the thing which you think you are most certaine of, is not as you do imagine it. Nay, nay, replied Telamire, I am very confident, that I am not mistaken as others are: and when I think that Artaxander is your friend, and that you are his, I think nothing but truth. Also I am confident, that in thinking Clorelisa to be full both of love, hatred, and jealousy, I think as I ought to do. And in perswading my self that you do much esteem me, I am perswaded of nothing but what you have induced me to belevee, by a thousand sweet expressions, and as many obliging offices which I have received from you. And therefore Tysimenes, though I grant that appearances are very fallacious, yet I am most confident, I am not mistaken, in beleveeing these things I have mentioned unto you. Certainly Madam, replied he, you are not mistaken in thinking, I do much esteem you; but perhaps you are mistaken in imagining that this esteem is so great, or so little as it is. I must needs think, replied shee, that you have a very good opinion of me, and that your Civility will not suffer you to undeceive mee in such a pleasing er|rou: for truly (said she and smiled) when I consider of it with application, I have some reason to fear, that a man who knows so well how to hide his reall thoughts, is not very sincere. And truly, would not any one say, who sees how you carry it, and hears how you talk before people, that you had no affection unto Artax|ander? but they you were still ready to quarrell with him? for my part (said she, and smiled again) I must needs conclude, that if you know how to conceal love as well as friendship, you were very fit for the most mysterious Intelligence. Had I a Passion which I would conceal (replied he) I should conceal it much better then I do the friendship I hold with Artaxander. And yet I have heard say, (answered she) that Love cannot long lie hid. I have heard it said, as well as you Madam, replied he, but I am sufficiently undeceived of that error: for I know a Lover, who is little suspect|ed to be so, and who is thought he never will be. Since you do know it, replied she, his Passion is not so concealed as you say it is. I do know it indeed (said he) but the reason is, because it is impossible I should not know it: yet it is most undoubtedly true, that I onely do know the passion of his soul. She who is the cause of it (replied she) doth not she know of that passion which she her self hath created? She knows it no more then you do (replied he) and which is more strange, this Lover hath Rivalls who dream not that he is theirs. This doth so much surprize me (replied Telamire) and I am so desirous to know who this Lover is, who can so well con|ceal his passion, both from his Mistresse and his Rivalls, that if ever I see Artaxander, Page 31 I will desire him to make you name him, that he may let me know it. Of the two, replied Tysimenes, I had rather tell you then Artaxander who it is: but truly unlesse I be forced Madam, I beseech you give me leave neither to tell it unto you nor him: and I shall not reveal a secret which is the most concealed that ever was. As I am perswaded (replied she) there never was any secret, but will out one time or other: so I belevee, this which you now conceal from me, will one day be the common talk of the Town. I assure you Madam, replied he, if ever it be revealed, it shall be soolner unto your self then any one I know: but to tell you truly, I do not think that day will ever come. Be not too positive (replied she) for all things that are within the compasse of possibility, may happen. For truly, when you and Artaxander went from Themiscyra, there was no likelihood, that ever you should be upon such good termes, and yet I see you are become his friend, and he yours. 'Tis true, said he, the change was great and unexpected: and one cannot make a quicker passe from indiff|erency unto love, then I passed from hatred to the friendship of Artaxander. As for matter of friendship, (said Telamire) I know very well it may grow a long time af|ter one is acquainted with a person: But as for love, I cannot think it can be so: for I belevee that when any one falls in love, it is at the very first sight of the party loved. I should be very sorry Madam, said he unto her, to contradict you in thing: yet truly I cannot agree with you in this: for I must tell you again, that I know a Lover, who was onely a bare friend unto the person with whom he is now in love, a long time be|fore he was so: yet now he is so desperately in love, as hee cannot conceive it possible, that he should then be onely a friend unto her whom he now adores. If this Lover, (replied she, and laughed) have no name, no more then your first you talked of, I will never as long as I live dispute with you again: for truly, I had rather have reasons then examples, when the men whose adventures are alledged, are namelesse unto me. But to tell you truly, it would be hard to make me belevee, that any man who hath long seen a woman, without loving her, should afterwards upon a sudden fall in love with her: And for my particular, I should sooner belevee that a man who never saw me above a quarter of an hour should fall in love with me, then that another, who hath seen me a whole year together with eyes of indifferency, should afterwards be capable of Love. Yet most certainly it is possible, replied he. And it is not more certainly true that I am Tysimenes, then it is, that I know a Lover, who after onely esteem, admiration, and liking of a person whom you know, is now become extremely in love with her. If I were to talk with him you mean (replied she) I should certainly ei|ther make him confesse that his friendship and liking was only a little higher then it was before: or that his affection which is now Love, did begin assoon as he saw her, though perhaps it was then onely a Luke-warme Love, and he hardly knew what it was: but I hold it absolutely impossible that any one should begin to be in love with a woman, two years after he first knew her. Then Madam, said he unto her, It seems that it would be a very difficult matter for a friend who knew you, to perswade you that he is in love, unlesse he tells you, he was so the very first minute he ever looked upon you? 'Tis very true, said she, that he would not easily perswade me; But thanks be to the gods and Clorelisa (said she and laughed) I am not exposed unto that danger, in the solitude wherein I live. But Madam (replied Tysimenes and smiled, though he was much non-plust) one that hears you talk, would think that I have not a heart ca|pable of being moved: and that I have not eyes by which love may enter into my soul: But since it hath hapned a hundred times, that friends have become Rivalls unto their friends, how know you but I shall become so unto Artaxander, or am so alrea|dy? In good earnest (said he to sound her thoughts) I think I should extremely sur|prize you, if in lieu of telling you, according to my custome, that Artaxander is ready to die for the love of you, I should tell you, that I love you more then he doth. 'Tis most true, replied she, you would most terribly affright me. But yet, (said he unto her) what would you answer me, and what would you do, if you should see mee at your feet, protesting with a thousand oaths, that I have done all that ever was in my power, to keep my self from being Artaxanders Rivall? And if I should vow further, that I love you infinitely more then ever he did? First, (said she) I would not belevee you: and secondly, I would carry the matter as if I did belevee you, because I would treat you as a perfiduous friend, a cheat, a man without judgement. For since I have so freely opened my heart unto you concerning Artaxander: you would Page 32 be out of your wits if you should offer to talk so unto me, though it were so that you did love me very much: But (said she) I am unwise to trouble my self in a bu|sinesse, which I hope in the gods will never be. And yet (replied he very coldly) you are fair enough to make an unfaithfull friend, a faithfull Lover: and perhaps I have a heart so sensible, and a soul so tender, that I can neither resist you, nor over come my self. After this, Tysimenes fearing he had been a little too lavish in his tongue, did strive to rouse up some merrinesse into his eyes, purposely to weaken the sence of his words. And indeed, he did it so well, that Telamire did not so much as suspect any reality in the matter, but thought it to be onely a sport of his wit: So that beginning to talk more seriously unto Tysimenes, she talked of Artaxander, charging him to tell him some obliging matter, which she desired he should know: In so much as Tysimenes, as much a lover as he was, yet he did negotiate as the Agent of his Rivall, and promised Telamire to tell him whatsoever she pleased: and indeed as he went from Telamire, he intended to go unto that friends house where he was to meet Artax|ander every night. But for that night, he went another way, thinking it some sweet|nesse to deferre those joyes which Artaxander would have, when hee heard Tela|mires message. And to tell you truly, his soul wavered whether he should bee the friend or the enemy of Artaxander, but still was constant in loving Telamire. But yet his vertue getting the mastery in his mind, he resolved to continue faithfull to his friend; and to hide his love from his Mistresse as well as from his Rivall: After which, he went to acquit himself of his Commission. 'Tis true, hee did it with abundance of pain: he never named Telamire, but his heart trembled: he could not hear so much as the name of his Rivall pronounced, without a chineese of heart. However, since Artaxander could talk of nothing else but Telamire, and since he was that night more earnest then ordinary in talking with Tysimenes, he retained him as long as hee could: for since he had opened the door of his heart onely unto him, it was onely from him he could have any consolation. I beseech you my dear Tysimenes, (said he unto him) sooth me up a little in my Passion, to ease me in my sufferings: Tell me that Telamire is worthy of all those miseries I have endured for her sake; for truly though you bee not in love, yet it is impossible but you should know that I have great reason to love her in that degree I do: for if you have but eyes and any soul, you must needs know and see that she is all admirable. 'Tis true, replied Tysimenes, that Telamire is much accomplished, and if I would contradict your Passion, it should not be for want of merit in her, since none can have more then she hath. Ah Tysimenes, replied Artax|ander, to see the difference betwixt love and friendship: for because you are onely the friend of Telamire, you can content your self to say, that none can have more merit then she hath; but I that am her Lover must needs say, that it is impossible to finde any who hath so much. If we never differ in any thing but that, replied Tysimenes, we shall always agree, since I confesse as well as you, that Telamire is incomparable, and that I never knew any so Lovely as she is. Did I know you were in love, replied Artaxander, I should take good heed of obliging you unto any such high applaud of Telamire; and should so much respect our friendship and your love, and not to wish you should preferre the person whom I love, before her whom you adore: but since I know you are onely in love with honour, and your friend, I conceive, I may well move you to do justice unto the merits of Telamire, by acknowledging you never knew her equall. But also I am forced to confesse, that I am as miserable as shee is fair, especially of late: for me thinks you have not spoke unto me from her as you were wont: And I see something in your mind, which makes me fear, you have some thoughts in her which are not advantageous to mee. Tysimenes, hearing Artaxander speak thus, was afraid that he had discovered his weaknesse. So as recollecting all his strength of vertue. he forced his tongue to tell his Rivall, that he was mistaken, and that he was never in his life upon better termes with Telamire, then at this time. But he had no sooner pronounced these words, then he was angry with himself, and found such a disorder in his heart, that his eyes had betrayed him if he had stayed any longer with Artaxander: and so he left him as soon as ever he could. In the mean time, Belermis beginning to perceiver that Clorelisa was not so zealous for his marriage with Telamire, as she was wont; he looked more narrowly unto Telamire: and growing jealous of the long conversation which Tysimenes held with her, he quar|relled with him; and if their Friends, indifferent unto both had not prevented them, Page 33 some misfortune had hapned between them. Clorelisa seeing how squares went but not seeing the thoughts of Tysimenes unto Telamire, shee resolved to de|st|roy her self of so much satisfaction in marrying her unto Artaxanders enemy, but contented her self, by taking her from him, in marrying her unto her brother. Then did shee begin to use all the power shee had with Algastus, to favour the designs of Belermis; and indeed she wrought so much upon him, as absolutely to command Telamire, to prepare her self for being wife unto Belermis within eight dayes. On the other side, Clorelisa desired Tysimenes, that since he himself pretended nothing unto Telamire, that he would perswade her to obey her father: In the mean time, Telamire after she had seen Algastus and Tysimenes, she was a most sad soul: and the more, because what desires soever she had to disobey Algastus, yet she had not power. Again, she told Tysimenes, that she would not have Artaxander fight with Belermi upon any termes, but declared, that if he made any hurly burly for the love of her, she would never see him again: So that when Artaxander knew this, he was extremely sorry for it. Tysimenes also was exceeding full of grief, yet not so full as Artaxander, though hee was no lesse in love then he, yet was a very faithfull Agent in the businesse: for since he had nothing but bad news alwayes to tell Artaxander, he told it him without any trouble, though yet he was his friend. 'Tis true, when Artaxander gave him in Commission to perswade Telamire unto disobedience of Algastus, he did not imploy all the eloquence he had. But doubtlesse hee spake more earnestly, and much more <...> uly, when he negotiated to comfort Artaxander for the lesse of Telamire, then when he undertook to perswade Telamire to bestow her upon Artaxander. But Telamire did insist so much upon Points of Glory, that she would never do any thing for which she might be condemned. On the other side, it was a harsh adventure for her to think shee should never see Artaxander again, that she should be wife unto Belermis, Belermis Clorelisa's brother. She was not able to refrain from tears when she talked with Tysimenes; and alas, these tears went to his very heart; but he made a secret of them unto Artaxander, and told him onely that she was sad, or so, but never told him that she wept. In the mean time Artaxander out of the violence of his Passion, told Tysimenes, that of two things, he must needs do one: either he must fight with Belermis, mauger Telamires charge to the contrary; or else he must carry Telamire away: Conjuring him to assist him in one, or both these things, so that Tysimenes being put to notable quandaries, he told Artaxander, that hee would advise him never to think of carrying Telamire away; giving him such Reasons to the contrary, that if the mind of Artaxander had been settled, he might have seen that Tysimenes took more interest in Telamire then he ought: for Tysimenes himself perceived he spake over zealously. But after he had dissuaded him from carrying away Telamire, and that Artaxander had repented of such thoughts, he offered him in point of honour, to be his second against Belermis, who never went without his friend. But as they were ready to fixe upon this Resolution, one of Tysimenes servants entred, and gave his Master a Letter, which he said one of Telamires women gave unto him with tears in her eyes. Do you not know said Tysimenes why shee cried? All I know, said he, is, that Algastus, Clorelisa, Isalonide, Telamire, and Belermis went out of Themiscyra presently after the Sunne was set: and I saw Telamire go into Clorelisa's Coach, with so much sorrow in her countenance, that I beleieve, the journey doth not please her. Ah Tysimenes (said Artaxander) I fear this journey which begins in the night, will prove fatal unto me: After this, reading the Letter which he took from Tysimenes, he found these words.

TELAMIRE UNTO TYSIMENES

Though Sir, I have but one minute to stay in Themiscyra, yet, go I must, and <◇> know when I shall return: All I know of my journey is, that my father told <◇> that hee would carry me into the Countrey, to the end my marriage with Belermis might make lesse noise. I pray impart this cruell newes unto Artaxander, in such a manner <◇> may make him the least sad. Assure him, I will resist as farre as handsomly I can, and prepare him for a misery, in case I cannot hinder it. Adieu, I have more sorrow <◇> my soul that I would have him know of: but how great soever it be, yet I do freely consent he should complain against my weaknesse, if my affection do yeeld unto what decency requires, so he complain in secret. Let me tell you once again: that my melancholy <◇> without any equall, unlesse the joyes of Clorelisa: which appears as visible in her eyes, <◇> despair doth in the eyes of Telamire.

You may easily imagine, amiable Doralisa, how sad Artaxander was, after the reading of this Letter: yet he was more sad, when upon enquiry, of the place whither Algastus was gone unto, he understood that it was unto a Castle which belonged unto Isalonide, against which nothing could be attempted, neither to release Telamire, nor against Belermis, for it was extraordinary strong: Also, as for Belermis, though he knew how to find out a way, to send him a challenge, yet he would answer, that he would fight, after he had married Telamire. Yet Artaxander resolved to do whatsoever he could, to twit him with point of honour, though he did not hap to make him alter his purpose: so as going out of Themiscyra, with one Page onely, because he would not engage Tysimenes in a businesse wherein he had no interest, he took his way towards this Castle, in a most melancholy mood. For when he thought, that perhaps before he came there, Belermis would enjoy Telamire, his resentment was beyond all imagination: he told me since, that he was not master of his own mind and but for his Page, he had lost his way a hundred times, so troubled was his soul. As he was in this turbulency of spirit, he spied afarre off two Coaches coming towards him, which came a very slow pace, and he thought he knew the Page of Belermis, who rode on horseback some thirty paces before: so as commanding his own Page, to go and ask unto whom those Coaches belonged, he understood, that Algastus going <◇> the night to avoid the heat of the day, the Coach wherein he was did overture, so as he was very dangerously hurt in the head; and that Algastus would not continue his journey, but would return unto Themiscyra, after he had rested a little, at the Town next the place where this accident hapned. So that Artaxander understanding this, he took the way upon his right hand, that he might not passe too neer the Coach: yet he went not so farre off, but he saw Telamire, and she him: But since she was then in as sad a condition to see her father in that case, as she was in parting from Themiscyra, she onely made a signe with her head, unperceived by Clorelisa, because she was turned the other way, to talk unto Belermis. But not to trouble you with any imper|tinencies, Algastus was carried home to his house, and got into bed: Chirurgi <...> were sent for; and they found his hurt to be very dangerous, so that when Artax|ander came back to Themiscyra, every one beleevved Algastus would die. Artaxander then considering the state of things, did not think it good to hazard the incensing <◇> Page 35 Telamire by fighting with Belermis: but contented himself with desiring Tysimenes to see Telamire: And the strangest thing was, Tysimenes was most sensibly grieved at the disaster of Algastus. As for Clorelisa, she was incapable of any comfort: but I am very confident, that it was more, because the death of Algastus would take away her power over Telamire, then out of any tendernesse of affection unto him. However, Isalonide, and Clorelisa were all in tears about Algastus, and never did husband think himself more tenderly loved by a wife, then he by his, though she wept more out of jealousy and spite, then any real sorrow for her losse. As for Telamire, she was of another mind: for she lamented with all the real sorrow of a daughter for a father in such a condition, so that she stood in need of consolation. In the mean time, Algastus after four dayes was at his last gasp: and that which is very observable was, that Clorelisa had so much power of him, as to make him give his whole estate unto her, if she had thought upon it: yet it was the very least of her thoughts: but still shee conjured him with eyes full of tears, (as if out of meer tendernesse) that hee would absolutely command Telamire to marry Belermis, to the end that both Lovers might be united. But whether it was that the tears of Clorelisa did trouble Algastus, or that this desire did mollifie his heart, he seemed to be astonished; and when he offered to speak, he could not: so as he lost his knowledge, and died; leaving it unknown whether he consented, or denied the demands of Clorelisa. So by this means Clorelisa was out of any power over Telamire, and Telamire was absolutely free: Artaxander had ground of hopes; and Tysimenes was in such a maze, as he knew not what to think: yet still he continued Generous. But since it was not possible he should long continue the Agent of Artaxander, and the Lover of Telamire both; he told his friend, that now there was no need of deluding Clorelisa any longer, and therefore he desired him not to imploy him in visiting Telamire any longer, pretending the aversion which he said he had unto Belermis, and Clorelisa. However, hee took upon him to carry a Complement from Artaxander unto Telamire, upon the death of her father. But Telamire being too wise to make any sudden alteration in her way of living, she would not admit of his visit. 'Tis true, this constraint of hers did not continue long: for having intelligence that Clorelisa did intend to carry her away for her brother, she secretly assembled all her kindred, who came altogether immediately, and demanded her of Clorelisa, who mourned much more to see Telamire carried out of her power, then she did to see Algastus carried to his grave: And that high reputation of vertue which she had gotten by the solitude and reservednesse which her jealousy had caused, began to lessen; for she behaved her self so, as she made is evidently appear, that she grieved not for the death of Algastus. The truth is, her sorrows that she could not now be revenged upon Artaxander, did so disorder all the faculties of her soul, as it was most visible unto all that looked upon her, that shee had a most violent Passion reigning in her soul. Shee was not able to pronounce the Name of Telamire, but she changed colour: She complained, and could not tell why: The very name of Artaxander made her mad; but the name of Algastus was pronounced a hundred times, and shee made not the least startle at it: So as all the Town began to be undeceived in their opinions of Clorelisas great vertue: Yet Isalonide said, that the excesse of her grief for the death of Algastus had a little distracted her: but this excuse deluded onely the simple. On the other side, Amaldea wishing the marriage of Artaxander with Telamire, after the death of Algastus, as shee did in the life of Cleossante, shee negotiated the business so well, with the kindred of that excellent Lady, as she concluded the matter in few days. But since they feared that Belermis would be some obstacle, they did carry it very secretly. In the mean time, since the reconciliation of Tysimenes and Artaxander was known, Amaldea desired this friend of her sonnes, not to forsake him untill he had married Telamire, lest Belermis should oblige him to fight the second time, acquainting him to what a passe she had brought the business, and let him know that the marriage would be celebrated very shortly. And indeed, Amaldea acquainting Artaxander what she had done for him; and the friends of Telamire having told her what was resolved upon, they both of them did think themselves as happy now, as they were [Page 36 miserable before: but Tysimenes was the saddest man that ever lived. Not but that he did strive against himself with admirable generosity: But yet the Passion in his soul was so strong, that he was not able to overcome it. As soon as Artaxander knew of his happiness, he went to tell it unto Tysimenes: but hee was much surprized to finde him so melancholy; and more surprized to finde that hee would not tell him the cause of his sadness, as he had told him the cause of his Joyes: Yet Tysimenes coloured his sorrows with some Domestique business, which he said, did not go so well as he wished: so that since the soul of Artaxander was all joy, he never examined the sadness of Tysimenes any further. However, it was so extreme, that as soon as his friend was gone he thought he should have died: and he was so neer it, that (as he confessed since) that he resolved upon twenty violent courses in a quarter of an hour. Is it so (said he to himself, as he related afterwards) that Telamire is going to be married unto Artaxander, and he ready to be as happy as thou Tysimenes art ready to be miserable? And yet it is thy self who hath contributed unto his happiness, and it is thy self who canst not see it without sorrow. But thanks be unto the gods (added hee, and sighed) that I can hope for nothing from Telamire, for in spite of all my vertue, if I had any hopes from her, I should have much more ado to overcome my self. But I have not so much Consolation, as that I can complain, either against my Mistress, or my Rivall: And I can onely lay the blame upon my own weakness. Yet though Artaxander be my friend; and though I am resolved to carry my self as if I were not his Rivall: I am not able to be a spectator of his felicity: And when I consider that within four days hee shall enjoy Telamire, I finde such a turbulency in my heart, that if I should see him happy, I should hazard the doing of things which would be farre from either Reason or Vertue. Let then Artaxander alone in Peace, Tysimenes, since thou canst never be so thy self: But in order to that, thou must never see Telamire: Thou must quit thy Countrey: banish thy self from that place where thou wilt leave Artaxander happy: and seek out thy death in some Desart, where thou canst never hear of their felicity, who have caused thy misery. And the truth is, Tysimenes was so fully resolved, to depart from Themiscyra, and never to see either Telamire, and Artaxander any more, as nothing could stagger this Generous determination: hee seemed therefore as if hee had some earnest business which called him away: And without unfolding the cause of his journey, hee told Artaxander, that he would depart the day before his Nuptials, of which Clorelisa, and Belermis were ignorant. At the first, Artaxander used all his perswasions to make Tysimenes stay untill after he had compleated his happiness: and he perswaded him in such sweet expressions, and tender words, as Tysimenes was so ashamed, that his resolution of going away was the stronger, since hee was not able to see Artaxander enjoy Telamire, without envy at his happiness, and grief to himself. However, since hee could not depart before hee had seen Telamire, hee resolved upon a visit: but it may be very well said, hee went to see her, but speak he hardly was able: and had not some company been there, which helped out with discourse, he had been put to a pitifull Non-plus. But at last he left her, and bid her Adieu, without telling her whither he went, nor why he departed. At his going out from her, he went unto Artaxander, with whom he was not able to stay above a quarter of an hour, so violent were the raptures of his grief, which his passion caused. Artaxander used all his Arguments to make him stay onely two days: for since he was ignorant of the cause, hee could not chuse but presse him to be a witness of his happiness. But at last, seeing hee would not be perswaded, and thinking that the business he pretended was some secret of the Family, which was not to be imparted, he pressed him no further: but bad him Adieu, with a thousand expressions of friendship: Telling him, that he was much beholding unto him for Telamire, and that he would acknowledge his obligements for it eternally. But Amiable Doralisa, after that Tysimenes had left Artaxander, and returned home, hee thought himself more miserable then before: For he found Telamire so early fair, and Artaxander so full of tender expressions, that Love and Friendship beginning to renew in his soul, his suffering Page 37 were beyond all expression, or toleration. Yet he stood firme unto his resolution: But since love is a Passion which naturally would make it self known, he could not resolve upon his departure before he had made known unto her who caused his misery, what course he took against himself, purposely to keep him from any attempts against Artaxander. So as being resolved to write unto her, he did so: and when he was just ready to depart, he gave it unto a trusty servant, with orders to carry it unto Telamire, an hour after his departure, and to chuse such a time, as when Artaxander was not with her. After which, taking horse, he departed without any with him but one Page onely, and went to a friends house some thirty Furlongs off, to consult what course he should take, and whither he should wander, to make choise of his exile. In the mean time, he with whom he left the Letter which he writ unto Telamire, having punctually obeyed him, and given it unto her, she was extremely amazed to finde it such as I shall afterwards read unto you: for since she afterwards gave me a Copy, I think it is about me.

In saying so, she looked for this Copy and found it, so she shewed it unto Doralisa, and Martesia: But before she read it, she told them that Telamire after she had read it with much wonder, and being in doubt whether shee should shew it unto Artaxander or no, she put it in her pocket, because she saw him enter: and a while after, forgetting she had a Letter which she would not have him to see, she unknowingly dropt it, and he took it up whilst she went to talk with one in the outer Chamber, who desired to speak with her: so that knowing it, to be the hand of Tysimenes, and not being able to forbear opening it, he read these words:

TYSIMENES UNTO TELAMIRE.

Madam,

I Make no question but you will wonder, that a man who hath so long spoke unto you of Artaxanders love, and hath been so faithfull a Confident of his passion, should dare to tell you, that he is his Rivall: yet at the same time tell you that Artaxander loves you as well as any heart can. In the mean time, it is most true Madam, that I began to love and adore you within a few days after I began to tell you that Artaxander did the same: and as certainly true that I love you now with as much violence, as ever heart did. Yet you know Madam, that I have done for Artaxander all that I promised unto him: and that in all my discourses with you, I betrayed onely my self. Yet do not think that I vanquished my self without abundance of pain: but in recompence of my respective passion, I Conjure you to do me so much favour, as beleeve, Page 38 that I never spake one Syllable in advantage of Artaxander, but it struck more sorrow to my heart then my tongue is able to expresse. But whatsoever I have done for him against my self, I shall be very glad that he never know his obligements to me: and that you may be the onely Person in the world who shall know my weakness and misfortune. Were I to see you ever again, perhaps you would be offended at what I say: but since I do not declare, that I love you untill the very day before you are to marry Artaxander, and that then I depart from Themiscyra, with resolution never to return again, you would be pitilesse Madam, if you should be offended at me for not denying my self so much consolation, as to think when I am dying, that its fit you should know the cause of my death; and to think, that haply you will confesse, that except Artaxander, there is not a man in the world who deserves your affection better then my self, if Fate had either not made him your lover, or made me his enemy. Moreover Madam, since I require no answer, because I cannot in any reason expect it to be favourable; give me leave to Conjure you unto a memory of all I have spoken in behalf of Artaxander: and to beseech you, that you would beleeve, that if I had spoken my heart, I should have spoken much more for my self then for him. Again, I am forced to confesse, because it is most certainly true, that friendship, vertue, and glory, were not the onely motives which induced me to be faithfull unto Artaxander: And that had I known how to have thwarted his happiness, and not yours, I should hardly have kept my selfe within the limits of Generosity.

Thus Madam, since I for the love of you, fight against my self, me thinks, I merit your compassion upon a most miserable Lover: who is going to find an end of his miseries in the end of his life: and since he will not disturb the felicity of his Rivall, contents himself to make the cause of his death known, only unto her who gave it unto Tysimenes.

You may imagine, Amiable Doralisa, how extremely Artaxander was surprized at the reading of this Letter from Tysimenes: And since hee really loved him, he was infinitely sorry, that he was in love with Telamire, but yet he resented it, without any jealousy, hatred, or anger. 'Tis true, he was so astonished at what he saw, that scarcely beleeving himself, he began to read the Letter again, as if he would be better satisfied: So as Telamire entring before he ended, she was almost as much surprized that she should finde him reading it, as she was Page 39 at what the Letter contained: also she changed colour: for since shee had concealed it from Artaxander, she knew not how he might take it. Sir, said shee unto him, I intended to hide that Letter from you, lest you should blame mee for the losse of a friend, who certainly was owner of a thousand admirable parts: but I see my Intentions are prevented, since you have found it. Your Intentions Madam, replied Artaxander, had been most just, if they were onely to spare me my sorrows for my being the cause of my friends misfortune. And it cannot be imagined I should ever complain against you, for it were most unjust to think you lesse Amiable then you are. So Madam, I do not accuse you, nor Tysimenes, but think my self more obliged unto him for being my Rivall, then for being my Friend. But the truth is, I extremely condemne my self, for obliging Tysimenes to visit you so often; and for doing so much wrong unto your merit, as to think it possible, he should see you so oft, and not love you. I must to my shame confesse, that Tysimenes is more Generous then I could have been: for my Passion is so strong, that had I been his Rivall upon the same termes as hee was mine. I should certainly have been his enemy, and should have spoken more for my self then him. Therefore Madam, in acknowledgement of his vertue, I ask your leave to pity him, and that you would perswade him to live. Moreover, I ask you pardon for his boldnesse in discovering his Passion unto you, and begge your amity for him, with as much zeal, as heretofore he begged your affection for me. And, I beseech you Madam, Let my Negotiation be as prosperous as his: and I ask lesse for Tysimenes, then he did for Artaxander, do not deny mee Madam, I conjure you: and let me preserve my friend, though Rivall, from being the most miserable of all Lovers. Your Demands are so just, and easie to be consented unto, replied she, that you may be sure I shall not deny them: Yet I do consent unto you upon condition, that you will not invite Tysimenes to see me, untill he be fully cured of his folly. If I may judge of his Passion by my own, replied Artaxander, I should think you will never see him again: for truly I cannot think it possible he should cease loving: especially Tysimenes, who hath a passionate soul, and knows no medium in his love, or hatred.

As Artaxander was saying so, an Aunt of Telamires, with whom shee then lived, came into her Chamber, to tell her, that Clorelisa, and Belermis, had discovered their intentions of marriage, and made such a noise about it, that she thought it expedient to deferre it for a while, to let all the world see, that Clorelisa lied, in giving it out, that Algastus charged Telamire not to marry Artaxander, since it is most certainly true, he had never forbidden him to see her, but onely at the instance of Clorelisa, who told her husband, that Artaxander was in love with her. At first, Artaxander did extremely dislike this Proposition: But Telamires Aunt, telling him that the whole Family did conclude it to be so, and that Telamire was of the same opinion, he consented that his happiness should be deferred onely for eight days. As soon as hee came home, he diligently enquired where Tysimenes was, and understood that he was not above thirty furlongs from Themiscyra, but that he went away from thence by break of day. So that without more delay, though it was almost night, he took horse, and went to the place where Tysimenes was, whom he found alone in his Chamber, condoling his misfortunes: he was so intent upon his sorrows, that Artaxander was within a pace of him before he either saw or heard him, but when he turned himself, lifting up his eyes to heaven, as if he would accuse it of his misfortunes, that when he saw Artaxander he was so surprized, that he went a step or two backward, to look better upon him, and to see whether or no he was mistaken: But Artaxander advancing faster then he recoyled, he embraced him, and sighed for company. I come, my Dear Tysimenes, (said he unto him) to beg your pardon for being the cause of your exile: I come to hinder you from banishing your self: and to assure you that Telamire after she had read your Letter, did give greater commendations unto your Generosity, then unto my constancy; and that if she do love me more then she doth you, yet she esteems you more then she doth me. If Telamire had really esteemed me (replied Tysimenes much surprized) she would never have denied me the favour which I asked, to conceal my weakness from you: Page 40 but I perceive she has a mind to be revenged upon me for my boldnesse, by making me lose a friend: and by depriving me of so much Consolation, as to think that you should never know my infidelity. For truly Artaxander, I fancied some sweetness in my misery, in carrying it so, that Telamire might know of my love, and that you should never hear of it, lest you should withdraw your friendship from me: but since she is pleased to cross this my desire, I must resolve to be hated both by my Mistressse and my Rivall. Ah Dear Tysimenes (replied Artaxander) if I hated you, I should never have told you that Telamire does esteem you. If you do not hate me, replied Tysimenes, it is because you know Telamire will never love me; and though I am your Rivall, yet you value it not, because you know I cannot hurt you any more then if I were not. But however it be, you have done more then you ought, and I should not do what I ought, if I do not speedily depart from a place in which I cannot stay without envie at your haplinesse. For if I should, how is it possible I should preserve both my love to Telamire, and my friendship to Artaxander? for I professe, I have striven as much to keep in one as the other: And to conceal nothing from you, know Artaxander, that I find in my self such strange suggestions, and tumultuous imaginations in my heart, as I will not promise but I may become your enemy, if I once see you the possessor of Telamire. But since I am yet as I ought to be unto you, I conjure you to be a little indulgent towards me; and by prosecuting my intentions of never returning unto Themiscyra, let me strive against the affection which I bear unto her who is going to make you happy: for truly my Dear Artaxander, if I may yet call you so, a Rivall that is absent, and not loved, is not to be feared: and by consenting unto this, you will give me so much satisfaction as to love Telamire without any wrong unto you. I will consent Sir, unto much more then you ask, replied Artaxander: for I consent that you shall see her, and love her: And I know the vertue of Telamire so well, that I am able to continue your friend, though you should continue to love her. No, no, replied Tysimenes, I will not accept your offer, because I dare not trust my self; nor think I am able to see you completely happy, but I must either die, or cease being your friend: And therefore to preserve my love unto Telamire, and my friendship to you, I must prosecute my designe, and banish my self for ever.

I should never make an end, if I should relate the whole businesse of these two friendly Rivals: for they talked together a whole night. But as they were striving to perswade each other, one came in, and told Tysimenes aloud, that a man, who would not impart his name, desired to speak with Artaxander: So as imagining that it might perhaps be one from Belermis, he was commanded to be brought in: and he no sooner entred, but he was indeed known to be the friend of Belermis: so as Artaxander imagining his businesse, went towards him to give him the better opportunity of speaking out of the hearing of Tysimenes, but Tysimenes following, and the friend of Belermis (who was one of those Bravadoes by profession, who spent their whole lives in Quarrels, Duels, and Punctilioes of honour) seeing that he could not speak unto Artaxander but in the hearing of Tysimenes, resolved rather then fail in his friends satisfaction, to engage him as well as Artaxander in the businesse. And therefore without more ado, he told Artaxander, that he knew him to be a man so well able to chuse his friends, as he would dare to tell him in the presence of Tysimenes, that Belermis knowing that he was gone out of the Town, came out also, and waited for him within a hundred paces of this house, in hopes to see him with a sword in his hand to dispute with him for the possession of Telamire: Adding, that if Tysimenes would be more then a bare spectatour of the Combat, he would fight with him. You may well conceive, that Artaxander was very ready to give all desired satisfaction unto Belermis: and that Tysimenes, who wished for death, would not fear a danger. But Artaxander was very much against Tysimenes his fighting: yet when he heard him say, that he would fight with Belermis, if he would not let him follow his fortune, out of a point of honour he consented; and so they went to the place where Belermis was. I will not insist upon any relation of their thoughts, for they are easie to be imagined: nor will I describe the Combat, the Page 41 successe whereof was very fatal: for Tysimenes kill'd the friend of Belermis: but it was after himself was mortally wounded. Yet Tysimenes had so much strength, after he had vanquished his Antagonist, to go towards his friend, who after he had wounded Belermis, had the misfortune to break his sword: so as Belermis making a Passe upon him, was ready to kill him: when Tysimenes, as wounded as he was, came neerer and cried out. It was not generous to kill a man who had no weapon. Belermis turning his head aside, and seeing him come with a sword in his hand, and seeing the sword of Artaxander broken, he was ashamed of his action, and confessed that he was very sorry, and that he did not see his sword to be broken. Thus Tysimenes saved the life of his Friend and Rivall: for though Artaxander was not wounded, but Belermis was, yet since he had the misfortune to break his sword, Belermis had certainly killed him, but for Tysimenes. But afterwards company came in: Belermis retired, and the body of him whom Tysimenes killed was carried away. Tysimenes was so weak that he fell; and they were forced to carry him back unto Themiscyra in a most lamentable condition, since there was no place neerer where he could be dressed. I beseech you, Amiable Doralisa, dispense with me from relating all the expressions from Tysimenes to Artaxander, and from Artaxander unto Tysimenes, for if I should offer it, I should drown all my words in tears: And to save you the sorrow of hearing it, I will onely in short tell you, That Tysimenes lived but five dayes after: that whilst he lived he talked of nothing but Telamire: that Artaxander was sadly with him all the while: that Telamire was very sensible of this sad accident: and that the very day designed for Artaxanders marriage, was the funeral of Tysimenes. But that solemnity was deferred: and for some dayes, the whole discourse of Artaxander and Telamire was onely of Tysimenes. In the mean time, Artaxander taking it to heart, that he had not vanquished Belermis: and since he thought he was obliged in point of honour to revenge the death of Tysimenes his friend, as well as to fight for love of Telamire; therefore he resolved to fight with Belermis again, as soon as he was cured of his wounds. But in this second Combat: which was one to one, he had the advantage cleerly: for he wounded Belermis in two places, and disarmed him: In so much as Clorelisa was even mad to see that nothing could hinder the happinesse of Artaxander. Yet shee found out a device to deferre it: for she divulged such reports about the Town, that never was such a clamour against Telamire, not onely that she should marry Artaxander, but that she should think of marrying him whilst she was in mourning, and before her father was well cold in his grave. In so much as Telamire, being strangely moved at those clamorous reports, how false soever, did take a fancy not to marry till her time of mourning was over: So that to passe away that time more safely, which was not to be very long, the two families joyned: And since the Aunt of Telamire had a house very near unto Amaldeas, it was concluded that all this company should come thither: so as for this moneth, wee have been alwayes together, some times at one house, and some times at another. But since the time of Telamires mourning ended yesterday, doubtlesse she will be married unto Artaxander as soon as this flux of waters will give us leave to return: And that which will the more hasten the consummation of it is, wee have received Intelligence, that Belermis was cured of his wounds, and that Clorelisa is more incensed then ever against Artaxander and Telamire.

As Erenice had ended her relation, and Doralisa began to thank her for the delight she had in hearing it, Amaldea entred, and told Erenice, that the body of Belermis was found upon the banks of the River: and that his Page (whose horse had saved him, by swimming) told her, that his Master being come out of Themiscyra with intentions to hinder the marriage of Artaxander, had been at Amaldea's house; where hearing, that she was on the other side of the River; and that Artaxander was there also, he would needs crosse it, maugre its overflowing, and strive to get unto the end of the bridge, out of his fears lest Telamire should be married before he could come to her; who told her also, that parting from his horse, he was drowned. Though Belermis was no friend unto any of those Ladies Page 42 who were with Amaldea: but on the contrary, was an inveterate enemy of Artaxanders, which was both kinsman and friend unto them all; yet this accident did strike some sadness into all the Company. As for Artaxander, as much an enemy as he was, he took care for his funeral, which were as well performed, as if he had died in the time when he was Clorelisa's friend. However, since this Accident was it which brought Cyrus and Mandana to the knowledge of Artaxanders Adventure: And seeing that the floods would not permit them to depart these four or five dayes, Cyrus and Mandana desired Telamires Aunt, and Artaxanders Mother to consent unto the marriage of these two Lovers, and that it might be consummated in their presence: And they having no power to deny the request, both Cyrus and Mandana did honour the Feast with their presence, which though in hast, yet was very Magnificent, both becoming the persons present, and those for whom it was principally made. 'Tis very true, there was more men at the Balls then Ladies: but those few there were so Amiable, that the shew was glorious. And though there was no other Ornaments but Mandana and Cyrus, the sight was worthy Admiration: especially when they danced together; since it was a thing most impossible to see two persons of a finer composition, or that danced better, and with a more noble Air. Mandana dazzled the eyes of all beholders: There appeared a most extraordinary blithenesse in the countenance of Cyrus: and one would have believed, that he had received some high newes, which had given him some ravishing satisfaction. But the next mornings newes did most surprize the world: for the common vogue was, that the King of Assyria was dead of his wounds: and Cyrus himself said, he beleaved it: So as all those whom his death made melancholy, or merry, were either in tears of sorrow, or tears of joy, according to their severall Interests. Anaxaris grieved: Mazares was all compassion: Mandana had some pity: Chrisantes, Martesia, and Feraulas were all glad of it: And every one now did look upon Cyrus as at the end of all his miseries, since he now had not one Rivall which he had not vanquished, or which was in the least respect to be feared: as for Anaxaris, the resentment of his passionate soul were beyond all expressions, when he saw that nothing was likely to thwart his Rivals happinesse. For considering the condition in which the King of Pontus was said to go in from the Tombe of Menestus, he had not the least shadow of any hopes that he could be any obstacle unto the felicity of his Rivall. However, hee could not endure the very thoughts of it: and though he knew well enough the injustice of his thoughts, yet he was not able to regulate them, but he still was desiring what he ought not to desire. But after he had concluded, that nothing could either make him happy, or Cyrus miserable: May I not hope (said he unto himself) that the gods who have ruined all the Rivals of Cyrus, or changed their hearts, will either ruine or change mee as they have all the rest? Yes ye just gods (pursued he) you will either give me the Fate of the Assyrian King, or else the Fate of Mazares: Doubtlesse ere long, I shall either be in my grave, as the first: or else, become as vertuous as the second. But truly, in the choice of these two, I had rather have the King of Assyria's Destiny then that of Mazares: and I had much rather die the Lover of Mandana, then live without her Love. But whilst Anaxaris was reasoning in this manner upon the King of Assyria's death, and upon his own Passion, one came to tell him that Cyrus asked for him: so as feeling some extraordinary turbulence in his soul, he had much ado to obey him: but at last, striving extremely with himself, he went unto his Chamber, into which he was no sooner entred, but Cyrus carrying him into a Closet, which was within his Chamber, he spoke unto him with abundance of Confidence, and Tendernesse.

You know, my Dear Anaxaris (said he unto him) that I have already trusted you with my honour, and all that can make me live with felicity, or die with Consolation: And to testifie that I have not altered my opinion of you, I will reveal a secret unto you, which I will never impart unto any but you onely: and which Feraulas himself, that Dear Confident of my Passion, shall never know <◇> for since he is in love with Martesia, I will not let him know, that the King of Assyria is alive. Is the King of Assyria alive? (replied Anaxaris and wondred) Page 43 Yes replied Cyrus, and when you heard it reported that hee was very ill of his wounds, and thought him dead, then did he mend, or was perfectly recovered: for since I intended to keep my word and fight with him, before we come to Ecbaitan, I thought it most expedient to let this lie passe for a truth: for I observed, that as long as that Prince was well, all my friends were so watchfull over me, that it was impossible for me to give satisfaction unto my enemy: so as to be revenged upon him for all those miseries which he hath caused the Princesse and me to endure, I thought it best to deceive the world, and publish the King of Assyria's death, to the end I might turn my fable into a history, and fight him, without fear of being hindred. The King of Assyria himself desires it; so as when hee sent me word, that within this three dayes he would be within fifty furlongs of this place, neer unto an old ruined Castle, which he very precisely marked unto me, I caused it to be published that he was dead. And I see all the world is so fully perswaded of it, that two reasons induced me to discover my designe unto you: though one of them is now invalid: for indeed I thought I should have stood in need of your help to deisingage me from so many eyes as were over me, by a device which I had imagined. But now, I shall onely stand in need of your help to hinder my Rivall from getting Mandana into his power, if I should chance to fall in the Combate with him: for though I made him a promise to fight with him before I enjoyed her, yet I never promised him to render her into his power. And therefore my Dear Anaxaris, I conjure you, that if I be overcome, to shew this Order (which I have writ with my own hand, and which I will leave in yours) unto all the Princes, and all the Commanders in the Army: to the end, that when they shall see, that I have put into the hands of Mandana, all the Authority which I received from Ciaxares, they may the more readily obey her, and oppose the King of Assyria: for truly there is cause of fear, that so many new subdued Princes, will be ready to joyn with the King of Assyria, to get out of servitude, unlesse prevented by your fidelity. I know very well your rare valour hath got you much credit in the opinion of the Souldiers. I know the Princesse would be glad you should be the second time her deliverer. I know your fidelity cannot be suspected: and you have heretofore promised me, rather to die, then leave Mandana in the King of Assyria's power. I did promise it Sir, answered Anaxaris, and I promise it again, assuring that I am inclinable unto nothing more then to oppose his designe. Cyrus being extremely satisfied, to see with what zeal Anax[ar]is answered his desires, did expresse himself in most obliging Language: and afterwards gave him severall Orders, both what he should say unto the Princesse Mandana, and what he should do to keep her safe, in case he were overcome. Not but that I hope very confidently, my Dear Anaxaris, that all these Orders are to no purpose, and that I shall conquer the King of Assyria: But my affection unto Mandana is so violent, and my hatred of my Rivall so great, that I am re[solv]ed to fight him to his grave, and therefore I ought not to forget any thing which may conduce unto the safety of my Princesse. And therefore once more, I conjure you, to make sure of all your companions: to prepare the spirits of all your friends: and to flatter the Souldiers as much as you can. Cyrus added unto all these one considerable piece of Prudence: for he put into the hands of Anax[ar]is more money then he needed, to appease all manner of mutinies amongst the Souldiers: so that neglecting nothing which might prevent the King of Assyria from having Mandana in his power, he spent his three dayes before the Combate in continuall cares: yet they were cares as appeared unto none but Anaxaris: and Cyrus was such a perfect Master of his own mind, that whether hee talked unto Martesia, Doralisa, Mandana, or any of those Ladies which the River stayed in that place: there did not appear any signe, either in his eyes or discourse, that any thing troubled the calmnesse of his soul. On the contrary, since the River began to confine it self within its owne limits: and since it was likely that within a few dayes, the Bridge in the place might be passed over, and since nothing hindred their journey but this inundation of waters, they would all remove presently from that place. On the other side, Anaxaris seemed to be very busie: but since Cyrus knew the cause of it, he was so farre from being disquieted, that hee was Page 44 extremely glad, he had found out a protectour of Mandana, so diligent, so zealous, and so faithfull. In the mean time, since Cyrus had intelligence every day from the King of Assyria, he understood that he was not farre from the place where they were to fight, which was to be the next morning: so that renewing all his Orders, and all his Prayers unto Anaxaris; also Anaxaris confirming all his Promises, Cyrus took thought for nothing, but how to steal away in the night, a little before day; to the end his fight might be finished before he could be mis[s]ed: yet he went late in the Evening to Mandana's, where the Conversation was very pleasant. Yet sometimes, when Cyrus thought, that perhaps, the next day before this time, the King of Assyria should see the Princesse and not himself, he was extremely sad, though not outwardly: But sometimes again, when hee thought, that perhaps, the day following he should be the Conquerour of his Rivall, and so return unto his Princesse, he was extremely pleasant. So leaving her with that agreeable hope, he returned home, and trusting none but Ortaques onl[y], he got a horse and a sword fit for Combate. But to the end, that those who waited upon him in his Chamber, should not wonder at his going out before day, and with so small a Retinue, he spake openly as he went to bed, that he intended to go very timely in the morning unto the Quarters of the Prince Artamas, where he was told he might meet with a Foorde which was passable, seeming to be very impatient to be Marching. So that those who waited upon him, being accustomed to see Cyrus play the part of a common Souldier, as well as the Generall of an Army, they did not wonder he should be so early up; that he should take none but Ortaques with him; or that he should command them to tell all such as asked for him, that he was still asleep. Thus this Illustrious Prince, after he had gained so many Battles, subjected so many Provinces, subdued so many Kingdomes, yet hung his whole felicity upon Fortune and his own valour: so that a King whom he had conquered, and a King without a Kingdom, was still in a condition to vanquish him: to send him to his grave, and to enjoy the Princesse, for whom Cyrus had done such great things. Also, all the way as he went, his soul was so full of different thoughts, as he could hardly repeat them in any order. Then did he call into memory, his old hatred to the King of Assyria, at that time when he passed under the name of Phylidaspes, and all the busses he had with him, under the name of Artamenes: He remembered the bloody fight they had at the Temple of Mars, close by Synope: and his imagination represented unto him the place where he saved his life, as he returned from the Massagettes: so that forgetting none of the obligations which that Prince had unto him, though he was used always to forget his own benefits, he made use of them to incense his hatred, as well as the remembrance of all the miseries he brought upon Mandana, by first carrying her away. But at last, coming just at Sun rise, unto the place where the King of Assyria waited for him, with one Page onely; these two Rivalls accosted each other, with a haughty civility, as was evident they intended the ruine of one another: Yet since they resolved to fight on foot, to make quicker dispatch they left those who came with them, to stay under some trees with their horses: and they went themselves under an old ruined Castle, where the ground was very even, to end this great difference, which had put all Asia into Armes. As they went, they talked together: And the King of Assyria told Cylrus, that he ever thought him more nobly devoted unto Glory, then to break his word, and he thought himself as much obliged unto him for it as possibly an enemy could be. Desire of revenge (replied Cyrus sharply) is so sweet, as I believe it is that, which moves me to give both you and my self this satisfaction, as much as my devotion unto Glory. What ever it be, (said the King of Assyria) I must highly commend you for it: and confesse I owe you both my life and my liberty: But I am forced to confesse also, that it is much consolation to me, to see you from the Head of an Army, of two hundred thousand men, over which I had no power, and to see you here upon equall termes with me. At these words, both being come to the place where they were to fight, they parted, and without any measuring of swords, they began the Combat. And they began with more fury then others use to end: They fell upon each other with such impetuosity, as if Page 45 they both intended to end all differences at one blow. 'Tis just now (said Cyrus) and fell furiously upon the King of Assyria) that I will either vanquish, or die for Mandana. This very blow (replied the other valiant Prince, and furiously made at Cyrus) shall let thee see which of the two will happen. Yet the work was not so quickly done: for Cyrus having wardd the blow, which the King of Assyria made at him, as the King of Assyria wardd the blow which Cyrus made, they did not touch one another: so as these two fierce enemies, employing all their valour, and all their skill against each other, they assaulted and defended themselves so valiantly, that their own valours was an obstacle unto their victory. For they disputed the matter a long time with such equality, that neither of them could get the advantage of the other: since Cyrus used more judgement in this Combat, then the King of Assyria did, who was of a more impetuous temper. Doubtlesse, he made better choise of the places where he aimed his blowes: But on the other side, the King of Assyria did strike with such fury, that none but Cyrus in the world was able to defend himself from the weight of such blows. Sometimes Cyrus would lie open, and put all to hazard, to the end he might sooner vanquish: Presently after, he would lie close upon his Guard, and manage his advantages a little better, also would profit by the King of Assyria's despair, who sometimes mocking at the precepts of that Art, would employ onely his strength. But 'twas strange, that these two valiant Princes, who had both of them wonderful agility, if they would have used it, yet dispatched this Combat in a very little space: For neither of them being willing to give one foot of ground unto his enemy, they were always so neer each other, as within reach, and every minuit in danger to be both killed. But at last, Cyrus had not onely the advantage to see the blood of his enemy, by reason of a slight touch in his left arm: but also it hapned, that the King of Assyria, fell upon his knee: so that Cyrus making a passe upon him, the sword of that unfortunate Prince fell out of his hands; yet he recovered himself so readily, that Cyrus could not passe upon him as he intended, but yet he could not recover his sword, because Cyrus had seized upon it: In so much, as seeing himself at the mercy of his Rivall and his Conquerour, his despair was without equal. Yet it lasted not long: for since Cyrus was not capable of killing a disarmed man: and since their Combat could not end, but by the death of one, he took his Rivals sword by the point, and presented the hilt unto him. Since I will not owe my victory unto your misfortune, (said hee unto him) but only unto my self: And since I cannot fight against those who are not in a condition to resist me; Take your sword Sir, and make better use of it then you have done, if you can. Alas Sir, (said this violent Prince, and took it) this is too too much: and though you do me no other hurt but over-load me with your Generosities, yet I cannot endure your sight. And yet I am ashamed (added he, and took breath) to employ the sword which you have given me, against the giver, but yet the love of Mandana will allow it: And since she can be but for one of us, but one of us must live. After this, these two inveterat enemies began their Combat afresh, more fiercely then at first: but as they were both ready to vanquish one another, and perhaps, both ready to perish, though Cyrus seemed to have the advantage, because fury had distracted the King of Assyria's reason, Feraulas appeared; who riding as fast as his horse could gallop up to them, cried out, as soon as he was within distance of hearing, Oh Sir, what are you doing here, whilst the Princesse Mandana is carrying away? At these words, the two valiant Princes suspended their fury, and stepped some paces back, to hear whether they rightly understood him: So that Feraulas being come neerer, he told them once again, that Mandana was carried away, and carried away by Anaxaris: And that unlesse they made extreme hast, they would not deliver her. How, (cried out these two Rivalls) hath Anaxaris carried away Mandana? Yes Sir, replied Feraullas, (addressing his speech unto Cyrus) and there is such disorder amongst the Souldiers, by reason of this Accident, and by reason of a report, that the King of Assyria is alive, and hath killed you, that if your presence do not calme this storme, and give Orders to make them follow the Princesse, you will never finde her. These two Rivalls hearing what Feraulas said, looked fiercely upon him: and as if they Page 46 had been inspired with the same spirit, both said, that their Combat must bee deferred, untill they had delivered Mandana. So, renewing their conditions in two words, they went hastily to their horses, and went immediately away together: for since the King of Assyria's wound was very slight, hee onely bound it up with a scarf, he went with Cyrus unto the place from whence Mandana was carried away, for that was the way to follow her, to shew himself unto the Souldiers, and to take some Troops along with him. But in his way thither, he met abundance of men of high Quality, who were looking for him: Amongst the rest, he wondered to see the Prince Indathiris, that Illustrious Scythian, who came out of the Dominions of Thomiris with him. As grieved as he was, he received him very Civilly, and told him his misfortune in the Language which hee understood, and asked his pardon, that he could not receive him, with so much Joy, as another time he should. But, (said he unto him) if you consider, how the Princesse Mandana is carried away from me, and carried away by a stranger, whose Countrey I do not so much as know, I hope you will excuse my incivilities: and will not take it ill, that (having a mind filled with the infidelity of the Traytor Anaxaris) I do not render those respects I owe unto the Generous Indathiris. Oh Sir, (replied that Illustrious Scythian) you will wonder much more, when you shall know that Anaxaris is not Anaxaris: and much more then that, when I have told you who he is. How, (said Cyrus) do you know him? Yes Sir, replied he, and I shall tell you more in private. Then Cyrus separating from the rest of the Company, and still riding on, to lose no time, he hearkned unto what Indathiris told him, with so many signes of wonder in his Countenance, as it was easie to know that he was both much surprised and much grieved.

The Ninth Part.

Book. I.

CAn it possibly be true (said Cyrus, and cried out, after he knew from Indatherses the true name of Anaxaris) that Anaxaris should be the Prince Ariantes, Brother unto Thomiris, who was gone unto the Kingdome of Issedons, with the young Spargapises, when Ciaxares sent me unto that Princess? Yes Sir, replied Indatherses, Anaxaris is really Ariantes, brother unto the Queen of Massagettes; and the voyage which he made when you were with that Princess, caused him to pass unknown in your Army, for since you never saw him, he might pass for whom he pleased: But I beseech you (said Cyrus) what could his design be in concealing himself so long, and in rendring me services so great, as will for ever after make me the most miserable man alive? Did he only wait for an opportunity of revenging Thomiris, by carrying away the Princess whom I adore? And must I look upon this Act of his, as an effect of that revenge which lurks in the soul of that incensed Queen? Or as his love unto Mandana? Sir, replied Indatherses, I cannot tell you what the intentions of the Prince Ariantes was; but I am sure he has been too long out of the favour of Thomiris, to be the Executioner of her revenge. I beseech you (said Cyrus) how do you know that Anaxaris is Ariantes? for I must ingenuously confess, what you tell me does so much surprize me, that I must needs enquire of all circumstances concerning a matter, which would seem absolutelie incredible, if any but you had told it. Sir, replied Indatherses, I know so very well, that Anax[ar]is is Ariantes, as none can be surer of any thing; for a servant of mine, in whom I have extraordinarie confidence, and who hath seen him whole years together, did see him with Mandana; and since I desired to be sure of the place where you were, I sent him to enquire, Page 2 with orders to return unto me at a place where I stayed a day to put my self in a fit equipage to appear before the Princess Mandana, whom I knew you conducted: So as this servant who has wit and spirit enough, saw Anaxaris yesterday do the office of the Captain of the Guard unto the Princess Mandana: But since he saw him, and was not seen by him again, by reason of the press of people which crowded to see that Princess as she went unto the Temple, his wonder at the sight of him was not perceived, and knowing none about him, he had no reason to express his admiration, yet he made a shift to be understood, and to ask the name of him whom he looked upon so seriously; and being answered that his name was Anaxaris, but none being able to tell him either what he was, or from whence, he easily apprehended, that the Prince Ariantes would not be known; so that saying no more, he returned in all hast towards me, not only to assure me that I should find you upon the banks of the River Halis, but also to tell me that he had seen the Prince Ariantes passing by the name of Anaxaris, and as Captain of the Guard unto the Princess Mandana. At the first I told him, that certainly he was mistaken by some that resembled him, yet he was so extreemly confident of it, that I contended no longer with him, but made <◇> doubt of it in my own mind, and said no more unto him: But Sir, when I came unto the place where I imagined to find you, then I understood that this Anaxaris had carried away Mandana, and then I made no question but that he was the Prince Ariantes; and truly I am now as fully perswaded of it, as if I had seen him my self. Alas my dear Indatherses (said Cyrus) I am no less perswaded of it then you, for trulie were Anaxaris of a more inferiour qualitie, certainlie he durst never have been so bold as to carry away the Princess; and now methinks you have opened my eyes, and I find some imperfect resemblance betwixt Thomiris and him: Also he hath an accent, and sound in his voice, as might at least have induced me to know him for a Scitheat: But assuredly the Gods, being resolved upon my ruine, did blind me, and deprived me of my reason, to the end that I my self might contribute unto Mandana's and my own destruction.

After this, Cyrus was silent, and continued a while sighing and walking, then upon a sudden calling Feraulas, unto whom the King of Assiria was talking, he asked him how it was known that Anaxaris had carried away Mandana? Sir, said Feraulas, Anaxaris hath carried the marter so subtilly, that none ever knew until within foure houres after his departure; for Sir, he went away with the Princess above an houre before it was day, yet it was not known that she was not in her Chamber, until an houre before I departed, with intention to come hither; and which is strangest, Arianite whom she left behinde her, had orders to conceal her departure as well as Pherenice, and all the rest of the women: But Doralisa and Martesia are with her: Oh Feraulas (said Cyrus) this cannot be, I can never believe that Mandana would let her self be carried away, and carried away by Anaxaris: Sir, replied Feraulas, it is as far from my belief as yours, but it is a certain truth, that neither the Princess, nor either of the Ladies who are with her, did call any unto their aid; that all Mandana's guard followed her, and that Andramites and his friends are gone with her: The greatest wonder is, Arianite said, that Anaxaris came and caused Martesia to be waked, to the end she might awake Mandana, which after she had accordingly done, he spoke unto the Princess, that he read something unto her out of a Letter which he had, and that he shewed unto her a Scarf, which she looked upon with a torrent of tears in her eyes, and with extreame bitterness of heart. Arianite said further, that after Mandana had caused Martesia to come unto her, and had sent to waken Doralisa, they both of them wept a while with her, and afterwards the Princess rising in haste, whilst Anaxaris went to take orders for her departure, she did nothing else but shed tears whilst she was dressing: She also said, that as the Princess was ready to depart, and to take Coach at a pair of stairs in a back Court, Martesia commanded her from the Princess to cause her women not to open the door of her Chamber until it was very late. Then Arianite pressing Martesia to tell her whether the Princess went, why she grieved? and why she carried not all her women with her? You shall ere long have orders to come unto her (replied Martesia) But in the mean time my dear Arianite (said She) repent of your serving the King of Assiria, since perhaps you were the cause of his killing the illustrious Cyrus, and of the Princesses death for very grief of his loss: You may well conceive Sir, that a woman who thought the King of Assiria dead, was extreemly surprized to hear that he lived, and that he had killed you; yet she could not express her wonder, for Martesia and Doralisa followed Mandana with as much haste as sorrow. However, since this news did touch Arianite Page 3 very much, she imparted it unto the rest of the Princesses women, and also awaked Pherenice to tell her. So that having passed away the rest of the night, and part of the morning in reasoning upon this strange adventure, she sent to seek out Chrisantes, yet it was long before her servant could get out, because the foure Guards which Anaxaris had placed at the Gate of the Castle, would not suffer any to pass out, because their orders was to the contrarie; but at last obtaining their leave, this servant got out and went unto Chrisantes, who understood before that you Sir was not at your own lodging: And hearing at the same time by Arianita that the Princess was also gone out, he thought it not fit to conceal her astonishment: So that acquainting the Prince Artamas, Mazares, Intaphernes, Myrsiles and others with it, there was presently raised so great a report of your death Sir, and of the Princesses her departure, that I am not able to represent unto you the disorder which this sad news caused, both amongst all your friends, and amongst the Souldiers: The greatest wonder was, that none knew what course to take, nor from whom to receive orders: Some said the best way was; to go unto the King of Hircania, others unto Croessus, and every one voting to revenge your death, and going after Mandana, yet all their Spirits were in such disorder, that neither of those courses was taken: Some said that happily Anaxaris had not carried away the Princess, considering the manner of her departure: But the Prince Myrsiles understanding from some of his servants, that Andramites many daies since had prepared some of his friends for some great design, which he said he had in hand, he made no question but his design was; that knowing Anaxaris would carry away Mandana, he would also carry away his adored Doralisa: So that supposing them to be carried away by fallacies, this Prince making no reckonings of these reports which went of the King of Assiria's being alive, and that he had killed you, he assembled together some of his friends, and went in all haste to see if he could discover which way Anaxaris took. The Prince Mazares also took up the same design, but took another way: As for the Prince Artamas, Intaphernes, Chrisantes, Aglatidas, and my self, we divided our selves with intentions to find you out: So that being guided doubtless by the Gods unto the place where you were, I have good reason to believe that they will also guide you Sir very shortlie unto the place where Mandana is: No no, replied this grieved Prince, there is no hopes, but on the contrarie all is to be feared. After this, the Sibels answer which was brought him by Ortalques coming into his mind, he assured himself that he was destined unto a sad fate, and that Thomiris would destroy him. Then also he believed that the Oracle of the Assyrian King would be fully completed, and prove to his Rivals advantage; nor durst he so much as hope, that the Oracle which the Princess of Salamis had received, could be interpreted unto his advantage: So that his Spirits being wholly possessed with sorrow, he talked no more of what happed in the place where Arianita was, from whose own mouth he intended to be precisely satisfied of all that Feraulas told him. He found her with Pherenice, Amalde, Telamire, and all the rest of the Ladies which used to accompany her, but he found them all in tears; yet his sight was a great comfort unto them; supposing that since he was living, they needed not to fear Mandana. However, their astonishment was not a little unto them that believed the King of Assiria dead, and had heard say afterwards, that he had killed Cyrus, when they saw them both living, and carrie themselves to each other as formerlie. And after they were informed of all that Arianita knew; after they had examined the four Guards whom Anaxaris had left, and who knew nothing but that Anaxaris had commanded them to let none go out of the Castle until it was late, and that the King of Assyria had been dressed of a slight wound which he had in his left Arm, they advised together upon the best expedients in such a disastrous occasion, 'Tis true; their counsels were often interrupted, for men come from all Quarters of the Army to be satisfied concerning this great report which was so suddenlie spread abroad, both concerning the King of Assyria's life, and the death of Cyrus, and also the carrying away of Mandana.

But at the last, since the necessity of the business did extreemly urge it, Cyrus with the advice of all his friends and of his Rival, and when they understood that Anaxaris had not above a hundred men with him, resolved that the King of Assiria, the Prince Artamas, the Prince Intaphernes and himself, should each of them take two hundred horse, and divide themselves, to try if any of them could find out the way which Anaxaris took, of which they had no light at all. But since Cyrus was glad that some of his friends would be with the Assyrian King, in case he should find Mandana, and recover her out of Anaxaris's hands: And so he had no means to break his promise and carry her away for Page 4 himself, therefore Cyrus transacted with abundance of discretion, maugre all his sorrows: And caused many of his friends to follow his Rival, As Araspes, Aglatidas and some others. Thus these four Princes, taking with them such men as they stood in need of, they parted, after they had agreed upon the several ways which they were to take, and of the place unto which they would send intelligence in case they heard any news of Mandana: But when these four Troops had taken their several ways, and that Cyrus marched and enquired all the way he went; also when he considered how after he had taken Sinope, Artaxates Babylon, Sardis and Cumes; and how after he had subdued so many Kingdoms, and delivered Mandana when she was carried away by the King of Assiria, by the Prince Mazares, and by the King of Pontus, now to see her carried away again, by the Prince Ariantes, he fell into a most extreame despair: For he saw himself in as miserable a condition, as he was when he went under the name of Artamenes, when upon his return from Massagettes, as he approached Thimiscyra, he understood, that the King of Assiria under the name of Philidaspes had carried away Mandana; yet sometimes he imagined that Ariantes perhaps had not carried her away; but this imagination was very weak in him: for having confidence in his secrecy, he had told him the the hour when he was to fight with the King of Assiria: So as seeing he had carried away Mandana, before he had so much as fought with his enemy, he could not find any foundation of hope: And not knowing well what to think of this cross adventure, he very well saw it to be full of cruelty unto him. In the mean time, all his vigilancy and cares to enlighten his knowledge was in vain. The Prince Artamas, was no happier then he was in his way; no more was Intaphernes. But though these three Princes with Mersyles sought Ariantes in vain: It was otherwise with the King of Assiria; for fortune seemed to conduct him unto Mandana; and he found the way she went, within forty furlongs of the place where he parted from Cyrus; so as making all hast after, and continually enquiring, he understood that the Coach in which the Princess was, being broken, it would be a long while before it could be mended So as then hoping to overtake them quickly, he marched so fast, that he came at last upon a little Hill within thirty furlongs of the Euxine Bridge: from whence he saw horsemen coming out of a little Wood; he saw a Coach stay: also he saw a Lady sitting under some Trees, whose head leaned upon the knees of another, and who by her action seemed to wipe away her tears, there being another woman upon her knees before him, who also behaved her self as if she wept: So as knowing that Mandana had none with her but Doralisa and Martesia, he doubted not but it was she whom he saw. Then without the delay of one minute he encouraged his men unto valor. He commanded them to have a principle care, not to fight over neer Mandana, least they should unawares hurt her: After which he commanded them to march, and at the very first to cut all the Reigns of that Charrot in which the Princess was, to the end Ariantes might be disabled from carrying her away: yet since he was not neer enough to know their faces, he only conjectured who they were; but his conjecture and appearances deceived him: for Ariantes having left Mandana under that shade, was gone himself to enquire whether the Coach could pass a certain way which would shorten that way at least two hours, in going unto the Port where he had provided a Ship, as soon as he understood that Cyrus was to fight with the King of Assiria: So that Andramites staying to command Mandana's Guard no sooner saw this body of Cavalry appear, in the head of which was the King of Assirias but he expected an assault. Yet to the end he might know who it was that assaulted him, he sent out one of his men to know who those were which he saw: And commanding all the rest to prepare themselves for a stout defence: he set one party about Mandana, and placed so me other at the entry into the little Wood, which was easily defended, because they could not be surrounded. Since all this could not be done but in Mandana's sight; and since her imagination was filled with a fancy that the King of Assiria had killed Cyrus, she started up in great hast, conjuring Andramites that if it were the King of Assiria which appeared, to defend her against him; and obliged also Doralisa to employ all her power over Andramines, to make him lose his life rather then suffer her to fall into the hands of a man whom she thought had killed Cyrus: She had no sooner said this, but those whom Andramites had sent to discover whether or no it was the King of Assiria returned with all speed, & assuaded him that it was the King of Assiria. So that Mandana aggravating her prayers unto Andramites, and her commands upon her Guards, she her self was an obstacle unto those who came to deliver her; not imagining that there could be more danger in being carried away by Anaxaris whom she did not know to be Ariantes, then by the King of Assiria by Mazares, or by the King of Pontus.

Andramites after he had assured her, that he would die in her service, and after he had sent to acquaint Ariantes with the adventure, he advanced towards the King of Assyria, as the King of Assyria advanced towards him, so that a most fatal and terrible combat began betwixt them. Since the King of Assyria in his march had divided his men into many small Parties, lest he should be mistaken, and since his intelligence of Mandana's march was various, he was no more numerous then his adversarie, so that the combat being upon equal terms; it was both sharp and bloody. But whilst they were at handy blowes, and whilst Andramites endeavoured to hinder the King of Assyria from coming at Mandana, that Princess would needs go unto her Coach whilst Andramites kept his ground: But since the King of Assyria had been exactly obeyed, she found that some of his men had cut the Reins of his horses; so that returning unto the foot of a tree environed with those whom Andramites had left to guard her, her imaginations were beyond all expressions, especially when she knew the King of Assyria, and saw him fight with incredible fury; for seeing him with the same Sword wherewith she thought he had killed Cyrus, her sorrows were such as words cannot represent. Alas (said she, lifting up her eyes to heaven and sighing) must I come under the power of him who hath taken away the life of the most illustrious Prince that ever breathed, and unto whom I was most obliged of all men living? Oh ye just Gods (cried she, and bathed her eyes in tears) Since the death of Cyrus must infallibly be the cause of mine, I beseech you defer it no longer, but let me even now expire with sorrow; and if you will be favourable unto me, let those who fight in my defence revenge the death of Cyrus upon the King of Assyria; or at the last, let not that unjust Prince triumph over my Tomb, much less over my person. Whilst Mandana was thus breathing up her prayers to heaven, a great noise of strange voice of armes, and of horses was heard, one man no sooner fell of each side, but another stepped into his place, and their fury both in assaulting and defending was as hot as at the first. The King of Assyria for his part did things beyond a man, and he killed almost as many with his own hand, as all the rest of his followers did. On the other side, Andramites as well in point of love as honor, did what a man of courage could do; but since the King of Assyria was stoutly seconded by Aglatidas and Araspes, he pressed so hard upon those he assaulted, that they were forced to give ground; so that Mandana, Doralisa, and Martesia, then thinking they should fall under the King of Assyria's power, they all breathed out such cries of sorrow, as reached the ears of Andramites.

This Lover no sooner heard the voice of the person whom he adored, but recollecting new vigour, and encouraging his men both by his example and language, he repulsed those who had repulsed him; then seeking for the King of Assyria, maugre the confession of the combat, he fell upon him with extream furie, and environed him with four of his men; So that the King of Assyria being weary with the combat which he had in the morning with Cyrus, who had wounded him slightly in the left arm, and now not having his usual strength, he could not resist so many upon him at once. Also his design being to quantify those who assaulted him at the very first, he weakened himself at the very beginning of the combat, and lost part of his forces: So that being now over-matched, he was wounded in several places: 'Tis true, his wounds cost others of his enemies very dear, and if his horse had not been killed under him, he had not been so easily vanquished; yet after he was dismounted, he did not render himself, but on the contrary redoubling his fury, he did things above imagination, for maugre the valour of them who were upon him on all sides, he made his way through in despite of them, and perhaps finding his strength to fail, he put his whole strength he had left unto it, and made his way with such vigour, that he broke through them, and went straight unto those who guarded Mandana. But in lieu of being able to assault as he designed by his action, he fell down after he had received a blow upon his Thigh, which hindered him from sustaining himself; so that the Guards had dispatched him, if Andramites who saw him fall had not forbidden them, after they had seized upon his Sword which dropt out of his hand as he fell. In the mean while Aglatidas and Alaspes, who fought for Cyrus, and not for the King of Assyria, continued the combat with incredible valour. But whilst Andramites resisted them, the King of Assyria striving to get up, he saw Mandana turning away her head from the sight of him, and stepping some paces further from him; but love strengthening his desires, he got up, and passing through those who guarded the Princess, he came to her and fell at her feet, and lest she should get further off, he took hold of her Gown, the Princess imagining that he held it with the same hand that killed Cyrus, did strive to get away, and speaking with as much anger as Page 6 sorrow; Away, away (said she unto him) how dare you touch me after you have sent Cyrus to his grave? Cyrus, Isay, unto whom you owe both your life and liberty, and for whom only I desire to live, yet I see you so impudently bold as to appear before me with a Sword stained with his blood, and to stay me with that hand which gave him his death: The King of Assyria surprized at Mandana's Speech, and desiring to die unhated: Oh I beseech you Madam (said he unto her) Do not put new torments of hatred upon me, I have not killed Cyrus, and I am so far from being his Conquerour, that certainly he had been mine, if the news of your carrying away had not taken up our combat; and to testify that I am as full of sincerity as love, I must ingenuously confess that he hath once more given me my life, though I was not able to yield you unto him: How (cried out Mandana) is not Cyrus dead? No Madam, replied he, but the unfortunate Prince whom you see at your feet is going to die, and to die desperate, unless you will pardon his crimes, and unless you will promise him some sighs for the blood he has lost in endeavouring to set you at liberty.

Mandana then judging by the manner of the King of Assyria's Speech that Cyrus was not dead, and believing that Anaxaris, whom she knew not to be Ariantes had deceived her, commanded her Guards to cry unto Andramites that Cyrus was living, to the end he might give over the combat; but the King of Assyria interrupting her: No, no Madam, said he, do not deceive your self, but believe, that if those who fight for me be overcome, Cyrus perhaps will for ever lose you, for Anaxaris is Brother unto the Queen of the Massagettes, and he carries you away out of revenge to her, or out of the love of himself: All this while you have cited Andramites to fight against your Deliverers, and your orders Madam have brought me into this deplorable condition, yet I do not murmur, but know too too late, that since Cyrus doth love you, I ought not to love you, but must resolve upon my death, since I am forced to say (as much my Rival as he is) that he deserves you better then any else. As the King of Assyria was saying so, and as Mandana was in extream astonishment, and unconceivable sorrow, though she was much joyed to hear that Cyrus was living, the Prince Ariantes (whom Andramites had sent to come up, and went straight unto the place where Mandana was, whilst Andramites with his remnant) was fighting with Aglatidas, Araspes, and their residue: But his intention was to carry away Mandana, Doralisa, and Martesia by force upon horses unto the Port where his ship stayed, whilst Andramites held the rest in play, and hindered them from pursuing. But Ariantes no sooner appeared, then the King of Assyria wounded as he was, and though he was not able to get on his knee, he shewed such a piece of courage as transcends all belief, for snatching a Sword from one of the Guards, and kneeling upon one knee as I said before, he held Mandana by the Gown with his left hand, and the Sword in his right: Then looking upon Ariantes as he came to him with a menacing action, Though I have but a small pittance of life to live (said he unto him in a tone which spoke both fury and faintness) yet I have enough to defend the liberty of this Princess, and to keep her for my Rival: If you be wise, pursued he, learn by my lamentable destiny, not to persecute this Princess, for if you do, I profess you must first kill me before I will let her go. The King of Assyria pronounced these words with such a generous fury, that he imprinted some respects in the souls of all that heard him, even in Ariantes himself: Also the King of Assyria, holding Mandana by the Gown, Ariantes had much ado to part them, out of his fears to hurt the Princess, in forcing the King of Assyria to let her go. In the mean time Mandana desirous to be satisfied from his own mouth whether or no he was her Protector, and whether he thought Cyrus to be dead, she began to command him to cease fighting, but she perceived by his answer that the King of Assyria had spoken truth, and better by his action, for he fearing lest more company should come in, and lest Andramites should be vanquished, he commanded that they should separate Mandana from the King of Assyria. But this unfortunate Prince no sooner saw them advancing towards him to that intent, but without quitting Mandana's Gown, he gave him who first advanced such a furious blow, that the man fell half dead at the feet of the Princess: So that Ariantes being incensed at his resistance, went himself to make him quit Mandana, when he saw Aglatidas, who having left Araspes to command those who were still fighting, came with five or six of his men to assault him: So as being forced unto a defence, he recoiled some paces from the King of Assyria, whom two of the Guard which were left with him, whereof the one of them was Brother unto him whom that unfortunate Prince had last wounded, both of them fell upon him behind, and took Page 7 his Sword from him, say what Mandana could to the contrary, for this Princess seeing how things stood, did what she could to defend him, who now defended her, considering the pitiful condition wherein he was; and she was now as careful of preserving his life, as she was of causing his death, when she thought he had killed Cyrus: 'Tis true, all her cares were fruitless, because the last blows which this unfortunate Prince had received, did so upon a sudden enfeeble him, as not being able to sustain himself upon one knee, he fell upon that arm which held Mandana's Gown, and so weakly supported himself: So that the Princess seeing him ready to expire, and being moved with extream compassion, she sat down upon the grass, whilst the fight continued some fifteen or twenty paces from her; and this miserable Prince, whose strength more and more failed, rested his drooping head upon Mandana's knee; and this generous and pitiful Princess seeing him ready to expire, did not draw back from him as she did a quarter of an hour before, and would not deny him the consolation of taking his last breath upon her knee. Since his great loss of blood had taken away from him some part of his fierceness, by taking away his strength, and since he had his reason very perfect, because he feared not death, he uttered nothing concerning Mandana, but yet what was very tender and moving: 'Tis true, he spoke but little, yet that little wrought great effect upon the heart of that Princess: And to make the freedom of his soul appear, he remembered the Oracle which he received at Babylon in the Temple of Jupiter Belus, which said thus unto him.

Well mayest thou hope to make her mourn,
For all her cruelty and scorn,
Because hereafter in her Arms,
Thou there shalt find such pleasing charms,
As quite shall terminate thy pain,
And never shall complain again.

This Prince very probably remembering this Oracle, lifting up his eyes in a languishing manner, and looking upon the Princess; I beseech you Madam (said he unto her in a dying tone,) let me have some share in those sighs which I hear you breath, to the end that dying in your Arms, I may meet with that rest which the Gods have promised me by their Oracles: I assure you Sir (said she and sighed again) that what you have now done for me, makes me extremely sad to see you in this condition, and if I were able to preserve your life, as you would my liberty, I would do it with all my heart: It is enough divine Madam (said he unto her in a very low voice) and I shall die much more happy then I lived, since I shall die unhated by the divine Mandana. As this unfortunate Prince said so, he offered respectively to take the hand of the Princess, but at the very first touch of it he lost his speech, and in a hollow whisper did let her understand that which his tongue could not pronounce: So as this deplorable Prince dying immediately after, he had the glory to make Mandana sigh, and really to pity his death, who had been the greatest torment of her life. In the mean while the combat continued still, but since the presence of Ariantes had given fresh hearts unto his men, the face of things changed, and both Aglatidas and Araspes who were met, could not with all their valour prevent almost an absolute defeat; for since the horse of Aglatidas was killed, and himself wounded in the arm, Araspes also being hurt in his right hand, Ariantes and Andramites left a Party of their men to keep in work those few men which resisted them, and went with the rest unto the place where Mandana was; and say what she would or could, she must submit unto force, and be carried away against her will, not but that it grieved Ariantes to the soul, that his passion should transport him beyond his due respects. But though he asked pardon for the violence he offered, yet he behaved himself as a man who would execute his design; and indeed he carried Mandana, Doralisa, and Martesia, unto the Port where the Ship waited; and as he remembered how Mazares in his carrying away Mandana from Sinope, did set fire upon all the Ships in the Port, he resolved upon the like, lest he should be followed, which thing was easily done, because there was not above three or four there; and because the Port was separated from the Town which was neer, and since there was not above two or three men in each of those Ships. Thus Mandana, Doralisa, and Martesia being put into the Ship, and Ariantes, Andramites, and their retinue also entered, they began to hoist sail, not tarrying for those they left in hand with the King of Assyria's men; for though Ariantes had left one of his dearest friends amongst Page 8 those which fought, yet he would not hazard the loss of Mandana to preserve him, so violent was his passion. Thus parting from the Port a little after Sun-set, Mandana was in as sad a condition as ever. But whilst this Princess (and with reason) was grieving, Cyrus was as sad as his sorrow was just, for after he had in vain sought Mandana, chance brought him at last unto the place from whence she was carried away: So as finding the place covered with dead and dying men, he saw Mandana's Coach, and the horses grazing loose; he saw Aglatidas wounded, as well as Araspes, and he saw the King of Assyria dead. So that not finding Mandana there, and those who fought for her liberty vanquished, his sorrow was most extream; but it was at a higher pitch, when he understood from Aglatidas and Araspes how the case stood, and when he understood from one of Mandana's Guard, who lay wounded neer the place where the King of Assyria's corps did lie, some of that Prince's dying expressions, and all that he had done for her liberty. So as this generous Rival in imitation of that compassion which they said Mandana expressed at the loss of so valiant a Prince, he also pitied the lamentable destiny of so great a King, though he had been his most mortal Enemy. But to spend no time in fruitless complaints, he commanded some of his Followers to put the corps of this renowned Rival into Mandana's Coach, to catch the horses, and to drive to the place from whence he came, there to stay till he had resolved what Funeral Honours to do unto it. After which, visiting the wounded, to see if any could tell which way Ariantes took, the Prince Indathereses, who was with Cyrus, did know one of his Country who was of good Quality called Adonacris: So as going to him, and making himself known, they were both surprized at the sight of each other. But after the first passages of civility, Indathereses asked him such questions as Cyrus desired to be satisfied in, and he answered that he thought it in vain to follow Ariantes, for certainly he would be Shipped before any could be at the Port where he had provided a Ship, though it was not far from the place where they were. However Cyrus hasted thither after, at the request of Indathereses, he had commanded that a special care should be had of Adonacris, who as wounded as he was, had the ayr of a brave accomplished man, and of good quality. But as much hast as Cyrus made, it was dark when he came unto the Port from whence Ariantes departed a little after Sun-set, so as he found none but those Ships which his Rival had set on fire; nor had he so much consolation as to understand which way the Ship steered which carried away his Princess, for the night being dark, one could not discover any thing towards the Sea, nor could he learn any thing from the men which had their Ships burning, for their amazement at the accident, did so wholly take up their minds, that they thought upon nothing else but quenching the fire, and never heeded which way he steered who had done them the hurt.

Thus the illustrious Cyrus could not that day learn whether Ariantes went towards his own Country, or whether he steered toward Thrace, or towards the Meotidan Lake, or towards Colchis, so as he was in the most miserable condition in the world; for since there was no Port within a daies journey of the place where he was, he thought it in vain to send after Ariantes, since he knew not which course he steered; yet he sent Feraulas with fifty men, and commanded him to take as many Ships as he could find, and to divide his men into all the Ships, to enquire news of Ariantes, and to know into what place of the world he might go and seek Mandana. He had a mind to go himself in person, but his friends diverted him, by desiring him to consider, that since all he could do was to enquire of the place unto which Ariantes went, since he was not in a condition to assault him, he had better stay and expect intelligence, then to wander upon the Seas with so much uncertainty of the way which he took; but the greatest inducements of his stay was, because Indathereses told him that happily Adonacris knew more of Ariantes mind, then he would tell in his presence: So that Cyrus being perswaded by him, returned to the place where the King of Assyria's Corps was carried, and whether they had also carried Adonacris after he was dressed. But in his return thither, he went through a Village where he rested himself two or three houres, and found a servant unto Andramites, who being wounded stayed there, and who knew all the secrets of his Master: So as Chrisantes knowing him very well, acquainted Cyrus with it, and told him, that happily he might get many things out of this man, if he did force him unto it; and accordingly Cyrus used prayers, menaces, and promises of recompence, if he would tell all he knew, both concerning Ariantes and Andramites: Sir (said the man again) If what I shall tell you would bring my Master under your power, though I know the design of the Prince Ariantes to be very Page 9 unjust, yet I would not tell you any thing, for all your menaces or promises of recompence. But Sir, since it cannot, if you will promise me to pardon my Master hereafter, if his Passion to Doralisa engaged him in a designe as unjust as that of the Prince Ariantes, upon this condition, I will tell you all the passages betwixt them.

Since generosity appeared in the discourse of this servant, and since he asked nothing in the behalf of Ariantes, Cyrus promised what he desired upon condition he would tell him all he knew concerning the design of Ariantes, and upon condition he would tell him how he had deceived Mandana, and carryed her away. Sir, (said he then after thanks for his promise) since I have been happy in the favour of my Master, and have been serviceable to him in this last business, I know all the passages which you can desire to get out of me: Therefore I shall tell you, that the Prince Ariantes having contracted an intimate friendship with Andramites, did at the last discover unto him, who he was, and how he loved and adored the Princess Mandana; also he told him how the King of Assyria was then alive, that with in three days he would meet you Sir, neer the ruins of an old Castle, and that you were to fight with him; and how you gave Ariantes your orders to shew unto all the Officers, in case you fell in the Combate, to the end they should obey the Princess Mandana. But Sir, After the Prince Ariantes had acquainted my Master with all these things, and told him how you had furnished him wherewith to make sure of all his companions, he expressed himself the most passionately in the world: and if I could excuse him without offending you, I would assure you that he had much ado to betray you, & that his generosity did much struggle with his passion; but in conclusion, his passion being too strong for him, he desired Andramites to assist him in his design of carrying away Mandana the same night that you were to fight with the King of Assyria: and the more to engage him in his interest, he told him that in carrying away Mandana, he would also carry away Doralisa: So that my Master who till then had resisted Ariantes design, could not now resist his own passion: for considering what a Rival he had of the Prince Mysiles, he saw he could not pretend any thing unto Doralisa: and if she ever loved, it would be rather that Prince then himself: So that finding the design of Ariantes unjust, when his own love had no interest, it was not enough to engage him in his interest; but afterwards both of them thought of nothing else but how to execute it. In order unto that, I was made choise of by these two lovers to find out trusty men for so great a design, and accordingly I provided twenty Souldiers of good resolution to be added unto the Guard of the Princess. Thus Sir, carrying the matter very secretly, there was above a hundred men resolved to obey Ariantes in all things whatsoever. But the day being come, and Ariantes knowing that you were to depart an hour after the Moon was up, they resolved to delude Mandana and carry her away: To that end Ariantes went to awaken Martesia, that she might awaken the Princess, telling her that it was a business of such high and hasty concernment as would not admit of one minuts delay: Accordingly Martesia being risen and gone to awake the Princess, she caused Ariantes to enter; he addressed himself in a melancholy aspect sutable to the sad news he had to tell her, and which he would have her credit. But Sir, without any relation of what he said unto the Princess to deceive her: I shall only tell you, how according to his resolution with my Master, he told her that the King of Assyria was alive: He told him what you promised that Prince at Sinope: And he shewed her the Order which you left him to execute in case he fell in the Combate with the King of Assyria. So that the Princess seeing an Order written with your own hand Sir, and perceiving it was not to be read until after your death: she drew as sad a conclusion from it, as Ariantes wished; and she assured her self that the King of Assyria had killed you: and the more because the Prince Ariantes by the means of a witty fellow who was his servant, had caused him to get out of your Chamber that Scarfe which you wore the day before, being the same (as I have heard say) which that Princess denied you in Capladocia, and which you took from the Prince Mazares when he was almost dead by reason of the Shipwrack with the Princess: So as when she asked Ariantes how he knew you Sir, were dead? he told her that Ortalques who followed you, brought back the news, and likewise brought back the Scarfe which formerly had been hers; adding that he had brought Ortalques himself unto her, had not that faithful servant been resolved to revenge your death Sir, upon the King of Assyria's second; and fighting with him he was so wounded that all he was able to do was to come and advertise him of the sad accident according to the order which he received from his Master before the fight. Ariantes added further, that as wounded as he was, he would have brought him, had he not feared that if the Page 10 Guards of the Castle had seen him, the accident would have been too much divulged, before she had well considered upon her own safety. After this, Mandana asked him with a sad sigh, what Ortalques had done with the Corps of his Master? And Ariantes answered her, that the King of Assyria had made himself a party amongst the Souldiers, and would not suffer Ortalques to bring it off; but he had much adoe to steal away and save himself. Therefore Madam (said he unto her) It is most expedient that you think upon the best course to secure your self, for I must confess, that I am afraid the commands of a living and victorious King, will be more powerful, then the orders of a vanquished and dead Prince, though he were the greatest in the world. You may imagine Sir, how this news grieved the Princess Mandana: But in conclusion, after abundance of sad complaints, she told the Prince Ariantes, she desired his advice; conjuring him to make his promise good unto you Sir, and to die rather then to let her come under the King of Assyria's power. Madam (said he unto her) you need not exhort me to defend you against this Prince, for I am sufficiently resolved upon it: but the difficulty is how to do it handsomely, and not to die before you are at liberty. In the mean time, I must once again tell you, that I do not beleieve the Order which I have from the illustrious Cyrus, sufficient to keep the Officers and Souldiers in obedience: For Craessus and Mersyles seeing their Conqueror dead, will perhaps be glad to aid the King of Assyria in getting the Throne, to the end they may ascend their own Thrones. The Prince Artamas, as generous as he is, will perhaps cease being Tributary unto Ciaxares, unto whom he was not so obliged as unto Cyrus: The King of Hircania will doubtless be of the same mind: And I make a doubt whether Gobrias and Gadates will not make use of this occasion, to make the King of Assyria forget all they have done against him. To be short Madam, so many new Conquered people are apt to rebel: and I have good cause to fear that the Orders of the illustrious Cyrus will be but ill obeyed if your person be not secured before the death of the Prince be divulged.

Mandana hearing Ariantes speak thus, and finding much probability in all he said, she told him, that her sorrows were so much above her reason, that she was not able to resolve upon any course to keep her self out of the King of Assyria's power, and desired him to tell her what she should doe: Since you command me Madam (answered he) I shall tell you, that in my opinion, the best course is to depart in all hast and goe unto some Port upon the Euxine Sea, which I know is not above a days journey from hence: that as soon as you are there, to provide a Ship, and make use of it if occasion be: after this, when you are out of the Assyrian Kings reach, then to send unto the Troops to come and receive your Orders; if they obey, and that the King of Assyria do not hinder them, you may then continue your voyage: and if they do not obey, the Madam you may imbarque presently, and secure your Person from the violence of the Assyrian King. Mandana finding all this to be full of reason, did beleieve him: yet she had a desire to send for Chrisantes and Aglatidas: But Ariantes telling her that they lodged far from the Castle, and their design requiring both secrecy and hast, she was contented to let them alone, though her grief was extream; and she feared so much to fall into the King of Assyria's power, that indeed her Soul was all sorrow and fear: So that since she thought no man more fitting to trust, then him unto whom you had trusted your secrets and your honor, she submitted her self wholly unto his conduct: yet she chid him much for not acquainting her with your engagements with the King of Assyria: but to put that off, he told her, that he never knew of it until Ortalques told him, and gave him this Order which he shewed her. So that the Princess resolving to follow his advice, she sent to give Orders for her departure; she did rise as fast as she could, and departed with two women only, beleieving that Ariantes had no further design but to secure her Person.

But Sir, I forgot to tell you, that in case Mandana had not been willing to follow the advice of Ariantes, he had carried her away by force; and would have told her that he had Orders so to doe, and to carry her unto the King her father: yet Sir, that needed not: for as I have already told you, the Princess confiding in the man whom you trusted Sir, and not suspecting that he was in love with her, she her self was necessary to her own carrying away: And the truth is, when the King of Assyria came up, she beleaved Cyrus to be dead, and that Ariantes under the umbrage of Anaxaris was her Protector. But I pray tell me (said Cyrus and interrupted him) what is the design of Ariantes, and whether will he carry Mandana? Sir, replied the man, if he have not changed his mind, he will land at the Port of Cholchis, and keep close in that Province, until he have Page 11 brought one of these two things to pass, either until he have negotiated with the Queen his Sister, or else until he have declared war; for I understood within these few days that there came a man of quality disguised unto him, who told him that his friends had raised a great Party against Thomiris, and that the state of things was so, as he was able to take the Kingdom of the Issedons from Thomiris, which he pretended that Princess unjustly detained from him.

This Scythian who came to Ariantes (replied Indathereses and addressed his speech unto Cyrus) is certainly him, for whom I desired your protection Sir: If so, replied Cyrus, happily we may get more light from him, then yet we know. If he do know any thing (replied Indathereses) I am in good hopes he will impart it to me, for he is my very good friend, and is a little obliged to me: So as since I know him to be a most accomplished man, I have good reason to hope he will not hide what I shall desire to know, if he can impart it without betraying his friend. For Heavens sake, said Cyrus, let me know as much as you can concerning Ariantes; I shall not fail Sir, answered this generous Scythian, for I assure you Sir, I should be as much joyed to help you in the delivery of Mandana, as I was when I had the happiness to help you out of the Massagetian Country. After this, Cyrus thanking him, and confirming the promise he made unto the servant of Andramites, he returned unto the place from whence Mandana departed; but in his way thither he met the Prince Mersiles, who with unequaled sorrow, told him thus, Sir (said he) since one that is a subject unto the King my father hath his hand in carrying away the Princess Mandana, I may perhap seem to be accessary; But if you will be pleased Sir, to consider what he hath done against my self, doubtless you will not think me culpable: As he was saying so, Mazares overtook them, and with so much sadness in his face (as it was easie to see) that though he did not pretend any thing unto Mandana; yet he did very much interest himself in her misfortunes. And Cyrus had no sooner returned a civil answer unto the Prince Mersiles; but Mazares conjured him to tell him, whether he had heard any thing concerning Mandana? So as Cyrus esteeming him very much, and had loved him most tenderly had he never been his Rival, he gave him a most exact account of all passages; but he had no sooner done speaking, then Mazares told him that he was exceeding generous to satisfie his curiosity: For truly (said he) though I never car|ryed away Mandana but once, yet it may very well be said, that I am accessory both un|to the King of Pontus his carrying her away, and also unto this of Arianes, since if I had never begun, they had never followed: But I assure you Sir, that I would spend both my blood and my life, to recover unto her that liberty which I caused her to lose. Alas, alas, cryed Cyrus, considering what is past, what may be expected from the future: After this Cyrus began to march, and muse with himself until he met with the Prince Ar|tamas, unto whom he related as much as he did unto Mazares: And after that he went straight into the Castle, where all Mandana's women stayed with all the Ladies of Thimis|cira, who were to return the next morning, for the River which had not swelled its banks was now confined into its ordinary limits, and would let them pass. But since Arianite was of their acquaintance, she and Pherenice stayed with them, and all the rest of Man|dana's women also: Cyrus desiring Amaldea to have a care of them until their Princess was at liberty; and that she would carry them unto Thimiscira, where he would give or|ders for all things they should need. In the mean time Indath|ereses went to visit Adonacris to scr|u what he could out of him, before Cyrus resolved upon any course: But whilst he was there, he did not only give orders that all honor should be given unto the King of Assiria's Corps, as if that dead Prince were living upon his Throne: But also, that it should be carryed unto the state|lly Tombe which the Queen Nitocris his Mother had built in Babylon. And accordingly about three days after, his Corps was put in a Charriot covered with black cloth embroi|dered with Gold, the horses which drew it, in magnificent harness, and this Charriot was waited upon by two hundred men in mourning on horse-back, whereof half went before it, and half behind.

In the mean time, since it was ever the custom of Cyrus to do a hundred unnecessary things for the service of Mandana, rather then neglect the least expedient that might be serviceable; he conveyed away Spies to Cholchis, where the servant of Arianes said be would land: and he sent Ortalques secretly in a disguise to Gelonide, who had been very fa|vorable to him when he was with Thomiris; but since it was Chrisantes who had the most commerce with her, Cyrus desired him to write unto her; and desired Aglatidas who was Page 12 Nephew unto that wise Lady, to do the like, he himself intending to march slowly to|wards that Country, until he knew precisely where Mandana was. Whilst Cyrus was thinking upon these things, Indath|ereses having been to see Adonacris, and having found him in a condition to be talked with, he conjured him to tell what Arianes his design was? I can tell you, replied Adonacris, that since I came hither, I opposed as much as I was a|ble, the unjust design of Arianes: And truly, generous Indath|ereses, I had a good mind to betray that Prince, to the end I might the better have served him; but since I was afraid to ruine him, by desiring to serve him, I durst not trust Cyrus, unto whom I had not the honour to be known; and if it had been the pleasure of the Gods, that you had been here when I came first hither, things had not now been in that lamentable condition as they are: For truly Sir, Arianes hath lost a Kingdom, to carry away Mandana, and he chused rather to be her Ravisher, then to be King of the Issedons: I do so little unde|r|stand the meaning of all this, replied Indath|ereses, that I cannot give any answer unto it, for since I left Thomiris, I have been alwayes in Greece seeking Anacharsis, who as you know is my Unkle, so as I have only a confused notion of what hath passed in both the Scithia's; and since I desired to forget the ungrateful Thomiris, I would not so much as think upon the Country where she dwelt, nor ask any news of it: 'Tis true, since I came into Asia I understood, that presently after my departure from the Massagettes, there grew a War between Arimtes and Thomiris, by reason of ap|retention which that Prince had unto the Crowne, but I have such a confused knowledge of it, that you would do me the greatest pleasure in the world if you would be pleased to tell me, not only all you know concerning Arianes and Thomiris, but all the adventures happened unto your self; and if you will compleatly oblige me, let the illustrious Cyrus know it also: and to induce you unto it, I must assure you that it much concerns the Prince Arianes (whom you love) you should oblige a Prince, who certainly will one day be his Conquerour. Since I have nothing to speak concerning the Prince Arianes, which can prejudice him (replied Adonacris) but on the contrary, will rather excuse him, I will willingly satisfie your desires as far as I can: But to tell the illustrious Cyrus all that re|lates unto Arianes, and all that concerns my self, will be a discourse so long, that I am afraid, considering my condition, I shall not be able to go through with it: But I have a friend which came unto me this morning, who knows all things as well as I my self, and who speaks Greek excellently well, he shall relate the matter better then I my self can.

Indath|ereses seeing that indeed he was not able to speak so long together, unless he should do himself hurt, though he was indifferent well of his wounds, he accepted of his offer: So Adonacris sending for his friend, whose name was Anabaris, he presented him unto Indath|ereses, and telling him what office he desired from him, he prepared himself for obedience: So that Indath|ereses telling him, that he would first know what ho|ure Cyrus would appoint, and then send him word, he went unto that Prince, and left those two ill|ustrious Scythians. And Cyrus, to loose no time, desired Indath|ereses to bring Anabaris unto him that night: So that he sent to seek Anabaris, and presented him unto Cyrus, who after a very civil reception, desired him to satisfie his curiosity. Then Cyrus, Inda|th|ereses, and he, each of them taking their places, he began thus.

The History of the Prince ARIANTES, of ELIBESIS, of ADONACRIS, and of NOROMANTE.

WHen I consider Sir, by what wayes the Gods do bring the strangest things to pass, and what that indissolveable Chain of small things with great ones, and great ones with small things is, I cannot chuse but admire their order, and acknowledg that it is not fit for men to pry too far into their mysteries: Indeed Sir, who can imagine that the violence which the Prince Arianes hath done unto the Princess Mandana, had its first cause in the adventures which I am now to relate unto you? And that before ever Arianes knew her, he had done a hundred things which put a disposition into his Spirit of com|mitting that Crime which now troubles you; yet it is most certain, that whilst you were with Thomiris, and whilst the Prince Arianes was in the Kingdom of the Issedons with the young Prince Spargapise, there fell out such things, as would have prevented this accident if they had not been: Then Sir, I do think it pertinent to tell you, that the Father of Thomiris was not born a King, and that when he became one he was already married: Indeed Thomiris, who was his then only Daughter, was four years of age when the Prince Page 13 Lypacari her Father, by his prudence & valor possessed himself of the Kingdom of Issedons, after the death of the last of their ancient Kings: So as by this means the Prince Arianes coming into the world two years after Lypacaris, ascended the Throne, Thomiris was six years elder then the Prince Arianes: I tell you this Sir, that you may the better unde|r|stand by what right Thomiris reigns in prejudice of this Prince; for be pleased to know, that the Issedons are so perswaded that prudence cannot be found in youth, as without any difference of Sexes, they have a Law, that when their King dies, his eldest Child must ra|ign: So as if he have a Daughter elder then a Son, the Crown is hers. Things being thus, and the Father of Thomiris dying, this young Princess, who was then fourteen years of age, was proclaimed Queen, because the Prince Arianes was but eight: And she found her way the more easie unto it, because the Son unto the late King of the Massagettes, who was then at Issedon, and was deep in Love with that young Princess, did countenance her cause by his presence, and by his interest, that so he might unite in her person two King|doms under one and the same Authority: And indeed, things went as he wished, for Tho|miris was declared Queen, and he married her presently after: 'Tis true, they stayed not at Issedon, which is the Metropolis of our Kingdome; because the King of the Massa|gettes being dead, the Prince his Son carried the Queen his Wife into his own Country, and he carried her thither in double mourning, because the Queen his Mother-in-law di|ed also: So that this Prince carrying the young Arianes with him, by this means he took him out of the peoples sight, lest, murmuring that they had not a King resident in their own Kingdome, there should any rebellion begin under his name. In the mean time, this young Princess being the first year delivered of a Successor, the King her Husband died suddenly, and left Thomiris Queen-Regent during the minority of the young Spar|gapises, and left her also Queen of two Kingdoms. Though this Queen was very young, yet she reigned Sovereignly and absolutely, and in great glory, making her self so terrible unto all the Grandees and people, that there was not the least commotion in either of her Kingdoms. In the mean time, though she was born at Issedon, though that Kingdom was more civilized then the Massaga|tes, though we have their goodly Towns, and though the others habitation be only in Tents, yet she preferred that warlike people before that which was more civil and polite; so as sending Lievtenants unto Issedon, she dwelt in Tents Royal. Also it was her pleasure, that the Prince Arianes should stay with her, until the People beginning to murmure a little at the exorbitances of those she sent to govern them, and then she sent thither the young Spargapisis her Son, though he was but a child, to the end his presence might appease all tumults. But because that young Prince did love Arian|tes very well, Thomiris let them both go together, which voyage continued longer then she thought of. This was the voyage Sir which those two Princes made when you were with Thomiris, during which time, all manner of diversions were invented amongst us to please the young Spargapises, and keep him amongst us, to the end we might still have him amongst us, who was to be our King. Since Issedon is a place as pleasant as any what|soever, it was there where Spargapises and Arianes stayed most; after they had surveighed all the Kingdome. And though Spargapises was not yet at an age to relish pleasures, yet since Arianes was eight years elder then he, the diversions were most for him; Dancings, Feasts, Balls, and other exercises of the body were for Spargapises, but walks of Gallan|try, conversation of Ladies, and civil society were for the Prince Arianes, who question|less was already one of the most pleasing Princes in the world. Thus whilst he was at Issedon, the Court was very magnificent and glorious, since all the men of Quality and wit in the Kingdome repaired thither, and so of all the Ladies, insomuch as Issedon did flou|rish in a high manner, at least, I am sure, that both the Scithia's were not comparable to it: Indeed we made a great difference between the Scythians and our selves, whom we called *arbarians: The reason why we were more civilized then they was, because we were not very far from the Euxime Sea, and were neer the Caspian, whereby we had more commerce with strangers then the Scythians who lived beyond the craggy Mountains, which divide the two Scithia's. So this mixed concourse of many people which inhabit amongst us, hath sweetened the ferocity of the ancient Scythians, and hath civilized us more then the rest. Also many amongst us do hold, that we are descended from the Grecians, as well as the Calipides, which are another sort of people amongst us, who are reputed Scythians as well as we are: So that whether by my first mentioned reasons, or by our original, que|stionless we are more polished then our Neighbours, as I said before.

But to *eturn from whence I digressed, give me leave to tell you, that Adonacris being Page 14 as accomplished a man as any is upon Earth, was one who had a great share in the friend|ship of these two Princes, especially with Arianes: and certainly Sir, he was loved with abundance of reason, for it was a most difficult thing to find out a man of so amiable a composure as he. For he was not only handsome, and of great courage and wit; but he was one that loved his friend as well as any man living: And he had such an Air and Garb of the world, as he did infinitely please at the very first sight, and therefore it is no wonder if he pleased the Prince Arianes. But Sir, as Adonacris pleased this Prince, so he had a Sister called Elybessis, who better pleased him; and Arianes was so taken with the beauty of this Lady, as I cannot imagine how it is possible such a violent passion should cease, and make room for any other in his heart, whomsoever it was. But Sir, be|fore I make any discription of the beginning, continuance and ending of this love, I must acquaint you, how before the Prince Arianes came unto Issedon, there was a man of qua|lity in that town called Agath|ereses, who was deeply in love with Elybessis, and who was so happy as not to be ill in her opinion: So as it may be said, that Arianes assaulted a place which was already rendered, when he attempted to move the heart of Elybessis: But since that passion was kept close, this Prince did not at the first know, how she whom he loved was engaged.

In the mean time, Agath|ereses did carry it so as it must quickly be known whether he loved or no; for he was of a hot and passionate temper, his desires were so many violence|cies, as magnificent in all things as is imaginable; and exceedingly handsome in his clothes. He was well proportioned, brown hair, eyes quick and lively: and his face did so shew the thoughts of his Soul, as it was easie to know by the sight of him only, that he had a great and fiery heart, much above his quality. But that you perfectly know this Rival of Arianes, let me tell you that he had a most excellent wit, and a quick fancy, full of de|lectable raptures, which makes conversation pleasant. The truth is, there was a kind of inequality in his humor; for he would be sometimes so unlike himself, that he would not speak for a whole day together, and sometimes again, he would do nothing but talke; yet it must be confessed, that this inequality was most caused by some men which did not alike please him, and sometimes also it was a pure effect of his humour and temper. Howe|lver, it may be said of him, that he was sometimes merry, sometimes sad, sometimes complai|sant, & sometimes all contradiction; but let me say thus much of him, in what humour soe[ver] he was, he was always generous, no man in the world being more officious then he: for truly though he loved pleasures with extream eagerness, yet he would quit them all with joy to do any good office, not only unto his intimate friends, but unto any of any virtue whatsoever. Moreover as musique is natural unto all men; so I think it may be said of Poet[sie]; and that there is no people in the world which use not an even measure of words, which sweetly take the ear, and gives an ornament unto their thoughts who write in verse.

As the Scythians, expressly the Issedons use a kind of Poesie not displeasing unto those who understood our language: So I dare assure you Sir, that if you saw the verses of Agathurses and could understand them, you would admire the sublimity of a Scythians Genius. Moreover, when he is in a good humour, his mirth hath such a kind of surprizing impetuosity to it, as doth exceedingly divert, and makes him very pleasing: 'Tis true, our Ladies do a little quarrel with him, for not being respective enough towards the Gods: For the truth is, if any occasion present it self, he will mock at Vesta, which we call Tabiti; at Jupiter and his Eagle; at Vulcan and his Forge; at Neptune and his Trident; at Hercules and his Club: at Mars and his Paramours, and so at all the rest of our Divinities which we and the people adore: Not but that I think he beleeveth all that we do; but since almost all Religions are established upon things which are not of common resemblance, Agathurses had got such a habit of Raillarie which our Ladies can hardly brook. Moreover he made such an open profession of absolute independency, that it was easie to see that he could not subject himself unto any thing but his own will, unless in being amorous: But to make a short definition of him, Agathurses was excellently accomplished; and deserved a most rare Character: This is he Sir, who was loved by Elybessis, before Ariantes was Captivated with her. As for the Lady, it is a piece of extream difficulty to make an exact description of her humour and spirit. Therefore after I have told you, that she is full, of a tall and handsome stature; that she is pale, brown hair, fair eyes, and that the Air of her countenance is noble, languishing and pleasing: I shall only tell you, that she is as full of wit as ambition, though high in both: And though they say, one cannot have two violent passions at once, yet she was in love with Agathurses, though Page 15 she had a most ambitious soul. After this Sir, you may easily conceive, that Ariantes was neither well nor ill received by Elibesis, when he made his love known unto her, for her engagements unto Agathurses, was the reason she could not well receive him; also the ambitious inclination of her soul would not let her treat a man of Ariantes quality ill: So as taking the Medium, it may be said, that she was neither sweet nor sharp unto that Prince.

But Sir, before I engage my self any further in the sequel of this history, give me leave to tell you, that whilst the eyes of all the Court were upon Ariantes and Elibesis, Adonacris began to fall in love with a Lady of eminent quality, named Noromanta, who was come unto Issedon with her Father upon some important business, but he began, and none perceived it, and carried it so cunningly; also there was such conformity of humour between them both, as there was scarce any need to tell each other that they were in Love; yet Noromanta was as reserved in all things, as any woman in the world: And to interest you Sir in her fortune, I beseech you give me leave to represent her unto you as then she was, and as now she is. Imagine her Sir, a great woman, of an advantageous stature, but I mean handsome and noble, of a high and modest ayre, her complexion white, fresh and lovely, her eyes black, sparkling, and sweet, her face round, her mouth well made, her neck full and plump, her garb haughty without any ranting. Moreover, her wit was proportionable to her beauty, she speaks well, and persuades with so sweet an eloquence, as one has no power to deny. She seems to be all goodness, all sweetness, all civility, and all sincerity; and though her enemies do make a question of this last quality in point of friendship, yet they all agree, that though she be not so sincere as she seems, yet it is more pleasing to be deceived by her, then to be faithfully loved by many others; but to speak truly, I am fully perswaded, that Noromanta is only so, to keep her self from being deceived, for I hold her one of the best and most sincere women in the world unto those whom she really loves. Moreover, she hath all requisite qualities possible to imprint a respect in those who come unto her, and I do wonder how Adonacris durst tell her that he was in love with her, but chance helped on his boldness in the discovery of his passion, and I do believe, that if Ariantes had not been in love with Elibesis, Adonacris durst never have told Noromanta, that he loved her: And indeed it was a long time that Adonacris had desperately loved Noromanta, and spoke not a word of it unto her; but this Beauty talking one day unto him when he came to visit her, she told him most sweetly, how all the Beauties in Issedon envied Elibesis his Sister, for captivating the heart of Ariantes, for the very truth was, they were all exceedingly nettled at it: For my part (said she, after she had with much eloquence aggravated all the symptoms of envy which she had observed in the minds of all our Ladies) I do not know any greater imbecility in the world, then to be vexed at any such thing; for if she who is preferred before all the rest has more merit then they have, it is extream injustice to murmur at it; and if the man who gives the precedence does make an ill choice, it were neither glorious nor reasonable to trouble ones self for not getting the esteem of a man, who knows not how to make a good choice; and in my opinion, Love is not always a convincing argument of extraordinary merit in those who cause it, since certainly it is more an effect of inclination, then reason: It is most certain, replied Adonacris, That reason alone never causes love, but withal, I am perswaded, that the love which reason doth authorize, is a thousand times more strong, then that which reason doth resist; and that whosoever loves forcibly, must be able to tell himself, that there is no Civil War betwixt his heart and his reason: I know very well (answered Noromanta) that love would be more strong, if it have reason for a Pillar, but I do believe that doth not often fall out: I cannot tell whether or no it often fall out (replied Adonacris) but I am sure it happens sometimes, and happened unto a man whom you do know: Then certainly (replied she) it is the Prince Ariantes, who indeed hath all the reason in the world to love her whom he adores: No, no, answered Adonacris, for though there were nothing but the inequality of Birth betwixt that Prince, and her he loves, Ariantes had reason enough to oppose his passion: But amiable Noromanta (said he unto her) I intend to trust you with a secret, and to tell you, that it is my self of whom I speak; of my self, I say, who before ever I was in love, had ever in my fancy an Idea of her whom I desired should captivate me, and indeed this Image was so imprinted in my mind, that I went unto no place, but I sought whether I could find her out, of whom my reason had formed an Idea. Oh Adonacris (said Noromanta craftily, and suspected something of his passion) I suppose that Idea is very fair: For my part, I fancy the most admirable Page 16 piece that ever was seen; for I am confident, that in forming the beauty of her whom you would love, you would have her hair the fairest in the world, gray eyes, a pleasant ayre, and I do imagine, you may seek her in all places, but find her no where. Pardon me amiable Noromanta (said he unto her) if I contradict you in all: For first; I shall never affect a Flaxen Beauty, nor have I been so unfortunate as you think: For truly (pursued he and smiled) after I had fancied an Idea of the rarest Beauty in the world, a brown Beauty, and after I had in vain sought her in more Kingdomes then one, I found her the very same day you came unto Issedon, and directly then, when I had the honour to see you the first time: Certainly your memory fails you, (replied Noromanta and blushed) for I do remember very well, that the first time I had the honour to see you, I was alone in my Chamber, when Agathurses brought you thither: I do very well remember it also, (replied Adonacris and smiled) but that is not incongruent with what I told you: For since I must tell you more plainly, it was in your eyes I found that fire which I was in quest of to burn my self, and it was in your fair person in whom I found that perfect Beauty, which I shall never find any where else: I must confess (replied Noromanta) that your language doth surprize me, for either I do not know the world, or if I should believe you, I must answer you as a man who speaks with too much boldness; therefore the best course, both for you and my self is, not to believe you: But by way of your excuse, to think that you are of their opinion, who think they never ought to be alone with a Lady, (unless old) without expressions of such pieces of Gallantry, as will equally suit, either with the fair or the brown Beauties, either with the great or the little, and talk only with lips, and without consent either of heart or thought. Oh Madam (said Adonacris, and interrupted her) my language is not of that nature, and it cannot suit with any but you only. Moreover, I do protest, that my heart makes good all that my tongue speaks, and if I can be accused of any thing, it is because I dare not fully discover the greatness of my affection to you: You have told me so much already, replied she, that I assure you I think it too much, for as much as I esteem you, I must curb my inclination of treating you as one of my dearest friends; I must, I say, shun your company, set a Watch upon my words and looks, and indeed I must so far overcome my self, as (I fear) to hate you.

As Noromanta said so, the Prince Ariantes entred, and did lead Elibesis, so that further discourse was broken off, whereof both of them were very glad, for Adonacris feared lest Noromanta should treat him ill; and certainly Noromanta was not angry that she had no time to do it. But Ariantes and Elibesis were no sooner entred, then Agathurses followed them, who observing that Elibesis did not avoid the conversation of Ariantes, was not very well pleased with her, but was very melancholly all that day, and it was such a kind of melancholly, as rather resembled anger then sorrow, for either he spoke not at all, or if he did say any thing, it was in two words, and those contradictory. Moreover, one might perceive by his looks, that the vexation of his heart would not permit him to speak all he thought. I who came in with the Prince Ariantes, did never in my life see a man whose eyes did better speak the thoughts of his soul, then his: Elibesis also saw it very well. As for Ariantes, he was so taken up with looking upon her he loved, that he never regarded Agathurses; and to augment his grief, the young Spargapises entred, who not knowing well what to say unto Ladies, began discourse with him in particular as soon as he came in: But since Agathurses was both witty and bold, he did not long endure this torment: Therefore inventing upon a suddain some kind of pleasant story or other, which he made a great secret of unto this young Prince, and which he thought would fill him full of curiosity, he told him, that Elibesis did know the whole business, and that if he would be pleased to ask it of her in a low voice, so that the Prince Ariantes did not hear him, doubtless she would tell it unto him: But Sir, added he, you must press her unto it very urgently and long, for I know her humour to be such, that she will never impart what she knows, until after an hundred entreaties: Nay if that be all (answered the young Spargapises innocently) I will put her to a thousand entreaties, and will not leave her all this day, until she tell it unto me: And accordingly, he went presently to Elibesis, and set himself down by her. Since Ariantes was full of respect unto Spargapises, he withdrew, and gave him the freedom of talk with her.

Thus Agathurses parted him and Elibesis, he not knowing the cause. But the best of the story is, Elibesis knew not in all the world what this young Prince meant, and protested unto him, that she understood him not. But since Agathurses had told him, that she Page 17 would not impart under a hundred intreaties, the more importunate was this young Prince with her, by how much she said she was ignorant.

But at the last, she denied him so earnestly, that he beleeveth her, and tormented her no longer: yet notwithstanding since Agathurses had so confidently assured him that she did know it, he said aloud, that Elibesis had so assured him of her ignorance that he believed it was he which was mistaken. I do protest unto you Sir, (replied Agathurses boldly) That there is no person upon earth which knows what you desire to know, if Elibesis do not: And indeed he lied not, for since it was a thing of his own invention, none could know it.

In the mean time, he rallied out the matter so well, that his design of separating Ariantes from Elibesis did take effect: for he did so cunningly engage the young Spargapises to be urgent with Elibesis, that his importunities lasted all the day, which he thought to be well spent since he had interrupted his rival. But that which gave him most satisfaction was, that in the conclusion of Spargapises obstinate curiosity, he observed that Elibesis began to suspect his fallacie, so as he went away less vexed than he was at the beginning of the conversation: And yet he did not think himself fully satisfied, until he had private audience from Elibesis, to tell her of her new Conquest: Therefore the next morning he went unto her so early, that she was not dressed when he entred into her Chamber: And finding her in consultation with her Mirror, he asked pardon for his abrupt entrance; but he asked it in a manner so little submissive, that Elibesis knew he was vexed in mind: therefore ordering the curls of hair more negligently on that side than the other which was dressed, to the end her women might retire, she indeavoured to appease Agathurses if she could: But those who dressed her were no sooner at the other end of the Chamber, then Agathurses with a kind of taunting Gallery, and a malicious smile, told her that the Prince Ariantes was very happy by his coming to see her: For Madam, (said he unto her) if you had continued dressing your self with the same care you began when I entred, he would have found you so fair, that he would have died with love, before you could have had leisure to have compassion upon him. In telling me (replied she and blushed for anger) that the Prince Ariantes had found me fair if he had seen me as I should have been if you had not come; you tacitly imply, that you do not think me fair as I am; but whether it be, that I am not very jealous of my beauty, or that I do not think it depends upon two or three negligent curls: if you did think to anger me, you are extremely mistaken. If you should be in earnest Madam (answered Agathurses sharply) I should be very sorry; for Madam, you are so careful to displease others, that I think it is permissible to wish sometimes your care less. I pray Agathurses (said Elibesis) without any more exercising your wit in taunting terms, tell me what it is you complain of? I complain Madam, (replied he, since you are pleased I should tell you) because High Quality dazzles your eyes; and because you think I ought rather to suffer the Prince Ariantes to love you, than a man of my condition: Yet Madam, I must tell you, that in cases of Rivals, quality is nothing; slaves and Kings are all one: In all other things, I do respect Kings and Princes as much as becomes my duty; but in matters of love, I protest Madam, that I do not value their quality: and though you make a great difference between Ariantes and others, yet I shall not; but shall look upon him as my Rival without any consideration of Spargapises uncle, or Thomiris brother. And to the end you may not doubt of what I say (Pursued he with ex[treame violence) I swear unto you by Vesta, by Hercules, by Mars, by Venus, by Neptune, and by all the gods which we adore, that I will be as good as my word: Since it is allowable to correct ones first thoughts upon some occasions, replied Elibesis, I hope that when your anger is over, you will alter your mind: Nay Madam, as for that, replied he, I shall change; and therefore you may build upon what I say, for really I cannot indure you should be capable of any such imbecility. I do protest unto you Sir, (said she then unto him) that you have no reason in the earth to complain: and if you would have me discol[ver my heart unto you, I will ingeniously confess that its true, Ambition is the predominat[ed] Passion of my Soul; and that the onely reason of my-slight complacency unto the Prince Ariantes, is, because I know that I do thereby vex all the beauties of Issedon, by possessing that Prince so much that he never speaks unto them.

I know very well Madam, replied he, that you do vex them, in causing the Prince Ariantes never to speak unto them: but you may know withall, that you vex me extreame[ly], by perpetuall talking with him. Since he is not to stay here, replied she, me thinks it need not trouble you so much: and truly how do you think I can be uncivil unto a man of Page 18 his Qualitie? Oh Madam, cried he out, it is not Qualitie that justifies a Rival; for I have already told you, and do tell you again, that Qualitie is no reasonable cause of Incon[stancie]: And as for Ambition Madam, believe it Madam, that there is more glory in slighting a Prince then in treating him favourably.

Moreover, how can I assure myself of your mind, and how can the Prince Ariantes assure himself, if you should quit me for him? For truly he is a Prince without a Principality, and there are a thousand in the world whom you would prefer before him, if you had the fortune to know them: and if chance should so bring it about that Spargapises should fall in love with you; you will quit Ariantes who is never to be a King, for Spargapises who ere long is to have a Kingdom: Also if the same fortune (pursued he in a scoffing Rallery) should let you see either the King of Phrigia, the King of Medes, or the King of Hircania, you would for any of them quit the King of the Issedons, and so pass[ing] from King to King, if Jupiter should take a phancie to prostitute one of the gods at your feet, or to come upon his Eagle to do you homage, you would then be unfaithfull unto all terrestriall Kings, to entertain the least of the gods: Oh I beseech you Agatherses (said she unto him) do not use such reverent names to shew the folly of your mind, if you would have me to appease you: I care not for appearing, (said he unto her) but I would either justifie you, or else make you repent of the injustice you have done me. If I have failed I will repent, said she unto him, but since I have not, I must needs protest that you are very injurious to complain: That the Prince Ariantes did never dispossess you of that place which you had in my heart: And that unless he were able to make me à Queen, I will never be more unto him than I am. I pray judge then whether a Prince without a Principality (as you say) be able to give me a Crown. Since in all likelihood (replied he and smiled) Fortune will never do Justice unto your merit, nor find you a King to set you upon a Throne; me thinks you might very well speak more obligingly unto me than you have done, and to tell me, that though Fortune would make you a Queen, and that a great one, yet you would not make me the most miserable man upon earth. But however, since you assure me that none under the degree of a King, shall ever supplant me in your opinion, my soul will be at some rest. I will promise you as much, replied she, upon condition you will not move me to alter my way of living with Ariantes whilst he staves here. For I must profess unto you, that I cannot endure the reports of such as envie me, who doubtless will say, that I would never have changed my way of living with the Prince Ariantes but for the love of you, moreover it will much concern your interest and fortune: Alas Madam, replied he, as for my fortune it is not a reason to be alledged unto me: for I think upon nothing but preserving you: No, no, Madam, deceive not your self, that is not the way to bring me unto your opinion; and therefore be confident, that as long as it concerns onely my Fortune, I will with abundance of joy sacrifice it all, to have so much satisfaction as to see you treat the Prince Ariantes sharply: But still I must confess, that if it reflect upon your honour, I will have as great a care of it as your self, and therefore I do consent you should be something civil towards that Prince; Provided Madam, you have a little care of comforting me in this despair that I am in, and provided you do multiply your goodness towards me: for if you do not, I shall lose all my patience, and be forced to do such things as will displease both you and my self when I have done them. Think upon it therefore Madam, and consider what it is to incense a Lover who hath a soul both high and sensible, and who in the very center of his heart prefers none before him, but such as have more vertue and merit than himself.

The truth is, Madam, (pursued he vehemently) if you seriously consider it you will find, that qualitie doth not infuse any wit into the words of him who speaks; nor alters his sence, nor doth at all contribute unto discourse: Therefore you need not wonder I should take it ill that you should be perfidious unto me for Ariantes his sake, though a Prince, more then if he were my equall. After this, the violence of his mind being by degrees cooled, he began to talk most submissively unto Elibesis; and was so full of his passionate expressions, as in the end he permitted her to continue her complacency unto Ariantes, as she had begun, whilst he stayed at Issedon, which he thought would not be long: so that they parted very good friends; yet they continued not long so, for I do not think one day passed without a squable and a reconciliation.

In the mean time, Ariantes being still more and more in the fetters of love, and not being satisfied with the bare civillie of Elibesis, he resolved to tell her his mind: But since her resolution was to cast him off, and to engage no further with him; he shunned Page 19 being alone with him; but still continued her complaisancy: so as by this means, she satisfied Agatherses, and arrived at her proposed end, which was, to keep this Prince still in love with her as long as he stayed at Issedon, only by being complacential and civil. Thus as great a desire as Ariantes had to express the thoughts of his Soul, he found it a hard matter to do: and the harder, because Elibesis had a friend called Argyrispe whom she entreated never to be out of her presence as long as the Prince Ariantes was at Issedon: So that these two Ladies being continually together, this lover could not meet with his desired opportunity. Again, since love cannot long lye hidden, he came to know that Elibesis did not hate Agatherses, but this in lieu of diminishing his passion, did augment it: and it grew to that height that he was capable of any undertaking to satisfie it. Also he did so vigilantly watch his opportunity of talking in private with Elibesis, that he found it mauger her intentions a few dayes after he sought it: I understood since from her self, that this Prince did express himself as passionately as ever lover did: For after he had aggravated the Grandure of his affection, he let her know how he was not ignorant of that esteem she had of Agatherses: And afterwards he took an odd course of obliging her to prefer him before that Lover. Moreover, Madam, said he unto her (after much of her discourse) do not think I will blame you for the esteem you have of Agatherses, and for preferring him before all others: For truly it was your choice before I had the honour to be known unto you, and Agatherses is a most perfectly accomplished man: so I cannot condemn what you have done for him before I knew you, and before I loved you: And to shew you that I am just, I do not blame Agatherses for continuing his affection, though he do know I love you, because I know very well that you have not forbidden him. But Madam, as I am just both unto you, and Agatherses, so I expect you should be just unto me, and that you will be pleased to take so much pains as to examine both my passion and his, to the end, that without any consideration of our conditions and qualities, you may chuse him who loves you best. But I beseech you examine the business very carefully; ask both him and me the most difficult proofs of our loves: And if you finde that there is a greater difference between his Passion and mine, then there is between my birth and his, I consent you should believe I do not love you, and that you should hate me. Sir, replied Elibesis, I will not say that there is no intimate affection from Agatherses to me or from me to him: for the honour you have done me merits more sincerity from me than so: but I must tell you that though I should do as you desire, and should find that you love me more than Agatherses doth, yet I ought not to cast him off: For truly Sir, our qualities are alike, and it hath pleased Fortune to put me much below you: so as since I cannot imagine there should be any innocent affection between two of unequal qualities: doubtless to follow the rules of reason, I ought to be just unto your merit, and not suffer my self to be dazzled with the glory of captivating such a heart as yours. Truly Madam, replied Ariantes, you cannot in more civill tearms tell me, that you will not cast off Agatherses; but know (too charming Elibesis) there are no words which can make me receive so cruell an answer without abundance of grief and anger: Eloquence may indeed sweeten the sharpest news, and sometimes it is used in telling the deaths of dearest friends: but when it is employed to take hopes out of a lovers heart it is too too weak to do it without abundance of sorrow.

But that you may assure your self it is impossible for me to lose my hopes, I declare unto you, that I will never do it: For I find such an absolute impossibilitie of living without hopes of your love that my very reason tells me, I must keep it alive in my heart. Since so Sir, (replied Elibesis and smiled) It is in vain to wish you would despair, and therefore I conceive it better to give you the liberty of believing as you please, provided I may keep to my self the same liberty of doing what I ought, and what I would. If you doe what you ought Madam, replied Ariantes, you will doe nothing against me: For truly though it were so that you gave Agatherses some hopes of happiness, it was in a time when his happiness would not have been my misery: But now when his happiness will be my death, you ought not to desire it, nor I consent unto it: Therefore Madam, I beseech you consider seriously what you resolve upon: Moreover I am so well acquainted with your inclinations that I know ambition is the predominate Passion of your soul: So as if the poore merits of my person do not move you, yet I beseech you let my qualitie finde acceptance and make amends: and let Agatherses pay more respects unto Elibesis as a Princess then he can do, as her Lover.

Sir, (replied she much perplexed) your language is the most obliging in the world, and Page 20 hath a most sensible operation, both upon my heart and my spirits: But since I must not dissemble with you Sir, I must tell you Sir, I have already told Agatherses, I will never cast him off, unless it be to be a Queen. Therefore Sir, since I am not your Subject; since you have no absolute command over me; and since I have promised unto him eternall affection, I beseech you be so good as to let me live in quietness. If you Madam would let me live in quietness (replied he after he had studied a while) certainly I shall let you: but since you will not, take it not ill, I beseech you if I let not you: but I conjure you Madam, to promise me two things: The first is, that you will not marry Agatherses within the compass of one year: The second, that if in the mean time a King do come and prostrate a Crown at your feet you will accept of it and cast off Agatherses: Alas Sir, (replied Elybessis, and laughed) How can I give any answer unto such an impossible supposition? For truly I do not frequent the Court of any strange King: Long live Thomiris our Queen; and Spargapises is so young that I shall be old before she know how to love, and therefore I profess I know not how to answer you.

Since the thing is so far from possibilitie, replied Ariantes, there can be no danger in answer[ing] it, since it is not like to happen. Truly Sir, replied she, I think you are in the right: Therefore Sir, I will tell you, that as to the first of your things whereof you speak, Agather[ses] cannot think of marrying me within the time you have prescribed, because both his aff[ai]rs and mine will not permit it: And as for the other, I tell you again, since you will have me; That if a King do come and offer me a Crown, and Agatherses do not advice me to accept, then I think I shall, because I should then think he did not love me, and consequently might break off with him. And for my part (said Ariantes and interrupted her) I conceive that if he should advise you to accept of it, you would have good cause to accuse him for want of love; and therefore whether he advise you or not, still ye ought to prefer a King before a Subject, and rather chuse to be a Queen than the Mistress of Agatherses. Seriously, Sir, (said Elibesis then) you swell my joyes to hear you talk thus; and truly I cannot be better pleased, then to know that all you have said are but flashes of pleasant wit: Time Madam will shew that, replied Ariantes, in the mean time remember you have promised me not to marrie Agatherses within one year; and that if in this time, a King comes and begs of you upon his knees to be a Queen, you will accept of the Crown he offers you; These are very easie to be promised, replied Elibesis and laughed: for truly Sir, I have no desire to marry any whosoever: and I am, and ever shall as long as I live be desirous of being a Queen, as far as I may desire it without folly. After this much com[pan]y coming in, the discourse changed, and Elibesis was put into a notable dilemma: for the Prince Ariantes was so full of tender expressions in the beginning of their discourse, and afterwards told such things so improbable, that sometimes she feared he mocked her. But otherwise she had so good an opinion of his merit, that she hath since said; she had more reason to believe that the violence of Ariantes love unto her caused him to tell her of such improbabilities, then to think he spoke not seriously when he said he loved her: However it be, she spake not a word unto Agatherses of all that the Prince Ariantes had said unto her: for though she did not see any possibility in the proposition which he made her; yet since she did not desire to lose this Prince, though she intended to keep Agather|ses, she would not acquaint him with the conference.

But Sir, to the end you may not wonder as well as Elibesis, why Ariantes should speak as he did; be pleased to know, that an Issedonian of great qualitie had been with Ariantes that morning, and perswaded him to think of making himself King, and also offered him the means how to bring it to pass. At first, the proposition seemed unto the Prince not onely as unjust, but as impossible. Yet since he would not reject the motion without more serious consideration, he pressed the man who spoke unto him, whose name was Octomasal|des, to tell him upon what motives he grounded so great a design. Sir, (replied he, as I understood from himself) I first ground it upon Justice, and secondly upon your courage: and upon the earnest desire of the people to have a King who will stay in Issedon. For Sir, the Law by which Thomiris reigns to your prejudice, is, that the eldest son or the eldest daughter unto the King of the Issedons, ought to succeed in the Throne: since so, said Ariantes the reign of Thomiris is just, for she is six years elder then I. No Sir, replied Octomasades, and thus I will make it good: The Law of the Kingdom sayes, that the eldest childe of the King of Issedon shall reign: Now when Thomiris was born the Prince Lypacaris your father and < > was not King, and in all likelihood was never like to be; so as she cannot truly be called the eldest daughter unto the King of the Issedons, since Page 21 when she came into the world her Father was not King: So Sir, since you were born two years after Lypacaris wore the Crown, it is you Sir who are the Kings right born, though he had a Daughter before; and to speak equitably, Thomiris is Daughter unto the Prince Lipacaris, and you are Son unto the King of Issedons. After this Sir, I think you need not doubt the Justice of your Title and Right, or at the least of a very plausible pretence. Moreover, all the people do exceedingly murmure at the remoteness of that Princess who prefers her Tents before our stately Towns, insomuch, as I am very confident, that if you will please to think of ascending the Throne, you may do it with much ease, I will offer my life and fortunes in your service, and also engage all my friends, which are no small number.

Airantes hearing Octomasades speak thus, stood pausing a while, and returned no an|swer: But since he had a very generous soul naturally, until love did alter his inclination, he hearkened unto what Octomasades said, rather as a subtilty to make him revolt from Thomiris, then as a real reason to pretend unto the Crown which she possessed: So not accepting his offer, he only thanked him for his zeal which he expressed unto him. But Sir, by this which I shall now tell you, you may admire the omnipotence of Love. Ariantes who hearkened unto Octomasades, as I told you, did change his minde whilst he was talking with Elib sis, for having discovered the unlimitable ambition of her soul, he resolved to attempt that out of love, which he refused out of ambition; so as it may very well be said, that his desire of reigning only in the heart of Elibesis, moved him unto a desire of reigning over the Issedons: And indeed this was the only reason of his Speech unto Elibesis, when he engaged her to promise not to marry Agather|ses within one year, and to accept of a Crown if it were offered her, imagining that within the compass of this time, his enterprise might either be executed or frustrated: But Sir, it was more then a light thought which love inspired into him, for it was a design fully resolved upon, and a design which he began to set on foot immediately, in order to which, he sent for Octomasades, and that reason which before he hearkened unto as a subtilty, appeared now unto him the justest title in the world: So that conferring with him, they concluded upon the mat|ter, and resolved that Ariantes should upon some pretence let Spargapises return, when|soever Thomiris should call him home; that in the mean time Ariantes should make as many friends as he could, that Octomasades should labour all his, that the people should be diverted with publike Feasts, and to have men about him, who know how to insinuate thoughts fit for the execution of so great a design: Furthermore, they framed a De|claration, to manifest, that the War which Ariantes undertook, was just, and their main drift was to make themselves masters of Issedon. But whilst Ariantes was busied in satisf|ying his Love by his ambition, Adonacris, who had only the thoughts of love upon his soul, did every day by degrees unperceivedly get new esteem in the heart of the fair and charming Noromanta; and as those who have only one design in hand, do execute it bet|ter then those who have many several things in hand; so therefore, Adonacris having no other design, then to get the love of Noromanta, it is no wonder if he did in a short time effectuate it, for truly he was infinitely officious, and he was so assiduuous in his visits, that he saw her at all houres when decency would permit. Noromanta on her side, having a violent inclination towards Adonacris, did but faintly resist him, and did insensibly suffer her heart to be engaged in an affection which she durst not call love, lest she should be obliged to resist and overcome it. 'Tis true, this Love had all the purity in it that was possible, nor do I think any passion in the world could be more refined, or more vertuous then theirs: Nor would Noromanta accustome Adonacris to talk to her of his love, though she was very willing he should love her, and give her a thousand expressions of it, but her modesty was so scrupulous, that she would not let him know her minde.

However since she knew her father did not love to live at Issedon, she could not hope that though Adonacris should aske his consent, yet he would never grant it: And Ado|nacris who had a father of an imperious and fantastical humor, he knew not how to make any such proposition unto him as a marriage with Noromata; who though of a very no|ble family, yet she was not rich enough for him. However, though neither of them could see any hopes of living together, yet they loved each other, and loved without telling each other of it. But yet Adonacris was not very obedient; but he complained of that which he was forbidden to complain: And the fair Noromanta, for all her demure carriage of the matter did sometimes let Adonacris see the thoughts of her soul in her eyes. So that whilst Ariantes had a heart that was ravelled both with love and ambition; Page 22 whilst the heart of Agather|ses was swelled with jealousy, and whilst Elibesis knew not well which she should chuse, and which refuse: Adonacris and Noromata did live lives as sweet as almost possible; for they equally loved each other: and they loved without being known unto any, and they saw one another every day: Yet love being a wonder|ous quiet and restless passion, which will never let a heart be at rest, Adonacris had mainy houres of sorrow and melacholy: And truly when he considered that as well as his dear Noromata loved him, perhaps he should never arrive at his full desired happiness, the very apprehension of the future, made him think the present very miserable: But for all that though his fears of an uncertain misery, did sometimes grieve him, yet since he en|joyed the esteem of Noromata, he was comforted and cheared up his hopes: So that these two persons having nothing in their Souls to conceal from each other, did make such a sweet and innocent exchange of secrets, and such an agreeable and sincere commun|ication of thoughts, that their hearts were more united then ever. Adonacris obtain|ed so much favour, as to write sometimes unto her: not but that he saw her every day; but since it often fell out that much company was with her, he desired so much lib|erty as to tell her that by letter, which he would not tell her before the world: And since it is more civil for a modest person to read a letter of tenderness, then to hear it, Adonacris did write such passionate passages unto Noromata, that she had no mind to understand them: Also she would sometimes answer him, otherwise then she durst tell him, with tongue. But though Adonacris and Noromata did enjoy much tranquility; yet it was not so with Agather|ses and Elibesis: For though this lover did suffer her to continue her civilities unto Ariantes whilst he staid at Issedon; yet he could not endure it, and sometimes did forget both his promise unto Elibesis, and his respects unto Ari|antes.

In the mean time Spargapises being neither in love, nor was ambitious, he employed his times in such things as Princes of his age use to delight in: And whilst Ariantes was plotting to d|sthron him, to the end he might take the heart of Elibesis from Agather|ses: poor Spargapises was delighting himself in his pleasures. Things standing upon these terms, it was known in Issedon, that you Sir, was with Thomiris., and also all your adven|tures: So that Octomasades Sir, closing with an occasion which was so favorable unto his design, did cunningly publish to the people, the Queens passionate doating upon you, how she would arrest you, and how you got out of her power, by the means of the prince Indal|ther|ses, adding many things more then truth, purposely to take off that esteem which the people had of her; for he knew very well there was no better way to make them revolt, then to take away that respect which they had unto that Princess. And indeed, the de|sign of Octomasades did take effect: for assoon as the people knew all passages in the Tents Royal, they murmured from murmur, they began to be insolently high: and from insolvency they fell to flat sedition: so as things did grow up to the highest pitch of disor|der: And Sir, you must know that Octomasades did not do all this out of any affection un|to Ariantes, nor out of any hatred unto Thomiris; but only out of his own particular am|bition. But he carryed the matter so that in a short time he gained all the Grandees in the State, he changed or divided all the peoples hearts: and he knew so well how to make use both of his friends and enemies, that all was in a flame, and all without any danger to him: For Thomiris was so drowned in her sorrows for your departure Sir, that she cared not a straw what became of her Dominions. Yet before the business came to execution, Octoma|sades thought it expedient to tarry till Thomiris called home Spargapises: And indeed the wise Terez, whom you saw with that Princess, moving her to send for the Prince her son and Ariantes, Spargapises obeyed, and Ariantes stayed at Issedon, under pretence of be|ing sick, and assuring the young Prince his Nephew, that he would shortly follow him. But Sir, he was no sooner gone, then Ariantes did set his design on foot: And Octoma|sades having cajoled with the town, and all his friends were perswaded that if Ariantes were once King, it would be Octomasades that would Reign under his name. And the people were so incensed, and so apt for sedition, as it was very easie to move them against him whom the Princess had trusted with her Authority; also to drive him out of the Town, and make the Prince Ariantes master of it. And indeed, since he had no Army which could come up time enough to appease this disorder: Octomasades did happily ex|ecute his design of feising upon Issedon, and began war in the very heart of the Kingdom. I shall not Sir, insist upon any particu|lar relation of the whole business; for I have so ma|ny other passages less tedious to tell you, that I will only in two words tell you, that the Page 23 people by the Artefice of Octomasades, did rebel: some said according as they were in|spired, that Ariantes was their legitimate King, and that Thomiris did but usurp the Kingd|om of Issedons from him: others did second them, and all proclaimed Ariantes King, who took up arms and drove the Lievetenant of Thomiris out of the Kingdom, and se|cured all the strong places of the Town: And all this in so short a time, that it had been done without any resistance, if Agather|ses had not been a rub unto his design: But Sir, since the passages were extraordinary, I beseech you give me leave to insist a little longer upon them. Be pleased to know therefore Sir, that Agather|ses whose mind was en|flamed with love and jealousy, he visited Elibesis as much as he could; not only be|cause he was pleased with the sight of her, but because he would hinder Ariantes from all private discourse: so as when this great tumult was in Issedon, Agather|ses was with Elibesis, who lodged far from that part of the town where the sedition began; in so much as Arian|tes was master of a great part of the Town before they knew it. But at last, the disorder was so great and universall, that the noise of it reached their ears, and interrupted Agather|ses, who was discoursing with Elibesis, both concerning his love and his jealousy: As they were much surprised at so great a noise, and full of curiosity to know the cause; one of the women of Elibesis came frighted in, and told her mistress that all the town was in arms: That Ariantes would make himself King and that none durst resist him. You may well imagine Sir, that this news filled Agather|ses and Elibesis with wonder: yet Agather|ses believed that Elibesis did not onely seem fuller of wonder than really she was, and that she knew something of the design: For I forgot to tell you Sir; that the night before, Ariantes talked at least two howers together of his passion with her, and A|ather|ses knew it. So that this Lover, hearing his Rivall would be King, and fearing least he should become his Subject, his sorrows were beyond expression: and the more, because he believed or at least feared, that Elebesis was Prince to the plot and approved of it: so as not knowing what to believe, or not to believe, he looked fixedly upon Elebesis, as if his eyes would look into the very bottom of her heart; I have reason to think Madam, (said he unto her) that you are acquainted with the unjust proceedings of the Prince Ariantes, since you told me once, that unless you were a Queen, I was in no danger of losing you: But know Madam, that since I am as faithfull a Subject as a Lover, and as terrible an enemy as a Ri|vall, the Prince Ariantes is not yet in a condition to offer you a Crown; and he shall never set you upon the Throne, untill after he hath sent me to my grave: Let me therefore leave you Madam, and either go meet death, or give it him, who removes me out of your heart: For I do profess I can never live a Subject, either unto my Rivall or my mistress: And I swear by all the gods that are adored at Issedon, or any where else in the world, that I will never be your Subject or Ariantes: After this Agather|ses went his way though Ele|besis would have stayed him: for though she was ambitious and desired to preserve Ari|antes, yet she loved Agather|ses: But it was in vain to recall him; for since the noise in|creased Agather|ses transported with rage and fury, would needs go and see if he could find any means to quash the Rivals design: so as he went out at a back door, least he should be compassed about with a croud of seditious people, and not know what to do.

But he was no sooner got out, then he met one of his friends, who with a hundred men onely would seize upon a For or Tower, which Ariantes was not yet master of: So as Agather|ses without more delay went with this party to oppose Ariantes. But before they could get into this Tower, they met with this Prince, and fought him with incredible va|llour: As for Agather|ses he did as much as any jealous Lover could, who fought with his Rival: and he made his way so through the press and got unto the Prince Ariantes, who seeing him come on so furiously, received him with the same vigour, the other assaulted him asking him for all the tumult, whether he fought, as subject unto Thomiris, or as the lover of Elebesis? I fight (replied he fiercely) to hinder you from being King; to hinder Elebesis from being Queen; and to keep my self from being subject unto either her or you. After this, Agatharses made a blow at Ariantes which slightly hurt him in the left arm: And Ariantes made another at Agatharses which scratched him on the right side; and which had killed him, had he not warded it with much cunning and force.

But in conclusion, Ariantes being ten times more numerous then his enemies, Agatharses was not able to retard the designs of this Prince: For all his men being neither souldiers, nor men of quality, they ran away as soon as they saw ten or twelve of themselves killed: So that Agatharses fearing to fall under the power of his Rival, or else to become either his Prisoner or subject, he was forced to retreat by a back-lane: but it was with so much Page 24 sorrow and rage, that never man was more desperate. All he could do was to get into the house of a friend: for since he had assaulted Ariantes, he durst not go into his own house: Furthermore, he sadly heard that nothing could withstand his Rival; and that the tumultuous assembly had declared that Thomiris, was only daughter unto the Prince Lipacaris, and that Ariantes was the son unto the late King of Issedons, and consequently King according to the Lawes of the Realm: But to his greatest grief, he was given to understand, that Ariantes whose wound was so slight, that he wore his arm in a scarf rather for fashion than need, had been a whole house with Elibesis. And indeed Sir, since the ambition of this Prince was only an effect of his love, he no sooner saw his design executed, but maugre all his business, he would needs visit her whom he loved and adored: and he might the better do it, because the main weight of this great enterprize did most depend upon Octomadas. I understand that when he first entred into Elibesis Chamber, he found her very sad, yet she received him very lively.

Now Madam, (said he unto her) the King which means to present you with a Crown, will very shortly be in a capacity to put it upon your head, and to do Justice unto your merit: But Madam, It is to you only I ow my thanks for the obedience of my subjects, for if I had not been your slave, I had still been subject unto Thomiris: yet since I would not seat you upon an ill established Throne, I come now only to make a tender of it unto you, and that you will be pleased to prepare your self ere long to ascend it, and to beseech you not to make any prayers which may move the gods to forsake me, or to protect Thomiris to my prejudice and advantage of Agatharses.

I must confess Sir, replied she, that my reason is at present so distracted, that I am not able to give an answer: and therefore I beseech you give me some time, not only to recollect into my memory what you have said unto me, but also to consider what I shall say unto you; for truly Sir, I am yet so unresolved that I know not well whether I speak unto the Prince Ariantes, or unto the King of Issedons: You will ere long know it Madam, (said he unto her) and if you will not thwart your own Fortunes and mine, you shall know that I am King of the Issedons, and by my ceasing to be your subject, you may begin to be my Queen.

After this, Ariantes retired, and left Elibesis in a great uncertainty: for truly since she loved Agatharses, it was not possible she should be a Queen unless her constancy was shaken: But since the Throne of a new King did but a little charm her, she resolved upon nothing, but would determine upon the matter hereafter according to the event of things: Thus not knowing whether she had more love or ambition, her mind was in much uncertainty.

In the mean time Agatharses who was hid in his friends house was in a most horrid despair; Can I live said he, and suffer my Rival to be a King? and my self to be a Subject both unto him and Elibesis? Fie, fie, I cannot be so basely unworthy: I must either finde out a way to hinder my Rival from being King, and my mistress from being Queen, or else I must and will die with despair and grief. Afterwards falling into a profound studie, he remembered that there was some places in the walls of Issedon which were broken, and the breaches so great, that he might easily get out with horses: So as conceiving that the multitude and weight of business which lay upon Ariantes & Octomadas, might keep them from any thoughts of repairing those breaches, or from guarding them, he thought his design not impossible: for since no army was on foot, they had more reason to think upon Levies, and to secure themselves in the Town, than to attempt any thing without it: so that Agatharses believed, that if Elibesis pleased, he could get her out of Issedon by the help of his friends through one of these breaches: And by this device rest quietly without being subject either unto his Rival or his Mistress. But not to make a vain Proposition, he provided as many men as was necessary for her guard: He sent to view the places, and he was so industrious, as in all likelihood he wanted nothing but the consent of Elibesis. So that having put all things into good order, he writ that same night unto Elibesis to give him a private audience, which considering the present juncture of things, she durst not refuse. For since she knew him to be of a very violent temper, she feared lest he should either perish in some desperate attempt, or else cause Ariantes to perish: so as thinking she should at least perswade him unto patience, untill she was fully resolved in her self, she resolved for the present to go the next morning upon a visit unto his wife, in whose house Agatharses lay hid: and so see him with more safety than at her own house.

Page 25 But Sir, before I acquaint you with the discourse of these two persons, I must needs acquaint you with the cruel separation of Adonacris and Noromanta: for at the beginning of this tumult, the father of this fair one being faithfully devoted to the service of Thomiris, and seeing the design of Ariantes, he would not stay any longer in a rebellious Town: Therefore assoon as he saw Ariantes was like to thrive in his design, and not being able to oppose him, he went out of Issedon in the disorder, and carryed his daughter with him: and before any Guards was set upon the gates, and whilst all was in a tumult, he put Noromanta in a Coach, and got out before any could acquaint Adonacris. You may imagine Sir, how this went to his heart, and how he was wonder-struck when after he had followed Ariantes all the day, and past all the peril, he heard that Noromanta was not in Issedon, yet since he imagined that her father would carry her to his own house, his sorrows lessened, in hopes to hear from her if he sent an Express: and indeed he writ unto her the very same hour, and sent his Letter by one of his own men; for considering the state of things, Honour would not permit him to absent his person, being engaged in the Prince Ariantes Partie. But to return unto Elibesis and Agatharses, be pleased to know Sir, that Elibesis was with the Lady, in whose house she was to see Agatharses, and where indeed she did see him. But to the end this meeting might be closely carryed, Elibesis carryed with her only one woman, and that discourse might be more free, chance ordered it so, that the Lady of the house being sick, Elibesis could see her but a while, and the Lady left her with Agatharses and the woman which followed her: And assoon as this lover saw himself at liberty to speak his thoughts; I know not Madam, said he unto Elibesis, whether you will hear me without hate; but I am certain you cannot deny me what I shall aske, without deserving I should leave loving; for, not to trouble you with any long winded story, if you refuse to go out of Issedon, and to get out of the power of my Rival, I shall have reason to think you prefer him before me, and that you will willingly submit unto him: And to remove all difficulty, I shall tell you in two words, I know an infallible way how to get you out of Issedon this very night ensuing. I have men ready for your guard: A Lady of your acquaintance and friendship, hating this rebellious Town, will go out of it with you: And I will carry you both unto the Queen, begging nothing from you, but that you will not expose your self unto the Tyranny of an usurper, who doubtless will presently fall, and ruine you if you should be so unjust as to forsake me for him. I assure you Sir, (replied Elibesis with much astonishment) That I would go out of Issedon with all my heart, but since I cannot do it with my honor, I must stay here: For truly how can I with any handsomeness go out, having a father and a brother engaged with the Prince Ariantes? but truly (added she subtilly, and purposely to appease him) I cannot tell whether I should be able to deny you, if I were sure his design would prosper; but I pray Sir, consider that Ariantes will know of my departure, and knowing will follow me, and sending men after, will bring me back: and should be extremely sorry to see you killed before my face, or at least made a prisoner, and therefore it's better to sit still then to run such dangerous hazards. Do not deceive both your self and me Madam (replied Agatharses sharply) for you can never perswade me that it is a fitting a woman of your beauty should stay under the power of an usurper, who is in love with you, when as you may if you please get out: and I must go a little further Madam and tell you, that though I were not your lover; though you had never made me any promises of eternal affection: and though you had no other inducement to go out of Issedon but your own honor; yet you ought to go if you could, and steal away, even from your parents if they should oppose it: unless you were resolved to obey the Prince Ariantes in all things without any exception: you know Madam, he loves you as much as possible, and yet you will remain under his power. Tell me I beseech you Madam, what safety can you have of your Person when you are under the command of a Prince, who to pull the Crown off his Sisters head, doth violate all manner of Rights, stifles all the Laws of nature and Justice, and who to satisfy his ambition, cares not to set two Kingdoms in a flame, to make Rivers of blood, and Mountains of dead men: Consider Madam, what he will do to satisfy his love, which is a more quick, lively and active passion; yet you think your self safe under the power of such a lover, but does not consider that he will be transported into the most violent extremities if you resist him: If you do not apprehend all this Madam, it is because you are resolved not to resist him, for otherwise you would quickly take me at my word, and get out of Issedon this very night: However I must tell you thus much, that to be the wife of a wicked usurper, who doubtless will ere long be Page 26 overwhelmed in the ruines of his new ill gotten Throne, is a most miserable piece of Fortune: and according to all probabilities, Ariantes will shortly be in that condition. But the truth is (added he, and lifted up his eyes to heaven) that if he be not miserable untill after you have made him happy, he will die with glory, and I with unequalled despair.

Consider therefore Madam, I conjure you, what answer you will give me: Think seriously what an amorous Tyrant will desire who is master of her he loves, moreover, I swear unto you by all the Divinities of Heaven and Earth, that if you will not do what in all reason you ought, I will do all that Love, Rage, Jealousie, hatred and revenge can make a desperate Lover do, either to ruine his Rival, or to be revenged upon his Mistress. For I do profess once again, I will never be a Subject either unto Ariantes or Elebesis: Yea, express your self so violently (said she unto him) that Sir, I know not how to answer you: and you answer me so coldly replied he that I may well enough understand you; but since my love is above my reason I will not believe what your eyes do tell me, and what your words do make me understand: Therefore to give you a little time of repentance, consider my affection to you. I am violent its true, but the same fire which inflames my anger when I am wronged, the same makes my love so zealous; and therefore do not upbraid me with my impetuosity, I conjure you, unless you will augment it, and if it be possible, cure your mind of so much weakness as to be dazzled with the deceiving glister of Grandure, though it be a legitimate grandure, and not usurped as that of Ariantes, which is but a bubble of the people, and will vanish to nothing within a while. Consider well too ambitious Elibesis, and act not both against your self and me: and do not drive a man into despair who is not master of his own thoughts when his love is injured; Speak Madam, I beseech you, but be sure you speak as you ought to do. Doubtless, I shall speak as I ought to do, replied she, but I do not think I shall speak as you would have me; for the truth is, I cannot suffer my self to be violently carried away. Oh Madam, (replied he and interrupted her) this word violently do not sute with my intentions, since I am so far from offering any violence, that I would have you avoid it; but I see you do not fear what the Prince Ariantes will do, when he is master of your heart.

But Madam, since he hath driven me out of it, you must give me leave to do what I can to drive him out of the Throne which he hath usurped, though I cannot drive him out of your heart. And therefore give me leave to do the duty of a true Subject and a faithfull Lover in taking the Queens part: Yet let me first acquaint you, that whensoever you hear any Troops are marching against Issedon, know that I am certainly in the head of them; and when you hear that Ariantes is wounded or like to be, be sure it is I, who will do what I can to kill him: In short Madam, you may be sure, that if the war continue, my Rival or I must die: And be confident I will use the utmost strength of my power, to leave loving you and to become all hate and revenge. These Madam, are the thoughts which you have inspired into a man who could have no other but to adore you, if you would not change him for another: You are so very violent (replied she) that I know not what to say; You are so unreasonable, answered he, that the most patient man alive would be transported more than I am.

For Madam, what one obliging word do you give me? I tell you (answered she) that I esteem you as much as ever I did, yet for all that I must act with prudence; and therefore though I should be glad to go out of Issedon; yet I must not, since I cannot without a crime, and without exposing my self unto the anger of my father, my brother, and exposing them to be ill used by the Prince Ariantes, who would suspect them accessories to my flight. You are a very good daughter Madam, (replied Agatharses coldly) and a good sister, but believe me a very bad Lover: I beseech you Sir, (said she unto him) do not unjustly complain against me, but wait upon the event of things; you tell me that the Prince Ariantes will shortly be hurried from the Throne: stay then and expect his fall with patience, and let both you and me live at rest till then. I do very well understand you Madam, (replied he hastily;) you would have me let you alone untill you may make your choice according to the event of things; that is to say, if the design of Ariantes succeed well, you are resolved to close with him, and look upon me as your Subject; and if it suc|ceed ill, then perhaps you will admit of me for your slave. But Madam, the heart of Agat|hereses cannot so basely close with time: I have loved you and you have not hated me; keep in that mind still I beseech you, or if you cannot, give me leave to trie if I can fall off also. For truely Madam: (pursued he with much vehemencie) I wish Hercules may beat my brains out with his club; that Neptune may push me into the bottom of the Sea with Page 27 his Trident, and that Jupiter may blast me with his Thunder-bolt, if ever I depend upon the good or bad success of the war. Therefore Madam, chuse now which you please, or ne|ver; but consider I beseech you, that Ariantes is an usurper of four and twenty hours standing: That his Throne stands but upon loose sand, and that I am a most faithful subject to the Queen, and the most faithful lover in the world. Moreover Ariantes did not love you till of late, and I have both lov'd and ador'd you many years: Ariantes will not love you till he enjoy you; but I will love you till I die: but to oblige me unto this Ma|dam, you must quit Issedon; If the Gods whose names you use, replied Elibesis, were not extremely good, doubtless they would punish you for all your prophanations, and your injustice; but to give you a direct answer, I will peremptorily tell you that I will not go out of Issedon, and because your violencies doth authorize mine, I must tell you further, that if you had loved me without self-interest, you would never haue grudged my being a Queen; but had rather have been my subject, then my Husband: but it is no argument of a superlative love, to desire the enjoyment of her he loves, and not to endure a Rival should possess her: Whosoever does not desire the enjoyment of her he loves, (replied Agat|hereses) is not any superlative lover. Ah Madam, truly I cannot love so, and whosoever can be contented to part with her he loves, loves but imperfectly: But Ma|dam, since you will not do as I desire, I must do as you would not have me.

After this, Elibesis finding more love in her heart then ambition, expressed her self as well as possibly she could to appease him, to molifie him, and to *elude him; yet not telling him that she would go out of Issedon, nor directly promising she would not mar|ry Ariantes. But Agat|hereses having wit at will, did know the thoughts of her heart, as well as if she had ingeniously confessed them: and indeed he did so plainly see, that she would neither lose him nor keep him, that he was transported more then before: And Elibesis also having her turn of anger, did upon a sudden leave him, and so they both parted very ill satisfied with each other. Agat|hereses told me since, that he intended to desire the man with whom he lodged, to keep Elibesis in his house, to the end he might have carryed her away the night following whether she would or no: But this design being very imprudent, he thought that neither his friend nor his wife would ever con|sent unto it; so as he rejected that thought, as a thing impossible to be executed. In the mean time, after he had in vain perswaded Elibesis to go out of Issedon, he began to think of getting out himself, and the rather because he was advertised that the Prince A|riantes caused a search to be made for him, and would secure his person: therefore with|out further delay, he disguised himself, and the night following he went out of Issedon through the breaches in the walls; and he went out so happily, that if he had deferred it one day longer, he had missed of his aim; for Octomasades caused those breaches to be repaired the very next morning. But at parting he writ unto Elibesis, and in such an odd manner, as never was love letter in the like: for my part, I think I have given a hundred copies of it, and I have writ it so oft that I think I am able to repeat it word for word: And thus this desperate lover writ unto his ambitious Mistris.

AGATHERSES unto ELIBESIS.

Madam,

I Could not chuse but tell you at parting, that since fortune and love could make people mi|serable, they never left a-y in such a cruel uncertainty as you and I: For Madam, you stay in Issedon, not knowing whether you shall be Queen, though you have a most ambitious desire of being so: And I depart out of it not well knowing whether I can hinder my Rival from being King, nor whether I can banish you out of my heart, as you banisht me out of yours: But I am sure only of this, that if I do continue loving you, it shall be against my will: And though I should love you as long as I lived, with the same zeal I did when Ariantes came first to Issedon, yet I will never tell you so as long as I live: This Madam is the very last Testi|mony of my love you shall ever receive from me: But my going into the service of Thomiris, shall not be the last Testimony of hatred, which my Rival shall receive. Adieu Madam, I know not whether Fortune will ever give you any subjects; but I am sure love gave you a slave that deserved to be kept, and the chains he wore perhaps would have been more glorious to you, then the Crown you hope to wear will be.

AGATHERSES.

Page 28 Though this Letter was somthing sharp, Elibesis yet was not much moved at it; but since ambition was then predominat, she would not answer it: And Agat|hereses under|standing by him who delivered it, that she said she had no answer to return, he entred in|to a new despair, which made him pass for one of the faithful subjects in the world: For Sir, he went unto the Tents Royal, and offered Thomiris to levy men at his own charge, and to spend both his state and fortune in her service. And since that Princess could not find a man of more courage and spirit then he, she made him Lieutenant General of the army which she intended to send against Issedon; and which she would not lead her self, because she fell sick of sorrow for your departure Sir. But whilst Thomiris did strive to hinder Ariantes from making himself King, Ariantes studied how to keep the Crown he had got, and how to make Elibesis Queen. Whilst, I say, Adonacris did wait with much impatience for the return of him he sent unto his dear Noromata, that Lady was in a strange conjuncture of troubles. For Sir, be pleased to know, that her father, whose name was Targitas, and who was an imperious and violent man, after he came to his house bethought himself how to signalize his fidelitie to Thomiris: and this house of his being very strong, he made a Garrison of it, and prepared himself to go unto the Armie, as soon as the Queen had begun her march.

But Sir, since in the beginning of these troubles every one looked like an enemy, and every one stood upon his guard, he whom Adonacris had sent unto Noromata, could not carry himself so, but the father of this fair one discovered that he had some secret business: so that causing him to be stopped and searched, they found the letter which Adonacris writ unto Noromata: which as he told me since was very long, and very tender: For since he foresaw that he should be long from her, and knew not whether he could write after, he desired to put her in memorie of his zealous Passion: but this Letter which he hoped would produce some good effects proved quite the contrary; for Sir, the father of Noromata, no sooner saw it, but he was extremely angry, for he saw his daughter did not hate him who writ it.

So as imagining this affection to be of another nature then it was, he applied all violent remedies to break it off: For though he esteemed Adonacris very much, yet he would not have him marry his daughter, though upon no other reason, but because he sided with Ariantes: So that this violent man without more delay resolved to marry her to a man of good account, called Sitalces, who had been long in love with her, and asked the questi|on before ever he went to Issedon, but he intreated him to stay for an answer untill his re|turn: And so resolving that the first news which Adonacris should hear of Noromata, should be of her marriage, he kept the man who brought the letter under the notion of a spie; and gave as favourable an answer unto Sitalces as he could possibly either expect or desire. After which he went unto Noromataes chamber, and commanded her to receive Sitalces as the man whom she was to marry within the compass of eight dayes, without any Ceremony; it not being fit said he to feast it at the beginning of a Civil war. You may imagine Sir, how Noromata was surprized at this and troubled at this command: for being naturally of a sweet, mild and modest temper, she knew not how to resist Targitas, yet since Sitalces was one that made open profession of bravery, and to be the first al|lways in all dangers and attempts: she beseeched her father to consider, that to marry her now unto Sitalces in the begining of a bloody war, was to put her presently into mourning, and therefore desired him to stay till things were composed betwixt Thomiris and Ariantes. But Targitas knowing very well her real reason, he was very angry at her, and told her that without any more adoe she must obey, and obey presently, and with a good will. And that you may the sooner resolve upon it (said he in a transport of anger) Let me tell you, that though you should not marrie Sitalces, yet you shall never marrie Adonacris. You may imagine Sir, how Noromata wondred her father should know of any passages in Issedon; but her wonder increased when she offered to justify and excuse her self, for he charged her not to speak; telling her, that she could no way justify her admittance of Adonacris without his leave, then by marrying Sitalces at his command. Noromanta did not yet yield; but at last yield she must, and suffered Sitalces to visit her as the man whom she was to marry.

And indeed within eight dayes after, he did marry her much against her will; for Sir, you must know that Targitas was a man so peremptory, and had in his face such a terror as caused fear; so that Noromata was excusable in not resisting him: and the rather, because she obeyed him with extream sorrow and repugnancy. But that which rendred her most Page 29 deserving pittie, was because she had an extream naturall aversion against Sitalces, as she had an inclination unto Adonacris: yet fear and virtue together moved her to obey Tar|gitas. But to compleat her grief the next morning after the marriage her father came in|to her chamber, and shewed her the Letter which Adonacris writ: I would not shew you daughter (said he unto her) what Adonacris hath writ unto you, untill I had put you into a condition of answering as I would have you. But now since you are wife unto Sitalces, I cannot think you will be the Mistress of Adonacris. And therefore, since I would have all manner of gallantries end betwixt you, and have no ill consequences; I pray write unto him in my presence; but write as I shall desire you, and as vertue requires you should: which is, that you are the wife of Sitalces; that you would have him never to write unto you again, and that you forbid him ever to see you again as long as you live. To tell you Sir, how Noromata grieved at the sight of Adonacris his letter, and at his apprehending the sad news of her marriage, is not an easie matter: yet since her father was a man that would not be dallied with, resolve she must, to write, or not to write; did she follow her own inclination, write she would not, since she would not write such bad news. But afterwards, considering she was married unto Sitalces, and it was not fit to hold any longer commerce with Adonacris, therefore she thought best to overcome her self, and not an|ger her father, who being all violence and haste had acquainted him that married her with the business.

Thus Sir, though the fair Noromata had her soul full of affection to Adonacris, though her eyes did swim in tears, her heart beat, and her hand tremble, yet she did write as Tar|gitas would have her. Tis true, that maugre the trouble of her mind, she called such words to express what her father desired, as it was easie to see her soul was full of sorrow. However, as soon as this letter was writ Targitas delivered it unto the man whom Ado|nacris sent; And not permitting him to see Noromata, he caused him to be conducted a dayes journey from the place where he was.

All this while Adonacris was in a most impatient perplexitie, and expectation of his re|turn whom he had sent unto her. But alas, his return was much more grievous unto him, when he understood how he had been arrested, searched, and Targitas seen his letter: But much more still was his sorrow, when he heard that Noromata had married Sitalces, when he read her letter: Since I was the confident of his sorrows, I am able to assure you that they were in a most high degree: but since he knew that Noromata had an aversion unto Sitalces, he could not charge her with inconstancie, only of a little weakness, though it was such as her vertue might excuse, since she did it only in obedience to her father: But since this was a misery without remedy, he complained sometimes in such feeling expressi|ons as moved me to pittie him very much.

Alas, alas (said he the day he received Noromatas letter) unto what strange destiny am I reserved? If I had a dozen Rivals and all preferred before me, I should be much less mi|serable then I am, though Noromata doth not hate me, and hath a husband whom she loves not. For such a misery though great, yet was not without a remedy: But that No|romata should be wife unto one whom she hates; and that she should be a woman of a rare vertue, this is a thing which leaves me nothing to do but complain and pittie both her and my self. Yet surely her affection unto me was not great, since she was able to obey so soon; and I wish unto the gods that mine to her were no more violent. However Sir, Adonacris had a desire that Noromata should know his sorrows; and therefore as soon as he heard that Targitas and Sitalces were gone unto Thomiris, three dayes after the marriage, and that they had sent unto a Town called Tyanis, with intention to continue there as long as the war lasted, he dispatched one of his servants unto the place where she was. Yet Sir, she would not read his letter, but sent it back sealed together with this note, which had neither superscription, nor subscription unto it.

Since I am not now the same I was when I permitted you to write unto me, forbear writing unto one whom decency will not allow so much as to see your letters, much less to answer them: I have not opened this you sent, for I do not love to hear of miseries which I neither can nor ought to ease: And I desire you with all my heart, never to write to me again as long as you live; And to believe confidently, that I can never do any thing more advantageous for you, than not to excuse my self, and permit you to hate me, if you cannot cease loving unless you pass from love to hatred. After this, ask no more of me, for I do profess this is the last time of writing unto you, and I would not have written now, but only to desire you to write no more unto me.

Page 30 After the reading of this letter Sir, the miserable Adonacris had nothing to do, but to strive with his sorrows, and to suffer them without seeking a remedy. Yet he was vexed with a fresh inquietude: For you must know that after Thomiris had her Army up, and Ariantes in the head, Agatharses upon the first occasion killed the brother unto a Lady of high account, called Argirispe, whom I told you was a friend unto Elibesis, so as by this means Argirispe being one of the richest matches in all Issedon, the father of Adonacris and Elibesis, whose name was Tyssagetties, had a fancy to marry his son unto her; and he was so earnest upon it that he never let him enjoy any rest. Also he employed the Prince Ariantes, and Octomasades to perswade him unto a marriage with her. For in those times of tumult Ceremonies were not stood upon; and therefore the mourning of Argirispe was no hindrance unto her marriage: And as for Argirispe, she was not unwilling to marry such a well accomplished man, who was brother unto her who was shortly to be a Queen: So as the whole Family of Adonacris being met together to persecute him, and to tell him that he did not love the Grandure of his house: he was so chid by them that in the end he told them, he would do as they desired.

Thus was the marriage made in four days, by the authority of Ariantes; but to tell you truly, his greatest enducement was, because I perswaded him to stifle a passion in which he had no hopes; and because he hoped that perhaps the beauty of Argirispe might by degrees root Noromata out of his heart. Thus though Adonacris did still love Noromata, and not love Argirispe; yet he lived very lively towards her. But to his comfort, the Prince Ariantes having viewed his Troops, departed from Issedon, with intention to meet the Army of Thomiris, which was advancing with design to decide the matter by battle; and by this means Adonacris was delivered from his constraint of being with Argirispe. Thus Sitalces and Adonacris were engaged in two contrary sides; for Sitalces followed his father in law, and went to Thomiris three days after his marriage with Noromata: And Adonacris engaged with Ariantes: so as they were in contrary sides, as well as Ariantes and Agatharses, who as I told you before was Lieutenant General of Thomiris her Army, which the young Spargapises commanded, by the advice of the prudent Therez, by reason of the Queens indisposition. But to speak truth, since Spargalpises was but a child, and his name only used to prevent the pretension of others; and since Agatharses was more forward then any other, being exasperated by the whet-stones of love, hatred and revenge, it was he who indeed was General of the Army.

In the mean time, the Prince Ariantes before he went from Issedon, did set guards upon Elibesis; lest during his absence the friends of Agatharses should attempt any thing against her. But Sir, I forgot to tell you, that before he went away; he courted Elibesis as earnestly as he could to marry him: For though he had told her that his Throne was yet but ill established to set her upon it; yet since his love increased, he pressed her unto it: yet all in vain; for she was resolved to marry none under a King, and a King quietly settled in his Dominion: It being certain that of all Subjects she loved Agatharses best, and much better than Ariantes though a Prince.

Thus finding several pretences which did not incense this Prince, she denied his desire, and he was forced to retire without marriage: So as by this means Agatharses was not in so bad a condition as Adonacris; for he had a Rival to fight with, whose death might be advantageous to him. But as for Adonacris, though Sitalces were killed he were never the better, since Agarispes was his wife: so that I think none could be in a sadder condition than he was during all that war. I will not make any particular relation of this War unto you Sir, lest I should abuse your patience: yet I must needs tell you, that when both armies met, and many Subjects of one Princess ready to kill each other, the most prudent of both sides and the least interested did make some overtures of an accommodation, and began to talk mildly upon the matter before they fell to blows: So as the wise Terez and Targitas, did so negotiate the business, mauger both Agatharses and Octomasades, who were all for war; one out of ambition, the other out of love, that they brought the business to a kind of Treaty.

And within a few days after, it was resolved to meet at a certain place and confer, and each side give their reasons, and thereupon to advise upon the best expedients of composing the difference. The place of conference being resolved upon, Ariantes nominated Octomasades and six other Commissioners on his side: Agatharses carried the matter so well that he himself was chief Commissioner for Thomiris, to the end he might transact Page 31 against Ariantes, as well during the conference as the War; and certainly he did most worthily acquit himself, for do not think it possible any could bring stronger reasons to maintain, that though Thomiris was born before her Father came to the Crown, yet she ought to be looked upon as the eldest Daughter unto the King of the Issedons, and not only as the Daughter of Lipacaris, and consequently since the Laws of the Land made the eldest Child of the King to reign without any difference of Sex, Thomiris was lawful Queen, and Ariantes an Usurper.

Octomasades maintained very strongly, that though the Laws of the Land made the eldest Child of the King to reign, yet it ought to be the Prince Ariantes, since he only was Son unto the King of the Issedons, and Thomiris the Daughter of a Subject, though she was his eldest Sister, and by consequence incapable of reigning; since it was the eldest Child of a King whose due it is: The truth is (said he to maintain the right of Ariantes) Ariantes pretends not to the Crown, as Son unto Lipacaris, but only as Son unto the King of Issedons: For truly a forced exposition ought not to be given unto that Law which gives him for the Scepter; it must be understood according to the letter, and be known, that those who made it, had sufficient reasons to authorize it: Certainly there is all the equity in the world, that the People who can never have too much respect unto those who ought to command them, should have another kind of person over them then themselves, to wit, a person that is incapable of reigning, and subject to the same obedience they are: To avoid which inconvenience, it must not be Thomiris which must reign, since all the people know her born in a private condition, when her Father was no King; but on the contrary, it ought to be the Prince Ariantes, whom the people saw born upon a Throne. But what if it will be objected? Why, though the Prince Lipacaris was a Subject, yet he made himself King. 'Tis true indeed, he did so, but it was after another manner; for the Prince Lipacaris did make himself King by the right of Conquerours, but his Successors cannot be King, but by the Laws he established; So it must be the Son or Daughter of a King, and not of a Subject, who ought legally to succeed. Moreover, there is one reason which moves me to expound the Law thus; for certainly a Throne stamps a new Character of Grandure upon those who are upon it: And those who are born Kings, have more Royal inclinations, more worthy of a Scepter, then others who are born in a lower condition: And to speak rationally, the first day of a mans life who makes himself King, is the first day that he steps upon the Throne, so as all before it were not his, and it must be since he was the Father of his Subjects, that he can be called the Father of his Children.

Thus I conclude, that the Law which says that the First-born of the King of Issedons ought to reign, ought to be expounded as I have done, though Lipacaris had had a Son elder then Ariantes in lieu of Thomiris; from a more forcible reason therefore it ought to be thus, since it is more advantageous to the people to have a King, then a Queen. Furthermore, every thing argues in favour of the side which I maintain; for Thomiris in yielding the Issedonian Crown unto the Prince Ariantes, remains still Queen of the Massagettes; on the contrary, the Son unto the King of Issedon, who only ought to reign over them, will be without a Kingdom, and indeed the Issedons will have neither King nor Queen, for since the marriage of Thomiris, she never comes amongst them, and she sufficiently makes it known, that Nature hath not infused into her heart that tender affection which Kings ought to have unto their people, since she never honours them with her presence; and it may be said, that she rather treats them like a People which she subjected by Usurpation, then Subjects which a legal and successive right did give her, since she governs them by Substitutes, and never comes her self amongst them. But not to use reasons and arguments where the authority of the Law is sufficient, I will maintain, that since the Eldest Child of the Issedonian King ought to reign, it ought to be the Prince Ariantes. And I will further affirm, that it would be more glorious unto Thomiris to be the Wife, the Mother, and the Sister of a King; then to have one Crown more, and have a Brother that is Subject unto the Prince her Son: So as I conclude, that if she will have the Wars to cease, she must restore the Crown of Issedon unto him, to whom legally it belongs; and that she let him be her brother by nature, and her Ally by interest of his Crown, and not a Subject. After this Sir, the eloquence of Octomasades went a little further, and enlarged it self in commendations of the Prince Ariantes, but concluded that he would rely wholly upon the Law, which was; that the eldest Child unto the King of Issedons should reign.

Page 32 I willingly consent (replied Agatharses after Octomasades had done) that the Law be punctually relied upon, which would have the eldest Child unto the King of Issedons to reign, since that is the foundation upon which the right Title of Thomiris her reign is built, and by which Ariantes ought to be looked upon only as an Usurper: And to prove that Thomiris is the eldest Daughter unto the Issedonian King, though she was born, when he was only the Prince Lipacaris; I need only say, that Lipacaris and the King of Issedons, being all one and the same person, Thomiris cannot be the eldest Daughter of the one, but she must be the eldest Daughter of the other. Also, if you tell me she is not the Daughter to the King of Issedons, I will tell you again that Ariantes is the Son of Lipacaris, and you cannot deny it by the same reason: For truly Lipacaris in ascending the Throne, did not cease to be the same he was before in all things directly relating to his person, he was still brave and generous, he was the Husband of his Wife, Father to his Daughter, Cozen to his kindred, and indeed all the very same he was before his being King: The elevation of his Fortune did not subvert the course of nature, it did not break the ligaments of proximity, and all his power cannot make that which is, never to have been: So since Lipacaris had a Daughter before he was King, she is still his Daughter, though afterwards he ascended a Throne. I would gladly know, if she be not Daughter to the King of Issedons, whose Daughter she is? For as soon as the King her Father was upon the Throne, it seems he was no longer Lipacaris, but Lipacaris was so mixed, incorporated, and confounded with the King of Issedons, that none ever knew how to separate them. So that since Lipacaris is King of the Issedons, since the King of Issedons is Lipacaris, and since they are both but one and the same, it must follow by necessary consequence, that Thomiris is eldest Daughter unto the King, and her unto whom the Laws gives the Crown: That the Prince Ariantes is her Subject, and that he most unjustly takes up Arms, by giving an interpretation unto the Laws of the Land, which they will not admit of. To say, that the people before they can respect those who ought to be their Masters, must obey Ariantes before Thomiris, because they had seen her a Subject like themselves, this in my opinion is the strangest thing in the world: They might as well say, that the people, because they had seen Lipacaris a Subject like themselves thirty years together, ought not to obey him after the Gods had placed him upon the Throne. But there are stronger arguments and reasons why they ought to obey the Daughter of their King, unto whom the Law gives more right unto the Crown of Issedon, then force did unto Lipacaris. Moreover, there is much shallowness in that argument which says that Thomiris hath more Crowns then one, and therefore may well part with the other, for if she had a hundred, yet the Crown of Issedon is hers, and no reason but why she should keep it: Private persons may sometimes doubtless yeeld something which descends unto them from their Fathers, but Kings never ought to yeeld Kingdoms: And though it be said, that it is not more glorious unto Thomiris to be the Daughter of a King, then to be the Sister of another, yet I say she ought to insist peremptorily upon her right unto the Kingdom of Issedon, over which she hath reigned with so much glory, that her presence was not necessary to make her people obedient, so wisely did she govern them. But not to dispute whether a King or a Queen is more advantageous unto the people, I say, as I said before, that since Lipacaris and the King of Issedons are both one and the same person, and since Thomiris is elder then Ariantes, and eldest Daughter to the Queen, she ought to continue her Reign, as she began, since the Lawes of the Land require it, and since she ascended the Throne by the peoples consent. And indeed, to speak rationally, what strange Chimerique division would it be to divide Lipacaris from the King of Issedons? It was the virtues of Lipacaris which made him King, and he did greater things to get upon the Throne then he did afterwards: So as it would be great injustice to put so great a difference between what he was when he deserved to be King, and what he was after he was a King. In my opinion, whosoever is so happy as to make himself a King, may be looked upon as one even from his Cradle to his Grave: For as it may be said, it is the Gods who gives Crowns as best pleaseth them; so it may be said, that whosoever is to be a King, is so from his birth, because it was so decreed from the beginning: So though men did not know that Lipacaris was to be King, yet by an infallible fatality he was to be so, and from his Cradle induced with all high qualities, fit to be ranked in the Catalogue of Kings, by that power which Sovereignly disposes of Monarchies and Empires, and which before he was born, knew whether Thomiris or Ariantes should reign.

Lipacaris then being by the Gods put into the rank of Kings, as soon as he was put into Page 33 the rank of men, though it should be granted that Thomiris is only Daughter unto Lipalcaris, yet it must of necessity follow, that she is also Daughter unto the King of Issedons, since he was marked out for such a one by those who have right to give unto men such Characters as best pleaseth them. But not to fly unto any subtilties to maintain the equity of a cause which nothing can weaken, I shall tell you only in two words, that the Law sayes, the Kingdome belongs unto the eldest Child of the King, without distinction of Sex, that Thomiris is five years elder then the Prince Ariantes, that as soon as Lipacaris ceased being a Subject, and began to be a King, Thomiris also ceased to be the Daughter of a Subject, and began to be the Daughter of a King; and that unless it can be said her Father was never King of Issedon, they cannot take from her the quality of a Kings Daughter, since she cannot change her Father, as he changed his Fortune. So that being his, and brought up with him, she is as he is, and by consequence is legitimate Queen according to the Laws of the Land, and by the same consequence, the Prince Ariantes cannot pretend unto any thing but a pardon for his crime, and to be the prime Subject unto this great Queen. I believe Sir you will think, that a conference of men who affected not Peace would come to nothing; but that on the contrary, it would exasperate their spirits; for since Agatheres hated Ariantes, he used many offensive invectives; and since Octomasades feared nothing more then to come under the lash of a Queen, whom he had wronged, he was full of tart expressions against her passion, to the end he might hinder the War from ceasing.

Thus after three daies conference and repetition of things, rather against Peace then for it, the Treaty ended, and the War began. But Sir, the thing most remarkable was, that whilst Octomasades and Agatheres conferred together, Adonacris accompanying Octomasades, and Sitalces Agatheres, the miserable Adonacris had the sorrow to see the Possessor of his dear Noromata, whom he yet knew not; for Sitalces was one of the Grand Signiors in his Country, who was well contented with his Quality, who came into the Wars when it came to him, and who never came at Court but by chance: So as Adonacris had never seen him: And that which most amazed him was, that since Sitalces did not know that he had any intelligence with his Wife, that he was in love with her, or any acquaintance between them, he addressed himself alwayes unto him, to propose such expedients as he fancied: So that since it was not possible he should see the Possessor of his dear Noromata, without extream grief, he was in a most perplexed condition, and the worse, because his love encreased: For Sitalces being one of those who think they can never talk too much of their Wives, and since it was so short a time since he was married, that he talked of her more like a Lover then a Husband. It chanced one day whilst the Commissioners were conferring together, a friend of Sitalces told him in the presence of Adonacris, that he had more reason than any other to perswade Agatheres unto an accommodation, and to end the War: For truly, said he unto him, it is one of the hardest adventures that can befall a man, who having been whole years in love with a Beauty, should part from her three daies after he had married her: 'Tis very true, replied Sitalces, the Adventure is very cross, and I must confess, I wish an end of the War, as much because I would return unto Noromata, as because I am a Lover of my Countryes Peace.

Whilst Sitalces talked thus, Adonacris spoke not a word, but sighed in secret: Yet this friend unto Sitalces being a man that would put a hundred questions, and Sitalces being one, who though he had wit enough; yet was not so delicate as to know one needs not answer precisely unto every question which is asked: Such Questions, and such Answers passed between them, as made Adonacris desperate; for this impertinent friend did oblige Sitalces, not only to relate his passion unto Noromata, but all passages since his marriage, which Sitalces did aggravate in such terms, as so saddened the soul of Adonacris, that he was ready to lose his patience, and utter such things as might make it known that he was the Lover of Noromata; yet he could not part from the place where he was, because resentments of love would not let him forbear audience of all that could be said concerning Noromata. But at the last he gathered some comfort from the words of Sitalces; for his friend asked him (after a hundred impertinent questions) whether Noromata was not as sad at parting, as she was glad of his company? And whether she did not water her cheeks with tears? Sitalces answered him, that it seemed he never knew Noromata, since he did not think her able to Mistress her self in all things: For truly, said he, she hath such a command over her self, that when I married her, there was not Page 34 the least sign of any joy in her eyes, and when I parted from her, there appeared not the least sorrow in her countenance: And I am perswaded she can love and hate to the height if she please, without being discovered; and when I parted from her, she did so well hide her thoughts from me, that she seemed to be neither glad nor sad, onely modest and serious.

As soon as Sitalces had said so, the discourse changing subject Adonacris retired, to enjoy the consolation of thinking that Sitalces never saw any joyes in the eyes of Noromata, since he married her; and this thought was the sweeter, because he remembered how often he had seen joy dance in her cheeks and eyes when he had given her any testimony of his love, and how by a sweet communication of looks without any words, she imparted her heart unto him. So that not doubting but Noromata was capable enough of joy, and knowing by experience that she was not alwayes a mistress of her self, since she had more than once in vain striven to hide her thoughts, he therefore thought to his comfort that she did not love Sitalces when she married him; and that perhaps she loved him still, at least grieved for him. So that his love increasing, he was so vexed that he was married, as he had almost as much ado to keep himself from hating Argirispe, as from loving Noromata. For truly (said he in himself) since my affection to Noromata is not brutish, onely grounded upon sense; if I were sure that Noromata loved me as well as I loved her, though she be the wife of Sitalces, and as absent as I am, yet I should entertain my self with many a pleasing thought, and enjoy many a sweet minute. But alas, how should Noromata ever believe I love her, since I married Argirispe? since she knows not how I was forced to it: nor can consider that my affection to her is the cause of it: Perhaps she is glad that my design of marrying did not take effect, since I was so apt to change: but alas, Noromata, you are much mistaken if you think so; for Heavens know I never loved Argirispe but still you, and shall do ever. But alas, what should, or what would I have Noromata do? Sitalces enjoys her; she is all vertue; and I shall never see her again: stifle a passion Adonacris, which will do nothing but torment thee; and be not so foolishly fond, as eternally to desire things impossible, and to love where there is not the least hope. Adonacris had good reason to consult with his reason how to quench his flames, for I assure you his love augmented by suppressing it, and he was the more overcome by striving against it. In the mean time the Treaty being ended as I told you before, Octomasades and Agatheres parted, both very glad that nothing was done.

But as Adonacris was going away, Agatheres came to him, and (speaking in his high and excellent Tone) I Pray Adonacris said he unto him, do me the favour to tell the fair Elibesis, that it is not long of Octomasades but me, the peace is not concluded; and that I hinder Ariantes from being King, by a Passion less interested, then that by which Octomasades would hinder Thomiris from being Queen; since his is ambition, and mine revenge. Since perhaps you shall be the Subject of Ariantes Sir, whether you will or no (replied Adonacris) I will do you so good an office as not to tell my sister a thing which may offend her, but will tell it her from my self: Alas (replied Agatheres in a fury and went away) if ever I be Subject unto Ariantes, be confident, that I will be a very rebellious one. After this Adonacris returned a sharp answer, but Agatheres did not hear him: And the truth is, he did so dislike the proceedings of Elibesis with Agatheres, that he retained the one half of his resentment, out of a thought that she had done him wrong.

In the mean while, as the state of things then stood, a battell had decided the business, and quite ruined the side which lost it, and therefore both sides were very cautious of fighting untill they saw a great probability of being victorious. But since both sides had officers admirably well known in Martiall affairs: Since Ariantes of his side, and Agatheres of the other, were both very circumspect; it was not easie for either side to suppress each other.

Moreover, since Thomiris hoped every day to recover of her languishing disease which her sorrows for your departure Sir, had caused; she would not hazard her Army: And to tell you truly what I think, I am perswaded she had a mind to keep her Forces for another design then to punish Ariantes, whom she alwayes believed would be reduced into his duty when she desired him. So that Spargapises and Agatheres having severall orders from Thomiris, to attempt nothing rashly, they were constrained to hazard nothing rashly, nor be so forward as otherwise they would. Thus both sides often skirmished, but never came to any desiding battle. Again, since the Army was not far from Issedon, Ariantes often stole a day to go and see Elibesis, whose soul was much unsettled: for the truth is, she Page 35 loved Agatheres whether she would or no: But ambition having a greater prevalence in her soul, then love had, she could not treat Ariantes ill, in hopes of being Queen: so as when he came to see her, she received him with all possible sweetness. Yet she still enquired concerning Agatheres, and would often tell one of his intimate friends not whom he left in Issedon, many obliging passages concerning him in hopes of bringing him back unto her, in case Ariantes was not King.

On the other side Argirispe who loved Adonacris more then she was loved, and who was one that made a misfortune of every thing, she was in continual fears of his being killed, or at least being wounded: for since she was ignorant of his being in love with Noromata before his marriage; and since he behaved himself very civilly towards her; she was not at all jealous, though her naturall temper was very apt for it as well as Sitalces. As for Noromata, she droned away a very malancholly life; yet her comfort was, that her husband was not with her; and that she could be sad and no body see her: for the truth is, she had such a tenderness of soul towards Adonacris, which all her vertue could not overcome. Yet she was vexed at heart to hear he was married, though she knew very well her anger was ill grounded, and that since she never intended to see Adonacris again, it was no matter whether she was married or not married. But for all that, Love being a passion which will never be subject unto reason, Noromata with all her reason could not chuse but murmur in secret, that Adonacris was married as well as her self: yet she murmured without any hatred, and accused him onely of the same injustice whereof she accused her self.

As for Sitalces, he had no other sorrow upon his soul but for being at such a distance for her he loved: the truth is, his sorrow proceeded more from sparks of jealousy, than love, though he knew not whom to be jealous of: and this was his very reason why he could not be absent from her he loved.

As for Agatheres, he was in a worse condition then all the rest; for his Love, his hatred, his jealousy, and his thirsty desire of revenge, would not let him enjoy one minute of rest: and which is strange, he did what he could to hide his love unto Elibesis; and to perswade all he talked to, that he hated his Rivall and slighted his Mistress: yet at last, I made him confess he loved her, and made him confess in a very odd way. For telling him one day that I thought he was still in love with Elibesis, he sharply interrupted me as if I had done him the greatest injury in the world.

How Anabaris (said he unto me) can you think I am still in love with Elibesis, since she hath preferred Ariantes before me? Since you know very well (said I unto him) that it is not the person of Ariantes which she prefers; and that it is onely the glistening of that Crown which he hath promised her, which dazzles her eyes, you need not be so angry; but look upon her rather as weak than inconstant: I look upon her, (replied he angrily) as inconstant, as weak, and as perfidious both: I look upon her as one, whom I am sorry I ever loved; as one whom I never love, or to say better, as one whom I never loved at all: Should you hate your Rivall any less, replied I, I should think you loved your Mistress less: but as long as I see such hot sparks of hatred and such ardent desires of revenge, I shall ever think that you either dissemble your thoughts when you say you do not love Elibesis, or that your self doth not know them: for as soon as love ceaseth, jealousy will cease also: and that hatred which it causeth will at least grow less, if not quite extinguish. When any disputes against me (replied Agatheres) they must not alledge generall rules, for I declare I shall except against them all: Since it is certain I do not build upon any thing but my self, especially in matters of love. So as without examining whether jealousy cease in the hearts of others when love ceaseth, and whether hatred diminish, I onely know, that though I do not love Elibesis, yet I do so extremely hate Ariantes, that I wish his ruine, and that I were in a condition to go and ask Elibesis, whether it were more advantageous to be overwhelmed under the ruines of a shattered Throne, then to wait quietly at the foot of that Throne: And mauger her ambition, I would there were in her heart one spark of that fire which once I kindled, and that it might flame higher and hotter then ever, to the end I might have the pleasure of being revenged upon her weakness and inconstancy, by telling her ingeniously that I will never love her again. Time will tell you (said I unto him) which of us two are in the right; After this, I said no more unto Agatheres, because I was resolved to put a trick upon him, and make him see that he did love Elibesis still, though he did not think he loved her. And indeed about four dayes after this dispute, as I was one evening in his Tent, I caused a letter to be brought unto me by one of my men, which Page 34 <1 page duplicate> Page 35 <1 page duplicate> Page 36 I myself did forge, and which I received in his presence, and which after I asked his leave, I did read in a Corner of the Tent: He knowing that I had a way to receive intelligence from Issedon, he asked me if it came from thence, and I being then alone with him, I told him, that it did, and added with a serious countenance, that I wished all he told me four daies since were true. I had no sooner said so, but he earnestly asked me why I said so? Before I give an answer, (said I unto him) you must tell me whether you are sure you do not love Elibesis, for if you do not, then you may read this Letter; but if you do love her, never read it, unless you have a desire to die with grief: If only that assurance be requisite (replied he hastily) give me the Letter; and as he said so, he took it, and began to read these words.

Sir,

WE know not here yet, whether or no Fortune will have Arianes to be King; but in all likelihood the Gods will not let Elibesis be a Queen, for she is extreemly sick, and I cannot tell whether at this hour I write, death hath not driven all ambition out of her heart: Some say, that her sorrowes to see so much uncertainty in the Fortunes of that Prince whom she hath preferred before Agathurses, is the cause of her malady and death: But for my part, I think her mind hath no share in the malady of her body; and I can assure you, few men know whether she grieves more for the loss of a Crown, or for the loss of Agathurses. Howlver it be, you shall receive further upon the first occasion.

I observed him all the while he was reading this Letter, and saw that he changed colour twenty times as he read it, yet having a high and proud Soul, though a lump of sorrow did hang like lead upon his heart, yet he gave me the Letter, and would not seem so much as troubled, but told me that now he began to be revenged, after which he was silent, and began to walk. But he no sooner took a turn in his Tent, but forgetting I was there, he began to lift up his eyes unto heaven in a fury, to stamp his foot upon the ground, and to walk sometimes fast, and sometimes slow, and to shew all the signs of a most distempered man, when any thing disquiets his soul. But since I had a mind to please my self with my own trick, and desired he should know I perceived his sorrowes, I told him that I was very sorry he was mistaken, and that I had shewed him the Letter which caused so much sadness.

I had no sooner said so, but he told me that I was much mistaken in him, if I thought his sorrowes proceeded from any tenderness unto Elibesis; and since I must explain my self; know, that my rage proceeds rather from this, that it is not Arianes in lieu of Elibesis which is going to the Grave: I believe it, replied I, but since Arianes may also die in this War, I see no reason why you should grieve now, for yesterday you were not at all troubled; and therefore I must conclude, that it is the malady of Elibesis which troubles you: Yes cruel friend (said he then unto me in as much anger as sorrow) it is the malady of Elibesis that troubles me, since you will dive into my heart, and since I cannot hide it: Yes, yes, it is the malady of Elibesis which goes near my heart, and her death will certainly be mine: And I must confess, that as weak, as inconstant, and as perfidious as Elibesis is, I must follow her to the grave as soon as I have my Rival thither: I had much a do to live and not love her, but I cannot see her die without renewing my flame. After this (pittiless friend) you may triumph over my weakness, and with reason upbraid me as the weakest man alive. I shall not Sir upbraid you with your weakness (said I unto him) but I shall chide you for keeping it so secret from me: Yet Sir (added I and smiled) I must confess I was deceived as well as you, for if I had thought you had loved Elibesis, I should never have put such a trick upon you, as to forge the Letter which I shewed unto you: How (said he) is not Elibesis extreemly sick? No Sir, replied I, but I am sure you are sick of that disease which hath so long tormented you: Oh most cruel friend, said he unto me, tell me truly what I must trust unto, and deceive me not again, for it concerns me to know in what condition Elibesis is, that I may regulate my thoughts accordingly; for if Elibesis die, I plainly perceive that my passion will revive, and I must die with her, but if Elibesis be living and in health, I must hate her if I can, or at least seem as if I did. I must confess, I could not chuse but laugh to hear Agathurses talk so: Truly Sir, said I unto him, if you do love Elibesis, you will love her living as well as dead, and if you hate her, you will hate her memory as well as her person: No, replied he, you are but a Novice in love, if you know not how to make a distinction between these two things; for Elibesis Page 37 in her grave can never be enjoyed by my Rival; so as pity molifying my heart, I shall look upon her as one who ceased to be perfidious in ceasing to live; as one who loved me, as one who loved not Arianes, nor ever could love him. But Elibesis living as an unconstant woman who hath forsaken me, and one whom I ought to forsake, one who may make my Rival happy by his fruition of her, and one who to satisfy her ambition and vanity cares not if she make me miserable; and therefore I conclude, that I can love Elibesis in her grave, and hate her living: You may conclude what you please Sir (said I unto him) but if you will speak truly, you do love Elibesis living, and you do know it as well as I do. 'Tis true (replied he hastily) I do love her more then I thought I did, and I am so angry both against her and my self, that she should have so much power over me whether I will or no, that I hope very shame will cure me, and chase her absolutely out of my heart; and though I had no other reason but to hide my weakness from you, yet I were obliged in point of honour to cure my self, to let you see my generosity is above my love: Yes, yes, you your self shall cause me to cure my folly, and hold me for the weakest and basest of men, if before the War end you do not see me hate Elibesis: If the War cease not before your love (replied I and laughed) it will be long before we shall have peace. After this, I seriously asked pardon for causing so much sorrow in him, and he very earnestly entreated me not to tell any living that he still loved Elibesis, for truly, said he, my affection to her is of such a nature, that though I had turned Arianes out of his new erected Throne, though I had killed him, though I had taken Issedon, and though Elibesis were in my power, yet I had rather die then give her any testimony of my love, though I should love her better then ever I did. I do believe you think as you speak Sir, replied I, but for my particular I do not believe you, for whosoever loves, would be loved again, and do any thing in the world to obtain it; therefore I assure my self with much reason, that if Fortune do make you the Conquerour of Arianes, yet still you will be a Slave unto Elibesis. After this Sir our discourse ceased, and since that day I have been the Confident of his most secret thoughts, though he knew I was a friend unto Adonacris. 'Tis true, he was not absolutely out with him*, for he knew very well that Elibesis did not follow the counsel of her Brother in all things, and that she only trusted to her self.

But not to be over-tedious in particularizing this War, let me only tell you Sir, that the year being far spent, both sides endeavoured to take up their Winter Quarters in their Enemies Country; and in pursuance of these endeavours, there was more blood spilt, then in all the year before. The contest Sir was so sharp at the passage over a little River which Spargapises would maintain, that the very water seemed as if turned into blood; but at last Arianes was forced to leave the passage unto his Enemies, and to retreat with his Troops towards Issedon: Yet since this victory did cost Spargapises very dear, and since he had more men killed then Arianes had, he said, that true it was, he had lost his baggage and the River, but yet that Spargapises had lost so much blood in gaining it, that such another gain would ruine him: 'Tis true, maugre this rally, that this passage which we got, was the cause of this Prince his ruine, because this obliged him to quarter himself so neer Issedon, that all about it were undone; the Inhabitants murmured, and this caused us to seek for better quarters, and a more fertile Country.

In the mean time Sir, Adonacris was taken Prisoner by Agathurses, and Sitalces by Arianes. Arianes sent Sitalces unto Issedon, and Spargapises sent Adonacris unto a Town called Tipanis, where that Prince would quarter in the Winter, for he would not return to the Tents Royal, because it was too far from his Army. Thus Sir, Fortune brought Adonacris and Noromata together, who as I told you before, had orders from her Husband to stay there until the end of the War: I being the friend of Adonacris, did him all the good offices I could; 'tis true, he stood in no great need of me, for Agathurses moved Spargapises to treat him so well, that he was suffered to go about upon his parol as soon as he came to Tipanis: You may well conceive Sir, that Adonacris did not think his confinement very rigorous, since he was so neer his dear Noromata; and on the contrary, you may well think that Sitalces who loved his wife very well, and who was of a jealous temper, did resent his with abundance of grief. Yet Adonacris was much vexed at the loss of his baggage, because all the Letters which Noromata writ unto him before she was married, were amongst it; yet since he had found her, he cheered up himself, and could not imagine the Souldiers could do him any ill office. Argirispe also was much troubled at the imprisonment of Adonacris; but as for Noromata Sir, I must needs tell you a little more Page 38 precisely how she knew that her Husband was Prisoner unto Arianes, and her Lover unto Agathurses, for truly this strange chance did produce such a fine adventure, that I think fit not to omit the least circumstance. Be pleased to know then Sir, that the news of this great fight being carried unto Tipanis, it was there published, as commonly they use to do all great actions, to wit, with a thousand false circumstances; sometimes men are killed who are still alive, some are mortally wounded, who are only Prisoners, and some are reported to be Prisoners who are at liberty, and some again who are never spoken of are Prisoners wounded & dead: Inasmuch as after the rate of such confused uncertain news, where truth and lies are so all mixed together, that nothing is certain: As soon as it was said in Tipanis that the Armies had fought, it was reported that Sitalces was wounded and taken Prisoner, and that Adonacris was dead: You may imagine Sir how this news surprized and grieved Noromata, she that was all virtue, of a most tender soul, possessed with a violent passion, could not hear her Husband was wounded and a Prisoner without some sorrow, though she did not love him, nor hear Adonacris was dead with extream grief, yet it was some advantage unto her, that she had now some pretence for her sorrowes, and an apparent cause to ask news, and satisfy her self in all circumstances, which indeed she did with extream earnestness: So that since there was no place where she could so soon and certainly know news from the Army, then from the Wife unto the Governour of Tipanis, whose name was Elijorante, and who was one of the most accomplished Ladies in the world, and the most generous, so she went immediately unto her: Yet since she was not fully satisfied of what she desired to know, she resolved to go thither every day until certain news came from the Army: But she durst not ask any thing concerning Adonacris, and though she knew that their affections had been carried very closely, yet she had not the boldness to inquire, but hoped that in asking of all the dead, the Prisoners, and the wounded in general, and of her Husband in particular, she should hear some certainty of him she desired to hear: So as in this hope, she went, as I told you before, unto Elijorante, not only the same day the news was divulged, but the next day, and the day after that.

As she was with this Lady, there came a Post, which confirmed the news of the fight, and of Spargapises Victory; and who assured Noromata that her Husband was a Prisoner, but not wounded: So that Elijorante in rejoicing with her, told her she had reason to be glad it was no worse with her Husband, since the worst half of the bad news was not true. Since Noromata was very rational, she would have consented unto what Elijorante said, if nothing else had disquieted her mind; but being most sensibly troubled at what she durst not make appear, she was glad she had a colour for the melancholy which she could not banish from her eyes do what she could; and therefore she told Elijorante, that though she was very glad to hear that Sitalces was not wounded, yet she could not chuse but grieve at his being a Prisoner: However; she cared not so much what she said unto Elijorante, as she hearkened with an attentive ear unto what the Post said unto the Governour of Tipanis, whose name was Aritaspes, and who was then in his Wives Chamber: And she confusedly heard him say, that the Prisoners were coming, and that there was one whom Spargapises would have let go about the Town upon his parol, and be used very well. But as soon as she heard this, there was heard a great noyse of men who talked loud in a great Plain before the Governours house: Presently after, the noyse drew neerer, and passed from that Plain to the Court, from the Court to the Stairs, and from the Stairs unto the outer Chamber, at last they came to tell Aritaspes, that the Prisoners which Spargapises had sent were come, and that there was some men of Quality amongst them, who were in the outer Chamber. As soon as this was said, all the Ladies that were with Elijorante, except Noromata, pressed her to desire Aritaspes that the Prisoners might come into the Chamber. But as for Noromata, since she alwayes feared to hear of Adonacris his death, she was not desirous of it; but on the contrary, not daring to trust her constancy, she offered to go away; saying, She had no interest in the news, since she knew of Sitalces as much as she desired to know: But Elijorante stayed her; and told her very gallantly, that it belonged unto her more then any other to entertain the Prisoners very well, since her Husband was in the same condition: For said she, It's credible that the same usage we shall shew unto those which are sent unto us, the same will the Prince Arianes shew unto those under his power: So that Noromata not daring to resist any longer stayed: And Elijorante desiring Aritaspes to satisfy the curiosity of all the Ladies who had a desire to see the Prisoners, he told them smiling, that though he should Page 39 thereby more expose them to be their Prisoners, then the Prisoners of Spargapises, yet he would satisfy them. And then commanding them to enter, the Lieutenant of Spargapises Guard who conducted them appeared first; after him, Adonacris entred in the head of ten or twelve Officers, and he entred with so good a grace, and such a noble ay, as it was easie to know he had sold his liberty very dear, and that his captivity was no shame unto him: You may well think Sir, how Noromata was surprized at the sight of Adonacris, whom she thought dead; to see Adonacris whom she had not seen since they were so kind together, since they were both married, and since they thought never to write unto each other again, nor see one another as long as they lived. The surprize of Ado|nacris was as great, for though he knew Noromata was at Tipanis, yet he did not think to find her in that place. Moreover, so it chanced, that the first person who saw Adonacris, was Noromata, and also he saw her very sad: And though he knew not the true cause of that sadness which appeared in her countenance, yet he was well satisfied that she seemed displeased at her fortune; for he did not then think that she could be so melancholy for the imprisonment of Sitalces; but thinking to make this moment of happiness to himself, he interpreted that blush which appeared in the cheeks of Noromata when she first saw him unto his own advantage; and indeed I understood by a Lady who was my friend, and present at this interview, and who knew all the secrets of this affection, that Noromata blushed in such a manner, as it was easie to perceive, that she who blushed was not displeased, for her eyes grew more lively, and such a joy did spread it self so all over her face, that it presently made a deep impression upon the heart of •donacris: Indeed Sir, there was something so passionate, and so significative in the looks of these two persons at this unthought of meeting, that they told each other without design, that they loved one a|nother still, that they would love alwayes, and that they were both very miserable: However, the first unpremeditated thought which last not long, being over, the virtuous Noromata, after she had blushed for love, did blush again for shame at her weakness, and did so strive with her self, that she shunned the eyes of Adonacris, and assumed unto her own the same sadness which appeared in them before he came in; and it was the more easie to be done, because her joys to see Adonacris living, whom she thought to be dead, were tempered with her sorrows, that she could not innocently either love him, or be lo|ved. And this thought did so imprint it self upon her soul, as it cost her many a sigh. Think upon it Noromata (said she then unto her self) Consider well what thou wouldst do, and what thou oughtest to do: Adonacris is amiable, it's true, and thou dost love him more then thou oughtest to do: But for all that, since thou dost love him without power of doing otherwise, thou lovest him without a Crime, provided he know it not, and provided thou never lets him know it; but on the contrary shun him, as if thou didst hate him. Consider Noromata, that it concerns thy glory, and to preserve thy virtue, consider that thy Father knows Adonacris loved thee at Issedon, and that if thou dost suffer him to see thee at thy own house, he cannot chuse but have thoughts which will be disadvantage|ious to thee: But especially consider, that Adonacris will esteem thee less, if thou shouldst give him any testimonies of thy affection, then if thou beest only upon terms of indifferen|cy with him: And out of a more Noble resentment consider, that thou wouldst esteem thy self less, and that whosoever does not esteem themselves, can never be happy, nor me|rit the esteem of others.

Whilst Noromata was thus reasoning with her self, one would have thought she studied so profoundly, that her study had no object, and as if her mind was far off any thing a|bout her: So that after Aritaspes had spoken unto all the Prisoners, and told Adonacris that he had orders to lodg him at his own house, and to give him all the Town of Tipa|nis for his Prison, and to let him pass upon his parol, he turned towards Noromata, who as I told you, seemed to be in a deep study: For ought I see Madam (said he unto her) you care not for seeing the Prisoners of the Prince Spargapises, but I believe you think more upon those that are prisoners unto the Prince Arianes, and think more upon Sita|lces whom you see not, then upon Adonacris whom you do see, though I think you knew him at Issedon: 'Tis very true Sir (replied Noromata with a trembling heart, though not seeming so) that I am thinking upon Sitalces: And I am thinking also upon Adonacris (added she with incredible resolution) but it is how to get an exchange between him and Sitalces.

The discourse of Noromata did so much surprize Adonacris, that he knew not what to answer: 'Tis true, his silence was not observed, for Eliorante beginning to speak, she Page 40 gave him time to recollect himself. The design you have Madam, of releasing two such gallant men at once (said she unto Noromata) is so noble and worthy your self, that I believe there is none but will do you what service they can unto Thomiris, and Spargapises: And if the friends of Adonacris will sollicite with yours, it is to be hoped you will very shortly have the joy of seeing Sitalces, and the sorrow of parting from Adonacris. If his imprison|ment be no worse than mine (said Adonacris) a liberty which will be disadvantage|ous to his side, is not to be wished: So that Madam, since Sitalces is more considerable in the party of Thomiris, than I am in Arianes, I shall not murmur though I be not exchanged for a man, who may more hurt my side by his valour, than I can serve it by mine. And therefore I shall never sollicite for my liberty, but leave it unto the consideration of the Prince whom I serve.

This answer is so modest, so generous and so gallant (replied Aritaspes and smiled) that you could not be more ingenious if you were a prisoner unto one of these Ladies: However Sir, (added he, and gave him no time to reply) though the fetters you are to have will not be so heavey, as those which they perhaps would impose upon you, yet I think its fit I carry you unto a place where you may rest your self: And accordingly Aritaspes preparing himself to go out, did put Adonacris before him, though a Prisoner, and conducted him into a very noble room.

After which, he took all requisite orders for the rest of the Prisoners, who were not to pass upon their Parol as Adonacris was. But Sir, I forgot to tell you that Noromata did hold her countenance so resolutely, when Adonacris saluted her in going out of Eliorantes chamber, that he saw no more in her eyes than when he first entred; onely a cold and se|rious civility, which had struck him into despair, had he not remembered her passionate tenderness which he saw a quarter of an hour before. Also he thought that perhaps the presence of so many persons made her restrain her self: but he was quickly deprived of that consolation: for being lodged in a Chamber which opened into the Court, wherein was a Balcone not very high, he stayed in it in hopes to see Noromata as she went out: And indeed his hope was not deceived; for she having more disquiet thoughts than she imagined she could master; she went out as soon as Adonacris came into the Balcone: But though he saluted her with all imaginable respect, and followed her with his eyes, not onely till she was in the Coach, but also till the Coach was out of the Court; he could obtain no more from her, but onely a civill congie without any looks of her eye or sign with her head, or wagging of hand, which he could interpret to his advantage: so that he went out of the Balcone very sadly. However, the first looks of Noromata made such a sensible impression in him, and so well perswaded him that she did not hate him, that he knew not what construction to make upon this last coldness. Let it be as it will (said he to himself, as he told me since) the best I can think of it is, that Noromata would not have me know she doth not hate me.

But alas, my dear Noromata (added he) If I be so happy as not to be hated, all your hollow cold treatments will be in vain; for I shall discern whether your expressions of ha|tred be caused by a reall aversion, or by prudence onely. After this, Adonacris began to cast about how to see her, and to see her in private; for he still found her so fair, that his love still augmented; yet this love as violent as it was, still was all purity: And Ado|nacris was so well acquainted with the vertue of Noromata, that he set most severe limits unto his desires; so that being full perswaded of the innocency in his affection, he thought Noromata might and ought to answer him: And imagining an unexpressable joy, if he could once in his life hear from the mouth of Noromata, that he was not hated, he thought upon nothing else but how to speak with her, when none could hear but her self. But whilst he was contriving how to bring this to pass, Noromata was thinking how to avoid all conversation with him: as for seeing her, she saw she could not. And indeed she could not go out of Tipanis, during the war: nor could she leave off her visits unto Eli|orantes and the rest of her friends, without giving them cause to ask her reason: All she had to do was, not to see Adonacris at her own lodging, and to shun him if she met him any where else: yet she found so great a repugnancy to take this course, that any other vertue besides hers would have submitted unto a Passion so tender and strong. However Noromata did surmount her self, but not her inclination, though she did all she could to overcome it: untill now she only indeavoured to love Adonacris; but now seeing the danger greater, she indeavoured to force her heart unto a love of Sitalces, but alas, she could not.

Page 41 But her vertue finding an ample Subject to make it self appear, she resolved to do as much for Sitalces, as if she had loved him better than her self: but to do nothing for Adonacris: And so neglect no means which might procure an exchange for her husband, though his presence was most grievous, and the presence of Adonacris most agreeable to her. Noromata did not resolve upon this rashly and tumultuously, but upon mature ex|amination and consideration of it a whole night together without a wink of sleep, untill at last, the weariness of her spirits compelled her. But when she waked, she received in one quatter of an houre, three letters of different stiles, which came from three different Persons: For a Post from Agatheres which came to advertise Aritaspes, that the Prince Spargapises and himself would shortly come unto Tipanis, did bring her one from Sita|lces at Issedon, whether Agatheres had sent the man to inquire of one of his friends, who could not be found either amongst the wounded or dead, or amongst the living on his side: the second was from Argirispes, who conceived her to sollicite as zealously at Tipanis for the liberty of Adonacris, as she would do at Issedon, for the liberty of Sitalces. And the third was from Adonacris, which a servant unto this prisoner had given unto one of her women by another name, than that of his masters, and without staying for an an|swer: for Adonacris feared lest Noromata should send it back sealed as soon as she saw the character of the superscription. So that the vertuous Noromata finding all at once, a let|tler from her Lover, one from her husband and another from Argirispe, she was in a strange perplexity; had she honoured her own inclination, she had opened that from Adonacris and had looked upon that from Sitalces the last: Yet this virtuous Lady surmounting her self, resolved not to open the letter from Adonacris at all, to reade that from Sita|lces, and, then that from Argirispes: So throwing upon the Table, that letter which came from the hand of him that was most dear unto her, she opened her husbands, but opened it with a sigh, and was long before she was able to read it, so sad was her soul: but at last having read it, she found some expression of affection, and some of civility: but Sitalces having no polite faculty in writing, though he had wit enough, these civilities had neither any tenderness nor gallantry in them; only as much as might come from a husband, who naturall was not gallant, and from one who valued his liberty more than any thing else; yet indeed there was some expressions of Love in his Letter, but truly very little obliging: for he bluntly intimated unto her how he was troubled that Spargapises and the whole Court would winter at Tipanis, and that she was like to have so much good company: Adding afterwards severall directions concerning his liberty and his estate, with as much familiarity as if they had been married ten years, though God knows, they had been only three poor dayes together.

So after Noromata had read it with many a sigh, and looked upon the Letter from Ado|nacris which lay upon the Table; Alas (said she to her self) what a difference is there be|tween that Letter and this I have read? yet I must not look into it, but do all which this I have read appoints me: Upon second thoughts, she found some danger in trusting any one to carry it back unto him; and thought it more convenient to give it handsomly unto him her self, the first time she met him at Eliorantes, where she imagined to meet him soonest: So that taking up the Letter, she put it in her pocket, and began to reade that from Argirispes. But as she confessed since, she read it with a trembling heart; for as oft as she found the name of Adonacris, she blusht, and could not chuse but entertain some thoughts which had something of hatred and jealousy in them; and wished that Adonacris loved Argirispes no better then she loved Sitalces: yet in a minute after, she condemned these thoughts, and not shrinking a jot from her virtue and best resolution, she went unto a publick sacrifice which was that day offered upon a little hill full of trees which was with|in the Town: For you know Sir, we never use to sacrifice but under the great Canopy of Heaven; our Fathers believing that men cannot build a Temple worthy of the Gods: nor do we use to sacrifice so often as other People; it being only once a moneth that these publick acts of Piety are performed: So that Noromata going that day unto the sacrifice, and principally to ask the Gods power to overcome the passion of her soul; she came un|to the foot of the hill, about which was built great magnificent Galleries, under which the Ladies used to shade themselves from the heat of the Sun: our Religion requiring only the sacrificers, and those who assist them to be under the open Heavens: Yet some of our Ladies who are of a precise Piety and scrupulous Consciences never go into these Galleries, but when it is either excessively hot, or excessively cold: So that Noromata, who was very full of devotion, placed her self that day amongst the multitude with many Page 42 other Ladies of quality. Her devotion was not disturbed by the presence of Adonacris, for Aritaspes kept him with him: but she prayed unto the Gods with so much serenity of soul and tranquility of spirit, that she thought she obtained from them a new strength, and went home with intentions to go unto Eliorantes as soon as she had dined, purposely to find a fit opportunity of giving back the Letter unto Adonacris; and accordingly as soon as she did rise from the Table, she commanded her Coach to be made ready: And to the end Ado|nacris should not think she had the least design of kindling any flame in his heart, she went in a very careless and negligent dress, pretending the imprisonment of her husband; But though her habit was simple; and though she wore onely five or six careless curls of her hair on either side, yet since she could not chuse but be handsome, she appeared to be as handsome without, as with a dress: But as she looked her self in a glass, to see if she was as negligent in her dress as she would be, she did hide some of her curls under her hood, thinking them too gallant for one who had a design not to please, though she wished in her heart that Adonacris would not hate her.

But whilst she was consulting with her Mirror to see her self drest carelessly enough, she signed, remembering how circumspect she had formerly been at Issedon to please Adona|cris. But at last, she left her glass, and went into her closset, to see out of the observance of her women, whether she had the Letter in her pocket; and found that the seal had been crushed open in the press during the sacrifice: so that she could not restore it unto Adonacris sealed. At the first, she was extremely vexed at her self, and held it a long while in hand before she would read it: But at last, considering though she should restore it back unread, yet he would think she had read it, therefore she resolved to reade it. But first, she examined her self what reason she had so to do? For (said she to her self) canst thou think Noromata, that Adonacris would ever have writ unto thee to tell thee of thy injuries, and to give thee causes of hating him? Hast thou not seen in his eyes, that the same passion which is in thy heart against thy will, is also in his? Why then shouldest thou reade his Letter? wilt thou thy self tempt thy own virtue? Thou knowest, that thou hast resolved to dye a thousand deaths, rather than to do any thing unworthy of thy self; and yet thou art ready to reade a Letter from a man whom thou knowest doth love thee; and which is strangest, from a man, whom thou knowest thou dost not hate. After this, No|romata fell into a deep serious study, afterwards resolving to keep close unto her former principles, what tenderness soever she found in the Letter, she did reade it, and found these words:

ADONACRIS unto NOROMATA.

Madam,

Did I not know that I have not the least thought which is unworthy of your virtue, I should never assume the boldness to beg a private audience, that I may tell you what my heart thinks upon the injustice which you have done me.

But being sure that I do not entertain one thought that can offend you, I conjure you Ma|dam, to grant me so much favour as once before I die, to tell you what I have suffered, and what I do suffer for you. And to oblige you, not to deny me, I do solemnly protest unto you Madam, that I love you without any desires or hopes; and if you please, I will never speak unto you of that passion, which is and ever will be in my soul, as long as I live: Provided you will give me leave, onely to put you in memorie of what it was, when once you thought it innocent. Thus asking you nothing, neither for the present nor the future, and desiring no other favour, but onely to talk with you of a thing thats past, doubtless you would be unjust, if you should deny me. But Madam, if you will deny me, I beseech you forbid me your self from telling you that I do love you still, more then ever any did or could. For Madam, I must profess, that if you should by your silence make me understand, it is not your pleasure I should tell you as much, I would not obey you. No Madam, though your fair eyes, as powerfull as they are, should tell me as much a thousand times, in that mute and rigorous language. The truth is Madam, it is so difficult a thing, not to speak of a malady unto the Person, for whose sake it is endured, that I had need to receive this Commande|en in such a manner as may force me to obedience. You know Madam, what power you ever had over me: I protest it is not lessoned; and whatsoever you command me, I shall obey, provided I receive the command from your own mouth, and provided you do not forbid me to love you, untill the death of ADONACRIS.

Page 43 This Letter being full of tenderness and respect, Noromata could not reade it without a sigh; and she hath told me since that she was never in all her life, in a greater perplexity than after this: But for all that, this Letter which at first she would not reade, she now read it thrice over; and read it with such resentments as she was never able to express: for she was extream sad after the reading it, but it was such a sadness, as had such a satisfaction in it, as made the same thing which grieved, not to displease her. However, after she had spent a quarter of an hour upon the Love of Adonacris, she revived out of her weakness, as out of a Lethargie of Spirit: And tearing the Letter in pieces; I would to the gods, said she, I were as well able to tear my tenderness unto Adonacris out of my heart, as I am to tear this testimony of his affection.

After this, altering her design of going unto E|lorantes, she said, that she would not go abroad, nor see any body, having no mind to expose her self so soon unto the sight of Adonacris. But to vex her, one came to tell her from E|lorantes, that if she would write unto Sitalces she could send her Letter, so it was written presently. Thus Noromata, whose fansie was filled with the conceit of a Letter from her Lover whom she loved, was forced to answer her husbands, whom she loved not; and did so with much ado. She began her Letter five or six severall times before she could end it: for though she had Sitalces letter before her, purposely to give a punctuall answer unto every Article; yet that from Ado|nacris was so imprinted in her thoughts, that she writ rather unto Adonacris, than Sitalces: but at last being angry against her self, she overcame it, and writ unto her husband with much respect; also answered Argirispes with much civility: After which she undrest her self and went to bed, as a pretence of seeing no body, no not so much as her own women. And to that end, she said she was troubled with an extream pain in her head, which silence, darkness and sleep would cure. So as her women shut up all the windowes and drew the curtains very close, and so left her at liberty to think upon the malady which tormented her: To tell you Sir, all that Noromata did both against her self and Adonacris, would be a very hard task: For truly all that a Person of a great Spirit, of a great courage and of a great virtue could think or do to quench the flames of a violent passion, Noromata did; and carried her self so towards Adonacris, that he could not so much as guess she desired he should love her.

In the mean time, since she thought it not expedient to let him know her mind at the first by her proceedings; she shunned seeing him, and told it the next day that she was not well, and that she would see no body: so that by this means Adonacris came many times to see her, and missed of his aims, nor could he so much as know whether or no, she had received his Letter. And he feared extremely, that he was deceived when he believed that Noromata did not hate him. On the other side Aritaspes being advertised that the young Spargapises would come the next day, he went to meet him with all the Gallantry of Tipanis: But though all the honours of the victory were done unto Spargapises, yet it was Agathorses who deserved them: for Spargapises was so young, as he was absolutely uncapable of any high actions on commendations for them, but onely followed the advice of the wise Terez and Agathorses: So that as soon as he came to Tipanis, Agathorses who to oblige Adonacris the more, and to make Elibesis the more ashamed, he presented him unto Spargapises, who as he was advised, received him very civilly. Thus the conqueror, and the conquered, lived together with extream civility; and Adonacris was more obliged unto that young Prince than if he had given him his liberty: for be pleased to know Sir, that Agathorses telling him it was fit he should visit Noromata, whose husband was prisoner in his cause, he went the same hour unto her, and offered unto her his best service in getting the liberty of Sitalces.

And Adonacris having that evening had a great deal of discourse with Agathorses, and letting him know that he never contributed unto the ambition of Elibesis, there was such a correspondency between them, that Agathorses asked him if he would wait upon Spargapises unto Noromata: Adonacris joyfully accepting the offer, did accompany this young Prince unto this fair one, who faining to be ill, did sit upon her bed to receive this visit, little thinking Adonacris had been there: But when she saw him, and had looked him in the face, her disorder was so great that she changed colour, imagining that he would in|terpret all her thoughts into his own advantage. But being a person of a most resolute spirit, and a great soul, she instantly recollected her self: And seeming to take no notice of Adonacris she answered unto the civilities of Spargipises concerning the imprisonment of her husband. But to do it in such a manner as might let Adonacris know, (whom she Page 44 saw hearkning very attentively) that she had all the thoughts, which a modest wife ought to have upon the like occasion, she thanked Spargapises with a most respective civility, for all his offers; conjuring him with abundance of earnestness, to do all he could for the liberty of her husband.

But Sir, added she, it is not here I should make this Petition to you; the first day I stir out, shall be to beseech you, you would be pleased to grant me one of your Prisoners, that I may propound an exchange unto the Prince Arianes between him and Sitalces. You need not stay so long Madam, replied Agatharses (seeing Spargapises knew well how far he ought to satisfie Noromata's request) for I suppose the Prince hath already granted your request. Spargapises then imagining by what Agatharses said, that he ought not to deny her, did confirm what Agatharses said; and asked her the name of that Prisoner whom she desired to propound unto Arianes in exchange of Sitalces. Sir, said she then, and blusht, I should have some hopes of my husbands liberty, if you would be pleased to grant me Adonacris, since it is very probable Arianes will not let the brother of the fair Elibesis, be a Prisoner: As Noromata could not name Adonacris, without a blush, so Adonacris could not hear himself named without a blush also, especially upon such a cross conjecture. However, he knew not how to oppose his liberty directly; and his expression of gallan|try which he used in E|lorantes chamber when Noromata spoke of his exchange for Sital|ces, was not fit to be spoken seriously. Yet being a business which he could not consent unto, nor indeed reject, unless in Rallery: he addressed his discourse unto Noromata; Truly Madam, said he unto her and smiled, I believe that Sitalces will not be pleased at your motion, and he had rather be a Prisoner than be exchanged for me: This modesty is so strangely excessive (replied Noromata but looked not upon him) that I have reason to think you speak by contraries: but be it as it will, since the Prince is pleased to grant me my desire it shall be the Prince Arianes who shall decide the matter, who I believe will decide it according to my wish; since it is not credible he can deny the fair Elibesis to break off your fetters at the instance of one, who doubtless hath zealously importuned him to it: So as I beseech you give me leave to hope that you will very shortly be at li|berty, and that I shall very shortly see Sitalces return.

After this, Spargapises not using to make any long visits, especially when they are only Ceremonious, he did rise up without giving Adonacris any time to reply unto Noromata: and he went to view some places in the Town which Agathorses thought fit to be fortified: And Adonacris not thinking it fit for him to follow him unto that place, he stayed with some others at the door of Noromata's house: But since it was the custome of men to part without any Ceremony in such occasions, those who stayed talking with Adonacris, having some business to go about, they left him alone with his own men at the gate where he was, so that seeing it still open, and imagining that Noromata might expect his re-entry, and that she would not deny him entrance into her chamber, he went in boldly, and going up the stairs he saw the door of Noromata's chamber open; so that without any more delay he went towards the bed where she was sitting. But to delude her women, and indeed her self consenting, Madam, (said he upon his first address) The Prince Spargapises hath sent me back unto you, to talk of some things which concerns you to know, before he send unto Arianes concerning the exchange of Sitalces: and therefore I beseech you, Madam, permit me a quarter of an hours audience. Noromata did so wonder to see Adonacris again, as in that disorder she had not handsome pretence of denying that request: And fearing that her women would think her not zealous for her husbands liberty, if she did not hear him, she was forced to answer him as though she did believe him, though indeed she did not: And indeed I'am perswaded that Noromata for all her virtue, was not very sory she had found an occasion of talking once again in her life in private with Adonacris, her self not contributing unto it. So that seeming as I told you before to believe Spargapri|ses sent him, she made him sit down and prepared her self for audience. And to make this conference more free, her women who were extremely desirous to tell others, that Spargapises had promised to set their Master at liberty, went into their Mistress Wardrobe to talk with other women who were there. So that leaving the door open that they might hear Noromata if she called; Adonacris saw them go into the Wardrobe, and that he had all the liberty he could desire of talking with his dear Noromata; who not taking notice of her women, had such a trembling at her heart, that she neither knew what she saw, nor what she should think of her self.

But at last, after Adonacris had silently looked upon her with as much grief as love: I Page 45 hope Madam, (said he unto her with a sigh) that since Fortune hath brought me unto you, you will not banish me: I beseech you Madam consider of your injustice to me, and treat me not so. If I were still the same I was at Issedon (replied Noromata modestly) doubtless I should be unjust in doing so; but Sir, since I am not now what I was then, no nor you your self the same, certainly I must do nothing but what becomes my duty: and if I have any power over you, I both conjure and beseech you with all my heart to go away, to come no more at my house, to shun seeing me any where else as much as you can, and to indeavour your liberty with as much zeal as I shall: Your power over me Madam, is such, replied he, that if it be your positive pleasure to do as you say, I shall indeavour to do what I can to obey you: But first Madam I beseech you hearken unto all my reasons: Let me acquaint you with the present state of my soul; examine your own a little, and by calling to memory what is past, you may the better know what to do in the future. Moreover Ma|dam, I beseech you deny me not what I shall ask; for if you do, I profess though I would yet I cannot obey you: Then you have writ me a lie, replied she when you sent me word that provided

I did my self forbid you seeing me, you would obey: I say it again Madam, (added he) but before you do forbid me any thing. I beseech you hear me: upon condition that this shall be the last time (replied she) I will hear what you please. I shall tell you then Madam, replied he, That you have done me the greatest injustice in the world in forsaking me for Sitalces; for truly Madam, I am fully perswaded, that when I had the honour to see you at Issedon, you did not then dissemble your thoughts, when your goodness was pleased to testify, that those thoughts which I had of you did not displease you: Also I remember very well, that the last day I had the honour to see you, your eyes did then bestow more obliging glimpses upon me than ever before; inasmuch as their language permitted me to hope for happiness: But when Fortune once separated me from you, you Madam, made me the most miserable man alive; and Sitalces who certainly knows not the excellency of that Treasure which he enjoys, was preferred before me. Had I voluntarily preferred Sitalces before you Sir, (replied she) certainly I had been much to blame; though you had been much his inferior in all accomplishments; for then I should have been branded with inconstancy and perfidy: But alas, Adonacris (pursued she and sighed) I am not so; since surely I should be much happier than I am, if I were more blameable; and I am afraid that if I were more blameable towards you, I were more innocent: For truly, you have no reason to upbraid me, and I obeyed my Father with so much unwillingness, and married Sitalces with so much repugnancy, that I may very well doubt, you had a little too far engaged my heart; and I have the more reason to chide my own weakness, by how much I know you have been charmed by the fair Argirispes: Alas Madam, said he, can you blame me for marrying Argirispes after you had married Sitalces? I do not accuse you Sir, of any crime (replied she): But truly I do accuse my self, lest you should: Nay, nay, Madam, replied he, I will not excuse my self; but confess that I did not love Argirispes when I married her, and that I did not marry her until you had first married Sitalces, and was so civil as to forsake me.

I do ingeniously confess (I say,) that I ought not to have married her, but ought to have disobeyed both Ariantes and my Father, and rejected the advice of all my friends: I confess also I did you wrong, in hoping that the enjoyment of Argirispes could never comfort me for the loss of you, but ought ever to continue desperate of all comforts: But for all this Madam, though I have failed in my duty, yet I failed with abundance of sorrow, and have failed without any inconstancy or perfidiousness. However it be Sir, (said Noromata and interrupted him) since you are now the husband of Argirispes, and I the wife of Sitalces, I ought not to entertain the least spark of your affection, nor give you the least glimpse of yours: but ought if it be possible never to see you again. Oh Madam, (cried Adonacris) you never did love me, if you be able to do so.

To testify unto you, replied Noromata, that I exact no great difficulties from you Sir, I will with a blush confess that I did love you more than ever I did tell you, and that you are still not so indifferent unto me as you imagine, or as you ought to be: But let me tell you after all this, that though I loved you more than ever any did, and though I hated Sitalces worse than a toad, yet I shall do what now I am resolved upon, out of a resentment of honour; and indeed I ought to do it out of another reason than it: for truly Adonacris, what sweetness can you find in seeing me eternally miserable? and what pleasure can I have in seeing you for ever unfortunate? and therefore it is much better to do what I ought, than otherwise: for since it is the pleasure of Fortune, that I must never be Page 46 happy: yet let me however be innocent, and let me know that I did not deserve so sad a fate. To hear you to speak Madam, (said he unto her) would make one think that you suspect my affection to be of some vitious strain: but know Madam, I beseech you, that my soul is not capable of any such thoughts: know that I do really love you without the least pretence or hope, but only not to be hated. I am contented, if you please that your affection to me only be only a little kind of tender amity, provided only you will let me love you more zealously than ever any did: Live still eternally happily with Sitalces, since it is the pleasure of the Gods, you should be his, and if I can, I will live well with Argyrispes, since my cross fate hath obliged me unto it: But Madam, since I can never give her my heart, let me keep it for you: Let me do that, I say which you cannot hinder me from doing, and put me not to a necessity of disobeying you. What I desire Madam, is, me thinks, but a small thing, since I am contented with your being only my friend, with a provision of letting me to be eternally your lover. You may phrase my love by what Epithite you please; call it esteem, friendship or tenderness, if you will, provided you will let me see you, let me love you, and let me think it my chiefest felicity to be near you. Of so many beauties which Sitalces enjoys in you, I ask only some of those favourable looks which heretofore were wont to afford me so many sweet minutes: Oh Madam, I beseech you consider well upon what I ask, your eyes by looking favourably upon me will not be less sweet unto Sitalces, and when he looks upon you, he will never find my image there; if I should happily desire any thing that were criminal, you may have some handsome pretence of some denying; for truly if I should desire often occasions of talking with you in private, any suspicious meetings, though happily innocent, you might then tell me that I did hazard your reputation: But alas Madam, I desire nothing from you, but that you will not hate me, that you will not dissemble your thoughts, that you will let me love you, and that you will not turn away your fair eyes when they accidentally look upon mine: In short Madam, do not seek me, nor do not shun me, suffer me only to see you, and do not complain against me: Let me, I say, see you without any affection, as a thousand others do, and that I may talk to you when chance lends me an occasion: If you will, I will not so long as I live tell you that I love you, onely content my self with saying, that once I did love you: But truly Madam, if you should turn me to despair, I may happily do such things as will displease you; therefore I beseech you be not so zealous in your solicitation for my liberty, in exchange for Sitalces, for it would be a piece of inhumanity to break those Chains which fetter me as a Prisoner of War, since you can break those Chains which fetter me as a prisoner of Love: Leave the business unto fortune, and oppose not my comfort of seeing you: You have already done enough as the wife of Sitalces, and if you will do as you ought, you must not negotiate any more for him, since you cannot solicit for him unless with strange inhumanity you solicit against me: The truth is Madam, I shall die if you deliver me; I much more desire death, then liberty, since I cannot have it without losing you.

Whilst Adonacris was talking thus, Noromata looked down with her eyes, and was in a most unconceivable torment of thoughts. However, since glory did exceedingly quash the tenderness of her soul, she would not be perswaded, and she told Adonacris so resolutely, that she would earnestly solicit for the delivery of Sitalces, that he plainly perceived he could not prevail with her: But Madam, said he then, since you will have Sitalces released, I beseech you solicit for his liberty and not mine: There are so many other Prisoners in your Party, for whom you get his exchange, that unless you be obstinately resolved to deny me all things, you will not deny me this. Ah Adonacris, replied she, I perceive you do not know the depth of my heart; for truly (if I could speak it without a blush) I should tell you, and confess, that if decency would permit it, I would solicit your return unto Issedon, without bringing Sitalces back unto Tipanis, and would easily be out of his sight, so I might never see you again. However, you ought to be so far from murmuring at what I say, that you are much obliged to me. But Adonacris, after I have confessed that your presence is terrible to me, and that it is a matter most hard to see and to hate you, I must resolve never to see you again, as long as I live, but when I cannot prevent it, and therefore I must even now begin to conjure you to be gone: Let me tell you Madam (said he unto her) that I cannot go until you have promised not to stifle your light inclination to me, and until you promise not to be offended if I do not endeavor my liberty so earnestly as you do. But Sir, said Noromata, if you do not endeavor it, people will have great reason to wonder, and dive into a cause so extraordinary, therefore Adonacris Page 47 you must endeavour it: Ah Madam, said he, you can never move me to it: And since by denying me all, you give me a right to deny you something, I assure you that in this I cannot do as you desire; and if I be released, or to say better banished, it shall be onely your Act not mine. After this, Adonacris expressed himself so tenderly unto Noromata, as that fair and virtuous person, not being able to hear him without much tenderness of heart, she began to be angry with her self, and commanded Adonacris so peremptorily to retire, that he was constrained to obey her: But Madam, said he (as she rose up) when will you give me leave to speake unto you? I will give you leave to bid me farewell (said she unto him) the same day you are to depart from Tipanis to Issedon in exchange of Sitalces. Oh Madam, said he, the limits of your virtue are too harshly narrow, and you are all cruelty in saying so. I know not whether it be cruelty to say so, but I am sure my thoughts tell me that I ought to speak as I do. Then Madam, said he unto her, tell me how I should interpret your words: interpret them as you please, replied she, so you will be immediately gone, so you will not return hither again, and so you will never seek for me any where else.

I promise you Madam, replied he, to do you all I am able to obey you; but in promising that, I promise nothing: for I cannot chuse but court all opportunities of seeing you. After this Noromata did so expressly command him to go out of her chamber, that he did obey her. But he obeyed not till after he had looked Noromata in the face a long while without giving one word; and till he discovered in her fair eyes, that her heart and tongue did not agree, and that she banished him with much sorrow. But away he went the saddest Lover in the world, and left her also in the same condition: For the truth is, she loved Adonacris more than ever: But for all that, having a high and virtuous soul, she checked the tenderness of her affection; and the next morning she claimed promise of Spargapises, and solicited Agathurses to send immediately unto Ariantes about the exchange of Adonacris for Sitalces. And the amorous Adonacris, seeing how earnestly Noromata solicited, his grief increased.

But since Love is a passion which can find expedients for all occasions, Adonacris found one out to hinder his own and Sitalces liberty: for it was a grand cordiall unto his passionionate soul to be near Noromata, though he never saw her but incensed: so that to hinder the happiness of Sitalces, and to make himself a little less miserable by hindring his liberty he sent secretly unto Issedon, and writ unto Ariantes, to tell him that Spargapises would address himself unto him, and offer him in exchange for Sitalces; but his zeal unto his service would advice, not to release him till the spring when the Army was in the field where he might fight in his quarrell. For considering the juncture of affairs, he thought that if he remained a prisoner all this winter time, he should be able to discover many of the enemies designs, much to his advantage. He told this Prince further, that he hoped to make him some Creatures in Tipanis: adding that it concerned him not to release Sitalces until the end of the winter, because if he were presently released, he knew that being very rich, he would make new levies to recruit the Army of Spargapises: Furthermore, he told him, that he was well able to do him this service, because his imprisonment was not harsh; but to the end his plot might better take, he told him also, that Argyrispes and Tyssagette should not have any knowledge of this secret, and that his best way would be onely to draw the business out at length without either consenting or infusing. Thus the winter being very long in that Country, Adonacris hoped for much comfort from the length of his imprisonment: and indeed his plot did take admirably well as I shall presently tell you. Again, he writ unto Argyrispes, as if he were in some hopes of his speedy release, though he had indeed some fears that it would not be so soon as he desired: But whilst the man whom Spargapises would send unto Issedon was preparing for her departure; whilst Noromata was soliciting from her husbands return, and the departure of Adonacris, she was extremely grieved: for asking two things so contrary to his own inclinations. Whilst Adonacris was doing all he could to hinder his own releasement, and Sitalces also, Agathirises, whose passion was still violently high, was busie in making all the world believe that he was not in love with Elibesis, to the end the fame of it might reach as far as Issedon, and that Elibesis might not think he loved her; thinking it a thing unworthy of himself to continue loving one who had preferred her ambition of being a Queen before her affection. So that he was extremely busie in giving instruction unto him who was going unto Issedon, least he should contradict his resentments: and in order to that, he made choice of a man who depended absolutely upon himself. But at the same time whilst he was instructing Page 48 him to speak nothing which might make it believed that he loved Elibesis; and that he did not act against Ariantes, but onely as a true subject unto Thomiris, he ordered him also to enquire very circumspectly, in what manner Elibesis behaved her self towards Ariantes: However, not thinking his revenge upon her to be enough in perswading her that he loved not her, unless he made her also believe that he loved another, he resolved upon a full satisfaction unto his revenge, in seeming to be desperately in love with some Lady in Tipanis. And there being no beauty of a greater luster then Noromata, nor more fit to raise a belief that he was in love, he determined to counterfeit addresses to her, and all the winter long to court this beauty with continual Feasts, and to closet up all his real resentments; in his own heart, that the least sign of any sorrow should not appear in his face. In order to which, he began his frequent visits unto Noromata, and to make many addresses unto the Governors wife of Tipanis, at whose house all the Ladies did rendezvous.

In the mean time, Noromata thinking it unfit for a wife, whose husband was a prisoner to be frequenter of so many diversions: she would needs excuse her self from them; but since Spargapises at the solicitation of Agathurses, was very importunate with her, she was forced to be less solitary than otherwise she would: For all the friends of Sitalces told her that there was no prudence in the world in incensing a Prince, who might hinder the releasement of her husband: So that Noromata, as melancholly as she was, yet was obliged to be in pleasant company. And thus though Adonacris could not see her at her own house, unless when he went with the young Spargapris: yet he saw her very often in other places whether she would or no, so as he received some consolation: Also he carried the matter so handsomly, that she not contributing unto it, he found ways how to talk with her a quarter of an hour together, when no ears but her own could hear: so that though she said nothing unto him, but what was worthy of her virtue, yet he did oftentimes break into expressions of his passion.

But the counterfeit passion of Agatheres, seemed the greater wonder unto Adonacris: for since he took that fancy up, he was almost perpetually with Noromata: and by consequence it was very hard for Adonacris to talk with her in private.

Again, as fair and charming as Noromata was, yet Agatheres took no other delight in seeing and talking with her, then his thoughts of spighting Elibesis: For he knew very well it would vex her to the very heart when she should hear her loved any other after her. Thus Agatheres disturbed the minds of these two persons without receiving any great satisfaction unto himself, or at least any tranquil satisfaction. But (said I one day unto him, seeing the constraint wherein he lived) I cannot understand why you should so dissemble; for what matter is it what Elibesis thinks of you? what matter? (replied he sharply) why it doth so much concern me, that she should believe I do not now love her, that I should be even desperate if he should not think me in love with Noromata. For truly I cannot endure she should ever suspect me of any puling weakness; but on the contrary, I had rather she should think me a thousand times more in love with Noromata, than ever I was with her.

But (said I unto him) in satisfying your fancy, you do but ill service unto the side you have taken: for do you think that Sitalces when he is released will take it well, that you should be in love with his wife? Provided Elibesis take it ill (replied he very sharply) I care not a straw how Sitalces takes it: Yet (added he) I had never made choice of Noromata, had there been any other in Tipanis, whose beauty was fam'd enough to make Elibesis fully believe I quit her for the other.

But since there is none so fair and charming as Noromata, she must be the object of my pretended love, which must satisfy my revenge: And more then this (added he) I will do all I am able to persuade my self, that I do love Noromata. Noromata being most virtuous (said I unto him) I am persuaded that you will not be a jot the happier if you should be really in love with her: Ah my dear Anabaris (said he unto me) that rigour which is caused by the virtue of the person loved, will never fill a soul so full of sorrow as will the inconstancy of an ambitious woman, who loves nothing but a Chimera of grandure which she fancies: So that though Noromata should treat me ill, yet I should be less miserable then I am, and should have this satisfaction at least, to know that she whom I loved did deserve to be so, whereas by continuing my love of Elibesis, I should continue loving one, who deserves not so much as my esteem: If you do not esteem her (said I unto him) you do not love her, for I cannot see how Love can subsist without esteem: Page 49 I did esteem her when I first began to love her (pursued he) and did since long esteem her; but let me tell you withal, that now I do not esteem her, nor ever will, though I am strangely afraid, that I shall love her still: I see she is as fair as fair can be, that she hath as much wit as is attributed unto the very Gods, and that she hath such a strange kind of engaging charms, when she pleases, that it is a matter most difficult to defend ones self against them. But for all this, it may be said, that I esteem in her what is estimable, but cannot truly say that I esteem her; for truly when I look upon her as a person blinded with grandure, one who would prefer a man that is defective both in body and mind so he be upon a Throne, before the most accomplished man, I cannot esteem her: But Sir, said I unto him, the Prince Ariantes is no such man as you speak of: 'Tis true, replied he, but she does not value his merits no more then mine: Then Sir, replied I, if she be such an ambitious piece, Can you think she will care whether you love her or no, or will be sorry if you should love another? At the least, she will not be glad if I love another (replied he) So that though I cannot make her grieve, yet I shall deprive her the pleasure to think that I can love none but she; and therefore though Sitalces should change sides, I would not change my thoughts: And indeed Sir Agatheres began his gallantry in such perspicuous manner, as it was impossible but to make a great noise in the world; but yet in the midst of all, he had such inward frettings of heart, which he was not able to Master, as that they appeared in spite of his teeth: For my particular, I have seen him when all the Ladies were assembled to dance, to stand all the night in the corner of the room, never so much as minding what they did, no not Noromata her self. However, this did not undeceive those who thought him in love, for they thought his sadness proceeded from Noromata's not answering his affection: She her self thought as much, and whilst his mind was all upon Elibesis, they thought that Noromata's rigour racked his thoughts. On the other side, Adonacris was so grieved at this high kind of gallantry, that had not I given him some cordial, I think he had died: but being his intimate friend, and might impart the secret of Agatheres without any prejudice to him, I did let him know that Agatheres did not love Noromata, but only did strive to love her: Ah my dear friend (said Adonacris to me) if Agatheres would love Noromata, certainly he will, for she is too too fair and lovely, not to answer the desires of all that would love her. As you cannot love Elibesis, though you would, as fair as she is (said I unto him) though she were not your Sister, so Agatheres cannot love Noromata, though he desire it. I wish it with all my soul, replied he, but I am afraid my wish will not prevent it: But Sir (said I unto him) I must confess, that I cannot understand this strain of jealousy which now possesseth you; for methinks when one is in love with a person who hath a husband, he never need be jealous of a Lover which is not loved: Alas Anabaris (said Adonacris) you are an ignorant in matters of love, if you do not know the difference between being jealous of a Rival and jealous of a Husband: I cannot tell whether I am an ignorant in amorous matters (replied I) but I believe I am in the right when I say that it is a much greater vexatious matter to see the Person whom one loves enjoyed by a husband; then to see her only loved by a Rival. If the husband were her lover when he married her, replied he, I must confess nothing is more hard to be endured; And when a lover becomes a husband the case is altered: for a Rival who is not loved troubles me no more if I should see him talk with Noromata, then Sitalces doth by enjoying her; for a husband who is not loved, will never be, but a hated lover, may be hereafter loved: Thus you see a vast difference between a husband and a Rival: Therefore I think my self infinitely obliged unto you for acquainting me that Agatheres is not my Rival. Thus Sir, you see what the resentments of these three persons were: Agatheres loved Elibesis still, and would seem as if he loved Noromata, and not her: Adonacris still loved her whom he loved at first, but durst not either say or be seen so to do: And Noromata, though she could not chuse but still love Adonacris, yet seemed as if she dearly loved Sitalces and not him.

In the mean time, the man whom Agatheres sent unto Ariantes in the name of Spargapris, not arriving at Issedon untill after the messenger which Adonacris sent unto that Prince, he did not speed so well as he hoped: for the Prince Ariantes really believing Adonacris, did protract the business, and dismissed the Envoy from Spargapris without either a denial or a consent unto his demands. So that Argyrispe hearing that Ariantes did not consent unto this exchange so readily as he hoped, she addressed her self unto her Sister in law, and desired her favor in obtaining her husbands liberty of this new King: Page 50 But Elibesis told her that, that she had already spoke unto Ariantes, who said he would first consider upon it: Adding that she did solicit in her behalf, with all imagineable care. But Sir, you must know, that Elibesis indeed had spoken unto the Prince Ariantes for the liberty of Adonacris, and he fearing to deny the liberty of her brother without telling her the reason, he shewed her what this prisoner had writ unto him, upon condition she should not speak of it unto Argyrispe or any other: She seeing this, that her brother desired not to be released, that his staying at Tipanis, would advantage to the new Kings affaires, and prejudice the Queens; she desired Ariantes to deny her very peremptorily, as often as she should at the instance of her Sister in law, solicit him for the liberty of Adonacris: So that by this means the design of this lover and prisoner, did take admirable effect.

On the other side, Sitalces understanding that the Prince Ariantes did make it some difficulty of exchanging him for Adonacris, was much perplexed at his being absent from his wife at a time when so many Gallants were at Tipanis: So that jealousie obliged him to write in answer to his wives letter, that he had appointed her to offer Agatheres any thing which much conduces unto the continuation of the war, so he would procure his liberty. Furthermore, Argyrispe not contenting her self with the answer of Elibesis, did write unto her Husband that she was resolved rather to offer the half of all her estate to procure his liberty, then to let him lye a long winter in prison; for she being naturally of a jealous and unquiet temper, and loving her Husband very dearly, his absence was intolerable to her. So that Sitalces not knowing that Adonacris was in love with his wife, or that his wife did not hate him, also Argyrispe not knowing these things neither, they were both of them in a most unquiet condition, and they partly shewed it; for Sitalces being upon his parol, as well as Adonacris, he went sometimes to visit her, and confer upon the best expedients, for the recovery of her Husbands liberty and his own: And thus the equality of their interests did beget a confidence in each other: But whilst these two were plotting for expedients to advance their designs, Elibesis was a little perplexed in resisting the Prince Ariantes, and refusing to marry him without angering him. However, being resolved not to marry under a King, and seeing his Throne yet in a tottering condition, she held him still cunningly in hand, but still intended, that if Ariantes were not King, then to renew with Agatheres, not doubting but that he would return to her, if she would return to him. And indeed she tempered so cunningly with Ariantes, that he believed the reason why she would not marry him during the war, was in respect of his own interest: for having wit at will, she told him that since her quality was inferior to his if he should then marry her, it would give the adverse party a colour for saying many things prejudicial against him: So that she going thus subtly to work, Ariantes thought him self obliged unto her for denying him.

On the other side, the messenger which Spargapris sent to this Prince, being returned to this Prince, with an answer nothing satisfactory; Noromata was not a little astonished; for she could not imagine why Ariantes would not release the brother of her he loved, by releasing Sitalces: she began to suspect that Adonacris was himself an obstacle unto his own liberty; but since she could not imagine which way he should do it, she could not positively believe it. However, though she shuned meeting with Adonacris as much as she could, and solicited hard to send him further from her by releasing him: yet she was not sorry in her heart that Sitalces (she not contributing to it) was still at Issedon; and Adonacris yet at Tipanis. Yet notwithstanding all this, as soon as she received her Husbands Letter which appointed her to offer any thing in the world unto Agatheres, to obtain his liberty, she resolved upon obedience.

Furthermore, Adonacris seeing his Plot did so happily hit, he was infinitely joyed it. But to the end Ariantes should not discover his drift, but still let him continue a prisoner all the winter, he did really spie so narrowly into the designs of Agatheres, and all the Cabinet intricases of Tipanis and likewise of the Tent Royal, that he did oftentimes send intelligence of great importance unto that Prince; in so much as there was no need of giving any new reasons why he should not be released: because the interest of State was reason enough.

On the other side, Agatheres in continuing his mask of love unto Noromata, he was nothing so circumspect as he might be in hindering Ariantes from the Throne: But his greatest grief was, that Thomiris during her languishing disease, did send such ambiguous Orders; as it was easie to know that her soul was troubled at something else then at Page 51 the War, and that She had some other design, since She would not hazard her Forces; and indeed Noromata's Father, who was with that Queen, did one day write, that he heard her say, She had rather loose the Kingdom of the Issedons, then her Army: Howl-ever, send what orders She would, Agatheres was resolved to give battle as soon as Winter was done, or else to force Ariantes into Issedon. But Winter being very long in that Country, he must endure a long torment; yet it was some consolation unto him to hear from Spargapris his Envoy, that the reports in Issedon was, Elibesis would not marry Ariantes until the end of the War. But since the passion of his soul was such as useth ordinarily to inspire him with thoughts quite opposite unto one another, he would some daies wish that Ariantes had married Elibesis: Yes Anabaris, (said he one day unto me) I swear unto you by all the Gods, that if I were sure to vanquish Ariantes to morrow, I would have him marry Elibesis to day; for it would be the greatest delight in the world unto me, to see a Scepter fall out of the hand of this perfidious woman; and my revenge would not be to the full, if the fall of Ariantes Throne did overwhelm only himself; and if I did not see Elibesis a Queen without a Crown, or to say better, the Widdow of a vanquished Usurper, and by consequence without honour, without rank, and without support, in necessity to have recourse unto me, to obtain for her some small corner in that Kingdom which She hopes to possess: Should you ever see her in such a deplorable condition (said I unto him) I am confident your joys would be mixed with much pity: Fie Anabaris (said he unto me) I cannot pity those who cannot pity me, and as my miseries never moved Elibesis, so hers shall never move me, or if they do, it shall be only out of meer generosity, and out of my satisfaction to let her know, that such a Subject as my self does better merit her affection, then such a Sovereign as Ariantes.

In the mean time, Noromata in observance of her husbands orders did speak unto Aga|therses, according as he desired her; but since he seemed to be in love with her, he thought fit to answer her in ambiguous terms, though he did intend to do what he could to release Sitalces. And since he would have her think him to be really her Lover, to the end, that she being first deceived, others also might be the sooner; he told her very wittily, that her desires of seeing Sitalces released had blinded her, since she made such Propositions as were dishonorable to him: For truly (said he) if it should be known you offer so much for his liberty, it would be thought, that his side did not much value him; and therefore it is requisite to manage his honour a little better, and give Ariantes time to advise upon it; for his answer was not so clear, but that it was requisite to send a second time unto him, without making any new Propositions: Therefore Madam, have a little patience, and let time bring that design to pass, which perhaps would be ruined with haste.

This Sir was the answer which Agatherses gave her, who being glad of a pretence to send again unto Issedon, that he might hear news of Elibesis, and publish it, that he was in Love with Noromata, he moved Spargapises to send thither the second time: So that Noromata writ unto Sitalces all that Agatherses said unto her: Adonacris also answered Argirispe, and wished her to be wary in her offers for his liberty, because if things changed not, he had an infallible way of getting his liberty, which now he could not write. In the mean time, whilst these designs, which had so many secret obstacles, were in agitation, Adonacris was very vigilant, to take all opportunities of seeing and talking with Noromata (<...> who, for his part, shunned him as much as she could, though she did very tenderly love him. But when chance only brought them together, and when Adonacris could not suspect that she gave him any opportunities of talking with her, then she could not chuse but be much joyed, and take great delight in hearing him talk to her; yet these delights and joys, had some bitter mixed with their sweets, for she was so extremely careful of being over-obliging in her language, that she so stifled the thoughts of her heart, as put him into a cruel qualm, she was so fearful it should be known, that he did, and still doth love her, as she oftentimes did contradict the most just things; and if he at any time did hold an argument with another, she would always take his adverse part, so scrupulous and careful was this virtuous Lady of her reputation; yet Adonacris knew very well, that whensoever she was opposite to him, She did it not out of hatred. But as the great prudence of Noromata did deprive him of a hundred innocent delights, in depriving him of all private conference with her; so he chanced one day to argue against Eliorante in the presence of Noromata, upon a Subject, which obliquely had some coherence with the adventure Page 52 which grieved him: For he pleased to know, that there was two Ladies in Tipanis, whose virtues and reputations were very different: For one, whose name was Menopea, was possessed with a most violent passion in her heart, and secretly held correspondencies of Gallantry with a very bravely accomplished man; but She carried her self with so much prudence, such strict reservedness, and so modestly, that except very few who knew the truth, all the world thought Menopea to be the most virtuous person upon earth, and the least capable of any correspondencies of Gallantry with any one. There was also another Lady, whose name was Orique, who was as really virtuous as ever any was, yet extremely exposed to scandal, because She had a conceit, that it was sufficient to be virtuous without seeming so. So that being only cautious lest any of her actions should be essentially ill, and never caring for appearances by which the world in general useth to judge, She exposed her reputation unto so much slander and envy, that all the Town (except a few who knew her very well) did think that all men were her Lovers, yes, her favoured Lovers. Thus She who was the Gallant, passed for severe and virtuous, and She who was the virtuous, passed for the Gallant, & seemed to do many things against the Rule of Vertue Falling then into discourse of these two Ladies whom so few did rightly know: Eliorante, Noromata, and Adonacris being together, and Agatherses coming also in, Noromata began to blame that virtuous Lady, who trusted too much unto her own goodness, and who was not enough observant over her actions. I could never have thought (said Adonacris and smiled) that of two persons, the one only seeming virtuous and not being; the other being virtuous, and not seeming, that the fair Noromata would take her part who was not virtuous: I do not take her part, replied Noromata, and yet I am against her who is virtuous, and is not careful of seeming so also: For truly if a woman love not her reputation, I cannot be well satisfied with her virtue, nor know I well whether She truly merits the name of Vertuous: It is most dangerous to subject ones self unto censure, and I will maintain, that though one be not virtuous, yet they ought at least to endeavour to appear so, and much more She who really is virtuous: For my part, replied Adonacris, I am perswaded it is sufficient if one do nothing against virtue, and one needs not to insist so precisely upon endeavours to take away all manner of pretences of slander; for as those who are most assiduous in frequenting sacred duties, are often accused of hypocrisy; so it must be concluded a thing impossible to prevent all scandal and censure: And so since malicious and envious people will be talking and belching out their venom, do what one can, it were a piece of injustice unto ones self to be all their life long rigid and severe, for fear of being talked of: Much better it is, to let ones mind sore above all that malice can say, then to stand eternally upon a watchful guard against all tongues: For my particular (said Agatherses then) I think Adonacris to be in the right: For to carry ones self so, as nothing can be said against them, is a thing most impossible: And indeed, we see every day, that one and the same action both commended and condemned, according to the several humours of men; and to justify what Adonacris hath said, hypocrisy is commonly called piety: They do ill who do so, said Noromata and interrupted him: But for all that, what is good must appear to be so, and ill habits ought to be concealed: Your opinion seems so reasonable, replied Eliorante, that I cannot believe any is able to contradict it: Yet I shall Madam, replied Agatherses; for there is nothing worse becomes an heroic soul, then to study how the world should see all their good qualities; yet according to your Tenents, a man must never do any brave action, but first he must call for some witnesses unto it, he must never be liberal but in public, and he must do all the good he can, only because people must know it, and talk of it: No; no, replied Noromata, you put an ill exposition upon my words: How then must I expound them, replied he? To understand me rightly, answered She, I would not have any do good with a design it should be known; but in things which may reflect upon ones reputation, I would have one never to do any thing which may stain it: For example, I would have a man so regulate his life, as none can think but that he is valiant: I would have a woman live so prudently, that none can suspect her virtue; and not to content themselves only with being virtuous, but be careful to avoid all things which may make her believed otherwise: Alas Madam, said Adonacris, your Rule is most severe, for all the pleasure of life consists in such things as may be ill interpreted according to several humours: I do confess it, said She; but since they cannot be done without hazarding reputation, I will affirm, that the sorrow for losing it, is greater then all the delights that can be found: But Madam, (replied Agatherses pleasantly) you must do nothing as long as you live, but in your Chamber; Page 53 nay, I know not whether such a retreat would not be also subject unto scandal; for it would be said, that you would never live so, but because Sitalces would otherwise be jealous: 'Tis true, said she, and smiled, but they would then say that I did not give him any cause of jealousy: By your rules, added Agatherses, a Lady must carefully avoid all private conference with men, whom others do think do love her; She must never walk under a hundred women at once, and in a Garden be always in the throng of company, and never go aside to talk with any friend about any business; She must always talk aloud, and never talk of the Beauties of the Time, or of shadows, or walks, lest it should be thought you talk as if you were in love; certainly She must talk more with men She hates, then with men She loves, lest otherwise she should be scandalized: So a Lady who is so cheary of her reputation, must live ever without any friends of either Sex, lest it should be said, they are either her Lovers, or her Confidants: None of all this, replied She, for I allow her friends of both Sexes; but I would have a Wife live so, as none can accuse her of having any favoured Lovers; and therefore as soon as ever a Lady knows that any man is in love with her, She must carefully avoid both saying or doing any thing, that he may take any advantage to himself by it, but live so reservedly, that none can so much as suspect her favourable to him, and to avoid all occasions of his speaking to her, lest it should be thought he speaks of his love: For my part, I whom as little apt to slander as another, I must confess, that I cannot see a Lover hold long discourse with his Mistress, but I must needs think, he is talking neither of State affairs, nor martial matters. So that since She may draw a great inconvenience upon her self, for a little pleasure, I must conclude, She ought never to run the hazard of it. To instance in the fair Orique, for an example. All the world knows that She it most horribly slandered with keeping private conference with a Gallant in a Garden, yet I do know of a most infallible certainty, that all the while he was with her, he only related his affection that he bore unto a Lady who was with Thomir (<...> s. Do you think that the pleasure of the story did merit the hazard of her reputation, in passing away a whole afternoon with a man whom She loved not? I must confess, said Adonacris then, that since Orique did not love the man, and since he had nothing to say unto her which concerned her self, She had better to have let that meeting alone.

But still I must say, that when a woman esteems a man in an extraordinary manner, it were weakness in her to deprive her self of the pleasure of talking in secret, only because perhaps she may be talked of, and it's enough if She do nothing against the Laws of vertue; for if She do love very well the pleasure of free discourse with him She loves, 'twill be above the talk of spiteful tongues. One that hears you talk, would say, replied Noromata, that you do not value honour, and that you do not understand the sorrows of such as are injuriously dishonoured; yet I assure you, there is nothing more hard to be endured, then stander, when it reflects upon ones honour; as that which reflects upon ones wit or beauty, I am one who of all the world am least concerned; for truly should they say of me that I am simple, or ugly, it would not anger me at all; but should they say of me, that I was addicted to Gallantry, and a Gossiper, this would most sensibly grieve me, nor could I endure to be the Subject of any injurious Rallery: To live after your mode, (replied Agatherses) were to live more unto others then themselves: It seems (replied Noromata and laughed) that in all your actions you would strive only to please your self, without any satisfaction unto others: Since others care not for contenting me (replied he) I never trouble my mind with contenting others; for setting the interest of her I love aside, and the interest of my friends, which is ever dearer unto me then my own, neither those who are above me, nor those who are below me, shall never hinder me from doing what I have a desire to do, provided it be but honest; and it is the greatest folly in the world to do every thing according to the fancy of all our acquaintance, for Courtiers and Citizens see things with different eyes, old men and young the like, melancholy and merry men are of several minds: Such as we call Libertines, and pious people, have thoughts quite contrary; women who are fair, and such as are ill-favoured, have often very various thoughts. So that whosoever will content all sorts of people at once, will certainly spend their time to very ill purpose: For my particular; replied Noromata, I should spend it much to worse purpose, if all these sorts of people you speak of should unite themselves to wound my reputation, as doubtless they would, should I give them cause; for certainly there is a kind of malignity that reigns in the minds of all the world in general, which makes them apt to interpret in an ill sense, all things that may receive Page 54 an exposition of that nature: But Madam, replied Adonacris, what hurt doth any ill exposition of any of your actions do you, when it is spoken out of your presence, and never to your face? Though I should have no other grief, replied She, but to think that people will say the worst they can of me; and to think they will say of me as they do of others, it were enough to blast all the pleasures I should take in the presence of that person I loved best in the world: However, said Agatherses, Do we live for others, and not our selves? Yes sure, for our selves in the first place; if so, Why are we not contented with the secret testimony of our own consciences, and never torment our selves at any people who love us not, nor esteem us, nor whom we know not, let them think or say what they will. The reason why I will live as I do intend to do, replied Noromata, is because we are to live for our selves: for it is the strangest thing in the world, that one should loose their reputation without a cause; and my humour is such, that I would soonler pardon the misbehaviour of a person, whose manners are really irregular, then I would the misbehaviour of one who is virtuous; and truly I cannot conceive why one should manage their reputations carelessly when they know they deserve well, nor why one should not take a little pains to appear so, since it is easie to be done, and dangerous not to be done. Though you should appear never so good, (replied Agatherses) yet all appearances are no armour against slander: For as you know by experience, that Menopea with all her virtuous appearances, yet is not so: So I could say, if I would, that all your actions are but dissimulations, and that I know some things which do give all your actions the lye: When I have done all I can (replied She) I cannot chide my self if my reputation be scandalized, nor shall I be exposed unto a thousand dangers, as those are, who think themselves above all that can be said or thought; for those who despise the thoughts of others, will in time come to despise the thoughts of themselves: However, I must tell you Madam, (replied Agatherses) your life will be extremely tedious to you, if you should live always in a constrained course. The example of Menopea and Orique do clearly shew it unto you, for though Menopea doth both love, and is beloved; and by consequence enjoys all that is requisite to make the happiest person in the world, and enjoys all imaginable pleasures, yet her close reservedness, which she observes to hide her correspondence with her Lover, doth daily bring a thousand inconveniences upon her, for she dares neither look nor speak unto her Lover, but with most intolerable pre-caution; and as She lives, I am confident that She has not one hour of a thousand which is absolutely agreeable unto her wish; but on the contrary, Menopea, though not in love, nor in any particular correspondency with any, yet She lives the most pleasant life in the world, only because what She does, She does without constraint: If you be more a Lo|ver of your Liberty then your glory, replied Noromata, you then had good reason for what you say; but for my part, since I value my honor above my liberty, I have good reason for what I say, and to maintain that a woman who cares not for her reputation, but is contented with the esteem of her self, not valuing the esteem of others, She does deeply expose her self to do things against virtue, more then one who sets a prize upon her honour. Truly Madam, said Agatheres, you would have our Ladies more reserved then some of our Goddesses, for—I would you not speak thus against the reverence which is due unto the Gods, (replied Noromata, not giving him time to tell on) and if it be possible, leave off that ill custom of using the name of the Gods always to justify every trifle: I had rather you would swear by Agatheres and by E|iorante, said She and smiled, then by Mars, and by Hercules, were I of the opinion which many of our young Court Gallants are, who scarcely think they were ever men, much less Gods: For ought I see Madam (replied Agatheres and smiled also) you think me an absolute Libertine: No, replied She, for if I did think you so, I promise you that should not be any friend of mine; but I blame you, and with reason, for accustoming your self unto an ill habit of speaking over|sightly and irreverently of things in our Religion, yet truly in my opinion the argument is but weak, to say we ought to believe no further then we understand, since there are a thousand things in nature we cannot comprehend. I have heard say, that Croessus amongst his rarities had a Stone, which made those who wore it invisible: Yet it is a much harder matter to believe what is said concerning the power of our Gods, then what is related concerning the virtue of this wonder the Heliotrope. Commonly those who jest most at sacred things, do but imperfectly know what it is which hardens the hail, and whitens the Snow; nor know they at all what that boisterous wind is which often disroots the stur|diest oaks (though it touches them, and sometimes blows them over) yet these men must Page 55 be prying and meddling with the Cabinet secrets of Eternity, they will be Reformers of the best established Religions, and out of their capricious fond fancies, destroy all the Temples and Altars of the world; and all this, because not believing that there is a God, they think all that pleaseth them is permissible: But as for you Agatheres (added Noromata) whose manners are both innocent and virtuous, and who is not of their opinion, who think that the Gods do neither punish nor reward, only because they may live in more liberty; I advise you as a friend, not to be carried away with the ill customs of the world: Your zeal Madam, replied Agatheres, makes you so eloquent, that I cannot tell how to deny you, but will promise you, (most charming Noromata) that I will do as much as I can to believe, that Mars is jealous, that Vulcan is a Cuckold, and that Ve|nus did equally delude them both.

As Agatheres said so, the young Spargapises entred, who broke off this discourse, and hindred Noromata from answering Agatheres. But since he stayed not long with E|io|rante, he carried Agatheres with him, and Fortune was so favourable unto Adonacris, that one having some business with E|iorante, she went into her Closet, and desired No|romata as her intimate friend, to entertain Adonacris until she returned. At the first No|romata told her, that She desired her excuse, because She was to be gone her self; but She said this in such a faint manner, that E|iorante imagining She had no reasons which re|laid induced her to be gone so soon, did tell with all freedom of friendship that She would not bid her adieu, and that if She found her not with Adonacris at her return, She would quarrel with her: So that Noromata, who indeed could not part from Adonacris without sorrow, She had not power to deny E|iorante, who not staying for her answer, went un|to her Closet, and left her alone with her Lover. But E|iorante had no sooner left them but Adonacris began discourse.

I wonder Madam, said he unto her and smiled, that you will not rather venture a quar|rel with E|iorante, then stay with a man who infinitely adores you: Certain I should do so, (replied She, and both smiled and blusht) if I did not fear E|iorante would conceive some such thing if I should quit you: Oh Madam, said Adonacris, as long as your care of your glory obligeth you to things of this nature; I shall never murmur: But Madam said he (and assumed a most serious aspect) to lose no more of this precious time, but to speak more seriously, I beseech you; why are you so resolute of my banishment by your getting my release? Alas, Sitalces will see you all the daies of his life; but I, heavens know perhaps shall never see you again, after I am released: Allow then Madam of a thing which Fortune hath brought to pass without your consent, for truly Madam, you shall not release me so soon as you imagine: Therefore I beseech you, let me not have alny cause to complain against you for any rigour as long as I am with you; I desire only to see you, and talk to you when none hears but your self, do not answer me if you please, and let me only tell you that I did love you, and not that I do so still: Since I can talk this day unto you (said she unto him) and not upbraid my self for giving you any occa|sion, I will consent unto your desires; but Adonacris, it shall be still to tell you the same things over again, and to assure you, that since I cannot banish you from my heart, I will do what I can to banish you from Tipanis. Since I hope Madam, replied Adonacris, that Fortune will be more favourable unto me then you are, and not banish me so soon, I am contented you should continue your solicitations for the liberty of Sitalces, and by consequence for mine: But Madam, that which I do request, and request with abundance of zeal, is that you will be pleased as long as I do stay here, to let me talk to you, and see you often: I do allow it but too much (said she unto him) and if you did but know how I chide my self for my indulgency towards you—Alas Madam (said Adonacris and interrupted her) If you call your behaviour to me indulgency, I wonder what you will call your rigour? What I do (replied She) is certainly more then I ought to do; for truly Adonacris, that affection which might have been innocent at Issedon, is now become vicious at Tipanis, that I am now more faulty in suffering you to love me, then I was be|fore in loving you: And truly I intend (added She and sighed) to conjure both you and my self to do so no more; but Adonacris, I must confess, I know not whether I have power to execute my intentions.

As he was going to reply, E|iorante returned, who gave Noromata as many thanks for staying there, as Adonacris did unto her in his heart for staying her. The truth is, her so soon return did a little take off the good offices She had done him, and as he had a de|sire to thank her, so had he also to complain against her. But Sir, whilst these things Page 56 passed at Tipanis, other accidents fell out at Issedon, which put new faces upon things: For be pleased to know, that when Adonacris was taken Prisoner, he thought, as I told you before, that all his baggage was plundered by the Souldiers: So that though he was very sorry for the loss of his dear Noromata's Letters which he valued above his most pre|cious jewels; yet he hoped, that they would be lost unto all the world, as well as unto himself; and that those who plundered the baggage would never trouble themselves with such trifles as would not be worth any thing unto them, but would either tear or burn them: So that though they were never like to be any comfort unto him, yet at least they would never hurt him. But Fortune did otherwise dispose of them, and caused unhappily for him, that one of his servants, who was most zealously devoted unto his service, who seeing the Army routed, and baggage like to be lost, resolved to get his Masters things in|to some safety, and to execute his design, he saved the carriage, by seeming to be of the other side: Yet as soon as night was come, he fell extreemly sick, and the Inhabitants of the Town where he quartered, did pillage him of all he had, and left him nothing consi|derable, but a little Cabinet of a Fishes Skin, which was both handsom and rich, and in which was Noromata's Letters.

This servant after his recovery believed, that since he was much neerer Issedon then Ti|panis, it was best for him to go thither, and ask Argirispe what service She would com|mand him, and whether he should return to his Master, or take some other course. This design of his being very reasonable, he did execute it, and returned to Issedon; and to let Argirispe see his fidelity, he shewed this Cabinet unto her, not knowing what was within it; and it is to be supposed, that those who stole all the baggage from this servant, finding this Cabinet to be but little and light, and thinking no matter of money in it, did either slight or forget it, as a thing of no worth. But Sir, as it is the nature of all jealous persons generally to be full of curiosity, though there be no reason for any jealousy in the world: So Argirispe had a strong natural inclination to open this Cabinet, and to read these Let|ters, yet not knowing any reason why: And indeed, I have heard one of her friends say, that She never was in the Chamber of any one whom She visited, but if She were alone, and found any Letters upon the Table, She would open them, or at the least had a great desire unto it: You may easily imagine then Sir, considering the humour of Argirispe, as I have described it, that She could not see this Cabinet, but needs must open it. But Sir, the worst was, Sitalces, whom I told you, was a frequent visiter of Argirispe, was then present with her, and She being naturally of an impatient temper, She opened this Cabinet in his presence, and he who opened it, being forced to use some strength unto it, it broke all in pieces, and the Letters opened in falling out, and one of them falling un|happily upon Sitalces, he took it up to present it unto Argirispe, not thinking it was from his Wife: But he was strangely surprized when he saw the superscription, and knew it to be the hand of Noromata, his disorder was such, that altering his intention of giving it unto Argirispe, he now designed to keep it, though he knew not any handsome pretence for it.

But Argirispe saved him the labour of seeking out for an excuse, for She seeing and know|ing the hand, was also much surprized, and jealousy beginning to rouse up her heart, She was as full of curiosity as Sitalces: I never knew (said She unto him) that ever there was any such intimacy between Noromata and Adonacris, as to write Letters unto each o|ther, but I believe Sir you know more then I do. Sitalces hearing Argirispe say so, was much puzzled for an answer, but at last did ingeniously confess, that he was as ignorant as her self of any Letters that Noromata writ unto Adonacris, but he spoke with such trem|bling of heart, that he scarce knew what he said. But in conclusion, these two jealous persons agreed to read these Letters, and to see of what nature they were: For truly Sir, said Argirispe, since these Letters were written by your Wife, it is but just you should see them, and just also, that since they were written unto my Husband that I see them. But Sir, I beseech you admire a little at the oddness of destiny in this business, and to add unto your wonder, be pleased to know, that though all Noromata's Letters were only matters of civility, yet they so indited, as if they had some Characters of love in them. Moreover, they were not dated, so that Sitalces and Argirispe knew not whether they were writ before, or after their marriages: So that by this means Sitalces and Argirispe thought that they had matter of accusation enough against Noromata. But to return from whence I digressed, Argirispe and Sitalces beginning to read them, with such resentments, as you may well imagine: The first Letter was thus indited.

NOROMATA unto ADONACRIS.

SIR,

IT seems I am not so sincere as you are, for I would not that you should be able to Divine my thoughts, as you seem to desire I should yours; yet do not think that I do entertain any which are disadvantageous to you, nor any which are much to your advantage, but I am of an humour, which perswades me to let none have so much power over me, as I my self have, but be contested with so much as I do give you, and without diving into my thoughts: Let it suffice I give you leave to interpret all my words in the most obliging sense you can.

NOROMATA.

Though this Letter was indeed only civil and gallant, yet it so nettled the soul of Si|talces, that it turned it all at once into jealousy, hatred, and fury; nor did it move less dis|order in the soul of Argirispe, when She read another Letter, which if my memory fail not, contained these words.

NOROMATA unto ADONACRIS.

SIR,

Could I write that I do consent you should love me, and not tacitly tell you at the same time, that I do love you, doubtless I should do it: But since my permission may be inter|preted so, I will not allow it; all the favour you shall receive from me, is this, That I do leave you at liberty to love me, or not to love me, as you please, without any permittance or forbiddance from

NOROMATA.

After the reading of this Letter, Argirispe looked upon Sitalces, and saw his thoughts so well in his eyes, that she thought it unnecessary to ask him. I understood since by a woman who was with her, and who stood in a corner of the Chamber during all the conference which she had with Sitalces, that both of their countenances changed, their eyes were so full of fury, and their souls so troubled, that it was easy to see their hearts were disordered with more then one passion. I shall not trouble you Sir with a relation of what they said unto each other, though this woman made an exact relation of all unto me; for indeed their conference was so full of anger and fury, that it would be no great pleasure unto you to hear it: However, they read all Noromata's Letters, and though they found none more engaging then these two which I have already related, yet they drew out of them very vexatious consequences. As for Sitalces, he told Argirispe in the heat of his transport, that knowing Noromata so well as he did, he took all these her civilities to be so many signs of Love: And Argirispe also told Sitalces, that knowing her Husbands discretion so well as she did, she was sure he had burned the most obliging of Noromata's Letters, and kept only such as were most indifferent: Sometimes they concurred in their opinions of things, and sometimes again they differed, and their excess of vexation made them sometimes jar with one another; and indeed Argirispe did almost down-right tell Sitalces, that his wife had stoln the heart of her husband from her, because he had not merit enough to get hers: And Sitalces told Argirispe, that Adonacris would never have loved Noromata, but because he did not think his own wife amiable: Yet since their interest were alike, and since they were both wholly bent upon revenge, after the heat of fury was a little cooled, they agreed to make those two persons miserable who caused their sorrows. And at last they began to consider why Ariantes should make such a difficulty in accepting upon the exchange which they had propounded, to consider the slight sorrows which Adonacris expressed in his Letters at his not being released; and thereupon concluding, that it was Adonacris who had writ unto his Sister to retard his releasement; and afterwards Page 58 concluded, that Noromata was of the plot, and consented unto it, and that Adonacris and she did spend whole daies together in laughing and mocking at their sorrows, and at all the pains they have taken to procure the exchange. Sitalces for his particular, did not now doubt of the reason why Agathorses did not solicit Spargapises to make any large offers unto the Prince Ariantes for his exchange, for he knew it was his Wife who hindred him, and who did not negotiate as he desired her: And Argirispe also believed, that the reason why her Husband sent her word not to offer any thing for his releasement, because he knew an infallible way to procure it, that the reason was, because he desired not to be at liberty: So that both of them being in one minde, there was no violent course which they did not both of them resolve upon: And after they had well examined what course to take, they concluded it best to let Adonacris and Noromata know, that they were not ignorant of their affections; and to drive the nail so home, that this their intimation to them should oblige them to remove those obstacles which hindered their exchange, resolving after this to proceed further, when they should see their answers. So that the second Messenger from Spargapises being ready to depart from Issedon, without doing any thing more then at first time, they writ by him. But Sir, I forget to tell you, that since this messenger from Agathorses, had private orders from his Master to publish at Issedon, How it was reported in Tipanis, that Agathorses was in love with Noromata, to the end Elibesis might know it; so it chanced that the poor Sitalces came to the knowlledge of it also: So that believing then his Wife had two Lovers in one place in lieu of one, he was in a most miserable condition: But though this was very sad news unto him, yet it was not so unto the Prince Ariantes, but on the contrary; he much rejoiced at it; and thinking it to conduce much unto his advantage that Elibesis should know it, he made her a Visit, purposely to acquaint her with it. But Sir, his design did not hit so happily as he hoped, for Elibesis could not hear that Agathorses had left loving her, and that he loved another without abundance of grief; and Ariantes told it unto her in such a surprizing manner, that he plainly perceived how this new passion of Agathorses did trouble her; and not being able to forbear some expressions of his thoughts: If I should believe your eyes Madam (said he unto her) I should think that your loss of Agathorses his heart doth as much trouble you, as if I had lost a Battel, or as if you had lost a Crown: If my eyes have discovered any sorrow unto you (replied Elibesis wittily, and blusht) they have verry ill interpreted the thoughts of my heart, since I assure you Agathorses hath not any share in them: But I must confess, that since I do not love Noromata, I am not very glad, that a man whom heretofore I have communicated so much unto, should now go and tattle all our passages unto her: Yet Madam (replied Ariantes) I could never discover the least falling out betwixt you and Noromata all the while she was here: 'Tis true (replied Elibesis, a little non-plust) there was no visible quarrel between us: But Sir (added she with a marvellous vivacity of Spirit) When two are neer of the same age, of the same quality, pretend unto the same esteem, and the same commendations, and when they are neither old nor ugly, it is not a question to be asked, whether there be any quarrels between two such: For though they live together in all civility, yet believe it Sir, if you look well into their hearts, you will find but little friendship there to each other: Oh Madam (said Ariantes in looking fixedly upon her) your cares to perswade me that you are capable of envy, makes me suspicious: I am fearful to discover, that all your affections are upon Agathorses, and that you only held me in hand out of ambition: Truly Madam, I conceive it not just, that since I became a Rebel unto Thomiris, only out of love to you, since I began a War, only to Crown you, that I should loose your esteem by loosing a Battel, and that if I should loose a Crown, to loose also all hopes of enjoying you: I beseech you Madam, since Agathorses does not now love you, but loves another, let me have the happiness to possess his room: Be not so unjust, as to love him who loves not you, and not to love a Prince, who loves you more then himself. I have already told you Sir (replied she) that Agathorses hath no share in that anger which my eyes against my will discovers unto you; but to stop all your complaints, let me tell you, that if you had told me Agathorses had been in love with any other then Noromata, you should have seen less disorder in my looks: I wish I could believe you Madam (replied he) but if I be not much mistaken, I do rightly understand the language of your eyes, and unless you give me some more obliging language then yet you have, but will still perswade me that I am not loved, I shall give over all matters of War, and strive <...> no longer to crown a person, who grieves more for a Slave that hath broke his Ch <...> Page 59 then for me, who hazards my life to set her upon a Throne: Truly Sir (replied Elibesis craftily, whose ambition revived in her heart) you are most strangely earnest: But since it is fit I satisfy you, I will acquaint you with the true cause of all the sorrow you see in my eyes, though I shall hardly do it without a blush; for truly Sir, since you will needs have me confess the truth, I must tell you, that I cannot hear of Agathorses his ceasing to love me, but I must needs think that perhaps the Prince Ariantes will one day do the like, and consequently must extreemly grieve at the very thought of it; and judg, I beseech you, if I have not good cause for it: Your language Madam is so favourable (replied Ariantes) that I had rather accuse your eyes of an untruth, then not to believe you, and Madam, I had rather believe what pleaseth me, then what grieveth me, though I be deceived by it. However, say what Elibesis would unto Ariantes, yet she was extreemly vexed that Agathorses did not love her, and her hopes of his being one day her Subject, did not countervail her sorrows for his not being her Slave, though then she had no intentions of making him happy. But whilst Elibesis had more thoughts then she was able to Mistress, and whilst both love and ambition did tear her in pieces almost with equal violence, she knew not that Agathorses in counterfeiting not to love her, did yet love her with extreame zeal, and he suffered more in loving her, then she could do in thinking he did not. But as great as her sufferings were, they were but small, in comparison of what Noromata endured when she received her Husbands Letter. And indeed Sir, this Letter was writ in such a cruel stile, as never did Letter contain more bitter marks of extreame jealousy and anger, for he did not only hint unto her that he knew of the correspondency with Adonacris; but he told her also in most tart expressions, that she hindered his releasement, purposely to be out of his sight, and with Adonacris. After this, he mentioned something concerning the pretended Love of Agathorses, mixing sometimes amongst his injurious hints, some resentments of love, and ended his Letter with a Declaration, That if she did not find out some wayes that Adonacris might be within a few daies at Issedon, and that he might return unto Tipanis, he would never see her again; but make it known to all the world, that the reason of it was because she loved Adonacris: You may judg Sir, how this Letter troubled the virtuous Noromata, and how a person who loved her glory with so much passion, could not see her own in such eminent danger without extreame sorrow. Then did she plainly see, that to be innocent was not enough to have tranquility of mind, since though she never did any thing against the Rules of virtue, yet was she extreemly troubled that her Husband should suspect her, and that he would publish her suspicious, and ruine her reputation. But her greatest torment was, that maugre all these unjust aspersions, she still loved Adonacris most tenderly, who for his part was as angry as Noromata was grieved; for Argirispe in her Letter to him, did intimate, that she knew of his affection unto Noromata, that she had some Letters of that fair ones writing in her hands, that she believed him to be most tenderly loved, that she thought he had been an obstacle unto all her endeavours for his release, and that he chose rather to be a Prisoner with Noromata, then at liberty with her; adding further, a thousand inducements to repent of his infidelity, and as many menaces to be revenged upon Noromata, for making Sitalces use her hardly, if he did not change his mind. But that which most pinched him was, Argirispe intimated unto him, that Sitalces knew he loved his Wife, and that he had seen her Letters; for since he loved her in as Noble and Honourable a way as was possible, and since he was none of those Lovers who care not for the reputation of those persons whom they love, it grieved him to the soul that Noromata's honour should be brought in question for his sake: But that which put his patience to the highest test was, that the virtuous person who was so severe, and had carried her self with such cautious reservedness; when she had none to satisfie but her self, would not now so much as see him, when she understood her husband knew of his affection to her. Moreover, he feared that she would most horribly hate him, because her Letters had fallen into such dangerous hands; so that as pleasing as the sight of Noromata was unto him, yet his fears of seeing her incensed against him, did fill him full of strange apprehensions. On the other side, Agathorses having received a Letter from one of his friends at Issedon, which intimated unto him, how Elibesis was extreemly angry when she heard that he did not love her; he was as much joyed at this, as heretofore he had been, when she gave him the greatest testimonies that his affection pleased her. And indeed, as I came unto him the next morning after he received this Letter, he no sooner saw me, but coming towards me with a pleasant aspect: Come my dear Anabaris (said he unto me) Page 60 I am now arrived at that point I would be, and have received the best news in the world: Is it (said I again) that we shall shortly have peace or victory? No, no, replied he, I assure you neither peace nor war have any share in what I am about to tell you. It is only matters of love which I shall relate: Then assuredly, replied I, you will tell me that the Prince Ariantes is fallen out with his Mistress, and Elibesis is perswaded, that the Crown which he would give her, is not comparable unto the affection you bear unto her: No; said he, but Elibesis believes I love her not, and is vexed at it to the heart. But Sir (said I unto him) if her anger should turn unto hatred, would you be so well pleased as you seem to be? If it should, said he, I know not what I should be, but sure I am, that it joys me much She is angry, and I never took more pleasure in perswading her that I love her, then I have in making her believe, that I do not love her: And if after all this, I can throw down the Throne which she hopes to ascend, and have so much satisfaction as to see her without a King, without a Kingdom, without Subjects, and without a Slave, I shall be the happiest man alive: Yes, yes, Sir, replied I, so you would, if you could bring your self once to that pass, as to hate her or at least not to love her, for if you think to be revenged of her by still loving her, believe me Sir, the revenge will light upon your self: Though it should (said he to me) yet I should do as if I were happy; for I do profess, that I would die a thousand times, rather then Elibesis should ever know that I do not hate her: So that if I could be as happy as I could wish, and could not conceal my self, rather then tell her that I loved her, I would hide my self; and to be sincere with you, I have long time since resolved, that as soon as I have revenged my self upon my Rival, to begin a new form of life, and leave off the company of all such as Fortune hath been pleased to set above me, for I am so weary of seeing my self below them, that I cannot endure it; indeed I can neither flatter them, nor crouch unto them. Moreover; there is one strong fancy in my mind which mightily torments, and since I must discover my weakness unto you, I will tell you what it is: Know then, that I cannot see a man Superiour to me, do any thing ill-favourably, but I am infinitely angry at Fortune for placing them in that condition they are; it is not out of any tenderness that I do interest my self in their imperfections, but on the contrary, there is an Antipathy in my nature against all that are above me, which is the reason that I cannot endure to see Princes either weak, or timorous, or covetous, or foolish, when I see such, I cannot chuse but curse Fortune, because She did not rank them according to their merit: Truth is, I am so unable to endure that ill-favoured men should be placed above me, that I cannot brook Vulcan should be ranked amongst the Gods: Judg then, whether I can allow such as have the hearts of Slaves, the rusticity of a poor Fisherman, the language of a base Tradesman, should be ranked in the Catalogue of Princes: If Elibesis Sir (said I unto him and smiled) did hear what you say, She would, according to her custom, accuse you of prophanation, and I think She had good reason for it: I know not what reason She hath (said he unto me) but I am sure I have reason to take it ill She should betray me, and to be glad that I have vexed her. But Sir, to return unto Noromata, give me leave to tell you, that this purely virtuous person; after She had spent the whole night in sorrow, and seeking remedy against such an important misery, She had a new cause of grief, for She received a Letter from her Father who was with Thomiris, and who knowing that Adonacris was at Issedon, and not being ignorant of his correspondency with Noromata before her marriage, did send her word, that if ever he heard She let Adonacris come into her house, he would make her the most miserable woman of her Sex. So that being on all sides overwhelmed with sorrows, She took the most generous resolution in the world, maugre all her tenderness to Adonacris, and her aversion to Sitalces. For Sir, since She did apprehend it not handsome to exchange a Lover for a Husband, She resolved to justifie her self in her Husbands opinion, and to let him see She was no obstacle unto his liberty; She resolved, I say, to steal out o' Tipanis, and to return unto Issedon to Sitalces: But alas Sir, this resolution was not without <...> ny a <◇>, and much ado to execute? yet since there was no other <◇> to redeem her reputation, She fully determined upon it (maugre her repugnance) <...> ve him She loved, and to go unto him She hated: The tender affection of her heart unto Adonacris, moved <

In the mean time Noromata contriving a way how to get out of Tipanis, and to pass the Guards and Spargapises safely, She did at last hit upon one which did happily hit. She went unto Elijorante, and told her, as She might truly, that her Husband had a servant whom he loved very well, who was taken prisoner with her, and who was married a little before he was taken. But to advance her design, She added a lye unto this truth, and told her, that the Wife of this servant hearing that her Husband was fallen sick at Issedon, and earnestly desired to see her, She was very desirous to go thither unto him. After which, Noromata aggravating the sorrows of this wife, desired Elijorantes favour to procure a passport for her, conjuring her to sollicite her Husband for it, and not let any know that She did meddle in the business: For (said She unto her with much subtilty) I have so many things to ask of Spargapises, and Agatheres, concerning my Husbands liberty, that I should be unwilling to trouble them with the business of others, especially in a business which is of no great importance. Elijorante being glad of any importunity to oblige Noromata, did never examine her reasons any further, but told her, that if she would stay half an hour in her Chamber, She would give her an accompt how ready She was to satisfie her desires: She had no sooner said so, but Adonacris, as if he destined to speak unto Noromata no where but at Elijorantes, did enter: So that Elijorante seeing him; Sir, said She, I once before entreated you to entertain Noromata whilst I retired unto my Cloiset; and I beseech you once again to make the time seem less tedious unto her, whilst I go a little and execute some of her commands: I know not Madam, replied Adonacris, whether I shall be able to fulfill your commands; but I am sure, that though I do not divert her as I desire, yet my intentions are to do nothing that shall displease her: After this, Elijorante went out to mediate unto her Husband in Noromata's business: So as these two persons who had most violent inclinations to love each other, and who yet had thoughts very different, had the freedom of talk together; yet they said not what they thought, for Noromata never acquainted Adonacris with her design of going unto Sitalces, lest he should hinder her: And Adonacris never acquainted Noromata with the Letter which Argirispe sent unto him, lest it should grieve her. Noromata on her side would not tell him of those Letters which Sitalces had seen, though she had a great desire unto it; for She considered, that though his baggage was lost, and was the cause of it, yet the fault was not in him. Also since She could not tell him of it, without making him the Confident of her Husbands jealousy, she could not do it, thinking it would oblige Adonacris too much, and consequently reflect upon her honour: But considering, that though She had now the liberty to talk unto him, yet She was never like to have it again, She could not chuse but sigh. Adonacris observing it, and seeing her eyes full of curiosity: I know Madam (said he unto her) that I shall very ill acquit my self of that Commission which Elijorante hath given me to divert you; and I know too well by that sigh which I heard, that my company is not pleasing enough to keep you from some angry thoughts: Doubtless Sir, replied She, my thoughts do not please me, but I will be so just as not to accuse you for it, and ask your pardon that I do not force my self unto more complacency. Oh Madam (said Adonacris) It is most injurious to ask this pardon; and I have more reason to complain that you will not tell me the cause of that sigh, then complain of you for sighing: For truly Madam, methinks the least part that I can pretend unto in your confidence, is that of your sorrows: But Madam, to shew that I am easily contented in my passion, I will ask of you less then ever any Lover did, and declare unto you, that if you will be pleased to grant it, I will never complain of you. Though you may ask it Sir, replied She, as my Lover, yet you shall never obtain it: I will ask then as your friend Madam, replied he, since the name of Lover is offensive to you; but I beseech you let it be as a friend who loves none else but you, nor ever will: I only ask the favour to know all your griefs; conceal all your joys from me, but I beseech you make me a Partner in your sorrows, and let me know why you sighed. After this, I am confident you will not say I ask too much, and that my affection is hard to be satisfied, since I only ask to be a sharer in a sigh, and to know the cause of it. In demanding that Sir, replied Noromata, you ask perhaps more then you are aware, and more then I can grant: The truth is, there are some sorrows which one cannot impart without being too much engaged, and my humour is such, that the most engaging thing which I can do for those I love, is to trust them with mine, and to make them sharers with me. Then Madam (replied Adonacris) I beseech you tell me what it was which made you Page 62 sigh, for I must confess I cannot understand the cause of it? Without further examination of causes, replied She, I assure you I neither can nor will tell you; for the truth is Adonacris, reason will not permit me to put confidence in a man whom I ought not to see, and unto whom I ought not to speak as I do, if I should keep my self to the limits of exact virtue: And this is the last day I intend to hold any private conference with you, and to behave my self so, as you shall have none with me, for I will never upbraid my self with doing more then I ought to have done: Alas Madam (said Adonacris) if you do now no more then you ought, it may be said that you do nothing; for it is impossible one should do less then you have done: But Madam, if it be your resolution that I shall never talk with you in private after this day, then you must this day regulate all the rest of my life, and tell me what is your pleasure I shall do: I do profess I will never either do, or say, or think any thing which shall displease you: If so, replied Noromata, I will once in my life make use of that power which I have over you; but Adonacris, it shall be in commanding you to live as well with Argirispe, as I am resolved to do with Sitalces, and in conjuring you not to tell so much as your self, that ever you loved me, nor to think any more of any thing which may renew the memory of our friendship. Alas Madam, replied Adonacris, if you would be obeyed, you must command such things as can be done; but here you command me three things, two of which are absolute impossibilities, and the other an extream difficulty: I must Madam, maugre you command, tell my self, that I do love you, since it is not your pleasure I should tell you of it; I must needs, I cannot chuse, but think of you, since you will not give me leave to talk to you. Yes, yes Madam, I must both think and speak of you, since I can neither think or speak of any thing else, not but that I have done all I am able to forget you: But alas, I have done it in vain, for whosoever I go, and whatsoever I do, my imagination is all on you: I have been in the Wars, and in the very heat of fight, and most dangerous occurrences my mind hath still kept to its ordinary object: if I come into any company where you are not, I presently lament your absence, and value not their presence: I never walk out but my mind is pleasantly fill'd with a thousand thoughts of what you have done, and of what I have heard you say, and my sleep is nothing but dreams of you: And Madam, if I could tell you without hinting my crimes unto you, I would say, that I did not marry Argirispe without a thought of Noromata, as perfidious as She hath been unto me; and if I could shew you the true state of my soul, when after your example I did for ever engage my self you would see that my heart disavowed all the words of engagement which my tongue pronounced, and I thought more of what I lost, then what I got; yet for all this, you are so unjust as to command me not to think any more of you: But let me tell you Madam, that if the Gods be just, they will force you to think of me, and they will grant me so much favour, as to cause you many an angry minute by my being much in your mind: In wishing as I do (replied She) that the Gods will give you the same tranquility of mind which I wish unto my self, I am more just then you are; and consequently have reason to believe, that they will rather hear my prayers then yours: But Madam, I beseech you (said he unto her) what hurt can a pure innocent passion do you, when it is locked up in my heart? And what matter is it when I am out of your sight, whether I think of you or no? So I could think that you do not think of me (replied She) doubtless it would not at all concern me, but still it would concern you, that you might be more at rest. Then Madam (said he unto her, and looked upon her with amorous eyes) I may hope when I see you not, that you will think to guess whether I think upon you or no, and consequently I am not so miserable as I imagined; for it is some consolation to know, that you have not banished me out of your memory, though out of your heart. Oh Madam, for heavens sake (added he with most passionate earnestness) do not deny every thing to a Lover, who is not of their humours, which think felicity consists in the highest favours, but on the contrary, he knows how to multiply the delight, by the price which he will set upon the meanest favours, Permit me Madam, I beseech you, only to think of you, and to believe, that sometimes you do me the honour to think of me, and I shall not murmur at your excessive rigour: I should think that what I ask cannot offend you, nor would it be a grand crime, if I beseeched you to pronounce the name of Adonacris sometimes: For my part I do protest unto you Madam, that the name of Noromata is very often in my <...> th, and it is a sound so agreeable to me, that I cannot hear it without a bundance of <...> ght: But Madam, I assure my self that mine is not so to you; and you can hear it pronounced a thousand times without the least alteration in your colour.

Page 63 As Adonacris said so, Noromata (who was vexed at her self in secret that She was not so insensible as he said She was) could not chuse but blush. So that Adonacris observing it, he was now as full of curiosity to know the cause of that blush, as he was before to know the cause of the sigh: But since Noromata's modesty would not give her leave to tell him, She only left him so much subject, as whereby he might guess that her heart entertained no disadvantageous thoughts of him; for he importuning her to tell him her thoughts, and She thinking upon her design of going unto Sitalces, and parting from Adonacris, the tenderness of her soul did appear more in her eyes then She desired it should, and her very words did utter something to him against her mind; for as he did importunately press her to tell him her thoughts a little more clearly, and what her pleasure was to command him, she gave him an answer much more favourable then She intended one quarter of an hour before: You are so very importunate (said she unto him) that because I would be rid of you, I will confess ingenuously, that I am not so absolute a Mistress of my heart, as of my actions, and that what thoughts and my words do not agree, and that when I command you to forget me, yet I should not have been very glad if you had obeyed me; all I can say unto you Adonacris is, that what resolutions soever I have taken, to do always what I ought to do, yet I perceive I should more easily pardon you if you do not forget me, that I should my self; if I do not. In the mean time, whether I banish you out of my heart or not, yet I will so behave my self towards you, as if you had not the least share in it, and after this Adonacris, ask me no more; I know that I do give you more obliging language then I would, and the words which I pronounced do make me blush as oft as I remember them: But for all that, the infidelity which my obedience to my Father did make me commit against you, doth merit doubtless that I should punish my self, and comfort you; and therefore, though I have said more unto you then did become me, yet I do not repent of it, though I know I shall repent as soon as you are gone. You have reason Madam, replied Adonacris, to repent of what you have said, for it is so little obliging unto me, that I conceive you have great cause of repentance.

As Adonacris pronounced these words, Elijorante returned; so that Noromata fearing that She would speak before him of that office which She was to do for her, and fearing lest his Love should guess at her secret intention, She went towards Elijorante, and understood from her, that what She desired should be effected before the day was done, Elijorante assuring her that it rested only upon this, That the wife unto the servant of Sitalces who was to go and visit her sick Husband, was not to depart until the next morning. Noromata having obtained her wish, thanked Elijorante for the favour, and took her leave immediately, but when she turned towards Adonacris to salute him, and it coming into her thoughts that perhaps She should never see him again, such a deep melancholy did seize upon her Spirit, that tears stood in her eyes. But she no sooner perceived this weakness in her self, but she hasted out, lest it should be observed: So pulling her Hood hastily down, She hid the better hide those impressions of sorrow which came from her heart unto her face: But though She had wit enough to hide, yet She had not power of overcoming her sad resentments, but passed over all that day and the night following in such transports of violent sorrow, as She confessed since, that She was never in all her life in so sad a condition. However, her virtue being above her sorrows, she kept close unto her resolution of going unto her Husband, and to persuade him that She did not obstruct his liberty, nor desire the society of Adonacris. And in order to this, she made choice of two ancient servants unto Sitalces to conduct her, and a woman to go with her, giving order that a Coach should be ready by break of day, but not her own Coach, lest her design should be discovered. And to the end her departure should not be known until she was gotten far enough from Tipanis to be overtaken, if Agatheres should send after her, this virtuous Lady commanded her women which she left at Tipanis to let none come in to her Chamber for three daies after, and to tell all the rest of her Domesticks that she was sick, having to this end imparted her design unto an old Physitian her friend, who promised to come unto her Chamber, as if she were really sick. And to the end he should not be ill treated by Spargapises and Agatheres when the thing was discovered: It was agreed upon that he should say he was deceived, and that one of Noromata's women did counterfeit her voice, and lay in her bed, and the Curtains being drawn, he thought it to be her Mistress, and that she was sick. Moreover, she writ a Letter unto Elijorante, giving orders to deliver it three daies after her departure. To be short, the business was carried Page 64 so well, that none of her servants knew it, except those who were of the conspiracy. So that putting the woman which was to go with her in the best place of the Coach, She caused her to speak unto the Keepers of the Gates, and shew them her Passport, which was to let her pass out with one woman, and two men to conduct her. Thus it being very early, and not light enough to know one another, She easily got out undiscovered, but not without much sorrow; for when She was out of the Town, and began to think that perhaps

She should never see Adonacris again, whom She so tenderly loved, and that She was going to abide eternally with Sitalces, whom She loved not, her sadness was above expression, and her journey was the most melancholy that is imaginable, yet sometimes She rejoiced in the doing of an act of so much heroic virtue, but sometimes again this joy did cost her very dear: However, She passed over her journey without any obstacle, for all the Troops of Spargapises obeyed the Passport, and when She came into the Quarters of Ariantes, She discovered her self unto the Commander in Chief, and desired a Guard to be conducted unto Issedon, where She arrived sooner than She desired, though her resolution was yet to go unto it.

But Sir, before I tell you how Sitalces received her, I must acquaint you with some passages at Tipanis, be pleased to know therefore, that Noromata's orders were so well obeyed, that every one believed her to be at home, yes Adonacris did believe it more readily than any other; so that he passed over these three daies well enough; yet at the end, Eliorante received Noromata's Letter, which desired pardon for deceiving her, and concealing her design, and which intimated unto her, that She was gone to her Husband and to sollicite Ariantes for his liberty. But when Eliorante received this Letter, Adonacris was with her, and She not being able to conceal her admiration, did acquaint him with the cause of it. You may well imagine Sir, that the admiration of Adonacris was above Eliorantes, and he cried out so loud when he heard that Noromata had not been in Tipanis this three daies, that Eliorante who had a most sharp wit, began to suspect that he had a far greater interest in this departed Lady, than ever She imagined. How Madam (said he unto her) is not Noromata here? You will see that by her Letter (said She and shewed it him) and you will doubtless say that Noromata is the best Wife in the world. Adonacris taking the Letter did read it with as much grief as wonder, and with as much wonder at Noromata's virtue, as at her beauty. When he had done reading the Letter, Agathorses came in, who understanding how squares went, did think it still convenient for him to make a shew as if he were much troubled at Noromata's departure, purposely to make Elibesis believe that he loved Noromata: So that expressing much grief, he was much more zealous than Adonacris, who durst not express his. However, the business had no remedy, for in all probability before Noromata could be overtaken, She would be in the Quarters of Ariantes, where he could not stay her. So that Adonacris seeing he had nothing else to do but lament, he retired to his Chamber, but with so sad a soul, that I am confident never was such a sudden alteration seen as was in his face; indeed he was not the same man he was before, and sorrow was so apparent in his eyes, and he had such a deadly paleness in his cheeks, that any one would have said he was not only sadly afflicted, but that he would not live, and yet his condition was worse within an hour after he was gone from Eliorantes.

And Sir, to acquaint you with the cause of the augmentation of his sorrows, give me leave to acquaint you, how by an unparalleled example of Fortune, the very same time that Noromata out of her virtue went unto her Husband, Argirispe out of her jealousy, came to hers.

Thus when Noromata came to Issedon, Argirispe came to Tipanis, and came just in the height of Adonacris his sorrows for the departure of Noromata; and being conducted by an Officer of Spargapises his Army, who brought her to Tipanis, and made her known unto that Prince and Agathorses, they did receive her with much civility; and thinking that Adonacris would be very pleasantly surprized at the sight of her, they caused her to be conducted unto his Chamber, before he was acquainted with her coming. I being then with the grieved Adonacris, am able to relate their meeting as an eye-witness: But Sir, I am not able to represent unto you the wonder of this sad Lover, when he saw her enter; Truth is, it was so great, and his soul was in such a maze, that he was not Master of his own thoughts; so that in lieu of hiding that sorrow which appeared in his face, and anger meeting with his melancholy, he seemed more desirous to quarrel with her, than to salute her. Yet bethinking with himself, that in relation unto Noromata's interest, his best Page 65 way was to force himself, Love did more than his reason could to persuade him, and he did so strive with himself, that he almost made his sorrows to seem only wonder, and endeavoured to persuade Argirispe that his sadness was only an effect of his imprisonment: Therefore he saluted her very civilly, and expressed himself as handsomly as was requisite at such a meeting.

But Argirispe being witty and jealous also, She dived so far into his heart, that as soon as She set her eyes upon him, She saw, that She was the cause of his grief, and Agathorses telling her at first, how Noromata's design and hers did strangely parallel, She easily apprehended that her Husband grieved only for the absence of that fair one. So that though the departure of Noromata did leave her thoughts in some doubt, yet the sadness of Adonacris did confirm her in her jealousy: And I can assure you, that this meeting had nothing of sweet & pleasingness in it. In the mean time, since Eliorante came to offer Argirispe all the accommodations within the compass of her power, Adonacris took that time to go unto some place where he might lament. And taking me aside, we went presently after unto a Closet, in which we no sooner were, but he broke out into most sad expressions of the piteous condition wherein he was; his greatest perplexity was, that being a man excellently qualified, he could not be imperious over Argirispe, nor could he rid himself that way from the cruel persecution in which he was; and certainly he gave it a true Epithite of persecution; for Eliorante was no sooner gone, but this jealous woman twitted him with all imaginable malice: Truly (said She unto him) if you had fallen in love with Noromata after our marriage, you could be accused only of weakness and unconstanity; but being in Love with her before you may (and with abundance of reason and Justice) be charged with perfidiousness, with treason, and with indiscretion: Pray tell me, how could you ever think to live happily with one you loved not? Do not deceive your self, and deny your love unto the Wife of Sitalces, for I have in my hands all her Letters to you, and I know very well that you are a Prisoner unto Spargapises, only because you are the Slave of Noromata. Also I know very well, that you did with a premeditated design absent your self, only to be far off from her you loved not. To testify my sincerity (answered he) I will ingeniously confess that I did love Noromata, and that I do still hold her virtues in the same admiration; but I protest Madam, that I do hold no private correspondence with her, and those Letters you have of hers to me were written before her marriage, and consequently before you were. I further protest, that since that, I never received any more from her but common civility, and in all likelihood it will be long before I shall see her again, perhaps never. Moreover, though it were so, that such a passion had seized upon my soul, as I could not master, yet were I not too blame, since I was not able to overcome it, and since I should behave my self never the worse towards you: Therefore Madam, since I am able to assure you, that I never received the least favour from Noromata, and since you never receive any rudeness or incivility from me, I hope I may well beseech you to rest satisfied, and let me be at rest also. But Argirispe did not do as Adonacris desired her, but went from him in a chafe, telling him sharply, that since he went about to delude her, She would carry her self as one that would not be deluded, but as one that knew all his weaknesses and infidelities; but that which most nettled her, was to see, that all She said unto Adonacris did not anger him, and to see his Spirits so taken up with sorrow for the departure of Noromata, that he hardly minded what She said. So that She being vexed more and more, She vented such bitter expressions unto Adonacris, that he was forced to go into another Chamber. In the mean time, since he had no mind to be a Prisoner; but only because Noromata was at Tipanis, so now, he desired his liberty, since She was not there. So that the next morning he sent secretly to the Prince Ariantes, beseeching him now not to obstruct his liberty, because now he did very punctually know of all the designs of his Enemies, and consequently he would be useless at Tipanis Now Sir, I have acquainted you how Adonacris received Argirispe, give me leave to tell you in few words how Sitalces received Noromata. I assure my self Sir, that you will think her action generous enough to oblige her Husband unto a good reception of it and her, but it did not, for on the contrary, he received her very ill, and not putting any good construction upon her resolutions, he twitted her with the Letters which She had writ unto Adonacris; he told her She had not solicited for his liberty, and that She would not have come from Tipanis, but because She knew that Adonacris would not long continue there, and would release himself some other way then by the exchange which was propounded. All this while She took this unjust accusation so patiently, that She was not so Page 66 much as moved against Sitalces, only saying without any bitterness, as much unto him as might justify her self, though her soul was full of grief as sorrow, to see her innocence so unjustly injured: But Sir, to abridge my relation as much as I may, the Prince Ariantes having received the Letter from Adonacris, he did no longer retard his release; and Agathorses desiring still to persuade Elibesis that he was in love with Noromata, did press on the exchange between Sitalces and Adonacris, to the end he might make her believe that he did it only to see her again, and indeed Elibesis did not only believe that he did it for Noromata's sake; but also She thought that Noromata, whose virtue She was well persuaded of, had not come out of Tipanis, but only to avoid the trouble which She was put unto by the affection of Agathorses: So that being extremely grieved, She would willingly have opposed her Brothers liberty, purposely to hinder Sitalces from carrying his Wife to Tipanis: But since handsomness would not allow her to do so, She dissembled her resentments, lest Ariantes should guess the cause of them. But all things being concluded upon on both sides, it was resolved that Sitalces and his Wife should that same day depart from Issedon unto Tipanis; that Adonacris and Argirispe should set out of Tipanis to come for Issedon; and for an equal security of both sides, these four persons were to meet in a place, which was just between the Quarters of both Armies, to the end that the Convoys which brought Adonacris and Argirispe from Tipanis, might carry Sitalces and Noromata thither, & that Convoys which brought Noromata & Sitalces from Issedon, might carry Argirispe & Adonacris thither. So that by this means Sir, these four persons saw each other, and talked together. In the mean, Sitalces & Argirispe were extremely vexed at this adventure, yet dine all together they must, for he who was to see this exchange performed on the part of Ariantes, being a man of a generous mind, he made these Prisoners and Ladies a very sumptuous Feast; so that the constraint of Sitalces and Argirispe continued very long; and it was the greater, because they durst not talk together, lest they should give Adonacris time to talk to Noromata; and yet they needed not to fear it, for Noromata did not only carefully shun talking with Adonacris, but even looking upon him also; yet she could not be so careful, but he would sometimes look in her eyes, and find much sorrow in them, and he carried it so cunningly, that whilst he who treated them was talking to Sitalces and Argirispe, he spoke unto Noromata in a low voice, and conjured her to confess that Fortune was extremely unjust in not letting Sitalces carry Argirispe unto Tipanis, and him her unto Issedon. But Noromata being resolved to be neither sweet nor sharp with him, would not give any answer, and seeming not to hear him, She changed place, not so much as looking upon him, yet Adonacris made no question but that She heard what he said, and consented to it in her heart, for She could not chuse but blush and sigh in changing her place. In the mean time, the hour of their parting being come, Adonacris, who did not love Argirispe, but loved Noromata, did take the way to Issedon; and Noromata, who did not love Sitalces, but loved Adonacris, took the way to Tipanis, waited upon by her persecutor, and parting from the most respective Lover in the world; and She parted from him with so much settled resolution, that She did not so much as turn her head aside to look after him, but it was not so with Adonacris, for though he intended to restrain himself, lest he should incense Argirispe, yet he looked after Noromata as long as ever he could, and turned his head after her above twenty times when She was out of sight. I shall not any longer insist upon any aggravations of the various thoughts in all these persons, since it is sufficient to know the state of their souls by the state of their Fortunes. But give me leave to tell you Sir, that the end of Winter being come, both sides began to think of taking the Field. Agathorses had still the displeasure to know that Thomiris would have him still be wary of his Troops, and not to give Battle unless he was forced unto it, because She had some grand design which She would not publish; and Agathorses in his head of hatred unto Ariantes, he desired to tumble him presently from his Throne, and not to protract the War. And he so wrought upon the wise Terez, who had a great prevalency with Thomiris, that he persuaded him there was no way to ruine Ariantes but by Battle; so that this Princess did at last permit him to hazard a fight, if occasion was favourably offered. Agathorses not willing to loose a minute of time, caused Spargapises to draw his Troops first out of their Winter Quarters, and draw towards Issedon, which began to suffer much; because the Army of Ariantes had been close under the Gates of that Town all that sharp season.

Ariantes also seeing his Enemies in such haste, did take the Field also, and went to take his leave of Elibesis with extraordinary melancholy, which was no good omen unto Page 67 him; the greatest cause of his sadness was, because he knew almost of a certainty, that Elibesis did not value his love, but out of ambitious ends; so that his mind being filled with this thought, he could not chuse but express something of it at his bidding her adieu. Since I know not Madam, said he unto her, whether fortune will smile or frown upon me, I must tell you, that I know not how you will look upon me when I shall return, nor know I Madam, whether you know it your self, since my good or bad fortune depends upon the Fate of Arms: However, since it is not your pleasure I should be happy before the War be ended, yet I beseech you assure me, that I may loose a Battle, and yet not loose you: If you will be pleased to honour me with this favour Madam, I assure you, I shall not be easily overcome: But if you will not, alas sorrow it self will vanquish me before I fight: Methinks Sir (answered Elibesis very wittily) that I could answer you in not answering, only by beseeching you to answer your self all that I would answer, if I should utter all the thoughts of my soul: Therefore Sir, since it is sufficient for you to imagine what I would say, if I would satisfy you it is better to employ that little time which I have of seeing you, in assuring you, that I shall spend the time of your absence in making prayers for your return, and in wishing most zealously, that I may soon see you return victorious over all your Enemies. More then this Sir do not ask me, unless you would have me think, that you seek out for a pretence of quarrelling with me: No Madam, I do not seek for any pretence of quarrelling with you, but it is you that seeks for a pretence of not giving me a direct answer. However, since it is your pleasure I should be kept in ignorance until the end of the War, I must obey, though I can tell you it is with much ado. After this, Ariantes left Elibesis, who to keep him upon such terms as She desired, did permit her eyes to tell him more then his mouth, to the end, that if he were victorious, he might be still her Slave, and She a Queen. In conclusion, She did so cunningly manage the mind of Ariantes, both by her looks, and the manner of her bidding him adieu, that he did almost repent of his suspicions, and parted from her not ill satisfied, though She did not say any thing that could engage her self to follow his Fortune, if it was not good. But in conclusion Sir, that Prince Ariantes departed from Issedon, and went unto his Army, which was not far off, and Adonacris had the comfort of being absent from Argirispe by following him; and well may I call it comfort, for She was perpetually twitting him, though he carried himself very civilly towards her, for all her jealousies of him. On the other side, Noromata had the pleasure of seeing Sitalces depart, and go unto the Army, and rid her from the most terrible persecution that is imaginable; for ever since She came from Issedon, until he left her at Tipanis, there was every day some jars passed between them: But Sir, not to trouble you with the jealous thoughts of Sitalces and Argirispe, nor with the tender and virtuous thoughts of Noromata, nor with the amorous imaginations of Adonacris, give me leave to tell you, that Agathersis having still a design in his heart to ruine his Rival, he neglected no occasions of it; for he did not only husband every advantage which the fate of Arms did give him, but also he held private correspondencies within Issedon, purposely to move the Inhabitants of the Town to rebel against Ariantes, during his absence. Fortune also was so favourable unto him, that at the first drawing into the Field, he put the Vanguard of Ariantes to the rout; and though this first occasion was not deep in blood, yet this first advantage served to quell the hearts of that Princes side, and to encourage the opposite Party, not but that Spargapises lost as many men of Quality as Ariantes did; but yet he being the Master of the Field, Fame did trumpet him victorious: But Sir, the most remarkable passage of this encounter was, that Sitalces was killed in it; and Noromata behaved her self so, as if She had no cause of rejoicing at his death; yet truly She did not move in the deepest blacks, but kept such an even temper in all her actions, that no one living could lay any fault to her charge. She also had the happiness to know, that it was not Adonacris who killed Sitalces, for he was not in the fight; indeed it was the wise Terez, who commanded the Reserve Brigade that day, and it was Terez, who with his own hand killed Sitalces: 'Tis true, he revenged his death by the last blow he struck, for it wounded him so deep and dangerously, that this wise and experienced Captain was stoned, and could not get up on horseback. But Sir, though the death of Sitalces did at first give some satisfaction unto Adonacris, because he thought that now Noromata would be at rest and liberty, yet afterwards it did double his torment; for when he considered, that had he not married Argirispe, he had married Noromata, his mind was most lamentably tormented; but to ease himself, he intended to let Noromata know his mind: So that sending one of his servants secretly Page 68 unto Tipanis, hoping that Noromata, now having no jealous Husband to fear, she would not startle at a Letter from him, since now all decency did allow her to receive any Letter from an absent friend: But his hope was ill bottomed; for Noromata was so far from receiving or answering it, that she refused it and was angry at him, though still she retained much tenderness towards him. On the other side, Argirispe was so extremely troubled at the death of Sitalces, that she was almost stark mad; resenting it as a most considerable loss, since she whom Adonacris loved, had lost one of the most jealous husbands in the world. But the wonder of all is, Argirispe being a little ill when she heard of Sitalces his death, she was then in such a fear of death, least then Adonacris should marry Noromata, that she fell into a very violent fever, and died in earnest: I shall not tell you Sir, how Adonacris took her death, for having described him before, to be a very accomplished man, you may well imagine that he would not express any joy; but having also described him in love, you may well think he was no great mourner. In the mean time, Agatherses making his best use of his victory he did so negotiate by his counsels that Spargapises was advised by him in all things, and therefore it was resolved to give a deciding battle: And though it did not concern the interests of Ariantes to hazard any thing lightly; yet give battle he must, because he understood from Octomasedes, that if he did not vanquish presently, the people of Issedon would revolt, for they grew weary of the war. But Sir, though this Prince did as much as any great and valient Captain could, yet he lost the battle, and was forced to hide himself in a poor Shepherds hut; in the midst of a thick wood: intending to save his person from the victory of his Rival, and in the night time to get into Issedon. And to do it more safely, he sent one of his servants to spy out the pathes of the wood, to serve him as a guide: But Sir, the return of this servant brought him abundance of grief; for he brought him an Officer whom that Prince had left in Issedon, and whom this servant did accidentally meet: This Officer told him that at the very same time the battle was fighting, there was a sedition raised in Issedon by the friends of Agatherses: And that his enemies were become masters of the Town after a sharp dispute; After which they sent unto Spargapises to tell him, that if Thomiris would pardon their rebellion, they were ready to enter into her obedience: So that I am confident Sir, (added this Officer) that Spargapises is at this very hour the master of Issedon; for I saw a far off, some of his Troops marching that way.

Ariantes hearing this sad news, was extremely sad: but love being still above his ambition, he never asked any particulars of this disorder, but asked him very hastily what news of Elibesis: Sir, answered the Officer, the Father of Elibesis no sooner heard how squares went, but he departed the Town with all his household, and consequently carryed his daughter with him, fearing doubtless to fall into the power of Spargapises, until things were better settled. Afterwards Ariantes asked him whether he knew which way Elibesis went; and the Officer telling him that he thought unto a Castle which belonged unto Tissagettes some three hundred furlongs from Issedon. This Prince having neither Army nor place of retreat, resolved to go whether his love invited him, believing that the father of Elibesis would not deny him reception into his house which was very strong; and where he might rally together some part of his shattered Army: But Sir, this Prince was deceived in his hope. For Elibesis would not receive him but upon condition he would depart the next morning, telling him, that this house was not strong enough to resist a victorious Army, and therefore would not expose her and his family unto ruine: But Sir, the thing which struck him even dead with sorrow, was That when he saw Elibesis, he found her much different from what she was at Issedon; and far from following his fortunes when she saw it ill. Yet this Prince did accost her in such an humble submissive manner (as I understood since by one of her women) that the heart of any but hers would have melted. Now Madam, (said he unto her, with a most melancholy look) I am come to know whether I have lost your affection in losing the battle; and whether you have chased out of your heart, as they have chased me out of Issedon. Truly Sir, (replied she) my soul is so disturbed with fears, that I cannot tell you what to think and as the state of your fortune stands, I do not think my affection can do you any good, for when you have overwhelmed me under the ruins of that Throne upon which you intended to set me, you will be never the better: Therefore Sir, let me advise you to think upon your own safety, and think no more of me: Fie Madam (said he and looked upon her with wonder) are you so inhumane as to discover the neutrality of your soul unto me Page 69 upon such an occasion as this? I begun the war only to make you a Queen, and will you forsake me as soon as fortune forsakes me? will you not favor me so far as to dissemble part of your thoughts? Ah Madam, this is so strange that I cannot believe I rightly understood you, and therefore I beseech you explain your words, and tell me what I must truly think of you; you may think Sir, that I would do any thing in my power to make you mount a Throne (replied she) But you must think withall, that since I am not able to alter your fortune, I will not foolishly and to no purpose follow it: nor can I see which way your proposition to me can any way advantage or oblige me: I cannot tell whether it can any way oblige you Madam (replied he) but I am sure your expressions have not much generosity in them; And unless I be the basest of men, I shall hate you as much as ever I loved you: You may do even as you please Sir, (answered she) for truly my humor is to comply with the times, and change as they do: Then Madam, replied he, I see you know how to change with fortune, I know not Sir, how you can blame me for it, replied she, but I do think it commendable and wisdom so to do. Madam, said he, is it possible you should not apprehend that this act is so unworthy of your self, that if Agatherses knew it, he would certainly esteem you much less? and I am most confident that as furious as he is, he would treat me better then you have done, if I should fall into his power, though he be both my enemy and my Rival. But Madam (added he to vex her) since his example tells me that it is not impossible to cease loving you, I shall hope to imitate him, and though I shall not be a King, yet I shall have some advantageous hopes of not being your slave, and I think that I shall be as great a gainer by getting out of your power, as I am a loser by losing a Crown. After this, Elibesis wishing him heartily out of her fathers house, least Agatherses hearing he was there, should come and seek him, and least he should fall into the power of a man who loved her not, she talked to him so sharply, that Ariantes not being able to endure it, did abruptly leave her, and going out of the Castle went to seek a Sanctuary with Octomasedes his Cousin, or at least to stay a while with him concealed, to see if any remedy for his misfortune was to be found.

In the mean time, the ambitious Elibesis, being vexed to the heart that she had lost Agatherses, and that her ambition did thrive no better, she could not avoid that misery which she feared, which was, that Agatherses would hear the Prince Ariantes had been at her fathers house, and would come thither to look for him, as a punishment upon her for her inconstancy, for her ambition and hardness of heart unto Ariantes. Agatherses hearing he had been at the father of Elibesis Castle, he had no sooner carryed Spargapises unto Issedon whose Inhabitants opened their Gates, but he went thither with some of his forces fancying high satisfaction in getting both his Rival and his Mistress into his power, and was in hopes of full revenge for all the miseries he had endured. But he was much surprized when coming to the Castle, and by a Herald demanded the Prince Ariantes, he was answered, that he was not there. At the first he would not believe it, but at last he was forced unto it, for Tissagettes being retired unto this Castle in the tumult, he fell very sick, and was not able to defend it if it were assaulted. So that conceiving the sooner he yielded, the better it would be for him; he resolved to treat, and to obtain liberty for himself and his daughter: And to that end thinking it was not possible that a man who had once loved Elibesis, should have any inveterate quarrel, he commanded her to parle with Agatherses, since he was in bed and not able to do it, desiring her to use her best ingenuity to move Agatherses not to bring him under the power of Thomiris. After which, giving notice unto Agatherses, that he would parle, and Agatherses consenting unto it, the Troop retreated, to make a void place before the Castle gate, before which, was a kind of Portal, which the Courts of guards in time of war made use of: And this place being chosen to treat in, Agatherses with a very small number of his men, advanced. But he was much surprized, when in lieu of seeing Tissagettes appear, he saw only his daughter, accompanied only with some few men and women: for he loved her still in spite of his teeth, and could not look upon her, without some agitation of spirits. Yet he was so fully resolved not to shew any signs of love unto her, that the better to hide his weakness, he seemed to be a little arrogant; and he was so glad at heart to see Elibesis in lieu of being Queen, to stand in need of his protection, that easily surmounting the tenderness of his love, he carryed himself as if he would gust his revenge with full delight: and after he had saluted Elibesis, there appeared such a kind of insolent joy in his face, as was enough to vex her: but that which most vexed Page 70 her was, he would not give her leave to speak first: Madam (said he, and looked sternly upon her) you see I was not mistaken, when I told you heretofore, that Fortune would never do justice unto your merit in making you a Queen; but the worst is, in lieu of being a Queen, you must now be a Subject unto a Princess whom you have incensed. Since Thomiris is a Debtor unto your valour (replied Elibesis) for the Victorie which her Son hath gotten, I hope She will not deny you any thing; but I will hope that you will obtain of her liberty for my Father, and all his Family. Since it were a most cruel thing to make a Queen a Slave (replied Agatherses to vex her) I will promise you Madam to move Thomiris so far, as that She will give me leave to set you at liberty, that you may follow the Fortune of Ariantes, and conduct you unto the place where he is retired; therefore Madam, if you know it, as I doubt not but you do, I beseech you acquaint me, that I may appoint a Convoy for you thither: Fie Agatherses (cried She) your revenge goes too far in saying so: Why Madam (replied he with a counterfeit wonder) do you take it ill I should offer to convoy you unto a Prince, for whose sake you forsook me? 'Tis true, he is no King, nor ever shall be, and in all probability is like to wander from Kingdom to Kingdom amongst stranger Princes; but for all that, it is to be thought, that when you contracted friendship with him, when you slighted my love to accept of his, you then considered what the sequel of his fortune might be, and resolved to follow it: For I must tell you ingeniously, it were unworthy if you should forsake a Prince because Fortune hath forsaken him, as you did me, because you saw him more hopeful then my self: If you did not love Noromata and hate Elibesis (replied She) you would not speak thus unto me, you would forget a weakness which ambition only caused, and endeavour to regain what you have lost: Since Madam this interview is upon a business of War, wherein love has no part, I shall not now make any exact explanation of my thoughts, it will be enough to tell you what I writ unto you before, that though I should love you more then ever I did, yet you would not accept it for the love of me; and though you should repent of what you have done, yet I am not beholding to you for it, since you changed only, because Fortune changed; and truly Madam, I desire not to be taken as the most happy, but as the most loved, and loved for something which is purely my own, and not for any collateral respects and reasons, which do not really relate unto the person: Therefore Madam, without any informing you whether I do love you, or whether I ever will love you, or without enquiring whether you love Ariantes, or whether you have cast him off, I only ask you what Tyssagettes demands of me: Had you been a little more inquisitive Sir, (replied She) perhaps you would not have repented it; but since you are not, let me tell you from my Father, that he desires Thomiris would pardon him, and that Spargapises would do the like, and permit him to live in quiet at his own house with his Family. Since Maldam, replied he, his house is too strong to be in the hands of a Rebel, that must not be, but Tyssagettes and you must go to Issedon, and stay there till Peace be fully settled in the State, unless, as I told you before, you had rather follow the fortunes of Ariantes. Since we are not in a capacity to resist you, replied She, we must submit unto your will. Ah Madam, said he, had you gone out of Issedon when I desired you, you would have entred with more delight then now you are like, but since what's past cannot be recalled, the future must be disposed according to my mind, and that you Madam shall have no more power in my heart, then Ariantes hath in the Kingdom of Issedon. It plainly appears, replied She, that I have none at all, since you insult so over one that is miserable, and will not so much as ask whether or no I am capable of repentance: I do never intend to inquire Madam (replied he) because though you should repent, yet I would not alter my resolution never to love you: Since it is so (said she, and would have left him in a fume) then I pray let me have your hatred, and with the same hand you tumbled Ariantes from his Throne, pull down, if you can, the Castle into which I enter, that burying me in its ruins, I may find an end of my miseries: No, no Madam (said he and stayed her) I will not do so, and as violent as you are, I will never pull down that Altar unto which once I sacrificed: So Madam, though I am fully resolved never to give you any signs of my love as long as I live, yet you shall taste of my generosity; and to revenge my self in a more noble way, I will so highly protect you, that perhaps I will force you to repent as long as you live of your behaviour to me; and to begin it Madam, I beseech you let Tyssagettes know, that provided he will let me conduct him Page 71 to Issedon, and that you will accompany him, he shall shortly be readmitted unto the favor of Thomiris, and Spargapises, and shall not loose the least jot of his estate: So that Maldam (except the heart which you have restored me, and which I will never render again) you may be in the same condition you were before you knew Ariantes. As that heart escaped me, replied Elibesis, so it may escape Noromata: No matter, replied he, whether Noromata keep it or no; but I tell you, that though it were absolutely in my own dispose, yet it shall never be yours: For Madam, should I render it unto you, perhaps when some other Usurper would come, and promise you a Crown, you would restore it me again: I could never have believed (said She) that you are able to be so tart; but since to my shame, I must confess, that I have merited some part of it, I will endure it as patiently as if I were altogether innocent; Yet I must tell you, that they have so much incensed my spirits, that I wish my Father would rather perish in his house, then to be obliged unto a man, who does things only out of revenge upon me. After this, Elibesis retired, though Agathorses would have stayed her: However, since Tyssagettes was of a milder temper then his Daughter, he accepted of the Proposition which Agathorses made, and accordingly the next morning, by reason of his sickness, he took Coach and went towards Issedon, Elibesis following him with her women. But Sir, I forgot to tell you, that before their departure, Agathorses who gave them a Convoy, and took command of the Castle, had private conference with Elibesis; but the wonder was, he found her changed since he saw her last; for be pleased to know, that Ariantes having received a Letter from Octomasades which gave him some new hopes, and that he had gathered together some Troops of his shattered Army, he writ unto her; That since he had not lost all his hopes, he beseeched her, since she was capable only of ambition, to look upon him yet as in a possibility of making her a Queen: So that Sir, this Lady, being now of another mind, She talked more sharply unto Agathorses then She did before, yet She still talked something, which made him see that it vexed her to think he did not love her. But as good Fortune for Agathorses would have it, as She went unto her Coach, Ariantes his Letter fell out of her pocket, Agathorses took it up unseen, and read it as soon as the Coach was gone; and imagining that these new hopes of Ariantes caused the arrogant alteration which he found in her, he was so extremely incensed, that had he followed the first motions of choller, he had sent after Tyssagettes and Elibesis, and had sent them Prisoners to the Tent-Royal; but I being then with him, and he acquainting me with the cause of his fury, I hindered him from following them; and told him, it was a better course to leave loving Elibesis any longer: I can do no more then strive, (replied he hastily) but I do profess this last weakness of hers, hath quashed all my love to her, and hath brought into my heart such a kinde of hatred and scorn of her, that if I be not much mistaken in my self, these passions will be as violent in me, as ever my love was: Methinks I see Elibesis now with other eyes then I was wont; and I begin to think She hath not that beauty and spirit which methoughts She had. But Anabaris, though She were fairer then ever Venus is painted, and had more Charms then ever any had, yet for all this, I should hate her: You are now (said I unto him) in such a height of cholor, that you do not know whether you do love or hate Elibesis. Ah Anabaris, said he unto me, it is not now with me, as heretofore it was, when you made me confess I loved her, though I thought I did not; and to testifie it unto you, I profess, I wish she were as ill-favoured, as if she were a hundred years old, and I think I should wish her dead, were I not perswaded that Death is a remedie against all sorts of miserie, and thereby She would escape all those I desire may fall upon her.

I should never make an end Sir, if I should relate all that Agathorses said in his anger; and therefore to abbreviate the story, let me only tell you, that to give Ariantes no time of recruiting his forces, Agathorses went straight unto the place where he was, and did so absolutely quash him, that he was forced, as brave as he was, to save himself with Octomasades, Adonacris, and some servants in a thick Forrest, where they found a little house. In the mean time, after they had considered what to do, they resolved to stay hid in that place for a while, and to send to enquire the state of things.

But Sir, they soon heard that all obeyed Spargapises, and as things stood, there was no hopes left for them; yet they understood, that most people murmured Page 72 much against Thomiris, because of her amorous passion, which they said her Soul was engaged, and that they had still a disposition to revolt: But since that conjuncture was not then fit to be made use of, and since in all probability She would not continue long in that minde, they resolved, that knowing Tyssagettes had made his Peace, Adonacris should secretly render himself to his Father, and afterwards, as occasion served, put all his friends at Issedon into a disposition of a new Rebellion.

They resolved further, that Octomasades should go to the Prince of Callipides, and obtain fresh Forces when it should be time, and that Ariantes, who knew how ill the Queen his Sister had treated you Sir, should come unto your Army, and help you to deliver Mandana, who was then reported to be in Armenia, to the end, that obtaining esteem and amitie, he might afterwards obtain some aid from you, in case Adonacris could bring things into a condition fit for a new Rebellion. But since it did neerly concern the Prince Ariantes, that Thomiris should not know where he was lest she should discover his designs, and hinder you from aiding him, he resolved to change his name, and take upon him that of Anaxaris, and the rather, because he was sure, that neither you Sir, nor any in the Court, could know him; for as Scythians are seldom seen in the Court of other Nations, so other Nations are seldom seen in the Court of Scythia.

Thus Sir Ariantes became Anaxaris, and he met with you in Lidia. Octomasades, he went unto the Prince of the Callipides, and Adonacris went unto his friends house, until he had made his Peace, which would easily be done. For to pacifie things the sooner, a General Act of Pardon was granted unto all Rebels, except the Prince Ariantes, and Octomasades, who were the first beginners of this Revolt. But Sir, I forgot to tell you, that whilst Ariantes was hid in that Forrest I spoke of, he writ un-Elibesis, who seeing his Fortunes desperate, did return him so sharp an answer, that this Prince began to cure himself of his passion towards her. And he told Adonacris, when he saw the Princess Mandana neer the Castle of Hermes (as I remember) where he said that Princess delivered you Sir, that he then began to hope he had absolutely left loving Elibesis, and that he was so charmed with the beauty of Mandana, that he thought her a thousand times fairer then Elibesis.

How's this, (said Cyrus and interrupted him) did Ariantes, who then called himself Anaxaris, and who was a Prisoner as well as I, when Mandana released me neer the Castle of Hermes, did he begin that very day to love Mandana? He did not say Sir, that he began to love her that very day, replied Anabaris, but he said, That he began that day to leave loving Elibesis.

However, to return from whence I digressed, and to acquaint you with the state of Ariantes, and his Affaires, I must tell you, that Agathorses hating Elibesis in his very Soul, would needs, as soon as he came at Issedon, (say what I could unto him) go and carry Ariantes Letter unto her, which She let fall as She took Coach; and which now he would needs restore, as an excuse of his last time of ever talking to her. And indeed, since he knew how to hate her, with as much violence as ever he loved her, he went unto her very early: So that Elibesis, who still loved him for all her ambition, imagined, that perhaps he would return unto her; for though she knew very well, that she had lost the Letter of Ariantes, yet she could not imagine that he had found it. But she was not long in that error; for as soon as elver he accosted her, he gave her the Letter: I beseech you pardon me Madam (said he unto her) for restoring it no sooner: But since in reading it, I found my Soul disposed to hate you, as much as ever I loved you, I desired to read it very often, to the end I might love you no longer; for as weak and ambitious as you were, I loved you, even when I told you that I did not. But now, thanks unto my own spite, I am come to that pass, as I do not only not love you, but I do hate you, and hate with as quiet and calme a hatred, as ever any was capable of. And I assure you, I never had more pleasure heretofore in telling you that I loved you, then I have now in telling you that I hate you, and ever shall do, as long as I live. Moreover Madam, never think that this is so, because I love Noromata; for I do protest, I neither do, nor ever did love her, for you were the cause I never loved any; for I looked upon all fair women in general, onely as beautiful objects, without any capitulation. But now I look upon you in particular, as one of the Page 73 weakest, the most ambitious, and perfidious person in the world: And now Madam, I have no more to say unto you: I wish, said she, that you had said less; but since you tell me plainly that you hate me, I must do the like, and hate you: Agreed Madam (replied he, and did rise up) But if you know not how to hate, better then you know how to love, your hatred will never do me any great harm. Upon these words Agathorses left her, and went from her so well satisfied with what he had said, that it was very apparent he did not love her.

Thus this woman, who would needs entertain both love and ambition at once, did not satisfie either of those two passions; and it may well be said, that she did not <...> gn in the heart of Agathorses, but only because she would needs reign over Issedon. And thus, after she had lost two Lovers, the same passions still remained gnawing in her heart, so as She became so melancholy, and so unhealthful, that she became extremely ugly Moreover, Adonacris hath chid her a thousand times for her behaviour, both towards Agathorses and towards Ariantes: So that her her own fault did bring all sorts of misery upon her. In the mean time, Adonacris was no sooner at liberty to do what he would, and all the Kingdom quiet, but he prepared himself for Tipanis, yet that labour was saved: For Noromata having some business of importance at Issedon, she came thither just as he was ready to depart it: You may well imagine Sir, that the meeting of these two persons was no more pleasing at Issedon, then when Fortune brought them together at Tipanis: for then Adonacris was Husband unto Argirispe, as Sitalces was unto Noromata; but now, they were both free, yet Noromata made some scruple of marrying him so soon

But her Father having changed his opinion of Adonacris, because now he thought him unloosed from the interests of Ariantes. This Marriage was made as soon as they returned to the Tents Royal, and solemnized in mighty magnificence. Thus the adventure of Agathorses and Adonacris, did both end very happily; for that of Agathorses ended with the recovery of his liberty, and that of Adonacris in the enjoyment of his Mistress; Agathorses bragged, that he thought himself more happy in enjoying himself, then his Mistress.

After this, when all was quiet, Spatgapises ret <...> to Tho <...> ris, and Agathorses after a voyage to her, and was Crowned with Lawrels of that Victory which he had obtained, he returned to Issedon, where he lived as he did before the War, to wit, not caring for any above him, or any thing else, but to enjoy his friends, and please himself. On the other side, Adonacris amidst all his joyes did not forget his promises unto the Prince Ariantes, but on the contrary, he transacted with so much wisdom (after Spargalpises was returned to Thomiris, and Terez carried away in his Coach) that he had laid a plot, and carried it so judiciously, that nothing was discovered. The truth is, there was much more facility in the matter, because both the Issedonians and the Massagettes did extremely murmur to see how carelessly Thomiris dispatched the affairs of her two King|domes, since her passion was above her reason; and that which most incensed the people was, because they saw continual preparations of War, and could not see an Enemy that Princess had to fight with. So that Adonacris closing with such a favourable opportunity, did not depart from Issedon to come unto Ariantes, until after he had brought things into a condition of commanding in one day the Metropolis of the Kingdom, and Tipanis, and until an Army from the Prince of Callipedes entred, which Octomasades had negotiated, and levied men under another pretence. So that by this means Ariantes will hazard to spoil all the design, by carrying away Mandana; for he told Indathereses, that if he did not find the design of getting upon a Throne infallible when he came upon the Frontiers of the Massagettes, he would negotiate with Thomiris, knowing very well, that considering her affection to you, he could certainly make his peace with her, by bringing the Princess Mandana into her power, and by demanding her protection to marry her, and to defend her against you Sir: And certainly Sir, I make no question but this negotiation takes; for that Princess is so fully bent either to make you change your minde Sir, or else to be revenged of you, by declaring War, that she hearing I condemned such an unjust enterprize, was so incensed against me, as for the security of my person I came out of her Dominions. And since Fame Trumpets the glory of your Armes Sir through the whole earth, I resolved to employ the time of my Exile, in being a witness of all those glorious actions, of which Renown makes a noyse through all the world. But as Fate assembles and severs friends and enemies as she pleaseth, in coming hither, I met the ser|vant Page_74 of Adonacris, who carried me to the place where his Master was, from whom I re|ceived the knowledg of these last Occurrences, after we had renewed our ancient acquaintance.

Anabaris having ended, Cyrus said he was much obliged to him for acquainting him with many things, which might help him to prevent the design of Ariantes. Also he de|sired him, to assure Adonacris that he would be glad to serve him. After which, to make use of this intelligence, he dispatched another Post to Gelonide, to inform her of all, that might hinder Thomiris from having Mandana in her power.

ARTAMENES, OR The Grand CYRUS. The Ninth Part. Book. II.

Af|ter Cyrus had well examined all the intelligence concerning Ariantes, which he received from the friend of Adonacris, he concluded, that his best course was to execute his former resolution, and to march to|wards the Massagettan Country, to the end he might fall upon The|miris, if she received Mandana with intentions of keeping her, or upon Ariantes, if he carried her to Issedon. So that the next morning betimes giving out all requisite orders, and himself ordering the ways which every Troop was to take, he departed two daies after: But before he went, he vi|sited Adonacris (Indathereses being with him) with whom he had so much discourse, as let him see, that Anabaris gave a true Character of him, when he so highly commended him. This visit was more then a visit of civility, for Cyrus told Adonacris, that being acquainted with his virtues by Indathereses, he desired him to go unto the Prince Ariantes, and endeavour to bring him unto reason, and make him repent of that unjust resolution which he had taken: Sir, replied Adonacris, though you had not made this Proposition unto me, yet I would have addressed my self unto you for liberty to do as you command me. But Sir, since the high esteem which I know the Prince Ariantes hath of you, and the ob|ligations upon him, as Anaxaris could not dissuade him from following his passion, I fear I shall not prevail with him; yet I am resolved to do what I can, both for your sake and his, as soon as my wounds will permit me. After this, Cyrus imbraced Anabaris also, who offered to do him all the service he was able in delivering Mandana, knowing that the li|berty that Princess would prevent the desolation of his Country. As for Indathereses, though he had cured himself of his dotage upon Thomiris, yet for all that he was not altogether Page_76 neuter and indifferent; but on the contrary, he could not chuse but wish as ge|nerous as he was, that nothing might succeed happily unto her. So mixing a thought of revenge unto the interests of Cyrus whom he highly honored, he followed him with much joy.

This march having much wearied his Army, he thought it convenient to make a halt before he advanced any further towards Thomiris, whom he knew had a hugely numer|ous Army. Also not yet knowing where Mandana was, he thought good to get more in|telligence before he went any further; but he stayed not long for it, because the third day, as he was talking with the Prince Mazares, and the Prince Myrsiles, Feraulas returned, who by his looks made Cyrus to know that he had some news concerning his Princess. For heavens sake, dear Feraulas (said he at first unto him) tell me quickly what news of Man|dana? For I know by your eyes that you have something to tell me of her. 'Tis true Sir, replied he, I can tell you something which you desire to know: but the worst is, I can tell you nothing that will please you: Be pleased to know, that in obedience to your orders, I went unto the next Port to the place where I left you; but Sir, in lieu of finding many Ships to follow Ariantes, I found but one that was fit to sail the same hour: So that imbarquing with twenty of those men which you gave me, I left the rest to get into other Ships which were preparing; and I told my Pilot, that my design was only to cross the Sea to|wards Colchides, in hopes to hear some news of a Ship which I was in quest of: Indeed Sir, I was so fortunate as to understand from some Fishers, that they saw such a Ship as I enquired after, which though it had not a favourable winde, yet still made forward: So that hoping it was the same I desired to find, I desired my Pilot to steer that way, and to follow it. To say the truth Sir, it plainly appeared, that the Gods were pleased you should know where Mandana is; for after this, I still met with Barks or Ships which met with that I followed: That which did confirm me in my opinion this Ship was Ariantes, was, because the Captain of a Ship I met with told me, that he saw upon the Deck of that which I enquired after, two very fair Ladies, which seemed to be much troubled, and a third, whose face he could not see, because she was always wiping her eyes as if she wept. This Sir made me very glad; but gladder I was when he told me, that the Pilot which guided this Ship I enquired after, had conference with him I met, and asked him whether he might safely Land neer that place where the River Phases empties it self into the Euxine Sea; and this Pilot assuring him that he might, provided he took the water at full tide, and avoided one Rock which the water covered neer that place. I made use Sir of all this, and made immediately unto the place where Ariantes would land, but he having much the start of me, make what hast I could, he was landed before I came there: But 'tis true, I understood that he had carried the Princess Mandana unto a Castle not above six furlongs from thence, and which is seated upon the River Phases. But now my greatest fear was, that if I shewed my self, I should be known by those who followed Ariantes, and An|dramites. So that to hear more certainly, I sent those to Land whom I brought from the Port where I first imbarqued, but they being a company of dull fellows, I was not a jot the better informed; all they could tell me was, that it was a thing impossible for me to attempt the delivery of that Princess, for Ariantes and Andramites did so carefully guard her, and the Castle was naturally so very strong, that all would be in vain: So that having only twenty men, I could do nothing more then as a Spie. Then after many daies patience, I could devise no better way, then to endeavour the getting one of Ariantes men into my Ship, that I might out of him get some light of Ariantes his design, and to keep him there.

So that making choice of three resolute Souldiers, I put them into the habit of Marri|ners; after which, they went and fell in conference with them of a Ship upon that Port; for being all of them idle, when they are off their Guard, they have nothing to do but to walk, and hunt some of those birds which Phases gives a name unto, and of which there are a great abundance in that River. So that after they were landed, and had walked and hunted together, and talked of several indifferent things, those of Ariantes Ship desired those I sent to come into their Ship, and that to render civility for civility, invited them into theirs. So it chanced that almost all those who were invited, were called away upon some business, and only one of them staid behind them. Here Sir may the order of Pro|vidence be wondered at, for this man who stayed behinde, chanced to be one of Manda|na's Guard, and a man best able to satisfie me in all I desired to know: So that as soon as he was in my Ship, I shewed my self unto him, and so amazed him, that imagining you Page_77 were there also, and would throw him over-board, as a punishment for his crime, he threw himself at my feet: For heavens sake Feraulas, said he, I beseech you save my life; for if our Prince will spare me, I shall inform him of such things, as may perhaps deliver Mandana. You may well imagine Sir, that I promised his life unto him, upon condition he would be as good as his word, and indeed I made such use of his fears and hopes, that he told me all he knew. And Andramites having lost his man after the Combat, he had entertained this fellow to wait upon him, until he found his own, or got another. So that this man being very intimate with him, he often heard the discourse of Ariantes and An|dramites concerning their designs. Pray Feraulas (said Cyrus and interrupted him) tell me quickly if you know them: I shall tell you Sir, replied Feraulas, how I understand by this Guard, that though the Prince Ariantes has a great minde to make himself King of Issedon; yet he had rather preserve Mandana, then conquer a Kingdom, and hazard the losing of her, not doubting but both you and Thomiris will fall upon him, if he carry her unto Issedon.

So that caring for nothing but how to keep Mandana, he was no sooner ashore, but he writ unto Thomiris, and to all his friends about her, beseeching her to forget what was past, and he would solemnly renounce all his claim unto the Crown of Issedon, and pre|tend unto nothing but the quality of her Subject, provided she would receive Mandana in|to her Court, that she would promise never to render her unto you Sir, but use her best endeavours that he might marry her. Thus Sir, you may well conceive, that Thomiris would not refuse a Proposition which would assure her of a Crown, and which would bring that person into her power, whom she believed was the only cause why you Sir did not love her. Also this Guard told me, that Ariantes received an answer as favourable as he could wish; that Thomiris would forget all that was past, and offered him what se|curity he would desire for the safety of his and Mandana's person; and that she would solemnly ingage her self never to restore her unto you Sir. And indeed this Guard fur|ther told me, that Thomiris sent two men of Quality unto Ariantes, to tell him, that if he desired her Son in Hostage, she would give him, provided he would let Mandana be in her power. But Ariantes knowing very well that Thomiris had such an interest as would make her keep promise, as to Mandana, he thought it his best course absolutely to trust her; therefore the next morning he went by Land unto Colchides, and from thence to Thomiris.

At the same time he sent unto one, who as I think was called Octomasades, to tell him, that now he had no further design of making himself King: He sent also unto Issedon, to all them that had stirred in his behalf, to tell them the same. I heard all this I tell you from the mouth of Ariantes and Andramites, as they talked together, not thinking that I heard them, for Love had so blinded them both, that they hardly knew who was pre|sent. After this Sir, I believed this Guard could tell me no more, and I thought my best course would be to gain this fellow, and to send him back, purposely to hear more news of Mandana. And indeed, I inspired him with so much horror against the perfidiousness of all them that had betrayed you, that I am confident he will prove a faithful Spy; yet I sent him not away, until I had asked him how Ariantes behaved himself towards the Prin|cess, and he told me, that he was so full of reverence and respect, that she had no reason to complain of any thing but his carrying her away; yet he assured me, that she was extremely troubled, and that if she had not the comfort of Martesia's company, he knew not what she would do, for Doralisa was so full of sorrow and anger against An|dramites, that she was not in any capacity of a Comforter. But Sir, not to trust too much unto this fellow, I hoisted Sail as soon as I had set him on Land, lest he should be|tray me, and cause me to be stayed, and so hinder me from coming to advertise you: Yet since I was very desirous to know certainly whether the Prince Ariantes departed the next morning according to this fellows relation: I put a good way into the Sea, and sent one in a Cock-boat to enquire the truth; being extremely sorry, that I had not men en|ough wherewith to hinder him from carrying Mandana with him: But since I had men too few to have any such thoughts, I conceived it a better course to come immediately and acquaint you Sir with what I heard, then to attempt things impossible; yet I could not make so much haste as I desired, because the winds were contrary: But if Gelonide, who heretofore was very kinde unto you, have a mind she may let you know all the news of Mandana. But Sir, I forgot to tell you that this Guard, who vowed fidelity, did also promise me to acquaint her that I had spoken with him, upon the first opportunity Page_78 that he found. And that he would assure her, you would deliver her out of the Power of Thomiris, very shortly, as well as you had done out of the King of Assiras, and the King of Pontus. Indeed Feraulas (said Cyrus) you have done me most notable service, in causing him to speak of me unto my Princess: But (said he and turned towards Maza|ree and the Prince Mersiles) I do not see any thing we have to stay for; as he said so, Ortalques appeared, and Cyrus admiring his hast, received him with joy, in hopes of hearing something concerning Mandana, and indeed his hopes were not deceived: for Ortalques told him that since he went all the way by land, he came not to the Tents Roy|al until the day before Mandana arrived, and was there received in huge pomp: How (said Cyrus) have you been in the very same place where Mandana was? Yes Sir, replied Ortal|ques, and Gelonide unto whom I gave your Letter that night, would needs have me see that Princess enter. Myrsiles then, could not chuse but enquire of her he adored: so that he enl[aged Ortalques to speak of Doralisa, and to tell him that she and Martesia were still with the Princess, But I pray (said Cyrus) what says Gelonide? you shall know Sir, replied Ortalques, when you have perused what I shall present unto you. In saying so, Ortalques gave Cyrus a packet which was so big as filled him full of curiosity to open it in all hast: as so he did: But he was pleasingly surprized, when he saw Gelonides Letter which accompanied with two others, the one from Mandana, the other from the Princess Araminta: And first he read Mandana's, wherein he found these words.

MANDANA unto CYRUS.

SIR,

IT is by the goodness and wisdom of the virtuous Gelonide, That I have so much liberty as to tell you, that if I did not remember the great Acts you have already done to deliver me, I should despair of ever being free; But since I have not lost the memory of them, I shall still hope to see you break those chains which imprison me: yet mannage well your life, and do not expose me by exposing your self too far, unto the greatest of all misfortunes. Ortalques will tell you how I have been received by the Massagettan Queen: but let me tell you, that I have abundance of comfort in finding the Princess Araminta here; for since she cannot yet meet with happiness, I am glad that we are miserable together: for truly I love her so well, that I was to blame in accusing you for the safe. This is all that one can say who hopes ere long to be delivered by you; if fortune will but be just unto your valor, as I will be unto your vir[tue and your affection.

MANDANA.

The reading of this Letter made Cyrus both glad and sad, he was joyed to finde some expressions of tenderness towards him: but grieved that such an Illustrious person should be under the power of an incensed Queen, and of a Rival who had an Army more nume[r]ous then his: but after a while's resentment both of joy and sorrow, he opened Aramin[tas Letter, which gave him these words.

ARAMINTA unto CYRUS.

SIR,

I Perceive that fortune will still have me delivered either as the Princess Mandana, or as a slave with her, However to acknowledge my obligations to you Sir, I assure you that I will do all is possible to make her prison less tedious unto her, and will be as careful to ease her mi[s]eries, as my own: In exchange of which, I conjure you Sir, to have a care of Spitridates, in what part of the world soever he be; and oblige the Prince Tigranes to chide the unjust Phraartes for his violent resolutions. I ask your pardon Sir, for speaking of any thing but the Princess Mandana, at a time when I know she takes up your whole minde: but since I know you will measure the miseries of others by your own, I shall hope for a pardon, and the rather because I ask it in the name of the Princess Mandana, whose merits and virtues I ad[m]ire, and in whose Name I hope you will not deny.

ARAMINTA.

What esteem soever Cyrus had of this excellent Princess who writ this Letter, doubtless he had read it in hast, as the state of his soul then stood, if she had not both begun [Page 79 and ended it with the Princess Mandana: But finding things which related both unto his Mistress and his friend, he read it both with leasure and satisfaction: Afterward he opened Gelonides, and found what follows.

GELONIDE unto the Invinceable CYRUS.

SIR,

Since I conceive it better to trust Ortalques then this thin Paper, with what is worthy your knowledge, I will not therefore write it: Only tell you Sir, you may be assured I will serve the Princess Mandana in all things. For since it is good service unto the Queen whom I serve, to oppose whatsoever she would do against you; and since it is a good office unto you without betraying her, beleeve it Sir, I shall do it with all the wit I am capable of, and with all affection possible.

GELONIDE.

As Cyrus ended the reading this Letter, Chrisantes and Aglatidas came to him: and this Prince knowing they writ unto Gelonide he asked Ortalquis whether she had returned any answers to them? And after he said that she had answered them, he bad him deliver the Letters unto him; for since they writ only concerning Mandana, he had more inte[r]est in her answer then they had: And it was apparent by those two Letters that she re[l]y intended to do all good offices she was able, for that Princess. However after he had read them aloud, and given them unto whom they were written, he commanded Ortalques to tell him all he knew concerning Mandana, and to speak in the presence of Mazares, Mersiles, Aglatidas, Chrisantes and Feraulas. Sir, Replied Ortalques, I do understand by Gelonide, that the Prince Ariantes after he had carreed away Mandana, did land as Cholchides: and afterwards had negotiated so well with Thomiris, that she to get Mandana into her power, promised him to forget all past passages: never to restore that Princess back, and to endeavor a marriage with her to him. As I have gotten her out of the power of the Assirian King, and the King of Pontus, replied Cyeus hastily, so I hope to get her out of the power of Thomiris: Her Tents are not so hard to be scaled, as walls of Sinope, Babylon, Sardis and Cumes. But Ortalques, go on (said he) and tell me all I desire to know, especially how the Queen of Massagets doth treat Mandana, and whether you have seen her? Sir, replied Ortalques, to satisfie your curiosity, I must tell you, that as soon as the Treaty between Thomiris and Ariantes was ended: there appeared more joy in the face of that Queen, then ever appeared since you parted from her, and the very thought of having the Princess Mandana in her power, was a most incredibly satisfaction unto her: But to the end this Treaty might be the more solidly concluded, there was an enterview, between Ariantes and Thomiris, upon the Banks of the River Araxes; that Prince having left Mandana under the Guard of Andramites whilst he went to meet the Massagettan Queen: Moreover I understand by Gelonide who was pre[sent at this Enterview, that there was a Solemn reconciliation made between them: yet Ariantes carryed it so cunningly, that he spoke not a word unto Thomiris of her affecti[on] unto you Sir, and she carryed her self so demurely, maugre the violence of her temper, that she told him that the reason why she treated him so well, was not because he was her brother, but because he was Rival unto you Sir, yet they understood each other very well. But in conclusion, the more easily to make the Princess Mandana dispair of liberty, and not to greeve Ariantes, they resolved to bring her through all the Army of Thomidis: And accordingly Sir, when Mandana was conducted by the Prince Ariantes to the Queen his Sister: Thomiris caused her Army to be drawn up into Battalia in a great plain; So that Mandana (unto whom she sent a stately Charriot, and a Complement by one of her Officers) did pass through the midst of all these Troops, whose mult[itu]de and magnificence made that Princess extreamly melancholy, as Martesia told me since. However, Ariantes and Andramites did ride on horse-back after Mandanas Charriot, which was conducted into a most Stately Tent, next unto that belonging to the Princess Araminta, for whom Phraartes after he carried her away, asked Sanctuary, and protection from the Massagettan Queen: But Sir, she was no sooner there, then they placed Guards upon her, and within an hour after, Thomiris came to visit her; for the Prince Ariantes upon the Treaty obliged her to do all imaginable honors unto her: and Page 80 it is to be beleeved, that though she had no other reason for her visit unto this Princess, but only the satisfaction of her own Curiosity, yet that was enough.

To give you Sir, an exact relation of all the passages at this interview, will be a difficult task: For Martesia, told them unto me in such hast, that perhaps I may forget some circumstances, though I did my best to remember all: But Sir, give me leave to tell you, that when Thomiris came in, Mandana was lamenting with Doralisa and Martesia, the cruelty of her fortune, and as soon as she knew that Thomiris was coming, she went unto the door of the Tent to meet her, and received her with as much sadness in her countenance, as civility in her language: but Sir, for all her sadness, Thomiris was amazed at the beauty of this Princess: at least those who were present observed, that as soon as she saw her, she blusht, and such admiration appeared in her eyes, that Doralisa be[l]ieved she repented of her injuries unto a person of such rare beauty: Mandana also, found Thomiris so fair (though she had not the freshness of sixteen upon her cheeks) that Martesia charged me to tell you Sir, that Mandana thought her self obliged unto you, for refusing the affection of so fair a Queen as she. The truth is Sir, Thomiris seemed to be not above two and twenty, or three and twenty at the most. But to return from whence I degressed, the Massagettan Queen no sooner saw Mandana, but this Princess began to speak. I know not Madam (said she unto her in the Assirian Tongue, knowing Thomiris could speak it) whether I ought to complain against, or commend you, for the honors you have done me; yet since fame speaks so loud in your advantage, I shall hope that for your honor and my satisfaction, you will protect me: I will beleeve that these Gaurds which you have placed about me, are more for my safety, then to keep me Captive: I am almost perswaded, that your reason Madam will satisfie Ariantes, and that he will relpent of his unjust course: As he is my brother Madam, replied Thomiris, It would not be just in me to be against him absolutely, but give me leave to tell you Madam, that as soon as you have set him at liberty, I will do the like to you, and I promise, that when he is no more your slave, you shall be no longer my prisoner; and this is as much as I ought to promise you: But Madam, the chief cause of my coming hither, is to tell you that your Captivity shall not be harsh, and that you shall be waited upon with all reverence and respect, due unto your quality and merit: Though this be very civil and obliging, replied the Princess, yet I cannot chuse but think it infinitely harsh; for I beseech you Madam, tell me what right had Ariantes to bring me hither, and what colour of right have you to keep me here? By the right of force and Arms Madam, replied Thomiris, which is the very same right Cyrus hath to be Conqueror of the greatest part of Asia. However Madam, let us not now examine my brothers reasons, nor let us talk either at this time of liberty or imprisonment: victory is so used to follow Cyrus, that though you should not be free until after he hath vanquished me, yet doubtless you will expect it ve[r]y shortly: for truly what likelihood is there, that a Queen can resist a Prince who hath Conquered so many Kings? for I have neither walled Towns, nor fortified places, nor no Sanctuary but the valor of my own Subjects: therefore Madam. it is very improbable that a Princess whom Cyrus esteems not, can long defend her self against him: Indeed Madam, (said Mandana very prudently and interrupted her) I cannot agree unto all you say, for I know that Cyrus doth infinitely esteem you. I know better then you do Madam, what he thinks of me (replied Thomiris, and blusht for shame) But for all that, I assure you Madam, as weak as I am, and though the Massagettans have no strong Towns, yet they are not easily vanquished. For they fight only for glory; and never fear that a long war will ruine their Towns and houses, because they have them not, they will fight resolutely, and never submit till the last gasp. But Madam, added she, I beseech you let us talk no longer of victory or of war: let us leave the future to the Gods, and let us at this time think upon nothing that may displease you: and to that end Madam, I will suffer the Princess of Pontus, who is here, to see you; for she being of that Country where there is more politeness then you will finde in ours, I beleeve she will more divert you, and will think her self very happy in the society of such a one as you. Mandana wondering to hear that Araminta was there, could not chuse but express her wonder, and ask how she came thither. So that Thomiris who was not sorry to change the discourse, told her in few words, that the Prince Phraartes brought her thilther, and desired protection for her. After which, Thomiris not being able to stay longer with a person whom she found fairer then she wished, did retire, after a civil complement Page 81 unto Mandana. She was no sooner gone, but the Princess Araminta <◇> by him who guarded her, did enter into the Chamber of this Princess. But <◇>, this en[t]erview was more pleasing then that of Mandana and Thomiris: for though these two Princesses had never seen each other yet they accosted each other as if they had been anc[ie]nt friends; and the suitableness of both their fortunes together, with the high esteem they had of each other by the reports of such as spoke of their merits, did presently con[tra]ct a most intimate league of love between these two admirable Ladies.

The same also was between Hesionide and Martesia: And as for Doralisa, her destiny was so happy upon this occasion, that she became a great consolation unto these two Prin[cesses]; for though she was extreamly grieved at Mandana's misery, and to see Andramiltes so neer her, yet a kind of spiteful sorrow (if I may so phrase it) made her express a thousand pleasant passages, since she came to that place. But Sir, to conclude all I know, be pleased to understand, that the virtuous Gelonide carried the matter so handsomly, that the next morning she brought me to the speech of Martesia, who shewed me a glimpse of the Princess, who commanded me to acquaint you with all I knew. So Sir, Gelonide thinking it convenient that you should presently be acquainted with the state of things, did give me a packet to present unto you, she bad me set forward the next morning, and procured me a Guide, lest I should be stopped at the passage over the River Araxes: But as I took my leave of her, she commanded me to tell you Sir, that she would do all that ever she could to infuse reason into the minde of Thomiris and Ariantes, yet adding, that she feared all would be to no purpose. After this, Ortalques was silent, and Cyrus put many questions unto him, unto which he answered according to his knowledge or ignorance, and after he had sufficiently satisfied his Masters curiosity, he retired. But as for the Prince Mysriles, though he durst not interrupt them, yet he was extremely desirous to be satisfied of all passages concerning Doralisa; and therefore upon the first occasion, he left Cyrus, and went to talk with Ortalques at more leasure. In the mean time, since no further intelligence was to be expected, Cyrus resolved with Mazares to advance to the River Araxes, and afterwards to carry things fairly towards a Queen, whose injustice proceeded only from her too much affection to him; he sent a person of good quality to her, to demand the Princess Mandana, and the Princess Araminta, before he proceeded to the last remedy of War. In the interim, he took order for so many Boats as would make a Bridge over the River Araxes: So that calling a Council the next day, more for form then need, it was resolved upon as he propounded, and accordingly his Army began to march, and marched without any obstacle unto the River Araxes, where it encamped.

He was no sooner there, but he understood that the Princess Onesile, Wife unto Tilgranes, was come unto a little Town which was one of his Quarters, and that from thence she would come unto him, to enquire news of her Husband from his mouth. Cyrus having a high esteem of this Princess, and knowing how sorry Tigranes was for her, and she for him, he would needs go and visit her, since he had time enough to do it without prejudice to his design; for since he could not send to Thomiris until the next day, he had that day entire to render civilities unto the Princess of Armenia: And certainly Cyrus had abundance of reason for his high esteem of her, for indeed she was a Princess of a most extraordinary merit: The very truth is, Onesile had all the excellency that could be wished for in women, either for graces of body, or qualities of soul. Onesile was big, of a tall stature, and a most excellent presence, she had brown hair, black eyes, pure complexion, delicate skin, lips red and smiling, and the whole composure of her face pleasing, though of a very particular cimitry, for one could not say that it was either absolutely oval, or absolutely round. Moreover, her nose was rightly shaped, neither too great, nor too little, but it and every part so fitly proportioned, as made her the fairest and most charming beauty in the world, for she was not only all that I have already described, but moreover, there was such a splendid lustre in her eyes, such a fineness of ayr, and so noble and sprightly a physiognomy, such a particular beauty in her mouth, a neck so admirably fair, and so brave a Character in all her gestures, as did infinitely please: So that though she had no other graces but those of her person, yet they were enough to beget both love and wonder, yet her mind did shine more gloriously then her eyes, for it was most penetrating, most knowing, most pleasing, most solid, and of a most vast capacity: For though her fancy was so ready and quick, that she did anticipate the thoughts of all who talked unto her, and though her manner of conceiving things Page 82 might be called sometimes a divination, yet it is most certain, that as quick as her fancy and imagination was, yet it did never go before her judgment, which always gave a true judgment upon every thing: 'Tis true, she might sometimes seem blameable for not being always so, for the truth is, there were some few men in the world which could so much take up her mind, that she could not for a long time think upon any thing but what they said unto her; but she would return so handsomly and pleasingly out of these little distractions (for which her intimate friends did chide her) that she would answer so justly unto what they thought she did not hear, as it was apparent, that that which seemed distraction and studying, was only an effect of her vast mind which could not be confined to one single object, but divided it self into so many several, as it was not possible, whilst it was so divided, but something must appear, either in the tone of the voice, or in the eyes, or in some of the actions, and I think, that her generosity may as well be accused, for often when she hath been hearkening unto one friend, she hath been thinking how to serve another.

Thus it may without flattery be said, that whatsoever the Princess of Armenia can be accused of, does conduce to render her more amiable, and more perfect, and are only pure effects of the greatness of her soul and goodness; and when she talked in good earnest unto any, her discourse was the most pleasing in the world, and able to give full satisfaction unto the most delicate and difficult questions, there being nothing so high unto which she could not give a good accompt, nor nothing so low, unto which she would not Nobly speak. Moreover, it may be said, that never any serious person would be so wittily merry when she had a mind, nor ever any had such a fine mixture of modesty and Gallantry together, as this Princess, nor who better understood the subtilties and intrigues of the world.

As Onesile was eloquent in her language, so was she as excellent at her pen; few women ever writ comparably to her, yet for all this, her eloquence, her wit, and her beauty came short of her generosity, of her goodness, and of her virtue; never any had a soul more solidly generous then Onesile had, nor did ever any know how to oblige in a more noble way, for she would not only do such favours for her friends as they desired of her, but she would do such offices for them, as they never did, nor durst ask her. Moreover, whosoever was virtuous, was sure of her protection, and she was so much talken with any extraordinary merit, that she could never see any man of parts miserable without much sorrow, though they had no relation to her: Indeed, Onesile had so great and noble a heart, that though she was destined to sit upon the Throne of Armenia, yet it may truly be said, that she was below her fortune and merit; and all the world who knew her did so pity her want of health, that they did most zealously pray for it. Moreover still, Onesile was as liberal as ever any was, and the very truth is, she had all the virtues in a high degree, and she was so respectful, and so tenderly loved of every one that had the honor to come unto her, as it was no wonder the merit of such a person should make a deep impression in the mind of Cyrus, and move him to all possible civility in going to her; as soon as he heard she intended to come unto him; and he went with Indathorses, and six more only.

As soon as Onesile heard that Cyrus was coming to her, she went to meet him; but he going very fast up the stairs, she was no further then the door of her Chamber, where after the first complements were over, and that Cyrus had saluted a Cozen of Onesiles which was with her, he presented Indathorses unto her, and in few words acquainted her with his quality and merit: After which, Onesile expressed her sorrows for the actions of her Brother-in-law Phraartes, and that she could not hear where Tigranes was, whom she heard went with Spitridates to seek his Brother, and to move him concerning the Princess Araminta: I am confident Sir (said she after many other things) that you will think my sorrows not without good cause, and that hearing Phraartes was gone to ask retreat from Thomiris, I had reason to undertake this journey, to the end if Tigranes came hither, I might prevent those two Brothers from killing each other; for Phraartes allwayes expressing much friendship to me, I had some hopes of reducing him to reason if I could see him: I wish unto the Gods Madam, replied Cyrus, that you could perswade both Phraartes and the Prince Ariantes to set those two Princesses whom they carried away at liberty, and that the reports of such a noble adventure might bring Tigranes back to you. But Madam, not to spend time in vain wishes, give me leave to tell you, that I make no doubt but you will ere long see the Prince Tigranes here: for since it is impossible, Page 83 but fame must needs tell him that the Princess Araminta is with Thomiris, and that I am at the River Araxes, it is very credible that I am not deceived in saying you will see him very shortly.

Whilst Cyrus was thus talking with the Princess of Armenia, Indathorses and other men of quality who came with Cyrus, did talke unto the cosen of Onesile, whose name was Telagene, who was one of the most noble families in all Armenia. This Lady understood Greek, and Indathorses having got that Language very perfectly, in his quest of Anacharsis, he much delighted to talk with her; and certainly not without great reason, for she had many attractive and pleasing qualities. Telagene was of a mean stature, but well made: She had eyes great and blue, of a sweet and languishing lustre, which pleased infinitely: Her complexion was smooth; her face oval, and her hair so fine, that one may call it fair without doing her a favor. Moreover Telagene, had not only much beauty, much sweetness; but her memory was furnished with all the excellencies of Greece; And from Hesiodo unto Sapho, nothing of all that the Muses produced, escaped her curiosity: Her reading gave her a most excellent faculty in writing, and that so gallantly, as that might with reason be ranked amongst those which rendred her most amiable: Her discourse was sweet and complaisant: Her soul was tenderly inclined unto friendship; and all her inclinations so noble and disposed unto virtue, that it was no wonder if Indathorses took delight in talking with her, and thought the time not a quarter of an hour, when Cyrus went from the Princess of Armenia, who was resolved to stay in that place, in hopes of seeing the Prince Tigranes: For the Town where she was, being an allie both unto the King of Armenia, and the King of Medes, she was safe enough there: Also Cyrus being Master of the Field on this side Araxaes: And all the Forces of Thomiris being on the other side: she might safely enough stay there.

In the mean time, as Cyrus returned back along the River, with those who accompanied him, he saw a good way before him, a man who went into a Boat, which was so little, as not being able to hold his Horse, he let him go, and beckened unto another man on horse-back, as if he desired him to make hast. Cyrus observing this, the loose Horse came towards him, and seeing him to be a very handsome horse, he conceived the master to be a man of quality. Cyrus being full of curiosity to know who he was, did gallop as fast as he could to the place where this Boat was. But when he was within fifty paces, and he in the Boat knowing Cyrus, he changed his intentions of staying for the man he beckened unto, and rowed in all hast from the River side: And indeed the two fishers who undertook to pass him over, did row so fast from shore; that there was no staying of them. Cyrus did not know this Man, for he so turned his head from the Shore, that he could not see his face; yet he knew whom he was; for the man who was coming towards him, seeing his master stayed not, he turned back and endeavored to shun meet[ing] with those whom he saw: But Cyrus being still fuller of curiosity, he made towards him so fast, that the man being amazed at the sight of him, had not power to fly away. But lighting hastily from his Horse, he fell on his knees before Cyrus, who at first knew him not; but presently recollecting his memory, he knew him to be one of those forty Cavaliers who heretofore had conspired against him, and whom he had pardoned.

In the mean time, this wretch seeing himself in the power of a Prince unto whom he owed his life: and whose life he would have taken away, began to speak in a trembling tone: I may be ashamed Sir, (said he unto him) to appear before you, and may seem ungrateful: But Sir, if you will be pleased to consider by what a pitiful adventure I came to serve a Master who is your enemy, I beleeve you will pardon me; For Sir, I was born a subject unto the Prince of Cmes, and I returned unto that Town when you besieged it: And being chosen one of the guard of the Castle, when Anaxaris made himself master of it, and drove out the King of Pontus, that unfortunate Prince commanding me to follow him in his flight, I did so, and never forsook him since. How (said Cyrus, and looked towards the River) is he who is in that Boat, the King of Pontus? yes Sir, replied he, and I am not afraid to tell you that he is the most miserable Prince upon Earth. After this, Cyrus looked both up and down the River, to see if he could find a Boat to execute a design which he had in his minde; but seeing none, he turned towards the man again: Though after I have saved your life (said Cyrus unto him) I might easily punish you for bearing Arms against me, yet I will once more promise a pardon, provided you will truly tell me, what the King of Pontus hath done, since he went from the Tombe of Menesteus, and what his design is in going into the Country of Massagettes: Page 84 Sir, (replied the man very glad to hear Cyrus say so) to inform you truly of all this, be pleased to know, that the unfortunate King of Pontus miserably wounded, departing in the night, and going along a Terrent, was in a hundred dangers of losing his life; but at last, day beginning to break, as weak as he was, he went so fast, that he got into a thick wood, and lighted from his Horse, then lay under a Tree, because he could not go any further. As soon as he was layd, the loss of blood had so weakened him, that he swooned; so that then I was in a most pitiful case: But hearing accidentally some Cock crow, I concluded that some house must need be neer; so that going to the place where I heard the Cock, I found a Shepherds Cottage some two hundred paces from the place where the King of Pontus lay, and finding in it a good charitable old man, I told him in what condition my Master was, but did not acquaint him with his quality. This honest officious Shepherd calling up all his family, went with me to the root of that Tree where I left the King of Pontus in a swoond; and being moved with compassion he did not only carry him to his Cottage, but he dressed his wounds, telling him that it was his fortune in his youth to receive a wound, and an old Shepherd shewed him an herb that grew in the wood, which would both stop blood and close up the wound. Truth is Sir, this wise Shepherd having dressed the King of Pontus, he brought him out of his swoond, and was so careful over him, that he saved his life. However, falling into a Feavor, he was not able to go out of this Cottage until he heard that Mandana was carried away, and that you Sir, was marched towards the Massagettans. So that making no question but the place unto which Cyrus went, was that where Mandana was, he made that way, tra|velling only in the night, till he heard of certainty that the Princess Mandana was with Thomiris, and then he resolved to go thither. But Sir, I assure you he had much adoe to take this resolution; and though I am not worthy to be a confident of so great a Princes sorrows, yet I did know some of his thoughts: And indeed he took my diligence about him, since he came from Cumes so kindly, and having none else to talk unto ra|ther then not talk, he would sometimes be moan himself to me: And after I acquainted him where the Princess Mandana was, and who carried her away, I saw the perplexity of his mind. Then seeing he was put to the necessity of chusing one side, he was so per|plexed, that he knew not which to chuse. Sometimes his minde was to fight against that Prince who took Mandana away; but since he could not chuse a heart to be in your Army, he could not resolve upon that course, but chose rather to take the part of The|miris; with a resolution to serve in her Army unknown: And in case he were discovered then to tell the Prince Ariantes that he pretended not now unto Mandana, and all he aimed at, was to hinder Cyrus from enjoying her: For being perswaded, that the Prin|cess would never consent that Ariantes should marry her, he thought that in yielding him all, he yielded him nothing: Thus he went thither, without any hopes but only of seeing Mandana before he died, and to meet with death in that war. This Sir, is the design of the Pontean King, whom I have heard a thousand and a thousand times say, that when he remembered his obligations unto you Sir, he could not chuse but complain against the violence of his passion which forced him to be both unjust and ungrateful. After this, Cyrus seeing the man could tell him no more, he pardoned him: And I will give you leave (said Cyrus) to pass over the River, and to return unto your Master, and tell him from me, that it is the part but of a bad lover, to side with the Ravisher of his Mistress. Tell him further, that if he be truly generous, he will come and employ his valor for her li|berty, and fight in my Army: Tell him, that I offer him all that the Princess Araminta his sister offered him in Didia: And since the Gods are not pleased that his merits should move the heart of Mandana me thinks he should rather yield her unto me, then unto the Prince Ariantes. Tell him that Mandana will hate him if he fight for her Ra|lvisher, and will be his friend if he fight for her liberty.

Cyrus having spoken these words, he left this Cavilier, and as he marched on, he complained unto Indathorses, that fortune should send so violent a man amongst his enemies. When he came near his Tent and lighted from his horse, some Caviliers brought four men unto him which they had stopped as they endeavored to get over the River. As soon as he cast his eyes upon the eldest of them, he knew him to be no ordinary man; yet his clothes were mean and careless, and his face rather illfavored then fair; yet for all this, there was such a sprightliness in his phis|ionomy, and such fine tranquility in his looks, that Cyrus was moved thereby to that opinion; the rest of his companions were handsome, and in the prime of their age; but as for him, he seemed to be above fifty.

Page 85Indathorses being with Cyrus, knew him to be Anacharsis; so that this worthy Ne|phew of such an illustrious Uncle spoke first unto Cyrus: I hope Sir (said he unto him) that these prisoners will find a favourable reception, as soon as you shall know, that the famous Anacharsis, whom I sought so all over Greece, is now in your power. Since my Souldiers (replied Cyrus most obligingly) ought to take none but my Enemies Prisoners, and since I do not take the wise Anacharsis to be one of that number, I declare him free, and am so far from thinking him my prisoner, that I shall think it a great honour if he will give me leave to be his friend: Sir, replied Anacharsis, you have no reason to rank me in the number of your Enemies, since I have made too publike a profession of being a friend unto all such as are owners of any extraordinary merit, not to esteem my self in being yours. But Sir, I desire you as a singular favour to believe, that I do not at all give you my friendship as you are the Conquerour of Asia, but as you are the Conquerour of Vices, and a Professor of all the virtues. Did you know me Sir, replied Cyrus, and should then commend me as you do, I should think my self the most glorious of men; but since you know me only by Fame, which has long used to flatter me, I cannot take any great delight in the commendations of a man who merits them the most of any man living.

After this, that place being unfit for any long discourse, Cyrus took Anacharsis by the hand, and carried him unto his Tent; as soon as he was there, he asked him who those were which were with him; who seemed more like Grecians then Scithians? Sir, replied Anacharsis, he who is next you is indeed a most illustrious Greek, called Chersias, a most excellently accomplished man, and one who is young as he is, is thought worthy as well as Menesiphiles and Diocles to be at that famous Banquet of the Seven Sages, where it was my happiness to meet them, and of which all the world hath so much talked. To be born a subject unto the Sage Bias, (replied Cyrus) to be the friend of the wise Ana|chcharis, and to have been in the society of Periander, Cleobulus, Solon, Pittacus, Thales, and Chilon, is so great an advantage, as it is easily believed that Chersias does merit that honour. I assure you Sir (replied Chersias) if all those you have named should often make such ill choice of their friends as they have done of me, they would not merit the names of wise; but to say truth, certainly they had never done it, but in advantage unto me; I am most sure, that Solon in chusing Menesiphiles, whom you see there, was not deceived in his choice, no more then the King of Corinth in loving Diocles, whom you see there next that generous Athenian: For my part, replied Diocles, I am obliged in memory of that great Prince of whom I had the honour to be loved, to say, that it was my zeal unto his glory which made him excuse all my faults: And I may also say (added Menosiphiles, that it was my love unto my Country which moved Solon to be my friend: How|ever it be Sir, said Cyrus, I do already much esteem you all, though I have not yet had the honor of knowing you: But I beseech you, what cause did move three famous Greeks to come into Scithea, which doubtless is nothing so pleasant a Country as Greece? Sir (replied Anacharsis and smiled) these famous Grecians would perswade me, that they came hither more for love of me, then out of any curiosity of travelling, but I cannot tell whether I should merit the friendship of so many wise men if I should suffer my self to be so easily deceived: For my part (replied Diocles) the strongest motive of my ma|king this journey was to see the Country where the man was born whom the Sages of Greece admired. As for me (added Chersias) I cared not so much for seeing the Country of Anacharsis as for seeing Anacharsis himself, and for bettering my self by his wis|dome: I must sincerely acknowledg Sir, (said Menesiphiles) that the reason of my cros|sing the Seas, and passing out of Europe into Asia, was not only to follow Anacharsis, but also to have the honour of being a witness to some of those great acts which Fame speaks so loud of through all the world; and to see in your person Sir, the man whom of all people in the world the famous Solon most esteems; and he charged me to tell you Sir, how joyed he was when he heard of your generous act in saving the King of Lydia from the fury of the faggot: I am extremely glad, replied Cyrus, that Solon can remember me; and I assure you I will omit no opportunity of letting you see how much I ho|nor the virtue of that wise man. After this, Cyrus used a thousand obliging expressions unto that famous Scithian, who answered him with all imaginable civility; and though there was a kind of natural severity in his disposition, and though he was a professed E|nemy unto all frivolous ceremonies which pass for the complements of the time, yet his travels through Greece and Egypt had a little sweetened the severity of his nature, and Page 86 something civilized his Phyl|osophy: So that though he was a little austeer, yet he was also sweet and pleasing, and Cyrus did him all honors imaginable; he would have them in one of his Tents, he caused his own Officers to wait upon them, and he treated Chersias, Diocles, and Menesiphiles so well, that they were charmed with his generosity. In the mean time, since the mind of Cyrus did run continually upon the interests of Mandana, it came into his thoughts to desire Anacharsis that he would be a Mediator betwix Tho|miris and him, for having a design to send unto that Princess before he entred into her Country, he conceived this wise Scithean to be fitter then any other to perswade her. This thought no sooner came into his head, but he imparted it unto Mazares, who a|pproved of it.

So that to lose no time, he went unto the Tent where Anacharsis was lodged, and took him aside to propound his desires unto him: To testifie unto you Sir, said Cyrus, how much I honor your virtue, and how well I am perswaded of all that Fame speaks concerning your sufficiency and honesty, I beseech you, wise Anacharsis, to arbitrate the business betwix me and the Queen of Massagettes, I desire you would go unto her, and move her to release the Princess Mandana, who she cannot detain without a gross viola|tion of all Laws; for I will render so much respect unto that Princess, as I will not make any War upon her, until after she hath denied me what with all Justice I shall demand: Sir, replied Anacharsis, I know not how to be an Arbitrator of your differences; for since I can never take any unjust side, I declare unto you, that though I be a Scithean, I cannot side with Thomiris, but am absolutely all for you; yet if you please Sir to honor me with the Quality of your Ambassador, I shall with all my heart go unto that Prin|cess, and endeavour to infuse some reason into her soul, and prevent a war which can|not chuse but prove deep in blood: For Sir (added this wise Scithean very modestly) I believe I do understand the language of Thomiris better then any about you doth; also I have Greek enough to understand your meaning. After this, Cyrus to lose no time, acquainted him with the state of things, and without telling him how Thomiris was in love with him, he instructed him in all reasons and expedients to perswade that Queen. Cyrus also spoke to him concerning the Princess Araminta, that he would endeavour her liberty; and after he had talked above two hours in private with him, it was resolved that Anacharsis should pass over the river the next morning, and accordingly this resolution was executed. Cyrus would have set Anacharsis forth in an equipage befitting his worth; but he told him, that thanks be to the Gods he had long since left off all manner of vanities; and therefore beseeched him to let him go by himself without any other company; for Chersias, Diocles, and Menesiphiles being Greeks, and the Massagettans not loving that Nation, he thought it not convenient to carry them; yet Cyrus would not suffer him to go so, but would needs have Ortalques and two servants go with him, and the reason why Cyrus made choice of Ortalques was, because he intended to write by him unto the Princess Mandana, to Araminta, and to Gelonide, unto whom he was already known: But to the end the voyage of this Sage Scithean might the better prosper, Cyrus sent Aldonacris another way to perswade Ariantes not to persist in his unjust course: Anabaris also gave Ortalques many Letters for some friends he had about the Tents-Royal, whom he desired they would move Thomiris to restore Mandana. So that thus many men negoti|ating at once, there was some reason for hope that the voyage of Anacharsis would not be in vain. In the mean time, this wise Scithean having wafted over the River in a Boat, he was stopped by some Souldiers on the other side, who after they knew his business, conducted him to Thomiris.

But whilst Anacharsis was going to this Queen, Cyrus was making prayers for the hap|py success of his voyage, and that Thomiris might be as much moved by his reasons, as he was by o|s virtue: However, Cyrus knowing that in the best hoped for expeditions, was <◇> be looked unto; so he gave all necessary Orders for making a Bridg of Boats, and he divided his time so well, that he had some to spend in visiting of these three friends unto Anacharsis, who seemed unto him to be worthy of that honor: Sometimes he would t <...> <◇> of the late Corinthean King, and of the Queen his Daughter; sometimes a|lg+n he would speak of Sol <...> concerning Policrite, and of Pisistrates unto Menesiphiles; and sometimes he would desire Chersias to discourse concerning the wise Bias, unto whom he was a Subject: But he taked principal unto them all three concerning Anacharsis, for since <...> upon the <...> tion of Mandana's liberty, he thought it his duty to <...> st in him, the <...> any else.

Page 87So that one morning having Indathorses, Chersias, Diocles and Menesiphiles with him: He conjured them all to tell him what they knew concerning him. Indathorses then told him, that Anacharsis was wise even in his very Cradle: That indeed he never was a child, that he knew almost all things before he was taught them; That his manners and behav|ior was all innocency, and that his way of life, was ever very far from all that can be named voluptuous. That from his infancy he scoffed at grandure, and would never ad|mit of any difference between men, but what virtue made. This Sir, added Indathorses, was Anacharsis before he went out of the Country of the Thau|roscites, judge you what he is now after so many years travel in Egypt and Greece, which are the places where all the virtues and sublimest Sciences are most practized; and after the friendship of so many ex|cellent men.

For my particular, said Menesiphiles, I can assure you that Solon was charmed with the virtue of Anacharsis, when he came to Athens: And beleeve it, their first meeting was something extraordinary: For Anacharsis beleeving that it was enough to be what he was, to be well received by Solon, he never sought out for any man to present him un|to him, but went himself upon his first visit; So that having clothes meaner then these you see him wear, and Solons minde being possessed with some serious thoughts, he asked him roughly what he was? I am, answered he, a poor stranger, who came to Athens only to be acquainted with you, and to get your friendship. I cannot tell, replied Solon, what advantage you may get, by being acquainted with me, but I know that it is better getting of friends in ones own Country, then in a strange one; If so, answered Anacharsis and smiled, then you that are in your own Country and your own house, must be ac|quainted with me, and make me your friend. This quick answer did much surprize Sol|lon: so that looking better upon Anacharsis, he saw in his phis|ionomy a kinde of gran|dure, which made
